

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

STICAL

DIA.

D.,

N.

HERZOG

THE PROTESTANT
THEOLOGICAL AND ECCLESIASTICAL
ENCYCLOPEDIA:

BEING

A Condensed Translation

OF

HERZOG'S REAL ENCYCLOPEDIA.

WITH ADDITIONS FROM OTHER SOURCES.

BY

REV. J. H. A. BOMBERGER, D.D.,

ASSISTED BY

DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIANS

OF VARIOUS DENOMINATIONS.

VOL. II.

PHILADELPHIA:
LINDSAY & BLAKISTON.

1860.

Entered, according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by LINDSAY & BLAKISTON,
in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

STEREOTYPED BY J. FAGAN.

PRINTED BY C. SHERMAN & SON.

W. H. LINDSAY & B. BLAKISTON
217 N. 3rd St.
PHILADELPHIA

EDITOR'S PREFACE TO VOL. II.

WITH feelings of sincere gratitude, I herewith submit to the public, the Second Volume of this ENCYCLOPEDIA. And an unreserved expression of this gratitude seems to me to be due, first of all, to the goodness of the Lord, who has sustained me in the prosecution of the arduous and responsible work, and next to the unanimous favor with which the results of my labors, as each Part appeared, has been received. Even when differences of opinion, such as will of course exist in regard to many of the important subjects treated in these volumes, have been occasionally expressed, and when defects, such as all past experience proves to be next to unavoidable in the preparation and publication of literary works, have been pointed out, it has been uniformly done, so far as I have seen, with a spirit of kindness which has made them as grateful as unqualified expressions of approbation. Candid criticisms will always be welcome, and so far as, upon more careful investigation, they may be found correct, shall receive due attention. Of course when the criticism itself is discovered to be faulty, it would be unjust to obey it in mere deference to its author.

As some impatience has been expressed with regard to the apparently slow progress made by this work, it is proper for me to ask attention to the following facts:—

1. To measure the result thus far reached arithmetically, must necessarily lead to an unfair estimate of what has been actually accomplished. Due allowance must be made for the rule of condensation, which is rigidly observed. And as it takes more time to prepare a scientific Review, which is published only once in three months, than a daily newspaper, one week's issue of which may contain more matter by far than the Quarterly, and as it requires a larger amount of toil to write a compact and well-digested short sermon, than a diffuse and superficial long one, so in the case of each Part of a work like this Encyclopedia. Even judging the case mechanically, the number of Parts already issued, contain as much printed matter as twelve ordinary duodecimo volumes. But when, in addition to this, it is remembered, that the two volumes of this work have actually absorbed seven large volumes of the original, containing nearly 800 pp. each, and that it required at least as much time (and more severe labor) faithfully to condense these seven volumes into our two volumes, as would have been needed to give a literal rendering of the entire original, it will be frankly conceded, I think, that all has been achieved that could be fairly expected. Our work has, in this view, really progressed at the rate of nearly two volumes a year: no mean pace this, as any who have ever engaged in a similar undertaking, will cheerfully testify.

2. Another fact for which I beg due consideration, is the great difficulty I have found in securing the services of efficient and reliable co-operators. This has proven a serious hindrance to the more rapid progress of the work, and often embarrassed me beyond measure. Besides having supervision of the work as it passed through the press, I had not expected to prepare more than one-fourth of the matter myself. By turning over the pages of the two volumes now issued, it will be seen that at least twice this amount of labor fell upon me.

Although many gentlemen to whom I applied for aid, are sufficiently conversant with the German language, to be able to use it for private literary purposes, few felt themselves to have sufficient mastery of it, to undertake the preparation of translations for such a work as this.

3. A third cause of delay has been found in the rate of progress made by the original Encyclopedia of Herzog. It will be obvious to those acquainted with the alphabetical difficulties of the case, that I have had to guard against following up the German work too closely, lest an article should be needed for the English work before its appearance in the German. Thus Rechtfertigung (Justification) and Reich Gottes (Kingdom of God) have but recently been published. The original has now, however, reached nearly to the end of the letter R, and of course the difficulty just named is diminishing as it approaches completion.

Independently, however, of all this, no effort is spared to push forward this work as rapidly as can be done, consistently with accuracy and thoroughness. Herzog's work now promises to be finished in the course of another year or eighteen months, and, a kind Providence favoring, the last Part of our condensed translation shall appear in no long time after that date.

In conclusion, I may be allowed to express my gratification at finding the plan of condensation, which has been adopted, gradually receiving the approval even of some who at first objected to it. In a letter recently received from a gentleman of high literary reputation, and superior German scholarship, and who is now preparing one of the longest and most important articles to appear in a future Part, I find the following remark: "Although the Article is a very valuable and interesting one, I propose to abbreviate it still further, especially after I reach page —, where the narrative properly closes. The remaining 25 pp. of the Article are only reflections upon his character in its various aspects. This part, I think, I might abbreviate one-half, if not more." The truth is, that the chief fault of many of the longer articles of Herzog is a diffuseness which greatly detracts from the value and availability of a book of scientific reference. This fault, at least, shall be studiously shunned in the condensed translation. Those turning to it for information, amid the press of studies, will not be compelled to plod through forty weary pages, to ascertain what might be furnished on five or ten.

THE EDITOR.

PHILADELPHIA, September, 1860.

THEOLOGICAL AND ECCLESIASTICAL ENCYCLOPEDIA.

C. [CONTINUED.]

Confession, change of, is the transition from one Church communion or denomination to another. The confession of faith, by which an individual becomes incorporated, as a member, with a religious denomination, must proceed from free conviction; likewise the member of a denomination must be free, so soon as his conviction changes, to follow it, and separate himself from the communion in which he is, and connect himself with that one, to which he has been attracted in heart.

Inasmuch as the Rom. Cath. Church regards herself as the Church, and not merely as a confession or party of the universal Church, she, in perfect consistency, regards every apostasy from herself as an apostasy from the Lord, as he is represented in the Pope and in the Church ruled by him. So long as the Romish Church predominated, she proceeded according to this view against every one who departed from or abandoned her, as a heretic or apostate (see especially c. 13, de hæreticis in VI. [V. 2], Bonifacius, VIII.; also the Art. Apostasy). A change in this respect has taken place, since the Protestant Church has won acknowledgment, and parity with the Romish, although the latter will not admit this equality, nor even acknowledge the Protestant Church to be a Church; wherefore the transition of a Rom. Cath. Christian to Protestantism is still condemned as heresy and apostasy. The Protestant Church, on the other hand, although she is convinced that she possesses the truth of the gospel in a form purer than any other Christian communion, is still far from denying the ecclesiastical character of the Romish Church, and therefore regards transition to the same not as a formal apostasia a fide Christiana.

The first result of the recognition of Protestantism was the freedom of transition of Roman Catholics to it, without prejudice to their social or political position and rights. This was also allowed without limitation, in the religious peace of Augsburg, 1555, to the temporal States of the empire and their subjects, but not to the spiritual ones, on account of which rather, as the parties could not agree, King Ferdinand introduced into Art. 18 of that instrument, the so-called ecclesiastical reservation (reservatum ecclesiasticum), so that the clergy should lose their benefices by their transition. In this form it remained later, (Instrum. Pacis Osnaburg., 1648, Art. V., § 14, 15, 23). The peace of Westphalia determined as to the subjects (Instr. P. Osn., Art. V., § 36, 37), that the transition should be unhindered only in cases in which they enjoyed public or private religious instruction in the year 1624, but where this was not the case, such subjects, on changing their confession, should either voluntarily leave the country, or be compelled to do so by the rulers. Outside of Germany similar, or even severer ordinances existed formerly, and yet exist in single States, as in Spain, Portugal, France, Sweden, Denmark, and other countries.

Confessional changes were also, at times, required or interdicted by private injunctions, as in the case of bequests, wills, &c. That the requirement of a change of confession in a will, &c., is a conditio turpis, and therefore void, there seems to be no question; but it is not so unanimously agreed that, if the condition requires continuance in the confession to which the devisee belonged at the time of the bequest, it may not stand (see EICHORN, deutsches Privatrecht, § 79, Anm. h.). And yet this condition seems, no less than the other, to infringe upon religious freedom. If, therefore, the principle of personal liberty, in the matter of denominational change, may not be restricted, both of the conditions above named must be rejected.

Wherever the laws allow a change of confession, they are always in connection with such presupposition, from which it appears that the transition is a free one. They require, therefore, the necessary knowledge, and make this dependent on a particular age (annus discretionis); and often, also, that the former pastor of the convert discharged his duty properly towards him (thus the earlier legislation of Austria, but only in favor of the Romish Church), or that the pastor had opportunity to persuade the convert back to his original faith.

The effect of a change of confession is the dissolution of the former Church connection; hence the loss of hitherto enjoyed ecclesiastical rights, as the result of declension from ecclesiastical duties, and the gain of such advantages as are secured by the new confession. Civil and political rights do not suffer from it, if there are no special laws against it. The transition to one of the three chief Christian denominations is generally secured from prejudice in Germany, by Art. 16 of the Act of Covenant. As regards the transition to Christian sects, this is often limited, in so far as either the members of the same have not full civil rights, or certain particularities exist for the same, which are not guaranteed to the new convert. (See, as regards the Mennonites, the Prussian edict of July 30, 1789. Decree of the Minister of Home Affairs, June 11, 1852, etc.) The full effect of change of confession by the clergy is limited sometimes (as in France, Austria, etc.,) in favor of the reigning Romish Church, in that the character indelebilis is recognised as belonging to them also by the state, and, therefore, a former priest is not allowed to marry. The transition from a Christian to a non-Christian confession was, until lately, forbidden by ecclesiastical as well as civil punishment. The canonical statute, that such apostates are to be proceeded against as against heretics (c. 13, heret. in VI., cit.), the Romish Church still attempts to enforce, although the civil law has changed (comp. v. (tit.) Savigny, System of present Roman law, Vol. II., p. 233). The laws of particular states differ from each other, some hindering conversion, others not. Frederick II. permitted it in Prussia (see Preusz, Frederick II., Vol. III., p. 220, 221), and the common law, Part II., Tit. XI. § 1, sq., is not against it. Frederick William III. forbid it (Rescript of Nov. 19, 1814, March 10, 1818, Cabinets-ordre, Dec. 21, 1834, etc.) But since the meeting of the provincial synods (except that of Prussia), in the year 1844-5, which declared in favor of the permissibility of transition, it has been allowed, according to the decree of March 30, 1847 (conn. with the patent of April 7, 1847, ministerial rescript of July 28, 1848). It is similar also in Saxony, according to the ministerial rescript of Dec. 29, 1849. The forms which are observed upon the change of confession are, after instruction, baptism, public confession of faith, etc. Whilst the Prot. Church generally receives to the Lord's Supper Roman Catholic converts upon their reception of the Protestant faith, the Romish Church requires, according to the circumstances, a more or less solemn abjuration. Thus, Lucius III. already decreed in c. 9, X. hæreticis (V. 7) every heretic coming to her "errorem suum ad arbitrium episcopi regionis . . . abjurare et satisfactionem congruam exhibere." In France and Belgium, Protestant converts are first even rebaptized. Abjuration is followed by the removal of the bann, under which the non Roman Catholic lies, according to the view of that Church.

H. F. Jacobson. — BECK.

Confession, in an ecclesiastical respect, designates the acknowledgement of sins, and this in a two-fold sense: in the wider sense, of repentance, or of penance as a sacrament; and in the narrower sense, of an avowal of such repentance, confessio oris, as a part of the Romish sacrament of penance. The Evang. Church, in part, retained the term to designate an act of preparation for the Lord's Supper. In correspondence with the gospel call to repentance, which is reiterated by all evangelical preaching, there arose a special penitential service, with a public confession of sin (ἱξομολόγησις, cf. Acts 19 : 18). This, according to IREN., adv. hæc.; TERTULL., de pœnit.; CYPR., epp. 10, 13, &c., consisted in a confession of sin, joined to penitential acts, made before the congregation, or the episcopal presbytery, with the request that they would pray for the reconciliation of the penitents to God and the Church. But this occurred chiefly in the case of open scandal, rarely for private sins; the custom of confessing private sins to special penitentiaries first arose in the 3d cent. In 390, however, the patriarch Nectarius, of Constantinople, was induced to abolish this office in the Orient (SOCRATES, H. E., V., c. 19; Sozom. H. E. VII., c. 16), and allow each one to choose his own confessor. Still, private C. to particular priests continued, and ultimately prevailed over public C. The letter of Leo I. (459) to the BB. of Campania, contributed influentially to this result. In that (ep. 168, ed. BALLERIN.; 136, ed. QUESN.; cf. GRATIAN in c. 61 et 89, dist. I. de pœnit.), he rejects public C. as unapostolical, and recommends private C. as sufficient, and every way preferable. In the Orient, however, it continued a matter of personal choice. The Conc. Cabilonense, 813 (c. 33), declared: Conf. itaque, quæ Deo fit, purgat peccata: ea vero, quæ Sacerdoti fit, docet, qualiter ipsa purgentur peccata (cf. GIESELER, Eccl. H., I., 306; II., 62, 349, &c.). GRATIAN (l. c.; Can. XXXIII., q. III.) collects the different views, and says: utraque sententia fautores habet sapientes et religiosos viros. PETER LOMB. (Sent. l. IV. dist. 17) says: oportere Deo primum et deinde Sacerdoti offerri conf., nec aliter posse pervenire ad ingressum Paradisi, nisi adsit facultas. These wavering opinions were settled by INNOC. III., in Can. 21 of the 4th Lateran Council, 1215, ordering that every Catholic Christian should, on pain of excommunication, confess all his sins at least once a year, about Easter. This was confirmed by Trent (Sess. 14, c. V. de pœnit.) In the primitive Church, sins were confessed either to God only, or to fellow Christians (James 5 : 16, &c.), who needed not be ordained clergy. But when sins came to be distinguished into mortal and venial, it was thought requisite to confess the former to priests. (For the view which obtained in the 12th and 13th cents., see Gieseler and P. Lombard, l. c.) The truly contrite are forgiven by God. They prove their contrition by μετανοία, pœnitentia. The idea of pœna being thus associated with the matter, various penances came to be imposed by the Church as a satisfaction; these corresponded to the character of the sin (see Penitential). On the performance of these penances, the confessor pronounced the following form over the penitent: Dominus absolvat te — Misereatur tui omnipotens Deus et dimittat tibi omnia peccata tua . . . et perducatur te ad vitam æternam, &c. In the 13th cent., a more imperative form was used. P. Lombard (l. c. dist. 18) says: Deus tribuit sacerdotibus potestatem solvendi et ligandi, i. e. ostendendi homines ligatos vel solutos. T. Aquinas ascribes an operative efficacy to the matter, and his view is confirmed by the Conc. Trid. Sess. 14, c. 6, de pœnit. ; can. 9, eod. and cap. 3. This completed the Romish system of sacramental penance.

As a rule, C. must be oral or auricular, and only exceptionally by writing. It must include all sins, though in fatal emergencies a general confession is allowed. No compensation could be required by the priest, though it became an established custom to present free-will offerings (nummus confessionarius) at the time, as an alms, or for the maintenance of the Church and its services (HARTZHEIM, Conc. Germ., T. I., 109; T. VI., 606). Upon the principles of the Romish Church concerning this subject, see: KLEE, die Beichte, Mainz, 1828; SIEMERS, die sacr. Beichte, Münster, 1844; BINTERIM, Denkwürdigk., V., Th. 2 and 3.—The Greek C. differs from the Romish only in not so rigidly requiring auricular confession (AUGUSTI, Denkwürdigk., IX., 214, &c.).

The Reformers all agree in declaring that C. in the Romish sense is no divine ordinance, and, therefore, that it must be conformed to the spirit of the gospel. Luther distinguishes a threefold C.; 1. that before God (Ps. 32: 5), the C. of faith; 2. that to our neighbor, the C. of love; 3. that of the Pope, with more varieties of sins than one can comprehend, and which is compulsory. But God does not force men to the true confession of sin, much less does he enjoin this (WALCH, Luther's Works, XI., 799). The Evangelical Symbols, therefore, reject a compulsory C., and leave it to Christians to confess as often and when they please, although private C. was still retained (see Luther's Manual of C.; Walch, l. c., X., 2767; XI., 802; XIX., 105; XX., 59, &c.). Melancthon says: absolutio privata sic necessaria est ut baptisma (loci theol. ed. pr., 155). Calvin: Jacobus liberum permittit delectum, ut ei confiteamur, qui ex eccl. grege maxime idoneus fuerit visus. Quia tamen pastores præ aliis ut plurimum judicandi sunt idonei, potissimum etiam nobis eligendi erunt, &c. (Instit. lib. III., c. 3, § 18, c. 4, § 12. Cf. Conf. Augsb., Arts. 11, 12, 25; Conf. Helvet., II., c. 14; Smalc. Art. III., art. 7, 8; Declar. Thoruniensis, de pœnit., § 2). Accordingly, the Lutheran and Reformed Churches varied in their practice; in the former, private, in the latter, general, C. was made a preparatory to the Lord's Supper. In many Lutheran Churches, however, the latter practice has prevailed for the last century, whilst some Reformed theologians have advocated private C. (ENDEMANN, instit. theol. dogm., Hannov. 1778; AUGUSTI, l. c. 183). At present the tendency is towards a restoration of private C., with evangelical modifications (see Ztschr. f. Protest. u. Kirche for Feb. 1847, p. 96, &c., for Aug. and Sept. 1852, p. 152, &c.; Theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1852, p. 955, &c.; Proceedings of the 5th Ev. Kirchentag, publ. Berlin, 1852, p. 58, &c.; Ev. K.-Ztg. 1845, No. 77).

C. essentially includes absolution (LUTHER's Smaller Cat.); in private C., in the indicative or collative, in public C., in the declarative, form. But, notwithstanding its connection with the power of the keys, absolution is not performed as an act of jurisdiction by the confessor, since, in the evangelical system, this power is vested, not in an individual, but in the Church.

By ancient customs and rules, which were early incorporated into the canon law, the confessor was considered bound (sigillum confessionis) to keep any secret officially revealed to him (BASIL. ad Amphil. ep. c. 24; AUGUST., c. 19, Can. II., q. 1; LEO I., ep. to the B. of Camp., l. c. Comp. BINTERIM, l. c., III., 309; UHLEIN, de sig. confess., Heidelb., 1823). This principle is virtually maintained in the Ev. Church, even where confession itself has been abolished.

H. F. JACOBSON.*

Confessor, Father. The Romish Church requires a confessor to be an ordained priest. The paternal relation between a convert and the personal instrument of his conversion is suggested in 1 Cor. 4: 15; Gal. 4: 19. This was afterwards transferred to the relation existing between a confessor and his confessant (c. 7-9, Can. XXX., q. I.; Gratian on c. 7, cit.). It was early assumed that the right of receiving confessions belonged to Bishops, in whose absence, however, they might be made, in extremities, to presbyters or deacons (BINTERIM, Denkw., &c., V., 2, p. 183). Since 800, presbyters were authorized to receive them. As, in the Romish C., absolution involves jurisdiction, each C. had a distinct district assigned to him (cf. GIESELER, Eccl. H., III., § 109, p. 88, n. 3; CONC. TRID., s. 23, c. 15, de ref., and s. 14, c. 7, de pœnit.). Every parishioner, therefore, is the confessant of the regular priest of his parish, without whose consent he may confess to no one else, excepting in articulo mortis. In cathedrals, however, penitentiaries are appointed, and special confessors are provided for nuns (Conc. Trid., s. 24, c. 10, de regul.). But laymen are expressly forbidden to receive confessions, under any circumstances (BENED. XIV., de syn. diac., lib. VII., c. 16, § 11). Ev. Churches, which retain the practice, allow non-officials to receive confessions and pronounce absolution (Smalcald Art., App., of the power of Bishops); and this is consistent with their denial of the sacramental nature of confession; but the rule is, that ordained clergymen hold confession as a preparatory to the Lord's Supper. Ancient laws prescribed that C. should be made in some exposed part of the Church; the Synod of Paris decreed (829) that nuns should make it at the altar, with some witnesses near (cf. HARTZHEIM, Conc. Germ., III., 528, 598, 664). Even in the 16th cent., a locus conspicuus, &c., is prescribed (HARTZHE., VII., 174, 850). The first distinct traces of CONFSSIONALS are found in Italy, where the Synod of Consenza, 1579, and of Maffi, 1591, direct that every church shall have as many confessionals as it has confessors, but that they shall be so arranged as to be easily seen, and so that the confessant may be heard, but not seen by the confessor. Soon after this, confessionals are found in Germany and the Netherlands, &c. (see BINTERIM, l. c., V., Th. II., 233; HARTZB., VIII., 688, 777; IX., 109). The confessant received a shrove-ticket, certifying to his having performed the duty; and the names of confessants were recorded in an appropriate register. H. F. JACOBSON.*

Confirmation. In the apostolic Church, the laying on of hands was connected with baptism, as the means of communicating the gift of the Holy Ghost. In comparing Heb. 6 : 2 with Acts 19 : 6, they may seem to be separate acts; and, according to Acts 8 : 12-19, this separation and the view that the laying on of hands was an apostolic, afterwards episcopal, privilege, may seem to be required. Meanwhile, on closer examination, these two passages much rather show in perfect agreement with Matt. 3 : 11, Luke 24 : 49, &c., and Acts 2 : 38, that baptism was incomplete without the laying on of hands and the gift of the Holy Ghost; wherefore Protestant polemics should never have allowed itself to accept the declaration, that these passages did not refer to the Holy Ghost, but only to the special gifts of the Spirit in apostolic times. If (Acts 8) baptism was possible without the communication of the Spirit, then, according to Acts 10 : 44-48, may this latter also precede, and baptism become merely the external symbolical completion of what really took place before. Thus also the communication of the Spirit is not connected with the transaction which the apostles completed, even though it generally appear (comp. Epp. to Timothy) connected with the office; only not with the episcopal, as distinguished from the presbyterial. Was baptism more freely administered, then it was equal to that of John the Bapt. (comp. Acts 8 and 19), and thus peculiar Christian baptism is still only completed by the complementary transaction of the laying on of hands. Baptism holds this relation also in the first centuries, only that the anointing with oil was early added. Tertullian describes it as extending through the three transactions, viz., baptism proper, anointing with holy oil, and the laying on of hands, so that the last is the culmination of the whole. The unity of the transaction is preserved in the three acts being bound to the person of the Bishop. The question concerning the validity of baptism by heretics gave occasion to the distinction and separation of both transactions, so far as the party, which would not repeat baptism, still made the laying on of hands necessary. Another occasion of the subsequent separation of the two transactions, was given by allowing the lower clergy to baptize, and restricting the laying on of hands to the Bishop. Jerome entered the lists in favor of baptism, as against the importance of the laying on of hands. Augustine contended against the sacramental effect of the same. Innocent I. makes a two-fold anointing, that of baptism, and that of confirmation. It was the interest of the hierarchical system which caused the decision in favor of the particularity of confirmation, and of the enhancing of its importance. It was this decision, also, which gradually developed the episcopal act of confirmation into the second sacrament, which was established as such by the Synods of Lyons (1274) and Florence (1439). Baptism was nullified through the laying on of hands by the Cathari, from another point of view.

The sacrament of confirmation, which is called confirmatio from the act, sigillum or consignatio from the result, chrisma from the material, impositio manuum or unctio from the form, is, in the Romish Church, the second in order. The laying on of hands is superseded in it by the anointing, which fully agrees with the sacerdotal practice of the O. T., which is the basis of it. It is administered only by the Bishop, who performs it as occasion requires in the various places of his diocese; the ancient seasons also, Easter, Whitsunday, Emberdays, must yield to convenience and possibility. The high altar has been substituted, as the place of the transaction, for the earlier sacristy; and the forenoon instead of the evening. The subject for confirmation must be at least seven years old. A spiritual preparation is recommended, but not made as necessary as the external one of fasting, cutting off the hair, etc. He generally has a sponsor, and receives a confirmation name. The transaction, after a salutation and prayer, consists properly in this, that the Bishop makes the sign of the cross with the thumb of the right hand upon the forehead of the person being confirmed, using the chrism as the matter of the sacrament, and says: signo te signo crucis et confirmo te chrismati salutis, after which follows a slight blow upon the right cheek, and the salutation of peace (of doubtful significance). The effect of the sacrament is the communication of the Spirit for the augmentum and firmitas justitiæ, as equipment for the battle of life, and, in contrast with baptism, as the introduction to the proper activity of gratia gratum faciens. The sacrament is not absolutely necessary; and, as giving a character indelibilis, is not to be repeated.—The Greek Church has substantially the same sacrament, but permits every priest to administer it, and that immediately after baptism.

Confirmation was rejected as a sacrament by the Protestants from the beginning, for the two-fold reason, that it lacked the signs of a sacrament, i. e., the institution by Christ and special command, and because it detracted from baptism. The Reformers did not stop with rejecting it as such, but they also sought to substitute something of an evangelical nature in its stead—the catechization of youth, and an evangelical act of confirmation. Though the latter was adopted at first only by a minority, it must not be concluded that there was a fundamental opposition to it by the majority; the difficulty of its introduction and adoption explains itself from the great opposition to the Romish sacrament, and any approximation to it. It was practised, however, in Pomerania, Geneva, &c. The transaction is everywhere divested of a sacramental character; the intercessory laying on of hands takes the place of anointing with oil, and the act itself is regarded as a confession of faith. A difference in this procedure between the Lutherans and Reformed scarcely existed. The Church of England took a peculiar position, which approximates nearest to the Romish, in that it allows only the Bishop or his delegates to administer it. Chemnitz gave the Evangelical idea of confirmation its comprehensive expression. The ceremony, however, did not only not extend itself further, towards the end of the 17th cent., but even went out of use where it existed, with but a few exceptions. Its continuance was preserved by pietism. After several attempts (as by Heinsius, in Frankfort on the Oder), Spener re-established it in Frankfort on the Maine (1666). Its re-introduction into the Protestant Church was now so rapid, that it seemed as if a universal desire existed for it. Several Churches introduced it; the government approved, and then law made it binding; this was, in general, the way it spread. Still, it required the whole of the past and part of the present century to make its re-introduction general; and it was not done everywhere without opposition. The Reformed Church, undistinguished from the Lutheran also here, accommodated itself (entirely only later) to the ruling spirit. Spener's idea is not quite the old Protestant one. In his view, confirmation is the renewal of the baptismal covenant, and has, first of all, an awakening significance. Its reference to the congregation receded into the background decidedly; wherefore, he did not insist upon its publicity. An opposition between this view and that of the Reformers, according to which the most important point was catechization, can only be made when this act of awakening in some way prejudices the sacrament of baptism. If the awakening consists entirely in the becoming conscious of the grace of baptism, it corresponds with what catechization should effect. A knowledge of the faith was the least that, at first, must be required, as against the deadness of good works; personal appropriation is only the complete attainment of the same end. The danger, it is true, was near of again separating the new birth from baptism, and making it to be a second transaction, only not a sacerdotal sacramental, but a human self-active one. This has also been the history of the apprehension and practice of it during the last century, and to the present time.

The universal presupposition of Protestant confirmation is special preparatory catechisation. The rite itself is divided into two parts—confession of faith, and the laying on of hands. Confession may, however, again be divided into three parts: examination, confession proper, and vows. The pietistic and rationalistic tendency gives prominence to free examination, whilst the purer churchly view either entirely excludes this, or transfers it from the rite itself to the conclusion of catechization. The laying on of hands has not a sacramental, but an intercessory character; and is, therefore, only relatively different from any other ecclesiastical blessing. As to the age of those confirmed, the Protestant Church from the beginning regarded the 12th or 14th year as the lowest. The time of administering the rite is generally Palm Sunday, Quasimodogeniti, or Whitsunday, whence the catechization occurred during Lent. The publicity of confirmation has become the rule. As a general thing, the formal ceremony of confirmation in the Protestant Church must remain, to a certain extent, an adiaphoron (cfr. Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten u. s. w., VII.).

WEIZSÄCKER. — Reck.

Congregation, the, of the faithful, of Christians (ecclesia), in the widest sense, includes all who are united by a common faith to Christ, as their Redeemer and Lord, and with each other; in a narrower sense, a local part of the Church. Ordinarily, the word designates the congregation of some particular place. Thus in this article. Unity of faith begets communion. Thus arose the earliest Christian churches, of which the first converts then received charge (Acts, 14 : 23; Rom. 16 : 5; Tit. 1 : 5; 1 Cor. 14 : 15. Cf. Clem. Rom., ep. I., ad Cor., c. 42). But the Apostles were far from limiting the activity of the congregation to their officers (comp. 1 Thess. 5 : 12; Heb. 13 : 7, 17, 24; 1 Cor. 14 : 33, 40, with 1 Cor. 12 : 7, &c.; Eph. 4 : 7, 11, &c.; John, 14 : 23; Heb. 2 : 11, et al.). All the members, therefore, must labor for the upbuilding of the spiritual house, and share the responsibility of the furtherance and maintenance of the Church. They even participated in the Apostolic Synod, mentioned Acts, 15 : 12, 22, &c. (see also 1 Cor. 6; Matt. 18 : 16, 17; 1 Cor. 5 : 1, &c.; 2 Cor. 2 : 6; 2 Thess. 3 : 6, 7, &c.). They also conduct the entire public worship (Col. 3 : 15–17). But the harmony which originally existed between the C. and its officers was soon disturbed by the transfer of the O. T. idea of the priesthood to the N. T. Thus the terms priest and called (κληροποι) were limited to the officers, whilst the rest were only λαός, the people, who were denied a share in managing the Church (see Jurisdiction). Even spiritual offices were filled by the Bishop. The law of the N. T. (1 Cor. 12 : 7) is annulled by the canon of the Lateran Council, 1215; Discernimus ut laici eccl. tractare negotia non præsumant; and 1 Cor. 14 : 34 is paraphrased by Alex. IV. thus: Inhibemus quoque, ne cuiquam laicæ personæ liceat publice vel privatim de fide cath. disputare (c. 2, § 1, de hæc. in VI^{to} V., 2). In opposition to a universal priesthood, the Rom. Cat. (P. 11., de ord. sacr., c. 46, &c.) says, it is only interius sacerdotium, which presents its sacrifices on the altar of the heart; that all eccl. functions proceed from the clergy, the eccl. docens, of which the people form the object, not the subject. The clergy represent Christ's prophetic, priestly, and kingly office—they constitute the actual congregation (PHILLIPS, K.-Recht, I., § 8, p. 47, &c.).

It was a part of the business of the Reformation to correct this error, and restore the ev. conception of the C. Luther earnestly insisted upon this (L.'s Works, WALCH, XVI., 2777; XIV., 288; XIX., 1190. Comp. Melanchthon; CALVIN, Inst., IV., c. 4, § 9, c. 9, § 3, c. 19, § 25, &c.). The management of the C., it was contended, belonged to all the members, not to the officers alone; for all participated in the three-fold office of Christ (Luther, l. c., IX., 701). There must of course be offices for the proper maintenance of order, &c.; but these may exist in full unison with the general apostolic principle laid down above. It was in accordance with this principle, therefore, that the Reformers re-organized the C. The form of the organization was three-fold, corresponding to as many spheres of jurisdiction: consistorial, presbyterial, synodal (see Articles). The earlier Ref. and Luth. directories refer external and internal matters to the C., whilst later Lutheran directories (except some more recent ones) limit its functions to the former. Ordinary matters are transacted by the pastor and consistory (comp. Anglican Church).

JACOBSON.*

Conring, Hermann, regarded as the most learned of the noted scholars of the 17th cent., was b. Nov. 9, 1606, at Norden, E. Friesland. In his 14th year he entered the university of Helmstädt, of which he subsequently became the chief ornament. In 1632 he took the chair of Nat. Philosophy in H., and, in 1637, entered the medical faculty. Whilst he excelled as a general scholar, his association with Calixtus and Hornejus led him to devote his learning chiefly to the defence of the claims of Protestantism to independent existence as a part of the universal Church, and the maintenance of its theological tenets. Some of his writings were called forth by the Westphalian peace, and the conversion to Popery of his particular friend and admirer, Baron J. Chr. v. Boyneburg. In several others, he followed Calixtus († 1656) in the advocacy of union measures, or, at least, of greater harmony between the Lutherans and Reformed. He also made valuable contributions to other departments of ecclesiastical literature.¹ He died Dec. 12, 1681.

HENKE.*

Consalvi, Ercole, the last shoot of an old Roman family, was b. at Rome, June 8, 1757, educated in the college at Frascati, and the Acad. Eccl. in Rome, where he excelled in scholarship. In 1781 he entered the Roman prelacy, and, after displaying his zeal and acuteness in several important stations, became Uditor di ruota in 1792. A decided opponent of revolutionary movements, he excited the animosity of the republican rulers of Rome, and barely escaped violence through the aid of the Cardinal of York. After the death of his patron, Pius VI., the conclave, assembled in Venice, appointed him prosecretary. He was thus introduced to Pius VII., who made him Secretary of State, which office he held until June 17, 1806. His greatest work as Secretary was the conclusion of the concordat with France, July 15th, 1801. His subsequent resistance to the demands of Napoleon, led to his dismissal against the Pope's wish. From this time until Napoleon's fall, C. found but little rest. But, immediately upon the Pope's return to Rome, C. hastened to him, and was appointed his legate, to negotiate with the confederate princes at London, and then to represent him at the Congress of Vienna, where he rendered valuable service to his master. Returned from Vienna, he filled the office of Cardinal Secretary until the death of Pius VII., Aug. 20th, 1823. He devoted himself energetically to the reconstruction of the Romish State upon the principles of monarchical absolutism, in conformity with a motuproprio of July 6, 1816, but not with the desired success. His chief strength lay in negotiating concordats, for which his pliant policy seemed specially adapted (RANKE, Staatsverwaltung d. Card. Cons., &c., I. (1832), 624-765). Leo XII. (Sept. 23, 1823) at first deprived C. of all his offices but the Secretaryship of Breves. For a season he left Rome, but was soon recalled by Leo, and appointed Prefect of the Propaganda. This office he held but ten days, when he died, Jan. 24, 1824. It is somewhat remarkable that he did not receive priestly consecration until late in life. (Comp. BARTHOLDI, Züge aus d. Leben d. Card. C., Stuttg., 1824; RANKE, l. c.)

MEJER.*

Consilia evangelica, as distinguished from præceptis, are, in the Rom. Church, such moral rules as are not obligatory upon every Christian. But when once assumed, they must be kept. Their observance secures superfluous and transferable merit, and elevates to a higher degree of holiness than could be strictly required. Such rules were early supposed to be found in the Bible (HERM. PAST., Simil. III., 5. 3; ORIGEN, ad Rom., III., quotes Luke 17 : 10; Matt. 25 : 21; 1 Cor. 7 : 8). The doctrine was soon extended to vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, with appeals to Matt. 19 : 11, &c., 21; Luke 14 : 26, &c. (TH. AQUINAS, Sum. II., 1, Q. 108). Gradually twelve such "counsels of Christ" were discovered, including, beside the above, Matt. 5 : 29, 35, 39, 42, &c. The three named above, however, were thought præcipua et substantialia perfectionis consilia.

These works of supererogation were zealously assailed by the Reformers. So far from going beyond, man was continually failing in his duty (AUGUSTANA, Art. VI.; APOLOGIA, c. VI.; FORM. CONC. Art. VI.). They repudiated the distinction between C. ev. and præceptis, as resting upon a pernicious confusion of ideas. The moral law, as the objective idea of the good, of the will of God, must ever be the absolute norm of human willing and doing. And, as nothing can be too small to be defined as duty by that law, so no act can be so high as to exceed its demands. As there are no ethical adiaphora, so burgiorum Conringii, &c., 1663.—De scriptoribus, XVI., p. Chr. n. sæculorum commentarius. De Germanorum imperio Romano.—De angelis; de momento contriv. de gratia et prædest. De sudore Chr. sanguineo. Epist. ad Augustinum ducem de nova S.S. versione Germ., 1666.—Vindicatio suorum in ep. etc. de S. Ebraico codice doctorum ab iniquissimis culumatis M. Wasmuth, 1667.—G. Calixt. nostrum röv vadv et cujus eruditionem, &c. GÖSEL's large ed. of his Opera (Braunsch., 1730, 6 vols. fol.) omits 48 books on medicine, and most of C.'s theological writings. A worthy biography of him is also still wanting. Many of his letters, &c., are publ. in J. D. GRUBER's Anecdota Boineburgica, &c., Hannov., 1745; and in J. BURCKHARDT's Hist. biblioth. Aug., quæ Wolfenb. est, Lpz., 1744, &c.

¹ The extent and variety of his labors in the sphere of religion will appear from the following list of his works: De constit. episcop. German., 1647.—De conciliis et circa ea summæ potestatis auctoritate, 1650. In his Defensio eccl. protestantium adv. duo pontificiorum argumenta (Helmst. 1654), he controverted these two propositions: 1. Where there is an unbroken succession of Bishops and presbyters from the Apostles down, there is the true Catholic Church; but Rome has this, hence, &c.; 2. Where such a succession is wanting, the true C. cannot be found; but Protestants are without it, hence, &c.—Fundamentorum fidei Pontificiæ conclusio, Helmst., 1654. This last called forth several replies, to which he published rejoinders.—Epist. de electione Alex. VII. papæ, 1655.—Animadv. in fratrum Wallen-

also no opera supererogativa: and an imaginarily higher morality, laying claim to such, must, apart from its lack of humility, actually become a lower grade of virtue, a neglect of duty, and immorality. Of course, in order to perceive what is duty for each one in concreto, circumstances and individual position must be carefully considered. To these the first quoted Scriptures refer (1 Tim. 5 : 23 is of a wholly different character). But there is no intimation in them of higher or lower duties. This conception is forbidden by the spirit which must ever actuate the Christian. He must be constrained by love, or a faith working by love, which leads him to embrace the entire law of God, and make it in all things the norm of his life (Rom. 13 : 10; Col. 3 : 17; Luke 16 : 10). Who then shall exempt him from any part of duty; or pronounce compliance with it a work of supererogation? Unable to answer this argument, Rom. theologians were long quiet upon the subject, until MÖHLER (Symbolik) not merely defended the dogma, but charged the Reformers with incapability of seeing that Christians could meet the higher claims of morality. This called forth the refutations of Baur and Nitzsch (see also RORRE, Ethik, III., 91; DE WETTE, Chr. Sittenl. III., 45; FLATT, chr. Moral, p. 12, &c.; THIERSCH, Vorl. über Kathol. u. Prot., II., 166, &c.).

SCHWARTZ.*

Consistorial Church Government. Consistories. The Reformation having produced the separation of the Evangelical from the Romish Church, made it necessary that the former should effect a distinct organization. Luther had not contemplated a rupture of his former connection; up to 1555 he thought of retaining the old episcopacy, whilst Zwingli and the Reformed had separated more quickly from the Rom. Church. This, combined with other circumstances, gave rise to a difference of church government, styled respectively the Consistorial and Presbyterial forms. In Saxony, the energetic interference of the government was soon felt to be necessary. In 1520 already, Luther, in his address to the German Nobility, had exhorted the estates to assist in renovating the gospel. In 1526 he applied to the elector personally to institute a visitation of the churches and schools (see Ch. visitation). The execution of the rules then adopted was, however, prevented by various difficulties; in matters relating to marriage and excommunication, they were also defective. The "Articles of Smalcald," 1537, pointed out the necessity of special courts for matrimonial affairs. Hence the Elector required of the Wittenberg theologians an "opinion," which was drawn up in 1538, under the title "der Theologen Bedenken von wegen der Consistorien, etc.," by Jonas and Bugenhagen, and examined by Luther and Brück. In this, it is proposed that for "ecclesiastical, matrimonial, and other affairs," consistories should be appointed, whose members — "Judices, Commissarii, Archidiaconi, etc." — should have power to summon parties before them, and pass and execute judgment. For a jurisdiction so extensive, four consistories seemed to be needed. The Elector, however, in 1539, determined to institute at Wittenberg but one consistory, composed of two clergymen and two laymen, to have jurisdiction in matrimonial affairs only. In 1542, however, the execution of Church discipline in general was also referred to it, and another consistory established at Zeitz and Zwickau. The Protestants, being still desirous of a reunion with the Rom. Church, were also quite ready to acknowledge the episcopal office and functions. In this mind, the "Reformatio Wittenbergensis," of 1545, was drawn up by Melancthon, in which the consistories, as ecclesiastical courts, were confined to matters of discipline and marriage, whilst the government of the Church remained in the hands of the Bishops. But these plans were defeated by the resistance of the Bishops themselves. In consequence of this, the governments assumed episcopal rights and duties, deputing them to the consistories. The latter, from Church courts, now became Boards, invested by special commission, and within fixed limits, with the "jura episcopalia." In their origin then, these cv. consistories were Church-Boards; for they had been instituted according to the wish of the representatives of the Church, by governments belonging to the Church, and acting in its name, with a jurisdiction confined to affairs of the Church. Their officers, also, were churchmen, and representatives of the clergy and the congregations. Nor did their character as "judicia ecclesiæ" change, until, the supreme authority in Church and State having been united in one hand, and an intermixture of the two having been thus brought about, they also assumed a civil-ecclesiastical nature. The estates, assembled at Leipsic in 1547, ordered that "the consistories should be so reformed that they might administer spiritual and secular matters." The appointment of clergymen and laymen to the consistories was also already interpreted to mean, that in them both Church and State were represented. Besides this, some matters within their jurisdiction were no longer regarded as ecclesiastical, but as civil in their nature, which were not, however, withdrawn from them, as they were regarded as Boards of a mixed character. Hence the Saxon Ch. constitution of 1580 declares that the "consistories, as not having jurisdiction in matters of religion and conscience merely, but also in secular affairs, such as marriage, the property of the churches and schools, the support and conduct of the clergy, etc., should be equally represented by the Church and State." The principle thus admitted, and the Ch. government constructed upon this basis, necessarily weakened more and more the ecclesiastical character of the consistories, and at last co-ordinated them with the merely secular boards of the State. This consequence, however, owing to the conversion of the Elector, Fr. Augustus, to the Rom. Church, which led to a permanent separation of the jura episcopalia from the person of the sovereign, was never reached in Saxony. But even here, the confusion of civil and ecclesiastical affairs increased, rather than diminished; for there were constant conflicts of jurisdiction between the ecclesiastical and civil courts, and the members of the consistories, also, were regarded as mere servants of the State. In other Churches, especially that of Prussia, the confusion became still greater. These consistories soon rose to the highest favor in the other evangelical countries, and were generally introduced, as is evident from the Ch. constitutions of the 16th cent. In some states they were introduced in the 17th cent., as in Hesse, 1599, 1610; in Waldeck, 1676-80. In the Mark Brandenburg, the episcopal government at first maintained itself. The same is also recognised in the Ch. constitution of 1540 for the older diocese of Brandenburg. In the latter, however, jurisdiction is assigned to a consistory. In the dioceses of Havelberg and Lebus, a consistory was established on the Saxon model in 1543, and, in 1573, their Ch. government was completed, according to the principles prevailing in Saxony. In the duchy of Prussia, where the spiritual episcopate continued up to 1587, two consistories were established. In the Brandenburg-Prussian states there was, from the beginning, a strong tendency to territorialism, which at last increased so far that the consistories were, in 1804, abolished for East Prussia, and, in 1808, for the other Prussian states, and their functions transferred to mere State authorities. From this subjugation to the State, the Church was gradually liberated after 1815. The law of April 30, 1815, restored the consistories, which, however, were not regarded as real Church-Boards, since, being composed of Protestant and Rom. Cath. members, they administered also the rights of the sovereign concerning the sacra of the Rom. Church, and had a general supervision of the cultus of all other religious parties. By the enactment of Dec. 31, 1825, they were constituted pure Protestant Boards. Their duties, however, still continued to be of a mixed civil-ecclesiastical character. For these frequent changes in the Protestant Church of Germany, its consistorial Ch. government is no little to be blamed. This mode of Ch. government has its evident advantages, as it gives unity to the administration of the Church, and furnishes also, in the person of the common head—the Protestant sovereign—an index of the intimate relation of civil and ecclesiastical affairs. Its one-sided application, however, is injurious, since it destroys the independence of the Church, degrades it to a mere institution of the State, and withdraws all participation in the government of the Church from the congregations. But these evils were not designed by its founders, who wished the consistory to be one among other organs through which ecclesiastical affairs were to be administered. The congregations, the colleges of the elders or other officers, the representatives of united congregations, synods for smaller or larger districts, were not to be deprived of their functions in the government. The administration of discipline, also, and not merely that of its temporalities, was to belong to the congregation. But when, subsequently, the words of the Lord in Matt. 18: 17, εἰπὲς τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, were interpreted as having reference only to the consistory, all discipline in the Luth. Church declined, as a necessary consequence.—Nor did the consistories at first set aside the meeting of synods. These latter were abolished by the Saxon Ch. constitution of 1580, which substituted for them the general synods of the consi-

tories. The fundamental idea of the consistorial government consists in this, that in virtue of it the jurisdictio ecclesiastica, previously in the hands of the Rom. Bishops, i. e., the entire administration of Ch. government as a jus episcopale, passed over into the hands of the Protestant governments, especially of the sovereign; in so far, namely, as such a Ch. government still existed in the Prot. Church, without detriment to its principle of liberty of conscience, and its objects did not belong to the clerical office, as jura ordinis, nor to the congregations, as jura collegialia. According to the confessions, Ch. constitutions, and other writings of the Reformers, the jus episcopale embraces 1, ecclesiastical legislation; 2, ecclesiastical supervision; 3, appointment to offices; 4, Ch. property. These rights, or rather duties, were, however, to be exercised with the co-operation of the Church. Hence special Church-Boards were appointed, who were charged with the administration of them, in the name and with the authority of the sovereign, in so far as the latter had not reserved them to himself. These reserved rights, pertaining generally to legislation, and certain provisions and dispensations, are submitted to a special superior Board, composed of the counsellors of the sovereign, generally the ministry of justice and of the police. This led to a confusion of Church and State, which subsequent measures were intended to remedy, without, however, any great success. The consistories are subordinate to the superior Boards, whether these are a Spiritual Ministerium, Superior Consistorium, or Superior Ch. Council. They are the chief organs of the administration of ecclesiastical affairs. Hence the Prussian constitution says: "Among the Protestants, the rights and duties of Bishops belong to the consistories;" whence, it is evident that the consistory, just as a Bishop, is placed over the congregations of a district—diocese—as its spiritual authority. Its particular constitution and sphere of labors depend upon the provisions of the different consistorial and Ch. constitutions. A layman, skilled in executive affairs, is generally at its head.—The labors of the consistories embrace the general direction and supervision of the Church and its institutions, such as schools, etc., a limited legislation, the granting of various dispensations, jurisdiction in matrimonial affairs and Ch. discipline, etc. In Saxony, up to 1831, the consistories had charge of 1, doctrine and public worship, the churches, Ch. institutions and schools, their respective officers—examination, ordination, installation; 2, the administration of ecclesiastical penal jurisprudence in its various branches. After 1831, these labors were materially circumscribed. The members of the consistories are appointed by the sovereign.

See Jacobson, über d. Gründ. d. Verschiedenh. d. luth. u. ref. K. Verfass., in Schneider's deutsch. Zeitschr. f. christl. Wissensch., 1852, No. 49. De Wette, Luther's Briefe, Reyscher u. Wilda, Zeitschr. für deutsch. Recht, Vol. IV. Richter, K. Ordnungen d. 16 Jahrh. Luther's Werke, von Walch, Vol. X. Weber, syst. Darstell. des im K. Sachsen geltend. K.-Rechts. Heppel, die Einführ. der Verbesserungspunkte in H.-Kassel, 1849. Carl Curtze, Gesch. d. ev. K.-verfass.

des Fürstenth. Waldeck. Mylius, Corp. Constit. Marchic. Bretschneider, Corp. Reform., Tom. III. J. H. Böhmer, jus eccl. Protest., lib. I. Köhler, Handb. der kirchl. Gesetzgeb. f. d. Gr.-Herzogth. Hessen.

II. F. JACOBSON. — Reinecke.

Constance, Council of (from Nov. 5, 1414, to April 22, 1418). The Council of Pisa (1409), the first of the three ecclesiastical assemblies of the 15th cent. from which a reformation of the Church in head and members was expected, at least apparently prevented schism in the Church. It summoned two popes before it as the highest tribunal of the Church, deposed both, and raised Alexander V. to the papal chair. He soon died, and the cardinals elected in his stead Baldassar Cossa, who called himself John XXIII., who was a worthless character, crafty and daring, licentious, and capable of any crime, covetous of money in order that he might use it as a means of power, in short, a man who was better qualified to be a brigand than a successor of Peter. But the two deposed popes, Gregory XII. (Angelo Carraro) and Benedict XIII. (Pedro de Luna), did not resign their dignity; the former resided at Rimini; the latter had his adherents in Spain and Scotland. Thus there was a triple-headed papacy, to the scandal of the world. Pope John, as if he ridiculed his promise of reform, practised usury with his dignity, and dragged all those abuses to view which were so bitterly complained of. He was then suddenly robbed of almost all the Church States by the treachery of his hitherto confederate, King Ladislaus of Naples, and, in his extremity, could apply to no one for help but to Sigmund, king of Rome. He made a general council on free territory the condition of assistance. In a weak moment, the Pope allowed him to choose the place, and the free city of Constance was selected. Circulars and messages were issued by both jointly, inviting to the Council, which was to be opened on Nov. 1, 1414; Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII. were also summoned to appear. John soon repented that he fulfilled the dangerous wish of the protector of the Church, especially as Ladislaus soon afterwards died suddenly. In the hope, meanwhile, that he would be able to control the Council by money, cunning, and the Italian prelates whom he brought with him, he entered Constance on Oct. 28, 1414. A brilliant court surrounded him; 1300 horses were counted in his retinue. He was protected by the city and the Roman king; he also secured the protection of Duke Frederick of Tyrol. The Council was opened on Nov. 5 by the Pope in the cathedral, and held its first session Nov. 16. On Christmas night King Sigmund, the advocate of the Council, also appeared. By degrees 29 cardinals, 3 patriarchs, 33 archbishops, 150 bishops, more than 100 abbots, a larger number of professors and doctors of theology and of law, more than 500 monks of different orders, besides a crowd of envoys and representatives, of princes and nobles, assembled together from all Christian lands. An ecclesiastical assembly became, at the same time, a European Congress. The number of strangers in Constance at different times was between 50,000 and 100,000. More interest was taken in tournaments, festivals, buffoons of all kinds, and prostitutes, than in speeches, prayers, masses, and processions. Those who complained of the degenerated and divided state of the Church, and of the necessity of reform, were mostly the professors of the universities, the doctors, and monks. Here, as at Pisa, the longing after the ideal of the original apostolic Church expressed itself, and the leading speakers were there and here the same. Cardinal Pierre d'Ailly (see the Art.) and Jean Charlier de Gerson distinguished themselves among the French; the latter appeared in the name of the University of Paris as its chancellor, and as the envoy of his king. Cardinal Zabarella ranked as first among the Italians. They spoke boldly and with animation, as organs of the new unshackled tendency, and with learning which, although trammelled by the scholastic systems, still compelled the crowd of the unlearned to remain silent. Gerson was soon distinguished as the soul of the Council. It had three chief problems to solve: the removal of the schism, the examination of the doctrines of Wickliffe and Huss, and the reform of the Church in head and members. That the latter would and should proceed from the limitation of the pontifical power, the curials knew well; this thought made the Council uncomfortable to them and the pope. Already the organization of the Council plainly indicated the position which it would take. Pope John calculated on the customary voting by poll; the crowd of Italian Bishops and of those who were poor and dependent upon him, whom he brought with him, were to secure him a majority. But, with the same foresight, the Council determined upon another order. Four corporations were constituted, according to the four great nations: the German — to it belonged the Hungarians, the Poles, the Danes, and Scandinavians — the French, the English, and the Italian; each consulted for itself. To these the Spanish came later, after the removal of Benedict XIII., as a fifth. Each nation chose for itself a committee, which changed monthly; in each a majority decided. A committee mediated between them, and they voted by nations then in the public sessions in the cathedral, so that the Italian members alone by their number could obtain no decree of the general Council. Further, according to the proposition of the Pope, only the cardinals, archbishops, bishops, prelates, and generals of orders, should have a deciding vote. Still, it was left to the option of each nation to admit also the doctors, the lower clergy, princes and their envoys, into their assemblies. Just in this, however, consisted the chief power of the anti-papal party. The question which was first to be settled by the Council, seems in itself to be significant. Sigmund was for reform; it was the first concession, that he allowed the adjustment of the schism to precede. A motion was made to persuade all three Popes to voluntary resignation. The Italians not unjustly urged, that a Pope elected by one Council (certainly only indirectly) could not be deposed by another Council; that Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. were already deposed at Pisa. Pope John desired the present Council to be regarded only as a continuation of the one at Pisa; it asserted, however, its independence and freedom. The party of d'Ailly and Gerson prevailed, always actively supported by King Sigmund. Already, in Feb. 1415, a complaint against John was laid before the Council, in which his vices and crimes of all kinds were recounted; but it was as yet suppressed, to avoid public scandal. Sigmund was more active than all others to influence him voluntarily to resign. And the Pope really agreed to the humble reading of a formula of abdication, and to the bull of assignment of March 6, in the hope of securing a re-election; but both contained the condition, that the other Popes do the same. He cautiously avoided any other proposition. But when, on March 10, the motion for the selection of a new Pope was made, and the most bitter charges were made against him anew; and further, when Sigmund allowed the gates to be guarded, in order to prevent his departure, then fear in him outweighed all hopes. The Pope, disguised as a groom, escaped from the city in the dusk of the evening, with the secret assistance of Duke Frederick. Sigmund respected the security pledged to the Pope by the city and king of Rome, as little as he did that to Huss. As soon as the Pope was in safety, he summoned the cardinals and the officers of the court to himself, and complained that Sigmund ruled the Council, and threatened him. He succeeded in causing discord in the Council; and, although only a few followed him, still the opposition of the college of cardinals now arose. The fifth session of the Council, on April 16, 1415, constitutes an epoch. At it the doctrine of the leaders was made a decree, viz., that a Council regularly convened in the Holy Ghost, which represents the militant Catholic Church, receives its authority directly from Christ, and that every one, no matter what his rank may be, even the Pope, is bound to obey it in everything that refers to matters of faith and the extirpation of schism. On May 14, 1415, the Council solemnly pronounced the suspension, and, on May 29, the deposition of the Pope. He himself approved the decision; for when Duke Frederick, who had fallen under the ban of the empire and of the Church, was compelled to submit, and was punished, the Pope also fell into the hands of Sigmund. He was strictly watched for a time in a castle near Constance, where Huss was also imprisoned, and afterwards in Heidelberg. The French court alone expressed its disapprobation of the treatment he received. Gregory XII., an old man of 90 years, voluntarily resigned his power July 4, 1415; but Benedict XIII. opposed the transactions of the Council, and of Sigmund also, with unyielding stubbornness. He was pronounced deposed on April 1, 1417, but he continued to assert that the true Church was with him at Peñíscola. The trial and the judgment against the doctrines of Wickliffe, against Huss and Jerome (see Arts.), which in the meantime occurred, cast a dark shadow over the friends of reform and their protector, Sigmund. Gerson and d'Ailly opposed the doctrines and statutes of the Church no less than the Bohemians; but the scholasticism of Paris triumphed in the eyes of the world over the evangelical teachers of the Bohemians. Since 1415, a collegium reformatorium was constituted; but, during two years, nothing was done for reform. On the contrary, the vices of sensuality, simony, and abuses of all kinds, continued undisturbed even under the eyes of the Council. The only decree with reference to the moral discipline of the clergy, was a confirmation of the canonical statute concerning dress and tonsure. After the deposition of the three Popes, Sigmund, at the head of the Germans, whom the English always faithfully followed, demanded reform before the election of a new Pope. The cardinals, however, declared it necessary first to give to the Church an undoubted chief; the Italians and Spaniards were always with them, together with d'Ailly and Gerson. The French were also won over; even the English were added, and many bribed prelates of the Germans. Thus Sigmund was compelled to yield, not, however, until he and his adherents solemnly protested that they were not responsible if there was no reform. There was now an end to the previous unity. The dictatorship of the Roman king over the Council, and his design of decreasing the incomes of the clergy in favor of the rulers, embittered the rich prelates against him. It is true that, when he conceded the priority of the election of Pope, conditions were added which might afford security, if the future Popes observed them. At the 39th session, the important decree Frequens, concerning the holding of Councils was passed, according to which they were to be repeated first in five, then in seven, and afterwards in ten years. In the case of schisms, they were to pronounce judgment. Then eighteen articles of reform were determined upon, concerning which the future Pope would have to agree with the Council, "or the deputies of the nations." They referred to the reform of the head of the Church, i. e., the reduction of the revenues of the exchequer in the reservations, expectances, annates and spoils, indulgences, the jurisdiction, etc. For the Council regarded the wealth of the court as the root of its degeneracy, whilst it condemned the doctrine of Wickliffe and Huss, which affirmed the same thing concerning the whole Church. The conclave was held in the exchange of Constance, and the election committed to 23 cardinals, to whom were joined 30 fathers of the Council, 6 from each nation. The jealousy of the nations prevented an election during the first two days. On the third day the Germans, from love of peace, abandoned the election of one from their midst, and also influenced the others to elect an Italian. The result was that on Nov. 11, 1417, Cardinal Odo Colonna was elected Pope, and called himself Martin V. He gave no evidence in the Council of possessing superior talent, but was regarded as a temperate, moderate, and experienced man. He became exceedingly avaricious, and it was soon felt that he was a Colonna. It foreboded evil for reform that, on the following day, he issued rules of chancery which differed little from those of his predecessors. He replied to the expostulation for reform, that reforms needed to be maturely considered. Then he appointed a commission of 6 cardinals, who should negotiate with the legates of the nations. Sigmund's influence was at an end; the fathers were wearied; instead of one Œcumenical Council, there were five national councils. The Pope concluded concordats with the Germans, French, and English, but not with the Spaniards; the Italians were agreed with him. The governments of France and England did not confirm the concordats. The German was accepted only by Sigmund (published May 2, 1418, see v. d. Hardt, I., p. 1055), but not by Poland, Hungary, and the northern countries. Moreover, it was only concluded for 5 years, and the concessions of the Pope were ambiguous, and were not performed. Further radical reform was postponed to a future Council, which the Pope called in 5 years at Pavia, consequently in Italy. Martin however, in order to satisfy his oath, published also a series of articles of reform, which, however, were either only promises, or so conditional and uncertain, that they were of no effect. At the 45th and last session, April 22, 1418, he proclaimed by a bull that he closed and dismissed the Council at its desire. King Sigmund was indemnified for his expenses with a tenth of all the ecclesiastical possessions of his kingdom. The Pope left the city with great pomp—the king quietly, and greatly in debt; the greater part of the members were discouraged and dissatisfied.

Compare Magn. Œcum. Constant. Concil. etc. op. H. v. d. Hardt, VI. Tom., Franc. et Lipa., 1700; Bourgeois du Chastenot, Nouv. hist. du Conc. de Const., Paris, 1718; Mansi, Collect., T. XXVII. et XXVIII.; (Ulr. Reichenthal) Costn. Concil. gedr. 1575; Stumpf, Beschreib. d. Conc., gedr. 1541; L'Enfant, Hist du Conc. de Const., 1714, 1727; Royko, Gesch. d. K.-vers. zu Costn., 1784; v. Wessenberg, die groszen Kirchenvers. d. 15. und 16. Jahrh. 1840, Th. 2, p. 69–267; Fr. v. Raumer, die Kirchenversaml. zu Pisa, Kostnitz und Basel, im histor. Taschenb. Jahrg. 1849, p. 46–113; Aschbach, Gesch. König Sigmund's, Th. 2; Neander, Ecol. Hist. Dr. G. Voigt. — Beck.

Constantine the Great and his Sons. Constantine the Great, whose life and reign mark one of the greatest crises in the history of Christianity, was the son of Constantius and Helena, and was born A. D., 274, at Naissus, in Upper Mysia. His mother, made by tradition to be a British princess, was rather of humble birth (Zosim., II., 8, ἡ δὲ βασιλίσσης γυναικὸς οὐ σιμνῆς, Eutrop., X., 2, Const. ex obscuriori matrimonio. Ambrose calls her stabularia.) She was at first only the concubine, and then the wife of Constantius; and there is nothing incredible in the report that, in her old age, she went as a Christian pilgrim to the holy places in Palestine, which she richly ornamented, and always greatly revered (Eusebius, De Vita, III., 42–45; Manso, 3d appendix). Constantine, who was highly gifted in body and mind, and trained as a soldier, won his first martial laurels in Egypt, under Diocletian. At this time, the empire in the West was ruled by Maximian and Constantius, in the East by Diocletian and Galerius; and when, in 303, the two Augustus laid aside the purple, and the two Cæsars took their places, Constantine accompanied his father to Gaul. After his father's death, C., proclaimed emperor by the army (306), notwithstanding his doubtful birth, became, like his father, the brave defender of the western and northern boundaries of the empire against the barbarians. Also following the example of his father, he procured freedom of worship for the Christians of his province, whilst in the Orient the first act of toleration was only granted in 311. Maxentius made himself master of Italy in the complications which immediately followed. After the death of Severus (307), and of the Eastern emperor, Galerius, as also after the fruitless attempts of Maximian to regain power, the united empire was divided into the Western dominion of Constantine and Maxentius, and the Eastern of Maximian and Lucinius. Here Constantine's noble career of triumph commences. His first victory was that over Maxentius, a cruel and lazy sensualist, which was ended by his death in the Tiber, 312. Eusebius compares his destruction with that of Pharaoh (De Vita, I., 38). The victor, received with public rejoicing at Rome, secured his power by gifts and favors (I., 41, sqq.), and, being fond of display, he closed the first decennium of his reign with a festival (ibid., I., 48). That he was then already biassed in favor of the Christians, is shown by the edict of tolerance published by him at Rome, 312, and, in connection with Lucinius, at Milan, 313 (Eus., H. E., X., 5; Lact., De mort., c., 48). In 320, Maximian was seized with a dreadful sickness, which, according to Eusebius, compelled him to recall the law against the Christians (De Vita, I., 58, 59, and concerning Maximian's end, c. 57). Lucinius stood, therefore, now alone in the Orient, and, although he was the brother-in-law of Constantine, he did not long remain at peace with him. The outbreak of the second contest for supremacy was occasioned more by Constantine than by his opponent, as Eusebius affirms (I., 50–55); and Zosimen charges him with a breach of promise (II., 18, Κατὰ τὸ συνθηκὴς αὐτῷ περὶ τὰ συγκαταμένα φανερώσας αὐτοῦ). Lucinius surrendered himself at the battle of Chalcedon, 324, and was killed. The victor celebrated his triumph with unnatural cruelty. The promising Crispus, Constantine's son by his first marriage, was unjustly suspected of assailing the reputation of his step-mother, Fausta; the Emperor put him to death, 326 — an indelible stain on his character. This crime — Eusebius is silent about it — as also the murder of Fausta herself, of his nephew, eleven years old, and of other friends, as the philosopher Sopater (Zos., II., 28; Eutrop., X., 8. Comp. Manso, Life of C., p. 64, sq.), indicate the wild passions of jealousy and ambition. C. now appeared at Rome, crowned for the third time with the glory of a conqueror (Euseb., De Vita, II., 19, I., 46).

Thus far extends the predominantly warlike part of his life. As to his approach to the Christian religion, the evidences are more external than internal. He received from his father a platonic heathenism. The philosophical idea of a highest divinity (oratio ad sanctorum coelum, cp. 9), perhaps also the preference for the worship of Apollo (Eumen., Paneg., cp. 21; Euseb., De Vita, II., 50), so far as this externally resembles the worship of Christ, offered a point of connection. Further, it is related that, before the war with Maxentius, 311, Constantine beheld, in the afternoon and above the setting sun, a bright cross, with the inscription Hac vince (τοῦτο νίκα); and that in the following night Christ appeared, and directed him to use this sign in the war; whereupon he had a banner made with a cross on it, called later labarum, λαβυρον. (De vita, I., 28-32, and the Excursus in the edition of Heinichen.) This story, which Eusebius assures us he long after received from the Emperor himself, but which is only hinted at by Lactantius (De mort., ep. 44), and given by later writers (Sozom., I., 3; Nazar., Paneg. const., cp. 14) as a vision, was not a miracle, neither does it appear to be a mere fable (Burckhardt, p. 394). If we suppose that Constantine saw a sign of the cross in the clouds, and had thereupon a vision which explained it, then it is credible that this occurrence, confirmed by the subsequent victories, converted him, not, as Eusebius will have it (cp. 32), to Christianity, much less to its moral principles, but to a superstitious confidence in the sign of the cross, which may have served to draw him gradually to the Christian religion (Gieseler, Ecol. II., I., 120, n. 25; Neander, II., p. 11). From this time forward, the cross adorned the helmet of the Emperor, and the statue erected in Rome after his triumphal entry, and the labarum was carried by chosen soldiers in the war against Licinius, who protected it in a wonderful manner (De vita, II., 9). It is remarkable that the triumphal arch, erected to the Emperor after the victory over Maxentius, bore originally the inscription, nutu J. O. M., viz., of Jupiter, which words, according to Burckhardt (p. 363), may have been changed into instinctu divinitatis in 315. The jealousy of Constantine against Licinius and his anti-Christian procedure, could and must have increased his sympathy for the smaller but firmly united party. Nevertheless, he continued to call himself Pontifex maximus, and to join in heathen customs (Zosim., II., 29). The coins struck by Constantine bear heathen emblems, and it is a question whether these disappeared after 323 (Gieseler, l. c., opposed Burckhardt, p. 391). After the murder of Crispus and Fausta, so Zosimus (II., 29) and Sozomenus (I., 5) report, the Emperor sought to be freed from his anguish of conscience through heathen priests, and only after these declared that they possessed no expiation for so great crimes, did an Egyptian from Spain direct him to the sin-atoning power of the Christian faith. This account also indicates his religious halting, but later criticism (comp. Burckhardt, p. 402) has questioned its historical credibility.

After Constantine attained to sole supremacy, he proceeded on the whole as a Christian emperor. We will pass by his thorough reforms and regulations in civil and political affairs, such as the division of the empire into prefectures, and their management, the transformation of the army, and the ingenious organization of the different offices, which afterwards passed over to the Byzantine empire. The ecclesiastical changes followed rapidly and in a crowd on each other. The free exercise of religion, indemnification for sustained losses, and civil recognition were already secured by the decrees of 312 and 313 (Lact., cp. 48; Eus., II. E., X., 5. 7). The next laws of the years 315, 316, 319, 321, and 323, approve admission to public offices, free the clergy from municipal burdens, by which they were made equal to the heathen priests, facilitate the liberation of Christian slaves, allow Christian legacies to churches, and restrain the hostility of the Jews towards the Christians (see the passages of the Cod. Theod., lib. XVI., in Manso, p. 95, and Gieseler, l. c.). The observance of Sunday by cessation from municipal occupations, was first commanded in 321. These regulations were extended, since the supremacy, over the whole empire. For it excludes the pernicious effects which the reigning impiety and the persecution of Christianity brought upon the whole empire, and shows the necessity of the true worship of God. The Emperor did not wish to force any one to receive the Christian faith. But, in the first place, it was necessary to indemnify the Christians for the evil which they had endured. Wherefore, it was ordered that all exiles, &c., be allowed to return to their homes, and take their former position and possessions. Those who were deprived of military dignity, were allowed to resume it, or obtain an honorable discharge. Degraded freeborn citizens returned to their former rank. The confiscated property of martyrs, or of those who died in exile, was to be restored to their relatives, or, if there were none, it was inherited by the Church; but there was no indemnification for a lost usufruct. The exchequer must also restore the possessions which were unlawfully acquired, especially churchyards and the burial places of martyrs (Ibid., II., 30-41). More positive favors were soon added to this indemnification. No Jew was allowed to hold a Christian as a slave (IV., 27). The unchristian law against the childless was abolished (IV., 26). Senatorial and consular offices, and even the dignity of governor, were often given to Christians (II., 44, IV., 1. 28). The Emperor gratified his fondness for building to the advantage of the Church. He caused or aided in the building of splendid churches at Jerusalem over the grave of Christ (De vita, III., 25-29: comp., however, Socr., II. E., I., cp. 13), at Bethlehem, and on Mount Olivet, etc. (De vita, III., 51-53).

By all these measures, Constantine desired only to invite to Christianity, not to compel. He was prevented from immediately oppressing heathen worship partly by the principles of his government, and partly by his own sympathy for it. A prohibition against the private sacrifices of the governor had only a limited effect (De v., II., 44). It is true that, in 328, the scandalous worship of Venus at Aphaca, in Phœnicia, was abolished, the temple of Esculapius at Ægea destroyed, and an end made of the unnatural worship at Heliopolis, and its mysteries exposed (Ibid., III., 54. 55): the Emperor, however, may have thought himself obliged, even by his duty of moral supervision, to remove these corruptions. The destruction of other sacred places by Christian mobs may have been unpunished. Eusebius (II., 5, IV., 23, 25) also mentions a general prohibition against soothsaying, erection of images of the gods, and sacrifices generally, towards which, also, a later law of Constantine points; but we do not, at least, find that it was ever carried out.

Constantine came thus unavoidably to participate in the internal affairs of the Church, especially in its dissensions with heretics. The principle which influenced him to take so decidedly the Catholic side, was that of ecclesiastical unity, which allowed him to see in the smaller factions only unlawful separations from the unity of the Church. With this principle, he opposed the Arian agitation (see Nice, Arianism, and De vita, II., 64-72).

The last 3 years of Constantine's reign, after the removal to Byzantium (330), were filled with ecclesiastical and family cares. After conquering the Scythians and Sarmatians, 332, he took advantage of a Persian embassy to obtain mild treatment for the Christians there (De vita, IV., 8-13). What Eusebius, IV., 17, 22, relates about his increasing devotion, and the regular exercises in prayer and reading the Bible in the palace, is certainly exaggerated. It is more probable that he addressed the people concerning God, providence, and divine judgment (IV., 29), as this gave him an opportunity to work upon the crowd and gain applause. His intercourse with the bishops increased; they were frequently his attendants and guests, although all heathens did not disappear from the imperial presence. The Christian rules of living were more rigidly enforced in the army. Heathen and Christian soldiers must equally observe Sunday, Friday, and the other festival days; the heathen soldiers were even to repeat a prayer on Sunday, in which the Deity is invoked and supplicated to preserve the empire and the Emperor (De vita, IV., 18-22, 23, 24). In 336, and shortly after the Synod of Tyre, the Emperor celebrated the festival of his 30 years' reign by consecrating the church of the Redeemer at Jerusalem, in the presence of many bishops from all the provinces. After that he was occupied with the marriage of his son, Constantius, and with the division of the empire among his three sons (comp. Burckhardt, p. 378). About Easter, 337, he was taken sick; visited first the baths at Helenopolis, and then, feeling that his end was near, went to Nicomedia. Here, according to his own request, he received the laying on of hands from the Arian Eusebius of Nicomedia (comp. Heinichen, Excurs., V.), and after "the necessary instruction," also baptism, and died on the last day of Whitsuntide week, 337, at noon. The senate ranked him among the gods, according to custom. That he was baptised by an Arian is not surprising, after his later conduct in the Arian controversy. His corpse was brought to Constantinople, laid out in state, and interred, under the direction of Constantius, according to the wish of the deceased, in the church of the Apostles, with the highest honors (De vita, IV., cp. 61-70).

His great merit consists not only in his elevating Christianity out of persecution and distress, but also in inaugurating a Christian state. That the Church was injured by the sudden transition to public favor and worldly distinction, cannot be laid to his blame; but he is to be blamed for forsaking the way of freedom and taking the first steps towards the pernicious assumption of ecclesiastical dominion. Heathen authors, like Victor and Zosimus, call him greedy of praise, vain, and unreliable; and that they do not err is shown by his whole court-life, his public conduct, and his intercourse with the clergy. Even Eusebius (IV., 16) is a witness to this, if it is true, that Constantine had coins struck, on which he was represented as engaged in prayer. The Emperor recognised himself as an instrument of providence, which recognition raised his natural selfishness to despotic self-love, and his surroundings confirmed him in it, especially as he no longer had enemies to contend with. He possessed religious excitability, but lacked moral firmness entirely, and he continued to serve himself, even in taking care of the Church.

If we may complain that the first Christian Emperor did not possess a purer character, we may do so in a still higher degree as regards his sons and successors. None of them inherited the father's spirit and energy, none of them did special credit to the rigid Christian nurture which they received (De vita, IV., 51, 52). By the will of Constantine, Constantine II. and Constance inherited the West, together with Africa, while Constantius received the oriental prefecture, with Constantinople. As to Constantine II., we have only to say that he sent Athanasius back to Alexandria, according to the last wish of his father; and soon after made war against his brother Constance, who, after 340, ruled alone in the West. Both brothers now found their glory in frivolously transgressing the limits of civil power, which Constantine in a measure observed. Constantius already, 341, prohibited superstition and sacrifices; a second law, 346, interdicted, in the name of the Emperor, the visiting of temples, and could not be rigidly enforced in the West only on account of the strong attachment of Rome to the ancient cultus (Cod. Theod., XVI., 10, 2 and 3). After the assassination of Constance (350), during the campaign against the usurper, Magnentius, Constantius stood alone, and prohibited all sacrifices, 353 and 356 (Cod. Theod., XVI., 10, 4), on the pain of death; he even went so far as to regard the violation of it as a crime against the majesty of the Emperor (Ammian. Marc. XIX., cp. 12). Rome and Alexandria continued to resist, but elsewhere the temples were plundered and destroyed. These measures, which advanced the downfall of heathenism but little, met with some disapprobation among learned Christians, but no powerful opposition; and there are not wanting those who, like Julius Maternus (Liber de errore profanarum religionum, about 345), invite to the use of force. The Emperor, with similar self-will, took part in dogmatical controversies. Constance stood with the Council of Nice, and succeeded, 349, in re-installing Athanasius. Constantius, on the other hand, led the Arians at a series of Synods, employed fear and favor, broke, however, at last with the strict Arians, and sought in vain to determine the true medium of the semi-Arian stand-point (see Arianism). In the mean time, the Emperor, together with Constantius, Gallus and Flav. Julianus, was engaged in dangerous wars with the Franks, Alemanni, and Persians. He died Nov. 3, 361, in Cilicia. The reign of Constantius dims the glory of that of his father Constantine; it contained partly the shadows of the later Byzantine dominion, and partly enables us to regard as historical the subsequent reaction in favor of heathenism, accomplished by Julian. (Comp. Gibbon's Decline, &c., of the Rom. Emp.; Manso, Das Leben Constant., &c., Breslau, 1817; Burckhardt, die Zeit Constant., &c., Basel, 1853; Zosimus, Hist. Eccl.; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., De vita Const., De laudibus Const.)

GASZ. — Beck.

Constantinople and its Patriarchate. Ancient Byzantium on the Thracian Bosphorus, founded as a colony, according to tradition, 656 B. C., by Byzas, king of Megara, possessed the double importance of a favorable commercial location, and great political influence. After being subject to Persian, Macedonian, and Gallic supremacy, and for a time also connected with Athens, it fell at last to the Roman empire, and recovered itself from every loss, even from the consequences of the conquest and total destruction under Septimus Severus (A. D. 196). Since the middle of the 3d century, and still more under Diocletian, the centre of the Roman empire was no longer in Rome, but in the eastern regions of Illyricum. The idea of founding a second metropolis on this side of the empire, was, therefore, already historically prepared before Constantine seized and realized it, with the strong determination which marked his acts. Sozomen. relates (Hist. Eccl., II., 3) that Constantine, after conquering or making peace with his outward enemies, resolved to build a city equal to Rome, and call it by his name. He first selected the site of ancient Illium, together with the landing place of the Greeks, and marked the circumference and limits of a city. But a vision influenced him to decide in favor of Byzantium, which place was immediately greatly enlarged, and surrounded with a wall. This took place in 326. The Emperor employed immense means to build his residence and the city. Grand churches and palaces, gifts of lands to distinguished families, innumerable treasures of art and statues taken from Italy and Greece (Euseb., Vita Const., III., 48, 54), gave this new Rome, or Constantinopolis, the appearance of a residence. Many hundred statues were erected on the same place, and the Emperor did not neglect to immortalize himself by erecting a colossal gilded statue (Burckhardt, die Zeit Constant., p. 469, 472; Manso, Leben Constant., 7 Beil., p. 308). Eusebius (De vita, IV., 58, 59) calls the church of the Apostles the oldest church built by Constantine, and Sozomen. (II., 3) calls the church of St. Michael ἐν ταῖς ἑσπέραις. Sozomen. explains the sudden rise of Constantinople from the Christian piety and benevolence of the inhabitants, which tolerated no heathen temples, except in Julian's time (comp., however, Burckhardt, p. 474), and converted many heathens and Jews. This onesided religious design was certainly foreign to the founder; but, in that he raised his rebuilt Byzantium to equal consideration with Rome, and transferred the internal arrangements of the latter, together with the senate, to it, he certainly designed to give the new-founded state which recognised Christianity a new centre, that should not yield to the old in splendor.

The first age of the metropolis is made known to us more exactly by the descriptions of Chrysostom. The number of inhabitants was then 100,000, of which many were Jews, and at first also heathens. The reigning cultus was a mixture of Roman, Greek, Christian, and heathen customs and immoralities. The female sex passed over from ancient dependence and seclusion to unbounded licentiousness (comp. CHRYSTOST., ed. Montf. tom. XI., p. 112, 153, 464; IX., p. 93, 198, 199; VI., p. 45, 100).

We pass to the history of the Patriarchate. Constantine, by his division of the empire, laid the foundation for the metropolitan government, which unfolded itself at the same time, and for the union of the dioceses into larger hierarchical organizations. Of the metropolitans in the Orient, those of Alexandria and Antioch were the most distinguished; next to these, those of Ephesus, Cæsarea, and Jerusalem. Their limits do not entirely correspond with the present division into prefectures, as the above-named cities all belonged to the prefecture of the Orient, and none to that of Illyricum. This made it the more important, in carrying through an organization of the Church, to have regard to the political point of view, so that the principle might prevail as much as possible, that the ecclesiastical arrangement follows the political (Conc. Chalcedon., can. 17). The Bishop of Constantinople, who, to this time, stood under the metropolitan of Heraclea, is indebted to this political consideration for his sudden elevation. It was an important step gained, when the second Œcumenical Council of 381 decreed (can. 3) that the episcopate of Constantinople, because this was new Rome, should occupy the highest rank with that of Rome, by which also the title Patriarch, which was afterwards bestowed upon the metropolitans of the first order (Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, Rome), was naturally secured to it. The Council of Chalcedon (451) went still further. It demanded, in can. 28, for the Patriarch of Byzantium equal honors (τὰ ἰσα πρεσβεία) with him of Rome, thus contradicting literally the decree of Nice. The Patriarch was also to extend his supervision over the dioceses of Pontus, Asia, and Thracia, ordain subordinate metropolitans, call provincial synods, and be the last appeal in the Orient in important Church affairs (comp. Petri de Marca, De Const. Patr. institutione diss., p. 194, sqq.). The right of ordination was practically still further extended. The Concilium Quinisextum (692) repeated the entire contents of this Chalcedonian canon. It was of importance to the emperors to maintain this decree. Justinian declared the Church of his residence as the head of all others with Rome, and confirmed the position of the Patriarch over the provincial synod (see Gieseler, Eccl. II., I., 341, 370, etc.). However, in spite of all the preference which this episcopal chair continued to enjoy, many things co-operated to keep its authority within certain bounds. First, the Greek Oriental Church tolerated no concentration, which could have become similar to that developing itself in the West, and thus found a Byzantine papal system. Second, the unequal and inconsequent relation to Rome injured the independence of Constantinople. Third, the free activity of the patriarchate was greatly circumscribed by the ambition of the Emperor.

The succession of the Bishops of Constantinople is tolerably complete; a very uncertain tradition traces it even back to the Apostle Andrew (Randurii Imper. Orient., I., p. 187, ed. Par. Fabric. Bibl. Gr., VI., p. 707, and in the Edit. of Harl., VIII. p. 101). A mere glance at the names gives evidence of the restlessness of the time, for it presents not a small number of such Patriarchs, who, like Ignatius († 878), Calistus (1350 and 1355), Philotheus (1354 and 1363), were deposed and restored by the change of circumstances. Without regard to the first uncertain centuries, four periods can be distinguished; the first from Constantine to the Photian controversy (861), or to the entire separation from the West, under Cæcilius (1044); the second to the interregnum of the Latins; the third to the conquest of the city by the Turks (1453); and the fourth to the present time. The last Patriarchs under Christian dominion, Josephus II., Metrophanes, and Gregorius Mammas, took part yet in the Council of Florence (1439, sq.); and Bessarion (see the Art.) received later (1463) the title, not the office, of a Patriarch. The Turkish conqueror, Mohammed II., found the episcopal chair at Byzantium vacant, but approved the election of Georgius Scholarius, or Gennadius, perhaps the same person who shortly before, as layman, labored for the union in Florence, but afterwards seems to have abandoned it.

In the following centuries, the Christian hierarchy of Constantinople suffered not less from its moral declension than from Turkish oppression. The Patriarch surrounded himself with a permanent synod of Bishops and spiritual dignitaries, and assumed spiritual and civil jurisdiction over his adherents. The Churches of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem remained in the connection and subordination hitherto existing. The Sultan confirmed or deposed the superiors elected by the Synod, and soon learned that the highest office paid well. The Christians themselves were guilty of the most shameful simony, and in the 17th cent. one recreant succeeded another. (As to the court, costume, income, mode of election, etc., comp. Heineccius, Abbildung der alten u. neuen griechischen Kirche, Th. I., p. 46, sq., Th. III., p. 49, sq.; also Martini Crusii, Turcogr., p. 120, sq.; Thomæ Smithi de eccl. Gr. statu hodierno in ejus opusculis, Roterod., 1716; Geib, Darstellung des Rechtszustandes in Griechenland während der türk. Herrschaft, Heidelb., 1835.) Whilst, moreover, the papacy sometimes attempted to interfere in these external relations, the Church of Byzantium was also touched by Protestantism. First the Lutheran theologians of Tübingen entered into negotiations with the Patriarch Jeremiah II. (1574); then Calvinism was represented in Cyrillus Lucaris (see the Art.), who even occupied the Patriarchal chair in 1621. But both these attempts failed; ecclesiastical Greece would be reformed and renewed only in and by itself, not in connection with Protestantism, and an opportunity to this was soon after given by the establishment of the Russian Church.

Constantinople again lost a part of its former central importance by the independent organization of the Greek Church in Russia. The city is at present one of the most populous of Europe, having 800,000 inhabitants, of which about one-half are Turks, 130,000 Greeks, 250,000 Armenians, 6000 pure Hellenists, 20,000 Jews and foreigners of all nations. Every foreign congregation, the Russian, English, Scottish, Lutheran, has its own chapel; the Roman Catholics have even 9 churches, and efforts are now being made for making better provisions for Protestant worship. The relation of the Turks to the Christians has been greatly improved during the last decades, and under the rule of the present tolerant Sultan. On the other hand, the Greeks resist as strongly as ever all Protestant influences; less so, the Armenian Christians, who have here a Patriarch of their own. Many of the existing 14 Greek churches, which are mostly named after the Virgin and other saints, were built in the Byzantine age, although, as is known, the church of Sophia is used as a mosque, and the Blachernian church no longer stands. The Patriarch, and with him "the holy synod," possesses still, in addition to his spiritual dominion, a partial temporal and civil supervision over the Rajahs. The "holy synod," composed formerly of 12, afterwards of 6, archbishops, and a number of counsellors, constituted the ecclesiastical tribunal, which also decides civil controversies and cases of discipline in the congregation, administered the finances, and, under the confirmation of the Sultan, elected its head. As to other ecclesiastical occupations, the inspection of cloisters and of instruction, etc., was committed to a department, which formerly was connected with the synod, composed of two corps of officers. A Church commission was also for a time active in promoting the ecclesiastical life. The residence of the Patriarch was frequently changed, but has been for a long time in Fanar, at the church of "All Souls." This Patriarch not only participated, in connection with the synod, in the election of the other 3 subordinate Patriarchs, but he also could control it. The extent of his dioceses was greatly limited by the Greek insurrection of 1826. The Greek clergy of Constantinople took an active part in the contest for freedom, and their co-operation cost the Patriarch Gregorius his life. Upon the separation from Turkey, an assembly of metropolitans and Bishops, 1833, at Nauplia and Syra, declared the Church of Greece to be hierarchically independent, and transferred its management to a permanent synod. Wearisome intrigues and embarrassments followed; but the Greek government of 1844 confirmed the step, in that it besides allowed the complete ecclesiastico-dogmatic confederation of the Hellenic Church with the Church of Constantinople to continue; and finally, in 1850, the Patriarch was compelled to recognize the independence of the Hellenic Church government. The jurisdiction of the latter, therefore, only extends at present over

European Turkey and the Ionian Islands, as also over the non-united Greeks in Galicia, Slavonia, and Bucovina. The present Patriarch was elected in the fall of 1853, and was confirmed by the Sultan. (Comp. v. Hammer, Constantinopel u. der Bosphorus, Bd. I., 1822; Wiggers, Kirchliche Statistik, I., p. 176; Description de Const. ancienne et moderne, Const., 1846; Rigler, Die Türkei u. deren Bewohner vom Standpunkte Constantinopels, Bd. I., Vienne, 1852.)

GASZ. — Beck.

Contarini, Caspar, b. 1483, of a noble Venetian family, was by birth entitled to the highest official dignities of Venice. After a complete education, he commenced his public career under the fairest auspices. In 1521, he was sent as ambassador to Charles V., on his first arrival in Germany. At Worms, Luther made no favorable impression on C. Though the two held fundamentally similar views, C. could not understand Luther's character and plans. C. accompanied Charles V. to Spain, and, after the taking of Rome, reconciled Clem. VII. with Charles. His intellectual gifts, and moral firmness and integrity made him universally prominent. But he early displayed, also, deep and decided religious feelings. In Venice he was the centre of the spiritual movement (represented by the oratory of Sti. Amoris) of that period, against the religious frivolities of Rome. In 1535, Paul III. suddenly made him a cardinal, hoping thus to secure his great influence for Rome. C. accepted, but maintained his independence (see Ranke's Popes, I.). At first, circumstances seemed to favor his principles. In 1537, Paul III. called a Commission upon Church Reform. Something had to be done, and it seemed best to charge the most influential of those interested, with the matter. A liberal opinion was reported. Paul III. received it kindly, but did nothing. Paul IV. (once a member of the Commission) had it put in the Index (1559). It is to this day an offence to Romish historians. C.'s letters to Paul III. prove his large share in the action. The opinion exposes the excesses of papal power, the practice of simony, and the infringements upon Christian liberty. But the effort to correct these evils in their source came a century too late. In 1541, C. attended the Diet and Conferences of Regensburg (see Art.) as papal Legate. His instructions, though seemingly liberal, hampered him by their ambiguity. It was hoped, however, that he might draw the Evangelicals into a union upon dogmas, which might subsequently be construed in favor of Rome. Articles were prepared, which set forth evangelical views in Romish terms. C. approved of them. Protestant writers charge him with deceit in this; but his course was assailed in Italy, and Francis I. endeavored to excite Paul's suspicions against him. His defence against these attacks prove how deeply the questions of the day exercised his mind, and his decided opposition to prevalent Romish views. He especially insists upon the doctrine of justification by faith. Then came stricter orders from Rome, which he closely followed. He advised the Emperor, when the proceedings were closed, not to allow them to be resumed, but to refer all to the Pope, who might submit the question to a General Council, or make some other satisfactory disposition of them. In a second opinion he somewhat harshly charged the German Bishops with retarding the work of reform by their violent measures. It seems that, though convinced that existing abuses should be corrected, he still hoped to have this effected by beginning with the papacy; and he had no sympathy with the national character of the German Reformation. This may be accounted for by his high aristocratic position. Even his doctrinal views were modified by this fact. He thus exemplifies the inmost difference between an Italian and German notion of a reformation. C. was spared the pain of seeing his hopes put to shame. He died in Bologna, 1542, just when the inquisition was compelling many of his friends to flee from Italy, leaving behind him the character of a man who acknowledged the truth, and desired the good, though unable to break through his natural mildness and social circumstances. His works were publ. in Venice, 1589 (the tract on Justification changed. It is genuine in the Paris ed., 1571). (See POLUS's letters, III.; PLANCK, Prot. Lehrbegr., III.; RANKE, Popes, I.

WEIZSÄCKER.*

Conversion is a moral change of mind, and consequent adoption of a course of life opposed to that previously pursued; a change of disposition and behavior, especially with reference to our relationship to God. The term is used to designate both the beginning of this change or renewal, and its progress in sanctification, just as the corresponding term (though derived from another figure) "regeneration" is used in a narrower and wider sense. But this mode of speech springs from the fact that C. is a process, every step of which is a repetition of the beginning. Thus C. involves repentance and faith. These, though ideally distinct, are not separated in actual experience, and either may be the more prominent, according to the state and character of the individual subject. But each always includes the other as antecedent or result; i. e., a man cannot turn from unrighteousness without having inwardly turned to righteousness, and the reverse. These are the most general modifications of C. in its beginning and progress. Let us now note both more closely. Repentance is aversion to sin, and its inward renunciation. Sin is, essentially, self-exaltation against God, mistrust, unbelief, and consequent disregard and disobedience of God's will, law. Repentance, therefore, involves the sinner's abasement before God, restored confidence, faith, obedience. The spread of this act over the man's entire life constitutes sanctification.—The matter becomes still clearer if psychologically considered. C. has its root in the centre of man's personality, in the heart, the fundamental tendency of which is changed. It develops itself, however, in the usual modes of the soul's life, and thus acquires a definite form. Thus, repentance appears chiefly as a knowledge of (personal) sin, i. e., as a consciousness of opposition to the will of God, or a consciousness of guilt, of the interruption of our relation to God, of separation from him, of exclusion from fellowship in his love, of condemnation. This is a living, active consciousness, and produces a sense of sorrow, concern, of grief at sin as sin, as ingratitude and unfaithfulness to God, as a proud departure from him, and resistance to his holy law, and as an alienation of our will from him — and all this with regard both to the past (contrition), as to the future (aversion). — But this entire process derives its power from the corresponding process of faith. The knowledge of sin, above named, springs from the knowledge of the love of God, as manifested to the sinner; for without this, especially as seen in the work of redemption, man would have been unable to know himself as being in antagonism to God, and under condemnation — to exercise confidence in God — to resolve to yield to him; contrition and aversion would never have been wrought effectively in man. But, reversely, faith, as a humble, cordial appropriation of the love of God, can find place only as these parts of repentance really exist, so that faith is a living, decided surrender to God, with a firm purpose to live only by his grace, through which communion with God and all included blessings are secured. And this leads to cheerful and unqualified obedience to the will of God.

But this psychological process presupposes the operation of a divine causality. C. is no mere personal act of man (Jer. 31 : 18). Here three questions arise: 1. What are the divine acts in C.? They are the presentation of the law (God's will) and conviction of guilt. With these God arrests man's conscience, and brings him to a sense of his sin. Thus God works elenchthically upon the sinner's heart, causing the divine wrath against sin, and the sinner as such, to be reflected in man's spirit, and become a moral power there. But inseparably connected with this divine act, producing repentance, is that by which God would work faith in the soul, viz., the clear revelation of his purpose to restore, pardon, and reconcile the sinner to himself, and the personal appeal urging the sinner to take hold of saving grace, as he has been made to feel the need of it and long for it. These acts of illumination, calling, and justification beget faith, a hearty assurance of God's love to the sinner, a firm reliance in, and sincere giving up unto, God. They also, in proportion to the thoroughness of C., stir up and deepen true repentance; whilst, reversely, those divine acts which beget repentance prepare the way for enlightening and inviting grace. 2. By what means are these twofold operations wrought? Mainly by the Word of God, as that in which God draws near to man, revealing his will and ways to us, and our duty to him. Hence, this Word is divided into Law and Gospel. The substance of the law is contained in the decalogue, which, as expounded and developed by prophets and apostles, is the authentic and complete declaration of God's will. The Gospel is the sum of all the divine promises and proffers of salvation, and it sets forth the workings of God's grace to sinners from the fall to the culmination of that grace in the incarnation of the eternal Word, and his atoning sacrifice for sin. In him, as the son of God and the son of man, the Law and Gospel meet, in a perfect living exemplification of both. In him, therefore, the holiness of love, as abhorring sin, and its mercy, as rescuing the sinner, appear in inseparable union. Hence, the Gospel includes the power of the Law. But the Moral Law is not thus rendered superfluous, inasmuch as it is indispensable to conviction and conversion, and as a norm of a holy Christian life. But the Gospel bears witness of this grace in incorporated visible acts, also — in the sacraments (see Art.). 3. What is the relation between the divine causality and man's act? The question already denies that God's working excludes man's activity, or that man is merely passive; both God and man work (Phil. 2 : 12). God's working encourages man to work, by pointing to the all-sufficient power of God. Man co-operates in his salvation by the power of God which works in him, by yielding himself unresistingly to it. Because God works, man can and should also work. The personal God addresses a personal, self-determining moral agent, arousing him to free action, restoring sinful, captive (Rom. 7 : 14) man to Christian liberty, in the contemplation of its highest activity. Thus salvation is brought so near to man, by outward means and inward influences, that if man accepts it he cannot boast, and if he rejects it he has no excuse. And as, if man accepts, God continues to work in him, his free self-determination becomes ever more decided and energetic. The divine influence becomes an indwelling principle, the incitement an impulse. The self-determination of the soul, now united to God, combines with the determining grace of God. The truth upon this subject, therefore, lies midway between the doctrine of an absorption of the human will by the grace of God, as being alone active, and that false synergism which places man's will on a level with grace, as though it could act independently of the incitements and helps of grace. (See THIRSCH, Vorl. ü. Kathol., &c., 24; NITZSCH and BAUR against Möhler; THOMASIVS, d. Behehntn. d. ev. luth. K., &c.; SARTORIUS, Lehre v. d. heil. Liebe, 2. Th.) KLING.*

Copiatæ (κοπιᾶν, laboro; or κοπάζω, quiesco; or καίρομαι), Lat. fossore, fossarii, were officers who saw to the decent burial of the dead (ΕΡΙΦ. expos. fid. c. 21). They are also called vespillones, lecticarii, νεποδάντοι. They appear simultaneously with the Parabolani, and were reckoned with the clergy (PSEUDO ILLER. de sept. ord. eccl.; Primus (from below) in clericis Fossariorum ordo est, &c.). Their number varied. Theodos. the younger reduced them from 1100 to 950 for Constantinople. Anast. again appointed 1100. In Constant. they formed a separate college, called Collegiatai, Decani, and enjoyed certain immunities. (See Cod. Theod. XIII., 1, 1, &c.; Cod. Justin., I., 2, 4; BINGHAM, Antiq., III., 8; AUGUSTI, Archæol., XI., 239.)

HAGENBACH.*

Cordus, Euricius, a distinguished humanist and Latin poet of the 16th cent. Having early come under the influence of the reformatory movements, he spent several years, until 1523, in Erfurt. In 1521 he accompanied Luther to Worms. In 1524 he was appointed city physician to Brunswick. Here he continued to pour out his epigrams in favor of the new measures. In 1527, Landgr. Philip called him to the new university of Marburg, as prof. of medicine. In 1534 he accepted a call to Bremen as medicus and professor, where he died in 1535, aged 49 years. His writings as naturalist and physician are meritorious, but he excelled in satirical Latin verse. (See KÄHLER's vita Eur. Cordi, Rinteln, 1744; Ersch u. Gruber, Th. 19, p. 285-91). HENKE.*

Corinth was the chief city of Achaia propria, at the rise of Christianity. Paul went to it from Athens on his second missionary tour, remained there one and a half years, and, aided by Silas and Timothy, founded a Church composed of Jewish, but mainly heathen, converts. Schisms occasioned by divers views upon the obligations of Judaism, personal attacks, and the carnalities indulged by many converts, called forth three epistles (the first lost, cf. 1 Cor. 5:9) from Paul, and led him to revisit C. (see Paul). C., under the Romans the capital of Corinthia, lay upon a beautiful fertile plain, on the S. E. point of the bay of Corinth, at the foot of the hill on which the citadel Akrocorinth was built. The origin of the city dates back to the earliest traditions. Its old name was Ephyra, which poetry retained (OVID, Metam., II., 240; VIRG., Georg., II., 264; PROPERT., II., 5, 1). The name was changed (after a king, Corinthos) in connection with the division of rule between Sicyon and C., at the time of the Argonaut invasion. The Dorians put an end to the Æolian dominion, and introduced various political changes, substituting an oligarchy for the monarchy. Then came the tyrants, after whose overthrow (540 B. C.) a free constitution, a Timocratic, was established. During the Peloponnessian war, C. usually joined Sparta against Athens. After the expulsion of the Macedonians, C. (243 B. C.) joined the Achaian league, which led (146 B. C.) to its overthrow by the Roman general Mummius. For a century it lay waste, only some temples and the citadel remaining, until Cæsar (46 B. C.) restored it as Colonia Julia C. Its earlier bloom speedily returned. The new city (see PAUSAN., II., 1, &c.; STRABO, VIII., 378, &c.) was a regular square of 40 stadia on the north side of the citadel, with walls on three sides. Magnificent temples and public buildings, partly raised out of the old ruins, partly new-built, adorned it, especially the market-place. The road to the Akropolis, with various bends, 30 st. long, led past temples, altars, and statues, and on the citadel stood the splendid temple of Venus, adorned with a panoplied image of the goddess. Akrocorinth was thought the strongest fortress in Greece. Presenting a perpendicular front on the north, its approaches from all other sides were steep and well fortified. Its situation secured to it extensive commerce, and made it the port and highway of the natural and artistic products of the Orient and Occident. Thus it became populous and rich, but also luxurious and corrupt to a proverb. Sensuality prevailed, and was fired by the worship of Venus, and the institutions of the Hieroduloi, brought over from Phœnicia. This led more to the cultivation of the arts than the sciences. Its architecture (the C. columns, &c.), sculptures, vases, &c., are celebrated. But time has wasted all these. All that remains of its former glory is a pile of miserable houses amid ancient ruins, inhabited by sickly wretched people, who move like shadows along its streets. (See H. WILKENS, Specim. antiq. Cor., &c., Brem., 1747, 4to.; J. E. WALCH, antiq. Cor., Jen., 1761, 4to.; WAGNER, rer. Cor. spec. Darmst., 1824, 8vo.; PAULY, R.-Encl., &c., II., 642-49. For mod. comp. HASSEL, Handb., &c., III., 1, p. 673; PONQUEVILLE, Expéd. scient. de Morée, Paris, 1836.)

ARNOLD.*

Cornelius à Lapide (van d. Steen), a renowned Romish exegete and Jesuit, b. 1568, at Boehaff, in the see of Liege, became public lecturer upon the Bible at Löwen, and then at Rome, where he died March 12, 1637. He wrote extensive commentaries upon the whole Bible, the Psalms and Job excepted. These were often publ. in Paris, Antwerp, &c. The Venice ed. of 1740 fills 11 folios. They are rich in materials selected from the fathers, but are diffuse, allegorical, and mystic, and are loaded with insipid tropological and anagogical remarks. The latest ed. Lyons, 1838, 11 vols., 4to. His best com. are those on the Pentat. and Paul's Ep. (R. SIMON, hist. crit. des princip. comment., &c., Rotterd., 1693; MEYER, Gesch. d. Schriftausl. Götting., 1804, 3 vols.) K.*

Coronati quatuor, the traditional title of the four brothers, Severus, Severianus, Corpophorus, and Victorinus, who suffered martyrdom (304) under Diocletian, by having crowns with sharp nails forced into their heads. Their remains are said to rest in the church Sanctorum quatuor, &c., in Rome. HERZOG.*

Corporale, a linen cloth (Luke 23:53) on which the host (i. e., corpus Chr.) and cup are set, to keep them from touching the surface of the altar and tabernacle. At first it was large enough to envelope the elements (hence its name palla, ελεηρον). HERZOG.*

Corpus Catholicorum and Corpus Evangelicorum. Thus were designated the united Rom. Cath. and Protestant States, respectively, of the German empire, each of which formed themselves, during the progress of the Reformation, into a corporation for the protection and promotion of the political interests of their respective Churches. Although the first title does not occur until in the 17th cent., and Rome never formally admitted its corporate existence, the C. Cathol. was, in fact, formed in 1524, at the conclusion of the Regensburg league; and from that time continued silently to exert considerable influence. The C. Evangel. consisted of a college of delegates of the Ev. States of Germany, called forth to counteract the movements of the C. Cathol., and further the political interests of Protestantism. It originated at the Diet of Spires, 1529. It was also called C. sociorum Augustanæ confess. (See FABER, Europ. Staats-Cantzley, XVII. Th. (1711), 248; LIII. Th. (1729), 252, 335; MOSER, Teutsches Staats-Recht, X., 468, Lpz. u. Ebersdorf; v. BÜLOW, Gesch. u. Verf. d. Corp. Ev., &c., 1795.)

NEUDECKER, HEPPE.*

Corpus Christi is the Romish festival of the transubstantiation. It arose soon after the settlement of the tedious controversies upon that doctrine (1215), in accordance with the visions of several women of the convent of St. Cornelius, at Liege, who several times saw a full moon, exceedingly bright, excepting a dark shade on one side; and, having prayed for an interpretation of the vision, received in answer, that the moon was the Church, and the shade the want of an important festival in honor of the sacrament of the altar. The vision was communicated to several Bishops and others, who seized the idea, and favored the institution of such a festival. Accordingly, Urban IV. (1264) ordered its observance, and his bull was confirmed by Clem. V. (1311). It was not generally kept until 1316. The procession seems to have been first ordered by John XXII., 1317. Th. Aquinas was the author of the service prescribed by Urban IV., and is thought by some to have originated the festival (Binterim, V., 1, p. 279-89). The festival is kept on the Thursday after Pentecost, in evident reference to Maunday Thursday (on which (as the bull says) so many other facts were commemorated, that this object could not find place) and to Trinity Sunday, on account of the mystical bearing of the host to the Trinity. Its great objects were to disgrace heretics and confirm the faithful. — The associated procession is styled solemnissima, because the host is borne along in it; and, as the festival occurs in the season of flowers, there is the richest display of these (Conc. Trid., s. XIII., c. 5). — The doctrinal objections to the festival are thus set forth by Hillebrand: 1. Quod illo festo mutilatio Eucharistiæ et communio sub uno confirmetur, dum Christus in Monstrantia non nisi sub uno specie proponitur. 2. Quia hoc festo Corpus Christi solum ostentui est, cum tamen Christus ideo instituerit, ut distribueret et manducetur. 3. Quia hoc festo panis benedictus cultu sæpius afficitur, adeoque triticus Deus adoratur, quæ est manifesta ἀπολαρψία. (See AUGUSTI, Denkwürd. III., 304.)

GRÜNEISEN.*

Corpus juris civilis is the title of several collections of civil law, made by Justinian and others, and which form not merely a book of common law, but a source of authority for the whole Church. The Corpus embraces: 1. Four books of the institutions of Justinian. The contents are arranged in titles, with an introduction and paragraphs. It is thus quoted: § Hic igitur generaliter (1) J. de justit. et jure, I., 1. 2. Fifty b. of digests or pandects. also publ. by Justin., in 533, and arranged under titles, and under these the excerpts thus quoted: Fr(agn.) or l(ex) Juri operam daturum (1) § cujus merito (1) D. (κ. ff.) de justit. et jure, I., 1. 3. Twelve b. of the Justin. codex, of 534, containing the constitutions since Adrian, quoted: C(onstit.) or l(ex) Cunctos populos (1) §. Hanc legem (1) C(odicis) de summa trinitate I., 1. 4. Later imperial constitutions (novellæ leges, 529-582, from Justin. to Tiber. II.) were collected by private persons, and a collection of 168 still later ones was included in the Corpus juris. They are quoted: Nov. I., c. 1. To these other imperial edicts, the Apost. canons, &c., were added. These collections, especially the Codex and Nov., contain the most various directions concerning the relation of Church and State, as well as the entire Church itself. Hence canon law was the more closely connected with Roman law, because in the newly organized German states, the latter was the personal or national law of the Church. See SAVIGNY, Gesch. d. röm. Rechts im Mittelalter, I., § 40, 2. Ausg.: EICHORN, deutsche St.-u. Rechtsgesch. I., § 46.) The principles of canon law, especially when they favored the authority of the State, were assailed in the Reformation, and by some the Corpus jur. civ., was preferred to the C. jur. can. Thus by Luther (Walch, X., 510, &c.) and Melancthon. The study of the latter was even forbidden (SCHMINCKE, monum. Hassiaca, II., p. 650). But this had no influence on the Ev. Church, which retained its preference for the C. jur. civ. H. F. JACOBSON.*

Corrodi, Henry, a Neologian of the last century, was the son of a retired Swiss minister. After finishing his studies, he secured ordination, but bodily infirmities debarred him from the pulpit. In opposition to the mystic-pietistic orthodoxy of his father, he imbibed from Steinbrüchel, canon in Zurich, neological views, making Christianity a system of morality. He also came under Gessner's influence. Through both he was enabled to visit German universities. In Halle he became intimate with Semler, and zealously embraced the rationalism and humanitarianism there taught. In 1786 he became prof. of Moral Philos. and Natural Law in the Gymnasium of Zurich, where he died in 1793, æt. 41. His numerous, mostly anonymous, writings were devoted to the advocacy of the neological views he had embraced. His principal work is d. krit. Gesch. d. Chiliasmus, 1781, &c., 4 vols. It is rich in material, and instructive, but uncritical in its execution, and full of digressive attacks upon mysticism and orthodoxy. SEMISCH.*

Corvey. This renowned Benedictine abbey, which lay near the town of Hörter, at the entrance of the Schelpe into the Weser, possesses importance for the Christian Church, in having been for a considerable period, during the middle ages, one of the most active patrons of learning, and also the first missionary institution in Germany. In it were trained many distinguished men, who spread Christianity among the rude Saxon and other heathen nations in the north of Europe, especially among the Scandinavians. It owes its origin to Bathilde, consort of Chlodewig II., founded about 664, and called by writers of the middle ages Corbeja aurea, or vetus, cloister Corvey, near Amiens, in Picardy. Here many noble Saxons found a home, the families of whom were placed among the Franks by Charlemagne, to become acquainted with Christianity and the morals of the people. The regular employment of these Saxon youths, thirsting for knowledge, awakened the idea, in the mind of Abbot Adalhard the elder, of founding a cloister in Saxony. A similar idea had been entertained by Charlemagne. After Adalhard had taken up the Emperor's plan, having consulted often with the Saxon pupils of his cloister, to his great joy a certain youth, named Theodrad, declared that he knew a most desirable location on his father's estate, which he hoped could be obtained gratuitously. Thus encouraged, Adalhard sent several older monks with the youth to Saxony, where they found the desired reception, and (816) at once commenced the new institution in a retired part of the

"Sollinger Wald." According to some writers, this country was then called Hetha or Hechi. The first settlement of this pious fraternity is still remembered at Newhouse, by the names, Meadow of the Abbots, Valley of the Cloister, Plain of the Monks, and Woods of the Cloister. Many hindrances opposed the progress of this enterprise. The settlers were scarcely able to procure the necessities of life from the soil. They were disappointed, also, in the expectation of aid from the French Corvey. Through the malice of enemies, Adalhard, his brother Wala, and all his adherents, had fallen into disgrace with the Emperor, Lewis the Pious. A. was banished to a small island, where he passed several years in seclusion (PERTZ, Monum. Script., II., p. 529). Before leaving Corvey, however, he gave the government of the cloister to a pupil, Adalhard the younger, who endeavored to act and rule in the spirit of his predecessor. But little could be done for the sister institution in Saxony that was encouraging. After the death of Benedict of Aniane, his bitterest opponent, A. the elder was recalled from his banishment by the Emperor, and reinstated into his former dignity (Oct., 821). He at once sent relief to his suffering brethren in Saxony. He visited them himself, and was soon convinced that the new institution must be removed to a more suitable place. After his return to France, he went to the court of the Emperor, there personally to obtain permission to remove the cloister to a more friendly spot. The Emperor granted his request the more readily, inasmuch as he saw that by its prosperity, the success of Christianity among the Saxons would be made the more certain.

After A. had made the requisite arrangements at Corvey, he undertook a journey into Saxony, accompanied by Paschasius Radbertus, Ansgar, Wilmar, Autbert, and other monks. He was received with joy by his brethren. After a short deliberation, he selected a situation for the new cloister, upon the opposite banks of the Weser, on the property of the princely Villa Hüxori (Höxter), which, as was generally believed, Charlemagne had intended for said purpose. Forthwith the building was commenced, and prosecuted with such zeal that, in the autumn of 822, the overjoyed monks were enabled to forsake their solitary abode in Sollingerwald. They were accompanied by a large multitude, and moved in solemn procession, with the sacred relics of their church, into the newly-erected cloister. At the consecration by Bishop Badurad, of Paderborn, it was dedicated to the blessed Stephen, and received its name from the parent institution in Flanders, New Corvey (nova corbeja). A solemn mass, in the presence of the assembled multitude, closed the services of this memorable day. (PERTZ, Mon. Script., II., p. 579; I., p. 577.)

The Emperor looked with favor upon this first cloister established in Saxony in his reign, took it under his special care, granted to it all the rights and privileges of the French Church, and richly endowed it. His example was imitated by many renowned Franks and Saxons, so that the institution rose rapidly, and became opulent. Thus highly favored, the Benedictines were soon enabled to devote themselves exclusively to their own spiritual development, and the spread of Christianity. Adalhard witnessed all this with gratitude, and made New Corvey his abode, only occasionally visiting his former home. Inasmuch as he desired to be buried at the old institution, when he found age and infirmities beginning to press him, he imparted to the Saxon friars at Corvey his fatherly blessing, recommended to them his nearly allied Warinus, a son of the powerful Count Ekbart and Ida, as his successor, and departed for Corvey in France, attended by Ansgar, Authert, and other monks; where he died in peace, Jan. 2, 826.

Thus far A. had presided over both cloisters as abbot. After his death, his brother Wala succeeded to this honor in Old, while in New Corvey, according to his wish, Warinus was elected abbot, and confirmed by the Emperor. Though this separation was at first received with regret, and reluctantly accepted, the two cloisters long maintained intimate fellowship. Scarcely a year passed without mutual visits and communications. But New Corvey was more favored by emperors and queens than the parent institute, and rose to still higher renown and credit. Besides the presents already cited, it received from the Emperor, Lewis the Pious, the right of coinage, and the possession of Höxter, Eresburg, and Meppen, and other important grants. Count Gerold, having retired from the world and entered the cloister, before his death, in 851, bequeathed to it his rich possessions. But of far more importance was the transfer of the remains of the blessed martyr Vitus from the church of the Abbey of St. Denis, in France, in 836. After this, the Saxons showed themselves much more liberal towards the cloister than ever, believing that the prosperity and superiority of the German over the Francoonian power depended on the possession of these holy relics (PERTZ, l. c., and Wigand, Hist. of Corvey, I. p. 67). It was maintained by those of Corvey, that Lothaire, in gratitude to St. Vitus for the victory gained (844) over the Slavic king, Gestimulo, bestowed on them the island Rügen. This is not only improbable, but it may be shown that the documents are spurious, and that the oldest statements on these points, as found in the annals of Corvey (PERTZ, Mon. Script., T. III., p. 3, 840, 860), are interpolations. The known facts seem to be these: As the result of early attempts to convert the Slavonians, the island Rügen, seized by the Carolingians, was made tributary to Corvey, and, on its refusal to pay tribute, documents were forged to prove the claim.

The Abbot Warinus died Sept. 20, 856. Since then, until 1750, sixty abbots ruled over Corvey, many of whom were renowned for their learning, earnest piety, and pure zeal for Christianity. Instead of following the history of Corvey in detail, we shall confine ourselves to the presentation of events which immediately concern the Christian Church. The bloom of this institution was reached under the powerful rule of the Saxon emperors. Under their powerful protection, the school, early established and first directed by Ansgar, acquired an extensive reputation. The most renowned families sent thither their sons. At one time, about 24 teachers imparted instruction in the sacred writings of the O. and N. T. Besides Latin and Greek, the sciences, especially medicine, mathematics, and astronomy, were diligently cultivated. As the desire for intellectual improvement in Saxony spread so rapidly, the keen and zealous abbot, Adelgar (from 856 to 876), found himself necessitated to establish a second school, exclusively for Greek and Latin, which stood under the control of the first, but soon rivalled it. Corvey also became an example to other cloisters in piety and discipline—the wonder of all Germany, and the promoter of religion and learning, the teacher of the whole north. Contemporaries vie with each other in their praises of it. Of the large number of renowned men who received their training at Corvey, and who rose to high honors in the Church, we mention Ansgar, Rimbert, Adelgar, Hoyer, and Unni; Bruno of Köln, Thiagrin of Halberstadt, Bruno of Verden, Wigbert of Hildesheim, and Folkmar of Paderborn; and the zealous missionaries, Autbert, Adaldag, Ansfried, Nithard, Stephan, Otger, and Adelverd, some of whom found a martyr's grave.

Whilst these extended the fame of this institution by their labors abroad, many of those remaining labored successfully as teachers and authors. Adam of Bremen says (lib. I., c. 32, 35), that he received from Corvey the younger a collection of short cloister notices, which he called computus, besides the life of the blessed Rimbert, and the historical work of Bovo I., Abbot at Corvey (880–90), a contemporary of Archbishop Rimbert. Widukind, with others, wrote the excellent history of the Saxons (Res gestæ Saxonicae, PERTZ, Mon. Scr., T. III., p. 408–467), which reached down to 968. About the time of Henry IV., the monk Bernhard composed an Oratio inveciva in imperatorem Henricum IV.; also, about 1082, Isibort of Amelunxen a Breviarium rerum memorabilium. In 1206, Abbot Thietmar, assisted by Maurus, wrote Annales Corbej. recentiores ad a. 1206 (LEIBNITZ, Script., II., 297). Others devoted their talents to theology. Arnulph (982) composed a metrical work on the Proverbs of Solomon, and Eberhardus a commentary on the Pentateuch. Robert, Meinholt, Roger, and others took part in the controversy on the Lord's Supper, against the supposed heretical views of Berengarius.

This literary zeal was greatly aided by the library, which contained important MSS., collected from the earliest times; among others, the first five books of the Annals of Tacitus were found, and now preserved in the Medicæ library, at Florence (TACITI, Opera ed. J. A. ERNESTI, præf., I., p. 5). But with all these advantages, it could not withstand, after the death of the influential abbot, Wicbold († 1174), the unfavorable influences of the times. In the numerous feuds and wars, in which the German power suffered no little, the Abbey lost many of her rich incomes and possessions. To these evils were added internal dissensions and relaxed discipline. Cardinal Nikolaus Cusanus (from Cues, in Treves, † Aug. 11, 1464) found it in such a deplorable condition, both as to morality and science, that he fell on his knees, and, with his face on the ground, exclaimed: "O sancta tellus, quæ tot genuisti apostolos et episcopos, sit dominus in secula benedictus!"

The severest shocks the cloister experienced were during the thirty years' war, in which the library and the archives were scattered, the buildings much injured, many possessions taken away, and the tithes and other incomes impaired. The abbots, after the peace of Westphalia, exerted themselves to gather together that which was scattered, and to rescue as much as possible of that seemingly lost; but of all their former possessions, they recovered only a small district of 5 square leagues, containing about 20,000 inhabitants.

The abbots at Corvey stood directly under the Pope, and were reckoned among the German powers, and among princely abbots had a final vote. In 1794, Pius VI. created the princely abbey into a Bishopric. But, as it was hemmed in on all sides by Paderborn, Hildesheim, and Mainz, its jurisdiction was confined to its own narrow bounds. In 1803, the Bishop, by the decision of the deputation, lost his temporal dignity, and the secularized lands, with the bishopric of Fulda, was given as an indemnity to the principality of Nassau-Orange; whereupon, in 1807, it was united with the provinces of the newly created Westphalian kingdom, and after its dissolution, 1815, was transferred to the king of Prussia. After 1822, it constituted a principality of 6 sq. leagues, with 24,000 inhabitants. At the new diocesan arrangement of the Prussian monarchy, in 1821, the Pope dissolved the bishopric, and the chapter, consisting of one dean and ten prebendaries, was united with the chapter at Paderborn. The commodious abbey, now changed into a princely residence, is situated in a pleasant and fruitful valley, and presents, with its numerous residences, an imposing appearance. The beautiful Gothic church is built in the form of a cross, the interior handsomely finished, and the numerous monuments commemorate powerful landgraves and lords who are buried there.

A full and critical history of Corvey has not yet appeared. True, there are not wanting many sources, yet the greater part require thorough sifting as to the facts related. Among the old, but not critical, works, are to be mentioned Joh. Letzner's Chronicles of Corvey. Hamburg, 1593, 4to. C. F. Paullini's (MS. preserved in the library at Wolfenbüttel) new, complete history of the ancient cloister Corvey, in five books, 1683, in fol. C. F. PAULLINI's Theatrum illustrium virorum Corbejæ Saxonicae, Jena, 1686, 4to. Sketch of Cloister Corvey, by Joh. Fried. Falcken, Braunschweig, 1738, 8vo. Codex traditionum Corbeiensium Diplomatarium nec non registrum abbatis Sarachonis, ed. Jo. FR. FALCKE, Lips., 1752, fol. The original history of the princely abbey Corvey, and the cities of Corvey and Höxter, by PAUL WIGAND, Vol. 1, Pt. 1, 2, Höxter, 1819, 8vo, reaches only to 1146. (Comp. Ersch and Gruber, XIX., p. 392; KLIPPEL's Researches, &c., Bremen, 1843 and 1845).

G. H. KLIPPEL. — Santee.

Corvinus, Antonius (Rübener), a prominent Reformer in the north of Germany. b. Feb. 27, 1501, in Warburg. (not Marburg). Little is known about his youth or conversion. In 1523 he was driven, on account of his adherence to Lutheranism, from the cloister Loccum, where, as in Riddagshausen, he received his training. From thence he went to Wittenberg, where he prosecuted his studies without coming into personal contact with the principal men of the Reformation. In 1526 he was at Marburg, when efforts were made towards founding the new university, but was never professor there. At the recommendation of Amsdorf, leader of the Reformation in 1528, he was called to Goslar, as preacher at St. Stephan's, where he zealously labored to the close of 1531; when, owing to the unhappy turn of the Reformation at Goslar, and personal persecutions, he went to Witzenhausen. Here he served the ministry for a number of years, but was frequently at Marburg, and was employed by the Landgrave in nearly all the most important transactions, as at the disputation between Melancthon and Bucer, 1535, and the Smalcald convention, 1537.

In 1539, an important field of usefulness opened for him in Göttingen and Kalenberg. At the commencement of the Reformation, Duke Erich the elder reigned there, a man of an upright disposition; but, as a fellow-soldier of the Emperor Maximilian, rough and severe; without taste for higher interests; averse to the Reformation, as the friend of Charles V.; and, through the influence of his first wife, he strove to keep down the movement in his principality. His first wife died without issue. In 1525, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Joachim I., one of the bitterest foes of the Reformation. Elizabeth, favorably impressed, perhaps by the patience of her mother, more so by her brother, the Margrave John of Küstrin, who visited her at Münden, 1538, when Corvin preached for the first time in Münden, formally passed over to the Evangelical Church in the same year. Erich, who remained in the Romish Church, did not hinder her, and ordered that Corvin, at the request of Elizabeth, and by the permission of Philip of Hesse, should come over from time to time to preach and administer the sacraments. From this time Corvin gained in influence. In 1539 he reformed Nordheim, and gave to the city a Church government. Immediately after the death of Erich, July 26, 1540, at the diet of Hagenau, Elizabeth having become regent for Erich II., the introduction of the new doctrine became the chief aim of her life. At her side stood Just. Waldhausen, her chancellor, recommended by Luther; Burcard Mithob, her physician, a friend of Melancthon, allied to Corvin; above all, Corvin himself, who at first remained at Witzenhausen, but, at the end of 1541, or beginning of 1542, removed to the province, and engaged in her service, and was called as superintendent of Kalenberg-Göttingen.

In the fall of 1540, the estates were consulted in Pattensen concerning the Reformation, and consented to receive the Word of God. An edict to this effect was published. The ceremonies at first remained unaltered; but the pure gospel was preached. The change was first to be made internally; this accomplished, the outward soon followed. About Whitsunday, 1542, appeared the form of Church government drawn up by Corvin, in German: then, Nov. 4, canonistic rules, also rules for the Church revenue. These were to be introduced by a visitation. This was undertaken by Corvin, with the assistance of selected clergy and laity, in Göttingen, 1542, in Kalenberg, 1543.

Meanwhile, Corvin zealously assisted in carrying on the Reformation at Hildesheim, whither he was sent with Winkel and Bugenhagen, by princes of the Smalcaldian confederacy. He assisted in drawing up the ecclesiastical discipline, and introducing the Reformation into Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel. Then he returned to his own country, and labored actively in furthering the good work. Although all opposition had not disappeared, yet the whole land seemed to be permanently reformed. Erich II., whilst engaged in the Emperor's camp, in fighting against the Evangelicals, returned to the Roman Church. Many preachers had to fly. Corvin, with Walther Höcker, were seized (Nov. 1, 1549) in Pattensen, by Spanish soldiers, and taken to Kalenberg. He spent three years in prison. Elizabeth's intercession had no effect. C. suffered patiently for the cause of the gospel which he had served so zealously. Towards the close of 1552, Erich II., through the influence of the Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg-Kulmbach, was regained for the side of the Evangelical party, and Corvin was released from his confinement. But the rigor of the prison consumed his energies. Already sick, he was brought to Hanover, where he died April 5, 1553. He lies buried before the altar of the church St. George and James.

Corvin does not belong to the creative spirits of the Reformation, but to the circle of men who assisted in proclaiming the Word in its purity. More important than his writings, of which few (except his Postille) reached several editions, was his talent for Church organization. (See Baring, Leben C., Hannov., 1749. Schlegel, Kirchen-u. Reformationsgesch. von Norddeutschl. II., 141, &c.) UHLHORN. — Santee.

Cosri (Liber Cosri or Cusri, rather Cosari or Cusari) is the title of a remarkable production of mediæval Rabbinism, a religious dialogue, invested with unusual interest, as well for its classic construction, as the import of its title, and a correspondence connected with it. Its author is R. Jehuda Hallevi (Levita) of Spain, the renowned Jewish poet, and stepfather of Aben Ezra, who was trodden to death by a Turkish horseman as he entered the gates of Jerusalem on a pilgrimage, in 1150. He combined in himself the poet, philosopher, and general scholar; and, as a teacher of the Mosaic faith, excited the highest admiration of his brethren. Deut. 12 : 19 was applied to him, and his book Cosri was equally prized with the More hannevochim of M. Maimonides, as the best defence against unbelief. The aim of Cosri is to prove the superiority of the written law over heathen philosophy, Christianity, and Mohammedanism, and the validity of the oral law (against the Caraites), and thus secure his brethren against temptations to apostasy. He does this with great skill and taste, in a dialogue occasioned by a king, Cosar, who, disturbed in a dream by the voice of an angel saying, "Your intentions are good, but your actions bad," desired instruction in a religion which would teach him how to do well. The result is his conviction of the superiority of the Jewish religion over all others. The book consists of five parts, upon the existence, names, and attributes of God; creation; angels; the written law; tradition; providence, and God's decrees; free will; the resurrection, and eternal life; the worship of God; prayer; idolatry, &c.; the revelation of God, his Shekinah: the prerogatives of Jews; their former knowledge of things divine and human; the beauty of Palestine; the nobility of the Hebrew language; music and poetry; the existence, immortality, and powers of the human soul; prophecy, &c. It comprehends everything pertaining to the Jewish religion; is rich in its O. T. exegesis; and is most tersely and accurately written. Of course it betrays rabbinical prejudices, and, as its views of Christianity were mainly derived from Spain, they are very deficient. It was first written in Arabic, then translated into Hebrew, first by R. Jehuda ben Kardaniel; afterwards (better) by R. Jeh. ben Saul. The original MS., says WOLF, Bibl. hebr.: exstat in B. Bodl., n. 5424, inter Cod. Pocock. n. 97. Of the Hebrew version, three ed. exist, the Fanentian, of 1504, 4to., and the Venice ed. of 1547, 1594. In the last, which Buxtorf followed, passages injurious to Christians were omitted. Buxtorf issued an ed. in 1660, accompanying the Hebrew text with valuable annotations and a Latin transl. There is also a Spanish transl. (Amstelod. 1663) said to excel Buxtorf's. A continuation of Cosri, enlarging upon points briefly treated, was issued by D. Nieto, London, 1712-14.

That the dialogue is a theological fiction is unquestionable; though it evidently rests upon some facts. But it is otherwise with regard to the correspondence contained in the book, consisting of two letters exchanged between R. Chasdai Ebn Sprot, a Jewish minister at the court of Abd-el-Rhaman III. and Joseph, king of the Chazari, in 958. Of the existence of the kingdom of the Chazari, along the shores of the Caspian and Black seas, overthrown in 1016 by the Russians, there is now no doubt (see DE SACY, in the Arab. Chrestom.; FRÄHN, de Chazaris, Petrop. 1822; NEUMANN, d. Völker d. südl. Russlands, Lpz. 1847; Gieseler and Neander's Ch. Hist.). But, although the Chasari kings for a time may have embraced Judaism, and the Jews may have enjoyed religious liberty among them, their condition was by no means enviable. For eastern Jews who visited the country found in it so strange a mixture of barbarism and cultivation, that they were far from being edified by the visit. To those, however, living in the distant West, the fact of a king having been converted to Judaism would assume exaggerated importance. Hence it is possible that some Jew in Cordova might be induced at a great sacrifice to open a correspondence with the royal proselyte. Chasdai's letter possesses more proofs of authenticity than Joseph's reply, the genuineness of which has been denied by Düsterdieck (Götting. gelehrte Anz., 1848, p. 1519-26) and Yost.

PRESSL.*

Cotelerius (Cotelier), John Baptist, b. Dec.

1627, was the son of a Reformed preacher, who passed over to the Romish Church. In 1641, he went to Paris, where he studied philosophy and theology. In 1648 he became a doctor of the Sorbonne. Colbert, the minister, 1667, requested him to examine the Greek MSS. in the royal library, and to make a catalogue of the same. At this he spent 5 years. In 1676 he became professor of Greek in the royal college. († Aug. 19, 1686.) He issued an excellent ed. of the apostolic fathers, Paris, 1672, 2 vols. This edition, with other important works, were destroyed by fire in the Collège Montaigne. A second and third edition was edited by the learned Clericus (see Art.), 1698 and 1724. Besides these, Cotelier edited other memorials of Church antiquity. (See NICÉRON, Mémoires, T. IV., p. 243, &c. Biogr. univers.)

HAGENBACH.—Santee.

Court, Anthony, b. 1696, at Villeneuve-de-Berg, merits the title, "Restorer of Protestantism in France." After the revocation of the edict of Nantes, the civil, as well as ecclesiastical, existence of the Reformed was practically ignored. The designedly delusive cry, "There are no more Protestants in France!" though constantly refuted by the complaints of priests that their sacraments, &c., were contemned, was still reiterated in the palace and the court. This delusion was, indeed, partly dispelled by the uprising of "prophets and fanatics (see Brousson; Camisards). But, when they were silenced, the "great work" of exterminating heresies and retailing official slanders was again put in motion. There were many Reformed, however, who resisted all attempts to induce them to embrace even a modified Romish confession. They were the prop of "new converts," the germ of life still left in the subverted Church. And yet the tares of fanaticism had almost choked this germ. Unprotected by the earlier organization and discipline, and lacking the element of sound religious knowledge, the French Ref. C. seemed doomed to certain death by the fanaticism of its own members. From this sad fate the Lord saved her by the hands of a youth endowed with extraordinary talents, pre-eminently qualifying him for the work of re-organization.

In the synod at Delphinus, 1716, where he met by invitation five pastors, followed by a second at Languedoc, 1717, he laid the foundation for an ecclesiastical constitution, similar to the old form of the French Church, incorporating and based upon the old discipline. In doing this, he encountered and overcame the greatest difficulties and personal perils. These were enhanced by the opposition of fanatical brethren, who said "He is fighting God," and of envious persons, and such as opposed him from jealousy, while others still writhed under the application of discipline. But God favored his work, and Court, though three of his co-laborers had died by violence, could soon replace them. Then arose the great difficulty of entrusting the functions of the sacred office to persons lacking the proper ordination. To obviate this difficulty, he sent one of his associates to Zurich for ordination, who, at a synod held in 1718, imparted said act to his fellow-laborers. The number was small, the work increasing, the demand for services becoming greater, while those in safe places would not exchange them for a wandering missionary life, exposing them to the gallows. The indefatigable Court, aided by the government of Berne and the Archb. of Canterbury, in 1729, established a seminary at Lausanne, where ministers were prepared for churches "under the cross," or "of the desert." The "churches of the desert" (a designation which seemed peculiarly suited to the condition of ev. Christians in France), spread more widely, and acquired greater historical importance than the so-called "field meetings" in England, or "conventicles" of Scotland. All ecclesiastical acts were registered "In the desert;" all certificates, &c., of marriage and baptism, and petitions to the court, &c., were dated "from the desert."

The unparalleled success with which this work of Court met in so short a time, could not possibly escape the notice of the government, which, under the regency of the Duke of Orleans, was naturally inclined to lend his power to persecution, but restrained by policy. Closely allied with England against Spain, he feared lest the ambitious Cardinal Alberoni would excite the Protestants to insurrection. The advice of Basnage, then at the Hague, was asked, who said that persecution alone would make the Protestants rebel. The regent even sought to induce Court to leave France. But Court continued his abode at Lausanne. Still he ceased not to travel through the kingdom, to give encouragement and counsel wherever needed, and thus was the soul of the work till his death (1760).

Court's diligence as a writer, and his influence in this capacity on the French C., were considerable. Besides his history of that Church (see Camisards), he wrote "Le Patriote françois et impartial, ou Réponse à la lettre de M. l'évêque d'Agén à M. le contrôleur-général contre la tolérance des Huguenots." Villefr. (Genève) 1751, 1753; "Lettre d'un patriote sur la tolérance civile des Prot. de France, 1765, &c. His unpublished MSS. are probably more valuable than any of the above. (See COQUEREL'S Hist. d. Egl. du Désert; PEYRAT'S Hist. d. Part. du Désert; La France Prot. per MM. Haag., Sept. Part. Paris, 1854, p. 95, &c.; Bulletin de la Soc. d. l'Hist. du Prot. Fr.)

V. POLENZ. — Santee.

Cramer, John Andrew, D. D., b. in St. Georgestadt, Saxony, Jan. 29, 1723. He studied theology at Leipsic. In 1748 he became preacher in Crellwitz, and, in 1750, principal chaplain in Quedlinburg. In 1754, Frederick V., of Denmark, invited him, at Klopstock's suggestion, as German court preacher, to Copenhagen. Here he gained renown as an orator, and acquired great influence by his piety. In 1765 he was appointed prof. of theology. After the accession of Christian VII., Cramer lost his place by his fearless assaults upon French scepticism, which had spread into Denmark. He then accepted, 1771, a superintendency in Lübeck. Upon the fall of Struensee, the frivolous prime minister of Christian VII., Cramer was recalled to Denmark as prochancellor, and first prof. of theol. in Kiel. There he labored with great success, especially in raising up worthy men for the ministerial office. He died June 12, 1788. Besides being distinguished as a preacher and theologian, he gained reputation as a religious Lyric poet. In connection with Klopstock, he issued, 1776-9, an "Algem. Gesangb. zum Gebrauch in d. Gemeinen d. Herzogth. Schleswig-Holst." He also published "Poetische Uebersetzung d. Psalmen," Lpz. 1755, &c.—Although his hymns excel in rhetoric rather than in depth of evangelical sentiment, they are full of pathos, and stirring, passionate outbursts. Indeed, in this respect, he rises above Klopstock. The hymn-books of the latter part of the last and beginning of this century, have many of his productions. KOCH.*

Cranmer, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, descended from a family which came to England in the time of William I., was b. July 2d, 1489, at Aslacton, Nottinghamshire. His first instruction he received from an incompetent teacher, and practised, according to prevailing custom, physical exercises, such as riding, hunting, and archery. After the death of his father, his mother (1503) sent him to Cambridge, where he attended to the customary studies, and became a fellow of Jesus College (1510-1511). As such, he diligently read the writings of Faber, Stapulensis, and Erasmus, besides other good Latin authors, until the appearance of Luther directed his attention to the Holy Scriptures, with which he was engaged for some years. Concerning his inward development, little is known. What he thought of celibacy is apparent from his marriage, about 1519. On this account he had to leave college, but, nevertheless, was selected as teacher in Buckingham College; and, after the death of his wife, which occurred early, and also his child, he was selected again by his former college, where, 1523, he received the honorary D. D. His reputation as a theologian was so well established that, in the following year, he was nominated, among other respectable names, for Wolsey's new college at Oxford. He declined this offer, brilliant as it was, and was elected professor of theology, preacher at the university, and examiner to those to be promoted in theology. At the examinations, he generally made the Holy Scriptures his basis, and refused to pass many monks whose knowledge of the Bible was deficient. This, as the nickname "Scripturist," which was given on account of his sermons, shows that already then he was a representative of the evangelical tendency of the university.

About this time the divorce of the king became the question of the day. For the solution of the difficulty, a theological commission was selected. Cranmer was a member; but, being absent from Cambridge, he did not meet the commission. He removed to Waltham, in Essex, owing to his enfeebled health, with his two nephews, whose instruction he had undertaken. As the commission now unanimously declared the marriage legal, Fox and Gardiner, who were about the king, remembered Cranmer, and visited him at Waltham, to ascertain his views. These suited the king so well that, in August, 1529, he had him called, and requested him to give his views in writing. At the same time, he assigned him the house of Sir Thomas Bolen, Earl of Wiltshire, who was concerned in the matter of divorce, as a place of abode, and appointed him his chaplain, and afterwards arch-dean of Taunton. After Cranmer had finished his task, he was called upon to defend it at Cambridge, and soon succeeded in winning many to his opinions. Henry now saw that Cranmer was the person to carry his case successfully through at Rome, and sent him thither (1530) with Bolen and others. Cranmer's written opinion was laid before the Pope, and keenly defended by its author. He remained at Rome for a few months, after the others who despaired of the issue had left, and returned only towards the close of the year. Already, in Jan. 24, 1531, the king entrusted him with an embassy to the German court. Here, too, he succeeded in winning many to his side, as the counsellor to the Emperor, Agrippa, and A. Oslander, in Nuremberg, with whom Cranmer formed an intimate friendship, strengthened by marriage with his niece, who came to England in 1534. Oslander supported Cranmer's view in his work de matrimoniis incestis. Cranmer was also entrusted with other diplomatic business, in reference to a treaty of commerce with the Netherlands, etc., and with a secret embassy to the Protestant princes, which proves how highly the King prized his prudence and skill. Though these efforts proved fruitless, the confidence of the king in him was not shaken. He rather meditated elevating him to a position in which he might the more successfully carry out the plans of the King. The Archbishopric of Canterbury became vacant by the death of Warham, Aug. 23, 1532. Henry had no doubt previously recalled C., and communicated his views in reference to filling said office. Cranmer for some months delayed his return; but, in the beginning of November, 1532, he was in London, when Henry privately married Anne Bolen. Cranmer, for a long time, refused to accept of an office which then appeared so difficult and dangerous. His decision was embarrassed partly by his natural timidity, and on account of the impossibility of harmonizing the royal supremacy with papal authority. The counsellors of the King found an expedient in the protest which he was allowed to enter at his consecration. This last took place, with papal approbation, March 30, 1533, in Westminster Abbey. Cranmer here solemnly declared that, by the oath he took to the Pope, he in no wise bound himself to do anything contrary to the divine law, the rights of the crown, or the laws of the land—neither should he be hindered in any way to speak and act publicly and freely in matters affecting the Reformation and government of the English Church, the rights of the King, and the welfare of the State. With these reservations, he took the oath, and was consecrated Archbishop.

Cranmer at once was made to realize his critical position. The King, without his knowledge and presence, publicly solemnized his marriage with Anne Bolen, April 12, and Cranmer, from the start, had either to break with the King, or to declare the divorce from Catherine legal, and confirm his marriage with Anne. He accepted the latter, and could do so the more consistently, since he considered the former marriage illegal. On May 23, he declared the first marriage dissolved, and eight days afterwards confirmed the other, and crowned Anne on June 1. He well knew that this would lead to a rupture with Rome, and accordingly sent to Bonner, the ambassador at Marseilles, an appeal from the Pope to the next general council. The Pope answered with a bull of excommunication (March 23, 1534); the King, on his part, by the decision of the convocation, annulled the papal authority over England by an edict, June 9, and affirmed by the act of supremacy, Nov. 3, 1534, the independence of the English Church over against Rome. The Archbishop exchanged the title of papal legate for that of primate of the whole of England. He now stood at the head of a Church independent of Rome, and thus had a work before him, the extent and compass of which he at first could not comprehend. Thus far, the only point had been concerning the separation from Rome, the justification of the divorce, and the legal heir to the crown. All this could be settled by the secular authority. Now the question was about reforming a whole people, head and members, and bringing the gospel to bear on a cruel and tyrannical King, who stood at the head of the Church, and also on a clergy zealous for papal Catholicism. True, the queen exerted some influence on the heart of the King, as he over his people; and Cromwell, the vicar-general of the King-Pope, favored the Reformation. But opposed to them stood the heads of the Romish party, the Duke of Norfolk, Gardiner, Stokesley, Bonner. Those who would have been the most important for the Reformation had long before fled from the country. He that could, under such circumstances, carry through a thorough Reformation, had to be penetrated by the spirit of the gospel, required intrepid courage and unbending determination, in short, such peculiar attributes as are never found in one single man. Cranmer wanted the most important of these. He was not wholly disentangled from Romanism; though circumspect, he was fearful and complaisant; with all his learning, he was vacillating and unsound in the most important doctrines. But this is certain, that Cranmer saved himself from the executioner's axe, not by such diplomatic dexterity and complaisance, as Cromwell used, but more by the noble traits in his character, which won and preserved for him the unshaken confidence and love of the King. A different character might, perhaps, have attempted greater things; but, under a reign like that of Henry, might have effected much less, or nothing. Cranmer sought to reform step by step, and piece by piece.

Above all, he sought to secure the royal supremacy, which for him was an article of faith, and the acknowledgment of the new act of succession; to abolish gross irregularities, and to give the Bible to the people. He dealt severely with the obstinate, though he did everything to save, for example, Fisher and Morus. To carry forward his reform, and to enlighten the people concerning it, he restored the visitation system, which for 100 years had fallen into disuse. He took the lead in his own diocese, and in this retained only such canons and ceremonies as favored his measures of reform. For the translation of the Bible, he could do but little. He merely broached the matter in the convocation (Dec. 1534); but the clergy opposed, under the pretence that the foreign versions of the N. T. were unsatisfactory. Cranmer, accordingly, distributed Tyndale's Testament, in 10 parts, and sent them to the Bishops for revision. These, except Stokesley, complied, and thus ended this first effort. He was more fortunate in filling vacancies with evangelical men. In spite of the opposition of the Romish party, the Reformation seemed to be progressing, when an important crisis occurred. Henry, already grown tired of his new wife, eagerly caught at the reports of her unfaithfulness, to get rid of her. Cranmer during his residence in her father's house, had become intimately acquainted with her, and regarded her as a friend of the Reformation, and was satisfied of her innocence. Although designedly excluded from the commission before which she had a hearing, he ventured to address a letter to the King in her defence. But the warmth of his plea was mingled with fear for his rigorous master. He admitted that the King doubtless proceeded on good grounds, commiserated him on account of his troubles, and only begged him not to withdraw his support from the good work. Fourteen days later he obeyed the order from the King to declare the marriage illegal, and the issue of it bastards. True, the Queen acknowledged, with or against her will, the existence of some unmentioned impediment to her marriage. On May 19, 1536, she fell under the axe, and on the following day Henry married Jane Seymour.

Fortunately the new Queen was favorable to the Reformation, and during the next 17 months, until her death, important progress was made. The first Reformed Synod, under the presidency of Cromwell, as vicar-general, was opened June 16, 1536, and discussed the ten articles of faith, which were probably prepared by Cranmer and others, and which form the dogmatic basis of the English Church. The Bible and the three confessions of faith are therein acknowledged as the rule of faith; three sacraments were acknowledged, baptism, the holy communion, and penance; the doctrine of transubstantiation was retained; and concerning justification, it was taught that it was effected by repentance and faith, with love, only through the grace of God and the merits of Christ. Nearly all Romish ceremonies, invocation of saints, prayers for the dead, were preserved; only persons were admonished not to expect through these forgiveness of sin. Cranmer would not acknowledge penance as a sacrament; but in general the above points expressed his views. These articles were, however, a compromise which satisfied neither party, and Cranmer, accordingly, had them revised under his inspection. The result of this labor was "The institution of a Christian man," in which an advance in favor of evangelical sentiments is clearly to be seen. In all probability, Cranmer would have gone farther, had he not been compelled to contend against such men as Gardiner and Stokesley. The book appeared in December, 1537. Inasmuch as it had not the sanction of the King, he revised it himself, and sent his corrections to Cranmer, who criticised them with much independence and keenness. The decree of the King, which introduced these articles, contains some other important directions — the abrogation of holy days, the instruction of the youth in the faith, the Lord's prayer and the ten commandments, and the placing of the Bible in every church. Cranmer's attempt to have the Bible translated by a committee failed. In the mean time, however, this work was accomplished by Protestant refugees abroad. This rejoiced Cranmer so much that he declared it was more to him than £1000. He did everything he could to obtain the King's permission of its sale. On the assurance of Cranmer, that the translation was a good one, the King consented. Thus the fountain of truth was opened to the people. The Bible was eagerly read, and much said and disputed about it. But Cranmer himself was not as yet so thoroughly penetrated by the spirit of the Gospel that he could allow views deduced from thence which rose above his own. He even justified the condemnation of Lambert and two Anabaptists.

It was a great gain that Cranmer succeeded in introducing the Bible before the death of the Queen, Oct. 24, 1537. From this event affairs took an unfortunate turn. The King grew morose and discontented with the movement. The Romish party seized the opportunity of gaining the confidence of the King, and supplanting the evangelical party. Cranmer sought in vain to abolish celibacy. The King prohibited the marriage of priests (Nov. 1538), and Cranmer found it expedient to send his wife back to Germany. The conferences held at London with Saxon theologians had to be suspended. The protest which he, like Cromwell, entered against squandering the property of the Church, only provoked the King. Cranmer well saw that his opponents would not rest until Romanism was fully restored. But he was determined to face the storm. As the notorious six articles were laid before parliament, July, 1539, for adoption, he firmly opposed them for three days. Never was Cranmer so resolute as now. Cromwell yielded; two bishops on his side resigned their offices; but Cranmer was not to be moved, even by the command of the King, to lay the axe at the root of the tree he had with difficulty planted, and thus far sheltered. Cranmer's conduct made such an impression upon the King, that shortly after the close of the session in which the articles were adopted, a deputation was sent to him to satisfy him, and assure him of the kind disposition of the King. Cranmer answered that he hoped that his views might yet prevail, to the glory of God and the best interests of his kingdom. In the mean while, he would not resist the resolutions of parliament.

In order to oppose more successfully the power of the Romish party, Cromwell introduced the King's marriage with Anna of Cleve. Henry immediately thought of a divorce, which Cranmer suffered himself to execute. Cromwell was doomed to the scaffold, and though his former friends attempted his defence, they soon yielded, and voted for his execution. It is difficult to defend Cranmer against the charge of an unmanly succumbing to the will of the King, and a feeble vindication of his friends. But this cannot be attributed to concern for his own safety; for, in his support of the Reformation, he braved all danger. And when, on Cromwell's overthrow, the Romish party persuaded the King to appoint a commission to remodel the Articles to suit the Romish views, neither threats nor entreaties could induce C. to yield. Many declared that his refusal would cost him his head. But Cranmer managed to win the King to his side, and, with his approval, proposed to the commission 17 questions; their answers to which he sent to the King, with his remarks. These are important, in so far as they show the views of Cranmer, as then held. "Only baptism and the holy communion are sacraments, in the strict sense. Princes have charge both of the political and religious interests of their people, and hence appoint chancellors, treasurers, Bishops, and priests. The consecration of those called to spiritual offices is important to preserve good order and due solemnity; but there is no more grace thus imparted than by inductions into secular offices. When there were no Christian princes, the apostles or congregations chose officers. But, according to the Scriptures, a prince can create a priest as well as a Bishop, and, accordingly, consecration is not essential. Compulsory confession and extreme unction are unscriptural." The other bishops dissented materially from these views, and further conference on these points seems to have been broken off. This much, however, was gained, that the attempts of the Romish party were foiled. This was the more important, as they were gaining influence with the King, since his marriage with Catharine Howard (Aug. 1540). But, after a few months, this union again was dissolved. It became Cranmer's duty to inform Henry of her former dissolute life; and this time he could clearly declare the marriage void. Her fall was a severe blow for the Romish party. Cranmer seized the opportunity of having the Bible introduced into every church by the King's command. He also improved the schools, giving special heed to the poor. This provoked his opponents, who moved the King so to limit the use of the Bible that it amounted almost to a prohibition. But they did not stop here. As the Protestants found a new protectress in Catharine Parr, the Romanists became zealously intent on effecting both her and Cranmer's downfall. His clergy were incited to prefer complaints against him; but this resulted only in Gardiner's disgrace, and the imprisonment of the originators of the plot. Equally abortive was Gostwick's accusation of Cranmer before Parliament, and the attempt of some members of the Privy Council to have him imprisoned for heresy. His opponents, however, in some instances thwarted his plans. He complains that, in the "Necessary doctrine for any Christian man" (1543), many things were said which he disapproved. He, indeed, secured the institution of a commission for the revision of the canon law, but never saw it accomplished. And whilst he prosecuted the correction of some abuses, the prohibition of the Bible (1546) was more rigidly enforced. There is no doubt that C. proposed a treaty with the King of France, for the abolition of the mass, about the time of Henry's death, Jan. 28, 1547.

Thus far, Cranmer seems to have accomplished but little. Many good rules and regulations were nipped in the bud, while others were only partially carried out. Nor is this surprising. Cranmer had to steer between Scylla and Charybdis, the arbitrariness of the King, and the hatred of the Romish party; so that it seemed to be a great gain merely to have saved the vessel of the Reformation. Even he himself had no settled aim. Another reason why he effected so little, is to be found in the whole process of this Reformation. It commenced with an external rupture with Rome, and spread from the court downwards; whilst the German Reformation commenced with an inward emancipation from Romish errors, and rose from the common people upwards. The relations thus far existing, changed with the accession of Edward. His education had been entrusted to Cranmer. The Lord Protector and Cecil were friends of the Reformation; and though the Romanists were still powerful, the other party had no longer to pass between two fires. They could resist their opponents without having an enemy in their rear. Surrounded by truly evangelical men, Cranmer's views became more settled, and he thus gained courage to apply his best talents to the furtherance of the Reformation; of which, indeed, he was the soul, during Edward's happy reign.

In full harmony with his exalted views of the royal dignity, C. received his office anew from Edward. Holding up Josiah as the ideal of a Christian king, he urged Edward (at his coronation) to imitate that sovereign in his reformation of the Church; but added, that by neglect of such a duty, he would not forfeit his crown. In this onesided view, C. overlooked the independence of the O. T. priesthood, and prophetic office. But he evidently thought he could thus most effectually sap the power and popular influence of the Romish clergy.

He next instituted visitations of all the churches, and a commission was appointed for each diocese. His object was, not only to have the King's supremacy universally acknowledged, and abuses abolished, but also to have the people more thoroughly instructed. He compiled, with the aid of Ridley, Latimer, and others, the Book of Homilies (July, 1547), which taught evangelical doctrine more distinctly than before, and he had the paraphrases of Erasmus translated into English. In Parliament (November, 1547), he succeeded in having the Six Articles annulled, and proposed a revision of the liturgy. The celebration of the Eucharist under both forms was at once enjoined—Cranmer's views concerning it having been changed through the influence of Ridley. Then he had the Nuremberg Catechism translated into English (1548). The draft of a new liturgy was completed Nov. 1548, and, in Jan. 1549, accepted by Parliament. This was not effected without desperate opposition from the papal party; and it was found necessary to imprison Gardiner, and afterwards Bonner. The universities being still a bulwark of Romanism, C. sought to bring these into the new measures. He was greatly aided in his efforts by continental scholars, whom he welcomed to his palace. Among these were Peter Alexander v.

Artois, Peter Martyr from Florence, Bernardin Ochino, Tremellius, Bucer, Fagius, Matth. Negelin, Justus Jonas, John Laski, the founder of the first German congregation in London, and the Scot, Alex. Alesius. Peter Martyr was appointed to a professorship in Oxford, where he delivered lectures on the N. T., and triumphantly disputed with the papists on the Lord's Supper. Bucer did the same at Cambridge. Tremellius and Dryander, whom Melanchthon recommended, also received appointments at Oxford, and Fagius in Cambridge.

Cranmer engaged in another important measure. The 10 articles of faith no longer answered their purpose. C. conceived the great idea of uniting all Protestants in a new confession. He proposed the matter to Melanchthon, Calvin, and Bullinger, and proposed London as the most suitable place for deliberations upon the subject. Melanchthon and Calvin greatly desired such a union, but saw insuperable difficulties in the way. C., therefore, had to be content with a confession which he, aided by English theologians, drew up, probably on the basis of the 13 articles found among his papers, the fruit of his conferences with the German theologians, and closely allied to the first 17 articles of the Augsburg Confession. In May, 1552, 42 articles were laid before the Convocation, and subsequently approved by the King, but not by Parliament. In the same year, the liturgy was revised by Cranmer, assisted by Ridley, Cox, Peter Martyr, Bucer, and others, and extreme unction, auricular confession, and prayers for the dead were omitted.

Thus Cranmer completed the external structure of the Reformation. But the spirit of the Gospel spread much more tardily. Under Edward, also, extreme measures were adopted. A fanatic, Joana Bocher, was burned, after C. and Ridley had tried in vain to induce her to renounce her errors. It is now certain that C. was not present at her conviction, and did not secure the King's signature to her sentence.

The Romish party continued to assail the Reformation. Gardiner, though in prison, attacked Cranmer's view of the Lord's Supper. C., in his reply, assumed the Calvinistic doctrine. The Romish party, however, effected the downfall of Somerset, and thus deprived Cranmer of an important support. Northumberland, who followed S., sought to draw Edward from Cranmer's influence, and succeeded in persuading the King to secure the succession to his daughter-in-law. Cranmer, who first vindicated the claims of Mary, yielded to the King. The young King soon after died (July 6, 1553), and with him sunk the hope of the Reformation. After an unsuccessful attempt in favor of Lady Jane Grey, Mary ascended the throne.

With this commences the last and shortest period in Cranmer's life. His work was done. Martyrdom threatened him, but he resolved to stand by his banner. Mary could not forget that he pressed her mother's divorce, and sanctioned the elevation of Lady Jane Grey. Moreover she hated him as the champion of the Reformation. He was, accordingly, summoned before the royal council and (Sep. 14) the Star Chamber, and sent to the tower. He was accused of crimes into which Gardiner had drawn him; and he, who reluctantly assented to Lady Jane's succession, had to atone for it, while others escaped. At first he displayed most admirable courage. While many let go their views, he declared himself prepared to defend the Reformation as scriptural. But no opportunity to do this was granted him. In November he was convicted of high treason. He was ready to die a martyr for the Gospel, but could not endure to be branded a traitor. He wrote to the Queen, and was released from the charge of high treason, but accused of heresy. The tower was so crowded that he was thrown with Ridley and Latimer into one cell. He found great comfort in prayer and the reading of the Scriptures with them. He was soon called before the convocation and heard. He appealed to the Word of God; his opponents pointed to the sword as their weapon. The case was so conducted that many of his opponents were dissatisfied, and it was transferred to Oxford for further action. He was taken to Oxford in May, 1554, and the case was resumed. The session was solemnly opened in St. Mary's church. C., staff in hand, maintained a dignified position before his judges. He was required to subscribe three decidedly Romish articles, but refused, and begged time to answer them in writing. Next day, Sunday, he sent in his reply, and appeared on Monday to defend it. In spite of constant interruptions and gibes, he remained calm and firm, and for six hours defended himself, both in Latin and English, with such learning that his foes were amazed. On Thursday he was recalled, and even the chairman commended his meekness and modesty. On Friday, he, Ridley, and Latimer were again required to sign the three articles. They unanimously refused, and were condemned as heretics. When the decision was announced, C. cried out, "I appeal from your bar and decision to the righteous judgment of the Almighty, in the firm hope that I shall enjoy his presence in heaven, on account of whose corporeal presence in the sacrament you condemn me." In a letter to the Queen, which she probably never received, he complained of the unjust proceedings against him. The three were now kept in close confinement for 18 months, during which time C. prepared a second paper against Gardiner. They stood so high in the regards of the people, that it was probably thought impolitic to execute them without the sanction of the Pope. A new investigation by papal and royal commissaries, was therefore commenced in Sept. 1555. Latimer and Ridley were first heard; then Cranmer. C. protested both against the commission, being bound by his oath to discard the Pope's authority; and against the witnesses, who had violated the oath of supremacy. But the witnesses were examined, the trial was closed, and the result sent to Rome. Again C. wrote to the Queen that he rejected the Pope's authority, as against the law of the land, and because the Pope made himself God, and forbade the sacrament under both forms; that he protested not from personal motives, but to save the independence of his country, and serve the glory of God. Henry had told C. that his intercession for Mary would prove his ruin. She directed Pole to answer the letter. The mediation of his friends was unavailing. The Pope excommunicated him; Bonner and Thirlby, an earlier friend of C., executed the act (Feb. 14, 1556). Whilst publicly stripping him of his insignia and robes, Thirlby wept. Bonner exulted in his degradation. C. remained composed, and, when they had done, banded Thirlby an appeal to the next general council — a last, but hopeless, attempt to obtain that justice in a foreign land which was denied at home.

But C.'s enemies, not content with his fall as the champion of the Reformation, plotted his deeper abasement, by compelling him to recant. After his excommunication, great attention was paid to him, and he was besieged with entreaties and promises, until he finally signed a recantation, which was forthwith printed and circulated. Immediately an order for his execution was issued, but kept concealed from him. On March 21, he was led into St. Mary's church. The old man knelt on an elevated platform, where all could see him, with bare head and a flowing white beard. He wept bitterly. All present were deeply moved. After the sermon, which argued that, notwithstanding his recantation, such a heretic should be burned, as an example to others, C. was asked to repeat his recantation. "That will I do, right heartily," he replied, and, having offered a touching prayer for the pardon of his sins, he addressed the people; and, to the astonishment of all, declared that his previous recantation was falsely made, from a sinful love of life, and solemnly avowed his adherence to evangelical truth. "This hand that offended shall first burn." He was soon interrupted and hurried to the stake, steadfastly resisting all attempts to shake his faith. Whilst the flames were rising, he thrust his right hand into them, crying out "This hand hath offended." He uttered no lamentation, but calmly looking up said: "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." The fire soon consumed all but his heart; this, it was affirmed, was found entire.

Cranmer's character combined high excellences and great infirmities. He was mild, peaceable, and conciliatory. By nature timid, undecided, and compliant, he often showed inflexible firmness and courage. His gentleness towards foes became proverbial; but he was backward in defending his friends. His generosity and hospitality won many friends, whilst his vacillation and indecision repelled others. He was conscientious, and yet pliant and easily impressed. Above all, he lacked that central living principle, justification by faith, which animated Luther, and a clear perception of other Gospel truths. And yet he seemed best suited to influence a man like Henry. Often his conviction of duty may have yielded to what seemed the necessities of the case. — In literature, as in other matters, C. possessed no originality. Though his writings exhibit extensive reading, and skill in the use of material, they present nothing new, display no independent research. He gained by slow steps the theological position he occupied under Edward. Besides contending with outward opponents, he had to wrestle with his natural weakness, which often overcame him.

But his last and deepest fall was only the transition to that final victory which secures to him a place among the great men of the Reformation. (See Foxe's Martyrologium, 1576; STRYPE's Mem. of Archb. C., 1693; Jenkyn's Remains of C., 1833; Todd's Life of C., 1831.)

C. SCHÖLL. — Santee.

Credence, the, is a small table on the epistle side of the altar, on which the cup, mass-cruet, and other things used at mass, are placed. Such tables are commonly used only at high-mass.

HERZOG.*

Crell (or Krell), Nicholas, b. at Leipsic circa 1550–53, was distinguished, as a doctor of law and practical jurist, no less for his integrity than his learning. In his lectures at the university of Leipsic, he opposed and ridiculed the pedantry of scholasticism. The elector, Augustus, whose notice he attracted, called him to his court, and Christian I. made him a privy counsellor, then chancellor, and entrusted him with the highest affairs of State.

After the death of Augustus, Crypto-Calvinism, which A. had used every means to eradicate, sprang up with new energy. The Lutheran party hoped to counteract the movement through Crell's influence with Christian I. But Christian was disposed to use his own judgment in such matters; and though not inclined to forsake his father's religion, he did not share his zeal for the Form of Concord; but took the Bible, the ancient symbols, the Augustana, and Luther's two catechisms, as his rule of doctrine. In other respects he was a Phillipist. Crell, whom Christian had appointed chancellor, accepted the office on condition that he would not be required to violate his conscience. This secured, he proceeded, in accordance with the sentiments of Christian, to execute measures for the suppression of vice and heresies, and also of religious strife. By the Elector's command, a German Bible with practical notes was prepared for popular use, under Crell's inspection. But when 2 Chron. was reached, Christian died (Sept. 25, 1591), the work stopped, and most of the printed copies were destroyed. Christian II. was in his minority, and his mother, the Electress Sophia, who hated Crypto-Calvinism, favored the restoration of the extreme Lutheran party. Crell, even before the burial of Christian I., was thrown into prison. Religious proscription swept through the electorate; so that Duke William felt compelled to restrain the violence of persecution by a special edict, Aug. 1592. Meanwhile, Crell was kept in prison, but the Estates were puzzled to take hold of his case. The nobles wished him punished as a malefactor; the universities and cities plead the Elector's high regard for him, and urged that he should be tried by a regular process. Crell's foes triumphed, but three years passed before the syndic brought up the accusation. On Sept. 28, 1597, a hearing was had with him in prison. In 1599 it was decided that he had been unfaithful to the Elector and his country, interfered in religious matters, and otherwise violated his trust. His appeal to the imperial chamber at Spire was denied, and the case was referred to the imperial court, at which Crell's political position was as much abhorred as dissensions among the Protestants were desired. There the previous decision was confirmed, and he was declared a capital offender. This decision was published, in the name of the administrator, on Sept. 22, 1601. Crell, conscious of his innocence, thought such a result impossible. He earnestly protested against the injustice of the proceedings, but, in reply, was admonished to prepare for death. Three clergy were appointed to attend him, P. Blume and two others. These presented to him an abusive description of a Calvinist (viz., that he was a man who does not trust in God or his Word, gives free license to Mohammedanism and heathenism, encourages treason and bloodshed, &c.), and requested him to sign the paper, and thus frankly confess his sin. Crell acknowledged that he often had erred, but, of course, refused to belie his conscience by subscribing such calumnies. He was executed on Oct. 9, insisting to the last upon his innocence of the crimes for which he was to be unjustly beheaded, but declaring his forgiveness of all his opponents, and commending himself to the triune God for mercy. (See Dresden Archives; NIEDNER'S Ztschr. f. hist. Theol., 1848, p. 315; KIESLING, Hist. mortuum; HUTTERUS, Concordia Concors, c. 49; ARNOLD, Kirchen- u. Ketzehistorie, II., 16, 32; ENGELCKEN, hist. N. Crellii. Rostock, 1727; MENZEL, neuere Gesch. d. Deutschen, V., 176.) VOGT.*

Crescens, the companion and assistant of Paul, on his journey from Rome to Galatia (2 Tim. 4 : 10), where, according to the Apost. Constit., VII., 46, he preached the Gospel. Subsequent tradition reports that he also preached in Gaul. HERZOG.*

Crespin, John, the son of a jurist in Arras, after studying at Löwen, and serving as advocate in the Paris Parliament, became a Protestant, and fled to Geneva. There he established a printing press, and published a number of Protestant works. Like many publishers of that day, he himself became an author, and, besides works on jurisprudence and philology, wrote several which are valuable in the history of French Protestantism; especially, L'état de l'Eglise, avec les discours des temps, &c. (Gen. 1562, 8vo.), and Histoire des Martyrs. In 1555 the Geneva Council conferred on him the right of citizenship. He died in 1572.

A. SCHMIDT.*

Crete, the modern Candia, attracted commerce both by its location and fertility (ARISTOT. polit. 2, 8; STRABO, p. 838). Although traversed by a rocky mountain, which reaches its summit in the snow-capped Ida, it is well watered, and anciently had beautiful forests. It also richly produced barley and tropical fruits. It was the seat of the most ancient culture, the earliest tribes having sought to secure its possession. The original inhabitants, Eteoeretes, of Carian descent, were gradually driven, by the inroads of Hellenist colonies, especially Dorians (circa 1000 B. C.), to the eastern portion of the island, and confined to the mountainous parts. The western portion was peopled by Syro-Phœnicians, the antiquity of whose settlement there is attested by Homer (Il. 2, 649; Od. 19, 172, &c. Cf. Horat. odes, 3, 27, 33; Virgil, Æn. 3, 106). the worship of the Minotaur and Talos (Baul and Moloch), and of Europe and Ariadne (Ash-toreth). Minos personifies the Phœnician period in the history of the island which preceded Hellenist colonization; and it may be that the Greeks derived much of their civilization, letters, measures, weights, &c., from the Phœnicians of Crete (MOYERS, Phœn. I., 27, &c.; DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth. III., 254, &c., 383, &c.). The Cretans bore a bad reputation for falsehood, deceit, avarice, and licentiousness. The prophet whom Paul quotes (Tit. 1 : 12) was Epimenides of Gnosus, in whose work, περί χρησμῶν, Jerome found the passage (cf. POLYB. 6, 46, 3; 6, 47, 5; PLUT. Philop. 13, and the various commentaries). They were skilled in archery (PAUSAN. 1, 29, 5; XEN. Anab. 3, 3, 7; VIRG. Georg. 3, 345).

In the O. T., C. is called Caphtor (see Art., and Pelethites). In 67 B. C., the island became a Roman province, and was ruled by a proconsul (FLOR. 3, 7; JUSTIN. 39, 5; TACIT. Ann. 3, 38; 15, 20). Many Jews were then living there (Jos. Ant. 17, 12, 1; PHILO, leg. ad Caj. l. II., 587, ed. Mang.). Paul seems to have founded Churches there (Tit. 1 : 5). The silence of Acts upon this point is no contradiction (See Paul). The following places in Crete are mentioned in the Bible: Salmon (Acts 27 : 7), Gortyna (1 Macc. 15 : 23), Lasea (Acts 27 : 8), nowhere else named; Phenice (Acts 27 : 12). During the middle ages the Arabs invaded the island (823). But it was taken from them (962) by the E. Roman emperors. In 1204 the Venitians seized it. In 1669 the Turks took it from them. By the clearing of its forests and the poor management of its lands, Crete has lost its reputation for fertility. It contains about 300,000 inhabitants, mostly Greeks. The chief cities are Candia (15,000 in.) and Khania (10,000 in.), near the ancient Cydonia. (See STRABO, 472, &c., 572; PAULY'S Real-Enc. II. 745, &c.; WINER; R. PASHLEY, Travels in C., Cambridge, 1837, 2 vol.) RUETSCHL.*

Crispus, the leader of a synagogue in Corinth, was converted by the preaching of Paul. He and his house then embraced Christianity. His example led many to be baptized. The Apost. Constit., VII., 46, cite him as Bishop of Ægina.

Criticism, biblical. [In the following article, immediate reference is had to the N. T. But what is said of the possibility of biblical criticism, and in justification of it, will equally apply to the O. T. The first two of the problems proposed below, as demanding solution, have been met, so far as they concern the O. T., in the Arts. Bible-text, O. T., and Canon, O. T. The third problem, as it affects the O. T., will be treated in the respective articles upon its several books. A separate article upon N. T. criticism was required on account of the peculiar importance of the subject for Christian theology, and of the present state of the questions involved. — HERZOG.]

The Bible, as the Word of God and a means of grace, is above human judgment. As Christians it is not subject to our criticism, but the reverse (κριτικός ἐνδυσμῶν καὶ ἐνοίων καρδίας. Hebr. 4 : 12); and whoever has learned the fullness of grace and truth in Christ, subjects himself, both as a Christian and Christian theologian, to the Word, which testifies of Christ as the only and highest norma credendorum. But whilst the Bible is above our criticism, its single books form a subject of critical inquiry, so far as they are a part of human literature, and consist of writings, composed by particular authors, at certain places, for certain ends, and at certain times, circulated by copies, and were purely or impurely preserved. It is not the object of such inquiry to sit in judgment over the style and contents of those books (for when biblical criticism makes this its chief object and motive, it has lost its path), but, though the contents must be studied and used as a means of criticism, to ascertain the age, authorship, and historical facts touching the origin and preservation of the biblical books, with as much certainty as can be attained by the (frequently imperfect) helps at command.

Biblical criticism has three chief problems to solve: 1. What books claim investigation? This is answered by the history of the canon, which informs us what books were acknowledged as ἐκδοχαὶ by the Church of the 2d–4th cent. 2. Are the books bearing the names of those then received really the same? This is answered by the history and criticism of the Bible-text. 3. When, where, and by whom were the single books written, and what is their credibility? This is answered by what, in a narrower sense, is called criticism of the biblical books and biblical history. As questions 1 and 2 have been met in the articles Bible-text and Canon, we shall here confine ourselves to the solution of the third inquiry.

I. But, first of all, is bibl. crit. justifiable and possible? If the Bible stands above human criticism, are not all critical investigations into the age, genuineness, and credibility of its several books impertinent and superfluous? For if these books have proven, in their organic whole, the power of God to the mind and heart, not only of individual believers (the Christian theologian also), but of the entire Church, why should not the very inquiry touching the credibility and genuineness of the books separately be superfluous, yea sacriligious? And yet the scientific tourist is allowed to examine, botanically and chemically, the tree of the oasis, whose fruit has saved him from perishing, and to inquire even how it got there. So in the sphere of our spiritual life. There are two ways of attaining to faith in the Word of Christ, as in Christ himself (John 14: 11); the one by immediate believing apprehension, the other by mediate dialectic examination. Those whose faith has been attained by the first method need not the second; at least not for the purpose of acquiring faith. Criticism cannot give them what they do not already possess; neither can it rob them of what they have. A hundred proofs of negative criticism, tending to invalidate the genuineness of John's Gospel, the reality of Christ's miracles, &c., will no more affect the man who has experimental faith, and is alive in Christ, than the dialectic proof of the owl, that "there is no sun in the heavens," will shake the convictions of the seeing man who walks by its meridian light. But whilst the believer does not need for himself the help of criticism, it is none the less requisite for the whole Church, which includes not only firmly established members, but many who need assistance in answering the objections raised against the credibility and genuineness of the sacred books.

In proportion, however, as such a justification of criticism is established, its possibility seems to vanish. "If," it is said, "the Bible is above human criticism, how can there be any actual criticism of its several books? What confidence can be placed in a criticism which assumes as an axiom the divine power and character of those books?" Were this objection valid, it would exclude the possibility of biblical criticism, at least for theologians who would not lay aside their Christianity; and this labor would have to devolve upon men who stood outside of, not under, the prepossessing influence of Christian faith. For even should the Christian theologian promise, for the time, to abstract himself from his convictions, the non-Christian would not believe him, but insist that he was, though unconsciously, so much influenced by his faith as to disqualify him for impartial investigation. "But true criticism must be free from prepossessions." This principle, often reiterated, has really induced many theologians to strive to affect the state of mind it demands. And yet this affectation is imaginary. For the freedom from prepossession feigned by the negative critics is a delusion. Every inquirer brings some philosophical or theological views into his critical operations. If, therefore, to hold that God is above nature, and that miracles are possible, is a "presumption," why is it not equally so to hold that "the divine causality lies in the course of nature?" And will not this latter "presumption" influence critical processes as much as the other? One might suppose that the pantheist, who believes in an everywhere operative, but not an almighty, God, a God whose power is limited by what he actually does, whose being is inclosed by his own works, and is wholly coincident therewith—the pantheist who, accordingly, is horrified by the idea of a miracle, as well as by that of an independent life in God, who considers evil as an unavoidable, essential factor of progressive good, and redemption as the sure ripe fruit of a poisonous blossom—must of course find the doctrines of the N. T. unpalatable and repulsive. For if it were critically proven that the Gospel reports of miracles were true, and especially the testimony of Christ's resurrection, his entire system would tumble into ruins. The impulse of philosophical self-preservation, therefore, would most probably lead him, consciously or unconsciously, to use all means, to leave no stone unturned, to prevent so undesirable a result.

But this does not prove the possibility of true biblical criticism. On the contrary, it would seem as impracticable in the one case as in the other. Still, it is possible for the critic, be his dogmatic standpoint what it may, without affecting indifference, freely to express his views, and yet fairly to inquire and report the facts ascertained by purely historical and scientific investigations, and show how far these agree with his religious convictions. Critical questions cannot be wholly separated from dogmatic and religious questions. But it suffices if, as the result of critical investigation, a Gospel fact, or a biblical book, in view of purely historical facts, and quite independently of dogmatic presumptions, is regarded as credible and genuine, or the reverse. Such an investigation demands, above all, inward peace, such as only the confirmed believer enjoys, who has experienced the life-giving power of the Holy Scripture. He knows that no seeming lack of external evidence can shake his confidence in the divine origin of the Bible, and he can therefore fearlessly prosecute his inquiries. Neither must the Church wait until critics have reached satisfactory results, or agreed in all points; as little as the blind man (John 9) needed to wait until the scribes had finished their investigations concerning the Messiahship of Christ. The believing Christian (theologian also) can calmly watch the process of criticism, furthermore, because he knows how defective its apparatus is, and that its results, both positive and negative, must be at best but problematical and incomplete. It does not disturb him to see that the positive results are so; it comforts him to find that negative are so.

II. The relation of Christian faith to Bibl. Crit. will be better understood if we consider the duplex nature and the twofold method of criticism. A discursive-analytical investigation, which deals with objectively certain proofs, such as constrain even the opponents' assent, forms but half, and really the smaller half, of the critic's work. Valuable as this careful process of inquiry may be, especially as a restraint upon wild fancies, the higher office of criticism is reproductive-synthesis. The true critic must sustain an inward affinity for the sacred history, spiritually digest it, and thus reproduce its facts synthetically in his own mind; and the inductive proof (or proof of evidence) resulting from such synthetical contemplation, will serve more effectually to solve any points in question than all discursive-analytical demonstrations. It is with the N. T. history, as with secular history and historical investigations. The sources, i. e., the writings, as to their age, authorship, &c., must first be carefully and honestly examined. But this work of the understanding must be animated by the co-operation of the spirit, before which the historical facts must spring up in bold relief, like flat pictures in a stereoscope. The spirit must feel the living breath of the history; its most lively contradictions must solve before his eyes; as a real unity, it must explain itself; the light of the whole must elucidate its several parts. In short, the discursive-analytical method must be combined with the synthetical-reproductive; we must endeavor to understand the sacred narrative, with its assumption of the possibility of miracles, in its own spirit, in its unity and harmony. Both methods demand and condition each other. Mere analytical investigation, unsustained by synthetical conspection, would soon be lost in the sands of single facts, and fall into anxious, joyless skepticism. On the contrary, mere reproductive synthesis, unchecked by the discipline of severe analysis, would be in danger of substituting arbitrary fancies for historical facts.

III. The real presumptions of true criticism, therefore, are of a twofold kind. The synthetic criticism of the history assumes, 1, the reality of redemption, to the spirit of which the critic is no stranger, whose saving power has, indeed, taken hold of his inmost being, and thus qualifies him to understand the history of salvation in its own nature; 2, the results of a careful analytic-critical examination of the sources. But this analytic criticism of the sources presupposes a general, minute, and yet comprehensive, knowledge of the Jewish and Christian literature of the apostolic and next succeeding period — a knowledge animated by the true historical spirit. Of the literature, we say, for mere acquaintance with the N. T. citations¹ found in Church fathers is not enough. This must be insisted upon in opposition to the perverse plan of determining the value of a N. T. book algebraically, by the number of citations in its favor, or of rejecting the book, if the citations can be cunningly set aside. It is obviously a main proof of the age of a book, if it is used or quoted by authors of a certain period. But one such citation, if indubitable, is decisive; if there are several, they merely corroborate each other (thus CLEM. ROM., ep. 1., 35, freely quotes Rom. 1 : 29, and literally, v. 32; POLYC. ep. ad Philip. c. 6, cites Rom. 14 : 10, 12; and in the ep. to the Churches in Vienne and Lyons, Rom. 8 : 18 is quoted, to say nothing of citations found in the ep. of Ignatius, and the works of Justin M., and Irenaeus). But the citations are not always literal, but mere allusions, and these more or less obvious (see an allusion to Rom. 13 : 9, 10, in POLYC. l. c. 3). The critical value of such allusions depends upon their real extent. (For allusions to John's writings in Ignatius, &c., see John.) Of equal importance is the use made by ancient heretics of N. T. scriptures. Marcion's entire Antinomian system is an obvious perversion of Paulinism, and the Church fathers mention special passages which Marcion thus distorted. The opposition of Gnostics to John's Gospel serves the same purpose. Marcion never disputed the genuineness of the Gospels of John and Matthew, though he denied their apostolic authority (TERT. adv. M. 3, 6); neither did the Valentinians dispute that of John (IREN. 3, 11, 7). Nay, Heraclion wrote a diffuse commentary on John's Gospel, and sought to derive Valentinianism from it, and Origen quotes largely from this comm. All this shows how little depends upon a dry enumeration of single citations, and how important to consider them in a literary-historical aspect. The least doubt of the genuineness of John's Gospel would have been seized and circulated by the Gnostics, instead of their taking refuge to a distorted exegesis. Marcion would have done the same. The Gospel of John must therefore have been above all suspicion of spuriousness as early as 150, only a few years after John's death. How rapidly must that Gospel have spread over the entire Christian Church!

But the paucity of explicit citations, and their entire absence in some fathers, as well as certain phenomena in ancient canons, has been thought of great negative weight. This argumentum a silentio, however, vanishes before a scientific, comprehensive view of post-apostolic literature. 1. Inferences against the genuineness of some N. T. books have been drawn from the circumstance that, whilst passages are literally quoted, the fact is not stated, the author's name not given (thus Rom. 8 : 18, in the ep. to the C. of Vienne and Lyons; Rom. 3 : 11-17, in JUSTIN. dial. c. Tryph. c. 27; 1 Tim. 6 : 7, 10, in POLYC. ad Philip. 1, though in 3 and 11 he cites Paul by name, as does CLEM. R., 1 Cor. 47). It has hence been concluded by many that, whilst the citations might prove the age, they did not prove the genuineness of the books, but that the omission of the author's name was rather prejudicial to their genuineness. But all who have read the apostolic fathers through, know that it is their rule to quote the Scriptures without naming author or book, excepting for special personal purposes, as when Clem. R., reproving the Corinthians, refers to Paul. In other cases, the citation is made as being a well-known Scripture passage. Such citations imply that the γραφὴ quoted was a γραφὴ ἐνδιαδικτός, publicly read, and canonical. And as long as there are no traces of the ep. to the Romans having been regarded by any Church where it was read as the work of any other than Paul, or the fourth Gospel as the work of any other than John, so long must those citations be considered proofs of the age and canonical authority of those books, and, mediately, also of their genuineness.

¹ The collection of these in the "Quellensammlung zur Gesch. d. N. T. Kanons," Kirchhofer, Zurich, 1842, is valuable.

2. As a second negative argument, it has been urged, some of the fathers never quote certain Scriptures. "Had they existed in their day, or been acknowledged as apostolical and canonical, they would certainly have cited passages bearing upon the subject they were treating." These arguments e silentio are, in advance, wretched shifts. They assume that every author must always say all he might say. But what preacher of our day does this? Moreover, we possess but small scraps of ancient patristic literature. We have but a few fragments of Papias and Melito; the writings of Quadratus, Aristides, and Miltiades, and all of Justin adv. hæc. are lost. Had we the library which existed in Cæsarea, in Jerome's time, what a wealth of citations, &c., might be collected!—In close affinity with these arguments e silentio, are the inferences drawn from certain phenomena of the ancient canons. Because the Muratorian canon mentions only 2 ep. of John, and none of Peter or James, it is concluded that these and 1 ep. of John were not then (at least not before the Nicene Council) universally considered genuine. Because Eusebius (3, 25) cites the ep. of James, of Jude, 2 Pet., and 2 and 3 John, as ἀντιλεγόμενα, it implies that their genuineness was then disputed. The Churches of the 2d and 3d. cent. are supposed to have been engaged in incessant scientific investigations, in modern style; the theologians and scholars of that day must have grown ever more credulous and ignorant; so that books previously thought spurious were gradually admitted into the canon. The Apocalypse is wanting in the Peschito, and even in Cyrrill. Hieros.; the Muratorian canon mentions it; Eusebius says some thought it a δυσκολογούμενον, others a νόσον; Athanasius quotes it as canonical. In the Peschito, 2 Pet. and 2 and 3 John are wanting; the Muratorian canon mentions 2 ep. of John, and Jude; Eusebius names them all, but as ἀντιλεγόμενα; Athanasius enumerates all as canonical.

But all this may be satisfactorily explained. Whilst the primitive Church considered the question of the genuineness of certain Scriptures important, the fundamental inquiry in the formation of the first canons was a different one (see Canon N. T.). And only by rightly apprehending that inquiry, can we properly understand the significance of those canons. This inquiry was an ecclesiastico-practical one: What books may and should be read in public assemblies, and privately by Christians, for their edification? In answering this, the chief concern was to exclude everything heretical. This is obvious in the Muratorian canon. The great object of the author is, evidently, to define what books might be read by Christians, publicly or privately, with edification.

IV. It would next be proper to describe the process of criticism; but we must confine ourselves to the following hints, referring for the rest to special articles. Analytical criticism, to be durable, must begin by establishing the authenticity of those Scriptures for which the remains of ancient Christian literature furnish the most and strongest proofs. These are Paul's ep. and John's writings. Of Paul's ep., especially 1 and 2 Cor., cited by Clem. Rom. and Polyc. as Pauline; Romans, acknowledged as Pauline by the Valentinians (Iren., I., 3, 4; 8, 3); Galat., often alluded to and cited by the fathers and heretics of the 2d cent.; Thess. and Philip., attested by Polyc. (see Paul). The authenticity of these being settled, we have solid ground for showing the credibility of Acts (see Luke); and thus we secure a basis for ascertaining the age and genuineness of the Gospels (cf. especially such passages as Gal. 4 : 4; 2 Cor. 5 : 19; Col. 1 : 16; 2 : 9; 1 Cor. 1 : 2; 8 : 6; 2 Cor. 8 : 9; Phil. 2; 1 Cor. 15; Eph. 1 : 19; Rom. 6 : 4; Acts 20 : 9, &c.; 28 : 3, &c. Upon the complementary relation of the Gospels to each other, see Harmony of the G. On their origin, see respective Art.). To these analytical investigations must be added the results of synthetical criticism, for which we refer to the Art. Apost. age, Jesus Christ, Jewish Christians, and to Neander's Life of Christ, and Neander's and Lechler's Apostolic age.

V. In conclusion, we shall notice the history and course of the negative criticism of modern times. As the canonicity and genuineness of the SS. had never been questioned during the middle ages, the Reformers had no controversy with the Romish C. upon this subject. During the Reformation and succeeding period, other matters absorbed attention. Deism, by its frivolous assaults, was the first to challenge positive apologetic criticism. Collins and Tindal called Christianity mere priestcraft; Peter Annet ridiculed the Bible; Whiston declared that the miracles were Jewish impositions; Woolston pronounced them allegories. These attacks called forth LARDNER's great works, which left but little for others to do (see Lardner). J. C. Edelmann ("Moses mit aufgedecktem Angesicht," 1740) and Reimarus transplanted Deism from England to Germany. No Lardner opposed. It was thought that sceptics and scoffers might be more easily won over by "rational" concessions, and "natural" solutions of miracles (Paulus, Venturini, Thicss. But see Teller's Lexicon for specimens. Cf., also, Harmony of the G.). The first period of modern criticism quickly passed. Schleiermacher introduced a reformation in dogmatics, De Wette in exegesis. Men learned, even by the progress of profane philology in Hermann's school, that it was really the exegete's work not to intrude his own notions upon an author, but honestly to inquire what the author meant to say. It was, accordingly, admitted that the N. T. writers actually intended to report miraculous and supernatural facts concerning Christ. This point conceded, rationalism found itself compelled to seek by means of criticism what its exegesis could not yield, viz., proof that the miracles reported were not really performed, or the credibility of the evangelical records. This could be maintained only by showing that the authors were not eye-witnesses, which Bretschneider attempted, especially in regard to John. Less pains were taken with Mark and Luke; for though Luke was a cotemporary, it was said he gathered his materials indiscriminately from all sides. Matthew's Greek Gospel, despite Papias' testimony (or rather the Presb. John's, Eus. 3, 39), was said to date from post-apostolic times. But these were only shy beginnings. Gabler, Krug, Horst, Schleiermacher, Ilase, and De Wette commenced to explain some things (especially touching the infancy of Christ), as "mythical." Then came (1835) Strauss (see Art.) with his "Life of Christ," making the whole record a myth. The scheme of Strauss not only called forth numberless refutations, but overreached itself. The discovery of the inadequacy of his theory is betrayed by Gfrörer's (Gesch. d. Urchristenthums) attempt to trace the "myths" to talmudic traditions. Others (as Weisse, Ev. Gesch.) retreated halfway, by rejecting John in part, and in part the other Gospels. The unbridled frivolities of this school culminated in Bruno Bauer's Krit. der ev. Gesch., &c. But the works of Gfrörer, Weisse, and Bauer only exposed the inward bankruptcy of the Strauss hypothesis. To save it from utter reproach another course had to be adopted. The negative criticism of the N. T. books and their genuineness was then combined with a similar treatment of the N. T. history. This led to the 4th period of negative criticism. And the broader the foundations laid, the more imposing was the superstructure of seemingly scientific results. In reaching these, however, seven-ninths of the N. T. writings had to be referred from the 1st to the 2d cent. This required a remodelling of the entire history of the post-apostolic age. Lützelberger ("d. kirchl. Tradit. über d. Ap. Joh.," 1840) and Wilke ("d. Urevangelist" 1837) took the lead. But Schwegler really began the work ("über d. Montanismus," &c., 1841; "nachapost. Zeitalt.," 1846). He regards the contention in Corinth (which arose, 1 Cor. 3 : 4, &c., mainly between two parties of Gentile Christians) as a strife between Gentile and Jewish Christians, and ascribes the predilection for speaking with tongues

(1 Cor. 12) to the latter, or, in his confused way, to the Ebionite party, which he thinks designated in the phrase: ἐν δὲ Χριστῷ (1 Cor. 1 : 12). Thus he obtains what he wants, a resemblance between the Corinthian Ebionites and the Montanists of the 2d cent., who also laid great stress upon "gifts," and therefore must be a continuation of Ebionitism! For Schwegler is either really or affectedly ignorant of a distinction between the healthy Judaism of the Apostles, and the morbid Judaism of the παρακαταφύβου ἀδελφοί (Gal. 2; Acts 15), Galatian errorists, and later Nazarites and Ebionites. As the Montanists are said to have taught that the Holy Ghost was not given at Pentecost, but first to Montanus (?), Schwegler concludes that M. originated the doctrines of the Trinity and Logos (!), and that out of the theory of a successive Trinity the subsequent eccl. dogma of an essential Trinity was developed. The conclusion drawn is: there was no united Church in the 1st cent.; what is said of the Ebionites as an insignificant sect is untrue; Ebionism was rather the primitive Christianity of the twelve Apostles, originating in the doctrine, Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah, sent for the Jews only; hence circumcision, &c., were indispensable conditions of participation in his kingdom. In opposition to the twelve Ap., Paul conceived the bold idea of making the religion of Jesus a world religion. Paul never agreed with the twelve. Hence two hostile religions sprang up, and contended with each other until in the 2d cent., when the strife waxed hotter, Praxeas and Marcion having (140) advocated Paulinism, and won the Romish see to its side. Then the Ebionites were called "Montanists," and declared a sect. Montanism then attempted by means of the pseudo-clementines, to assume a more liberal (Gnostic) form. For Schwegler identifies (Marcionite) Gnosticism with Paulinism, just as he had Ebionism with the doctrines of the twelve apostles. This point reached, S. assumes that all the N. T. writings, transposed by him to the 2d cent., were surreptitiously written, in order to smother the old dissension, and make it appear that the Apostles agreed in doctrine, and thus effect a reconciliation of the adverse parties. Of course no trace of the dissension is found in the N. T. books; hence they must be pronounced the work of pious fraud, in order to convert adverse passages into proofs of this romantic hypothesis!

But it seems reasonable to ask, if the N. T. says nothing of such parties, how do the critics of Tübingen know of their existence? To meet this difficulty, Prof. v. Bauer pronounces Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., and Galat., genuine; and he volunteers this concession, although he has as good reasons for doubting them as for contesting John's Gospel. "They bear," he says, "unquestionable marks of Pauline originality, &c." But how does he know the features of such originality? Not surely from the other ep., which he declares spurious. Still he has good grounds for knowing these to be genuine; for he extracts the same hypothesis from Galat. which Schwegler drew from 1 and 2 Cor.! But the other N. T. books, which yield him no support, belong to the 2d cent.! (Bauer's Paulus, 66, 68, 73, &c.). In its first period, negative criticism supposed it might hold, not only to the moral character of Christianity, but to the genuineness of the bibl. books, since it let go the supernatural character of Christianity. In its second and third periods, it felt compelled to yield the genuineness of the books, but hoped to adhere to the moral character of their authors. In the fourth period, it was necessitated to admit that most of the N. T. books were the work of pious fraud. To a sincere Christian consciousness, which draws from these scriptures the power of holy living and thought, and finds in them a stern κρίσις ἐνθυμήσεων καὶ ἐνοίων καρδίας, this acme of negative criticism appears as the acme of absurdity; and to a truly Christian and judicious scientific spirit as a tissue of sophistries. Such criticism must ever serve to instigate Christian scholars to new and more thorough demonstrations of the genuineness and sacredness of the N. T. scriptures. DR. EBRARD.*

Croatia. The original abode of the Croats, was E. Gallicia and White Russia; their language, also, was related to the Russian. Whilst dwelling near the Bosnians, near White Chrobatia, they assumed the name Chrobatians (Croats). In 634, the Emp. Heraclius gave them Dalmatia, which the Avari had conquered in 630, that they might expel the Avari, and hold the country under Greek rule. The Croats, led on by five brothers, effected this, 634-8. They then were baptised by priests, sent from Rome at the Emperor's request; and the propriety of setting Archb., Bishops, &c., over them was discussed. John of Ravenna, Archb. of Split, took special interest in them. Dubno and Sisek are mentioned as the oldest sees. But their conversion was more politic than real. They soon proved faithless, and, 641-829, renounced allegiance to the Byzantian court. But, about 790, they became subject to the Franks. By a treaty with Nicephorus, 810, this subjection was checked. After Charlemagne's death, the Franks cruelly treated the Croats, who threw off the dominion of the Franks. After the murder of their leader, Lindivit (823), the Croats gained their independence under Porin, 825-30. To secure a protector, they concluded a treaty with the Pope, and promised to re-assume Christianity. From 868-79, they again subjected themselves to the Greek emperors, and to the Patriarchs of Constant., especially because they preferred the Sclavic liturgy of the Bulgarians. But in 879, already, John VIII. commended their prince, Branimir, for his return to the Romish C. It was long, however, before the Greek faith was expelled from Croatia. The Sclavic liturgy obtained long after the invention of the Glagolitic letters in the 13th cent., or rather after the Cyrillian were changed so as to resemble the Coptic alphabet, although the Synod of Split (925) strictly prohibited it, and pronounced Methodius (its author) a heretic, 1035, and Cyril's alphabet an invention of Arian Goths. In 928 three new sees were founded, Screvlin, Sisek, and Duwno; under Kriesimir two more, Belgrad and Knin. After 990, the Princes called themselves Kings. In 1091, Ladislaus the Great subjected Croatia to the crown of Hungary, to which it remained united. Ladislaus founded the see of Agram (Zagreb). The Reformation extended into Croatia, supported by the renowned Zriny. From 1580-1600, many Croatian religious works were printed, Bibles, N. Test., Catechisms, &c.; some in the Sclavic press of Teuber, in Wittenberg. One of the most zealous Croatian reformers was Michael Butschitsch, a preacher on the island Murakoz, who openly embraced the Calvinist Confession. Bishops persecuted and synods condemned him; but Maxim. II. protected him. In 1607-10, the Reformation was exterminated from Croatia. It again became Roman Catholic. Its present pop. is 483,868, viz., 479,701 Rom. Cath.; 246 united Greeks; 58 Lutherans; 31 Reformed; 2900 orthodox Greeks. The Rom. Cath. are under the B. of Agram, a suffragan of the Archb. of Colocsa. This see has 343 parishes, but extends beyond Croatia. Including Croatian parishes in Hungary, there are 450, and 250 public schools. The united Greeks are under the B. of Kreuz, whose diocese has 20 parishes, but stretches into Hungary, Dalmatia, and Illyria. The union is said to be growing. The orthodox Greeks belong to the see of Carlstadt, which numbers 152 parishes. They can hold office and property. Formerly their religious books were publ. in Russia; latterly, through fear of Russia, none can be printed out of Austria. The Latins and Greeks sustain friendly relations in Croatia. Protestants enjoy fewer rights in Croatia and Slavonia than in any other Austrian province. (See P. J. SCHARIKS, slav. Alterth., Wuttke's Uebers., Lpz. 1844; Gesch. slav. Sprache, &c., von E. v. O., Lpz. 1837; REUTER's Repert., Bd. 74, 75.)

KLOSE.*

Crocus, John, D. D., a Reformed (or, as he preferred being called, evangelical) theologian of Cassel and Marburg, b. July 28, 1590, was the son of Paul Crocius, D. D., of Basel, the author of the oft-published "Martyrbuch." He excelled in his studies, and, after completing his course at Marburg, became (1612) court-preacher of Landgrave Moritz. In 1614, he was called to Berlin, where Moritz consented to let him spend two years. On his return to Marburg, 1617, he was appointed first prof. of theology, preacher, and a member of the consistory. From this time to his death, July 1, 1659, he was the chief advocate and leader of the State-Church of Hesse-Cassel, which had become Reformed, whose evangelical (but not Calvinistic) character and claims he set forth in a number of writings. In consequence of this, when (1624) Landgr. Lewis of Hesse-Darmst. reinstated Lutheranism in Marburg, Crocius and nine colleagues had to seek refuge in Cassel. Whilst there, Crocius wrote most of his works: "Summarische Nachricht, &c.;" "Comm. de Aug. Conf. societate, &c.;" "De eccl. unitate et schismate, &c." His chief work against Romanism is "Anti-Becanus, &c." He survived the re-opening of the Marburg university (1653), and became its first rector. He also assisted in preparing the united Church-Directory of Hesse-Cassel, which is still used by both parties.

HENKE.*

Cromwell, Oliver, Protector of England; b. April 24, 1599, in the county of Huntingdon; died Sept. 3, 1658. Few men have had such diverse judgments passed upon them. The prevailing opinion of his character was formed under the Restoration, during the Anglican reaction under Charles II., and Romish reaction under James II. That estimate of him became current in France through Bossuet's influence. For a long time he was regarded, on the continent and in England, as an arrant but genial hypocrite, and a skilful warrior (cf. ST. BEUVE, Causeries du lundi 17. dec. 1849). Thomas Carlyle was the first to attempt a thorough vindication of his character, by publishing his private correspondence, and the authentic text of his Parliamentary speeches. Carlyle showed that his letters bore the impress of sincerity, and that his speeches were lucid and vigorous. He appealed to historical impartiality, and asked for a new investigation of Cromwell's character and life. Carlyle regards Cromwell as a type of the vigorous spirit of northern nations, as contrasted with the less individual, less independent spirit of southern nations. He affirms that only Christians can rightly judge Cromwell, who was the first to proclaim liberty of conscience, and sincerely desired what England desired, religion and liberty. To these views many responded; though some modified them. Two celebrated historians have since published their opinions of Cromwell. Macaulay thinks England owes all its present glory to Cromwell; he sowed what the three united kingdoms are now reaping. Guizot's judgment proceeds from a higher and more comprehensive point of view, and shows less sympathy for the Puritan hero, whose hypocritical modesty and proud humility elevated him. In our day, continental popular opinion is disposed to hold that a great man must be a mixture of courage and charlatany; that the rejection of all religiousness is indispensable to a strong character; and that it lowers Cromwell to describe him as a sincere Puritan. It is otherwise in England. To excite admiration in the English masses, they had to be convinced of Cromwell's religious sincerity. But what were his religious convictions? What had selfishness and ambition to do with them? There are two main periods in a man's life in which native character shows itself: youth and death. Now we have authentic documents to prove that in these two periods Cromwell really had religious convictions. He was trained by a pious mother; and, though he spent some earlier years in dissipation, he seems to have been truly converted. He refunded large sums won in play. After his marriage, in his 21st year, he spent ten years in retirement, and acquired in his neighborhood a reputation for uprightness. He is charged with youthful licentiousness. But the proofs of this rest upon his own penitent confessions of his folly. In his family, and letters to his children, he always displays sincere piety, though, of course, colored with Puritanism. He was, indeed, dissatisfied with his position, but felt happy "in not being his own." Powerful impulses wrought in him, which early awakened in him his need of subjecting himself to the law of God, as he found it in the Bible. Filled with the feeling of Protestant independence, he acknowledged no supremacy but God's. He was a Puritan, so far as such a man could be one. Like other Puritans, he sought the Lord; but the answers he received to his prayers differed from those granted to others. They inspired him with intrepidity and wisdom. The combination of enthusiasm with worldly prudence, of mysticism with clearness of perception in other matters, is more common than many have supposed. Instance the characters of Socrates and the Maid of Orleans. Thus it was with Cromwell. He, too, had his inward voice, which he ever desired to follow. He ever sought for "providences" in his heart, in his understanding, in the Bible, in prayer. And when he arose from humble prostration in prayer, he was filled with a confidence in God which he believed a divine influence. Not that he pretended to be a prophet, or, to speak and act by the Holy Ghost. His enemies have failed to prove this charge. He did not seek to subject others by arrogating superhuman qualities; he rather seemed pervaded by a sense of human weakness, which he shared with others. Some Independents held to the letter of the Scriptures, others to the spirit within them; Cromwell laughed at both. He also ridiculed Fox, the Quaker, for his self-confidence. He likewise saw through the pride and self-delusions of the dogmatism of the Chiliasts, and adherents of the fifth monarchy, and repelled those of them (yet kindly) who thought him the man of their expectations. In reality he desired — therein lay his strength — what England wanted, the victory of religion, religious and political liberty. During the first period of his public career, he displayed his zeal for these by opposing illegal measures against the rights of the people. "The world," said he, "is beginning to laugh at the idea that the people belong to the King, and the Church to the Pope." Having once taken this path, he could not recede. When he attained to power, he would gladly have secured the victory to political liberty; but he could not. He effected many reforms; but the man of war and revolution was not the man to establish the cause of freedom in Britain. The contradictions combined in his character were in the way. His faith was mixed with politics and egotism. By turns he played the Christian, the patriot, and the aspirant. Humor and seriousness, laughter and tears, jests and exhortations, were alternately indulged. Thus he combined in himself elevation of spirit and low thoughts, weakness and magnanimity, prayer and pretence, frankness and a deceit which could utter the boldest lies. And yet he had the profoundest convictions. Religion was the centre of all these divergencies; not, indeed, the pure religion of Christ, but, still, religion as Cromwell apprehended it; a religion with sword in hand, which should realize his fond dreams. Hence, when the hour came which tries man's heart, in which he shows his true character, Cromwell proved the correctness of our delineation. "Tell me," said he to Sterry, one of his chaplains, "is it possible to fall from grace?" What does this question signify? Does it come from the abyss about to engulf his soul, or from the depths of that conflict through which many a sincere Christian passes on the approach of death? God knows. Yet we rather think it sprang from the latter. "It is not possible," said the chaplain. "Then," exclaimed the dying man, "I am safe, for I know that I was once in grace" (see Lingard, Hist. of England, XI., 125-6). Then he continued: "I am a miserable creature. Yet, Lord, thou hast made me an instrument in thy hands. This people desires that I may live, believing it would be for thy glory. Others wish I might die." — "God is good," he added, "he will not" "I desired to live for the service of God and his people; but my mission is accomplished. God will be with his people."

These were his last words. They are, indeed, not the utterances of filial resignation. They rather betray grief at being called from a work which he thought needed his presence, than a true longing after rest with God. He seems to have shared the desire of many Puritans, that a fairer sun might dawn upon England, and a new kingdom of David arise, a kingdom of righteousness and glory, which he believed himself called to inaugurate. He longed for the triumph of God's law and of liberty, but could not effect it. In his death he saw his dream vanishing. In its place the unrighteous means which he had employed rise up to view. He sees the true, eternal religion in contrast with that political one he had sought to establish. The broad road he had trodden diminishes before his vision into the narrow path of the Gospel. Hence his fears. He would gladly console himself with the consciousness of good intentions. But this comfort also fails. Then he cries out: "Can a man fall from grace? I know that I was once in grace;" and enters the eternal world.

L. VUILLIEMIN.*

Cross, Signs of the Cross. The form and significance which the cross has acquired among Christians is peculiar to Christianity; indeed, it owes the form of it which is now prevalent wholly to its Christian significance. Cruz is any figure formed by the intersection, or contact at one point, of two lines. The earliest and simplest form of it is the Thau (T) of the old Phœnician alphabet, which is also found in Egyptian MS. and on Jewish coins, instead of Π . With this sign, animals in the East were branded; hence it is called (Ezek. 9 : 4, 6) the sign (cf. Vulg.). The same sign was transferred to the Greek and Roman alphabets. It was usual among the Phœnicians and Carthaginians to execute criminals by nailing or chaining them to a wooden cross of the above form. From them the Romans and Greeks borrowed their σταυρός, cruz; and many fathers believed that Jesus was crucified on one of that form, referring to Ezek. 9 : 4. This figure is often found carved in catacombs. But the Church has unanimously believed that the cross of Christ had the cross-beam intersecting the upright below the top (†), was a cruz immissa. Various comparisons and indications were urged in favor of the Christian form of the cross. It was observed to be a prominent form in nature, which thus furnished a tacit prophecy of Christ — a favorite idea of the ancient fathers and apologists, of mystics and symbolists. The four cardinal points (Hier. in Jer. 31); living birds; man praying with extended arms (TERTUL. adv. Jud. II.; JUSTIN. dial. 3); a roasted paschal lamb; a ship with oars; a man plowing, or even walking; the Roman vexillum and tropæum; Isis with her Nile key (†); and Thor with his hammer, all seemed types. But our cross, as a geometrical figure, might often occur as a mere ornament or sign, without further signification. And as the O. T. with its brazen serpent, typical of Christ, seems not to contain the slightest allusion to the sign of the cross, it must, like the atonement completed on it, be regarded as the most peculiar property of Christianity. Nevertheless, it may be acknowledged as providential that the Redeemer of the world was put to death by the Roman people upon an instrument better suited than any other to become a sign to all nations, of a sacrifice in atonement for the sin of the world. It is easy to see how the cross became the appropriate memento of Christ himself, the symbol of his Gospel, and the abbreviation of "the name of Christ." Gradually the sign of the cross, made on the person with a finger or the hand, was used instead of an artificial one, at the commencement of religious services or secular work; especially at baptisms and exorcisms. Hence, in later missions, as under Ansgar, &c., it was used as the prima signatio, primsigne, in the antecedent consecration of persons as Christians (cf. TERTULL., de Coron. mil. c. 3). The sign was usually made on the forehead (Ex. 9 : 4). Prudentius (hymn 6¹) admonishes, before going to sleep, to sign thus the breast and brow, to dispel temptations; the brow as the head of the body; the breast and mouth with allusion to Matt. 15 : 18, 19 (CHRY. hom. 87 in Math.). Thus it became the prevalent custom to cross these parts, or, instead of the mouth, both shoulders. The Western Romish Churches used either "the German" or "Latin Cross." The Latin formula used is: In nomine patris et filii et spiritus sancti. Amen; or Adjutorium nostrum in nomine Domini; or Deus in adjutorium meum intende; or simply, in nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi, whilst repeating which the palm of the right hand touches the brow, the breast, the left, and then the right side. The German cross is made by placing the left hand on the breast, then laying the thumb upon the first finger of the right hand, and thus touching the brow, mouth, and breast, and saying: Im Namen Gottes des Vaters, des Sohnes, und des Heiligen Geistes. Amen. The Greek cross, is used by Eastern Churches and orthodox Russians, and made with the first three fingers of the right hand, with the formula, "Holy God, holy Strengtheners, holy Eternal One, have mercy on us" (see Alt. Chr. Cultus, 1851, p. 183). All this was to effect the same as calling on the name of Christ, "if done in faith," as the Russian Catechism says. But it could be readily perverted by superstition. Luther, however, retained it (see his small Cat.). In the Lutheran (European) and Anglican C. it is still used at Baptism, the Lord's Supper, and in the Aaronitic benediction. The Reformed C. abolished it.

The artificial cross, cruz exemplata, must have been in use in Tertullian's time (Apolog. 16),

¹ *Fac, cum vocante somno
Castum petis cubile
Frontem locumque cordis
Crucis figura signet.
Cruz pellit omne noxium.*

but without ornaments. Chrysostom speaks of it as a common and favorite device. A small golden cross with a ring, intended probably to be worn on the neck, was found in the Vatican cemetery. Graves also had crosses placed over them; though they occur more rarely in catacombs (see Art. and Alpha) than the monogram of Christ (see Roma sub. ed. Arnheimiae, 1671; Evang. Kalender, 1857). After 380–400, it was used to ornament churches, especially altars. Nilus of Sinai recommended that it be placed in the sanctuary, towards the East; Paulinus, B. of Nola, directed it to be put over the entrance of his Church (Augusti, Beiträge, I. 166). In the Mosaics of the 5th cent., the cross usually occupies the foremost place, amid stars, emblems of the evangelists, and other ornaments; this formed the transition to images and pictures of the crucifixion, one of the oldest of these known being that named by Beda venerabilis (cf. Dr. Piper, chr. Bilderkreis, 1852, p. 27).

The cross was also used as an ecclesiastical sign, primarily at the laying of corner-stones of churches. This was enjoined under Julian; also by the Justinian code (Nov. 5, 1; 67, 1; 14, 7), and the capit. of Charlem. (5, 229). Churches were consecrated by its use. ORDO ROM.: et faciat episcopus crucem per parietes cum pollice suo de ipso chrismate in 12 locis. It was carried in processions, &c. (cf. Du CANGE, I. 1273–6). The universal adoration of the cross was fixed for Good Friday; only such could participate who lay under no mortal sin (Synod Nemausens, 1245). The cross, even on a highway, was an asylum for criminals; hence the phrase, ad crucem confugere. The cross also became the emblem of apostolic dignity. The Pope enjoys the right of always having one borne before him; so may the greater Patriarchs, excepting in Rome, or in the presence of the Pope or his legate, and each dignitary endowed with the pallium, in his own diocese. But Greg. XI. forbid this to Patriarchs, Primates, and Bishops, in the presence of cardinals. The cross is also used, in the Romish C., in the consecration of burial-grounds, and on graves. Many Protestants are returning to this custom. — As early as the 5th cent. it was often placed at the head of diplomas, &c., instead of "in the name of God, &c." Christian physicians long put it on their prescriptions. In the 6th cent. letters, &c., were often signed with one (or three crosses), instead of the person's name. Clergy put it after, Bishops before their names. Greek emperors often signed with red, Byzant. princes with green, old English kings with gold crosses. The bearer of a dispatch thus signed was called σταυρονάτης. Thus from Constantine onward the cross became the ensign of Christianity, as opposed to heathenism and the crescent. It was carved or painted on banners, crowns, &c., &c. Crucem assumere or crucizari became the motto of Christians after the Conc. Claramont. under Urban II. In countries and cities taken from the Mahomedans or heathen, a cross was erected. Persons accused by kings and emperors were made to carry one; by it oaths were administered; ordeals enacted; boundaries fixed, &c. After the crusades, the form of the cross was applied to eccl. architecture (see Art.), and it was put on every book, vessel, &c., used in the Church. Thus its use fostered superstitions. Even Protestants have not always risen above such influences. Crosses must be put on houses, stables, &c., to keep off bad spirits, witches, &c. (LUTHER's works, Erl. Ausg. X. 397; XV. 333, &c.).¹ The crusades led to the adoption of the cross as a badge of eccl. and secular orders, and in so many forms that a staurologia became necessary. The ancient Roman C. had three: 1, Cruz decussata X, or St. Andrew's; 2, C. commissa T, also called Egyptian or Antonius; and 3, C. immissa or ordinaria †. Distinct from these are the Greek C. †; Peter's C. †; Bernward's C., shaped like a dagger; the robber's C. Y; the double C. †; and the triple C. † of the Russian separatists, the lower cross-piece being for the feet (lignum suppedaneum).

H. MERZ.*

Crowns, wreaths, of flowers and twigs, sometimes of silver and gold, were used among the ancient Israelites, but not as extensively as among the Greeks and Romans. They are oftenest mentioned in the O. T. Apocrypha. They were worn as ornaments, symbolical of joy (3 Macc. 7 : 16, &c.), by princes and generals, on festival and triumphal occasions (Judith 3 : 18; 15 : 13; comp. Rev. 6 : 2); at feasts and marriages (Ezek. 23 : 42; Is. 28 : 1; Cantic. 3 : 11, &c.). Houses, gates, temples, idols, the animals sacrificed, altars, and priests were then also crowned (1 Macc. 4 : 57; Joseph. B. J. 4, 4, 4; Athen. 15, p. 674; Herod. I. 132). Hence the term is often used figuratively (Job. 19 : 9; Prov. 12 : 4, &c., &c.). In the N. T. it is frequently named in allusions to Grecian games (1 Cor. 9 : 25, &c.). For ancient monographs upon this subject see UGOLINI, thesaur. XXX. (See WINER's Lex.) RÜTSCHE.*

Crucifix. Figures of Christ crucified are found in paintings and MSS. of the 6th cent.; sometimes also on the shrines of relics and ivory lids. But crucifixes are thought to have originated about the end of the 7th cent., and to have become common during the Carolingian period. The oldest plastic crucifixes in the West are a bronze in the gallery degli Uffizi, in Florence, and the two which Leo III. presented to the Vatican and Ostia basilica. That the East had crucifixes in early times is proven by D'Agincourt's copy of a Syrian MS. of the Gospels, hints of the Church fathers, and the 82d c. of the Trullan Synod of 692 (see GIESLER, eccl. hist. § 127, n. 7). Subsequently the orthodox C. of the East forbid the use of all images, including crucifixes. In the Greek C., even the cross is not placed above the altar, but on its tablet. But in the West crucifixes of wood, stone, silver, gold; ivory, &c., are everywhere found, especially in churches, Rom. and Lutheran. The Reformed Churches, however, do not tolerate them. — The crucifix has undergone several modifications. Its first form was a lamb under the cross, as in the church of

¹ In general, the more these outward uses of the form of the cross prevailed, the more did living faith in the crucified One vanish; the more did the inner "cross of Christ" become a stumbling-block and foolishness. In this respect the Romish C. resembles Christians who are ever talking of their religious experiences, and making a display of them, until, having exhausted themselves, they utter glaring nonsense. — HANCOCK.

Paul of Nola. Then the bust of Christ was added, under or above the cross, with a lamb on its centre. The next form was a human image of Christ, clothed, and with extended arms, in the suppliant posture of the ancients. Such representations were used until the 12th cent. Meanwhile, the cross with Christ living nailed to it, was introduced, first with four nails, one in each hand, and one in each of the feet, which were placed beside each other; then with Christ dying, or dead, having only a girdle around his loins, fastened (after the 13th cent.) with three nails, one in each hand, and one through the feet crossed, the right above the left. Early in the middle ages the crucifix was surrounded with a group, usually Mary the mother of Jesus, and John, sometimes a soldier with a sponge and another with a lance; most frequently Mary Magdalene on her knees, embracing the cross. Anciently, and now yet in some Romish churches, the body of the dying Saviour is represented as emaciated, and his features as distorted; but more cultivated Christian art gave to his form and face the noblest expressions of agony and dignified suffering. (See MÜNTER, d. Sinnbilder, &c., d. Mittelalt. I. 77; OTTE, Handb. d. kirchl. Kunstarchæol. d. Mittelalt.) GRÜNEISEN.*

Crucifixion. This mode of punishment was common among the ancient Persians, Assyrians, Egyptians, Indians, Scythians, Grecians, and Macedonians (see WINER's Lex.). Alexander M., after taking Tyre, had 2000 Tyrians crucified. C. seems to have been practised even by the Phœnicians and Carthaginians. The latter are said to have put Regulus to death upon a high cross. Hanno, after being scourged, had his eyes put out, was tortured to death, and then exposed on a cross (see similar cases in Herod., Xen., and Plut.). Cæsar's letting the pirates be strangled before crucifixion, is named by Sueton. as a proof of his clemency (J. Cæs. c. 74); for it was at once the most painful and shameful death (crudelissimum terribilissimumque suppl., CIC. VERR. V. 64; damnatissimum quoddam fatum (Nonus) extremum suppl., ARNOB. adv. gentes, I. 36). The cross was called infelix lignum or arbor, infamis stipes (LIVY, I. 26; MINUC. fol. Oct. c. 9). The Romans considered C. a servile suppl. (HOR. Sat. I. 3, 80-83; CIC. l. c. 66), to be inflicted on common criminals, especially on slaves, robbers, assassins, forgers, thieves, and seditious persons. It was never executed on a civem romanum. The Romans practised it until Constantine's time, sometimes even upon freemen, captives, Christians, and women (LACTANT. div. instit. IV. 26. Cf. JOS. Arch. 18; 3, 4; B. J. V. 11, 1). It was inflicted by the Jews only under Roman rule; instead of the Greek and Latin phrases describing it, they used "hanging," and of the culprit, "the one hung." Impalement was practised by the Jews only to expose stoned criminals to greater indignity. The crucifixion of Christ was in the Roman mode (concerning the Rom. forms of the cross, &c., see Art.). Representations of Christ's crucifixion usually make the cross too high. High crosses were used only for great criminals (JUST. hist. 18, 7; SUET. in Galb. 9). Usually the convicts' feet were only a few spans above the ground. The use of the hyssop-reed, commonly only a foot long, proves that this was the case with the Saviour. The Rom. cross had a pin projecting from the middle (ὥς κρίκας, JUST. dial. 91; πηγμα, sedile), to support the body (IREN. adv. hæc. 2, 42), and keep the hands from tearing out. LIPSIVS, de cruce, Antw. 1595, supposes Christ's cross was made of oak; but it was most probably made of the sycamore, palm, or olive, the most common trees in Palestine (a gloss in CLEMENTIN. I. de summa trin. says, cedrum in stipite, palmam in palo per longam, cupressum in ligno ex traverso).

Scourging preceded crucifixion (JOS. B. J. 5, 11; LIVY, 33, 36; CURT. 7, 11, 28), either in the Prætorium or on the way to the execution, which took place on some public road outside of the city, as a warning to all who passed. Convicts had to drag their cross, or at least the larger beam, to the place of execution (PLUTARCH, ser. vind. c. 9); it was never carried for them; the soldiers compelled Simon the Cyrenean to bear the Saviour's from arbitrary rudeness, not from pity to Christ. A white tablet (titulus, cavis, λένωμα, αίρία), with the crime inscribed, was carried before the convict, or hung round his neck (SUET. Calig. 32; EUSEB. H. E., V. 1, 19). A herald went before the procession and proclaimed the cause of the execution. In Rome and cities where the governors had lictors, they were the executioners. As Pilate had no lictors, soldiers performed this office. The soldiers were usually commanded by a centurion or tribune (exactor mortis, or cent. suppl. præpositus), on horseback (TAC. Ann. 3, 14; SEN. de ira, 1, 16). The custom of giving the convict about to suffer a narcotic drink, was Jewish, but allowed by the Romans in the case of Jesus. It was vinegar, or sour wine and bitter ingredients (gall, &c.) mixed with myrrh, which Christ refused. Convicts were usually fastened to the uplifted cross (hence tollere, ascendere, &c., in c., and c. statuere); to fasten them to a cross lying on the ground was an exception; and the prevailing opinion of the Ch. fathers is that Christ was executed in the usual way. Before crucifixion, convicts were stripped naked; the exceptions were rare. The cloth around the loins of Christ in most paintings, is probably an addition of Christian art; though Hug thinks Roman custom warrants it. The phrase, γυμνοί γὰρ σταυροῦνται (ARTEMIDOR. Oneirocr. II. 55) does not forbid it. It is more uncertain that Jesus was crucified with the crown of thorns, as represented since the 13th cent. — The crucifixion, ἡ σταυρώσις, was as follows: four soldiers drew up the convict with ropes, and set him on the sedile; the arms and feet were then bound to their places, and nails driven through the hands and feet (see WINER's Lex.); whether a nail through each foot, or one through both, cannot be decided; the latter method was most common. The convicts' garments belonged to the executioners as spolia (John 19 : 23). The tablet, with its inscription in the official Roman language, the Greek world-language, and the national Hebrew, which was fastened above the head of the crucified, was probably the same which was carried before him, or on his neck. — The sufferings caused by crucifixion were, 1, the unnatural fixed position of the body, with the arms violently stretched, so that the least movement caused the severest pains in the whole body, especially in the back lacerated by the scourging, and in the pierced hands. 2. As the nails were driven through the limbs at points having many nerves and sinews, some of which were thus torn, others violently compressed, they caused great pain. 3. Inflammation of the wounds and other parts, in which circulation was checked, ensued. The pain and thirst thus occasioned were momentarily increased. 4. The blood was driven from the wounded and stretched extremities to the head, swelled the arteries, and caused terrible pains in the head. The circulation of the blood being checked, its passage through the lungs was impeded, the action of the heart became oppressed, all the veins distended, and unutterable dread ensued. Loss of blood through the wounds would have relieved these pains; but coagulation soon checked this flow. Thus death spread by slow degrees from the extremities through the muscles, veins, and nerves. Sometimes these sufferings lasted for twelve hours, or even to the second and third day (PETRON. Sat. III.), when the wretched beings died of hunger and pain combined (EUSEB. H. E., 8, 3; cf. HERODOT. 7, 194; JOSEPH. vit. 75). According to Roman custom, the bodies were left hanging until the flesh fell off, or was devoured by birds or beasts. Soldiers guarded them against attempts to take them away for burial. Occasionally, death was hastened by kindling a fire beneath the convicts, or bears and lions were allowed to devour them. Sometimes they were speared under the shoulders (ORIG. on Matt. 27: 54). The Romans never took the bodies down for burial, excepting on the eve of the Emperor's birthday. According to Deut. 21: 22, the Jews could not permit a person to hang exposed over night; it was thought a special desecration to allow one to hang thus on a high-sabbath. Hence, they begged the crucifragium of Pilate, which was a separate punishment; it was a substitute for the sufferings curtailed by a more speedy death. The broad lance inflicted the death-wound. Then they might bury the body. (See JAHN, Archæol.; FRIEDLIEB, Archäol. d. Leidensgesch., 155.) II. MERZ.*

Cruciger (Creuziger, Creutzinger), Caspar, a faithful and judicious friend of the Reformation, was b. Jan. 1, 1504, in Leipsic, of a respectable family. At first his talents seemed only moderate, but he soon displayed higher abilities. He quietly embraced evangelical doctrines about 1519. In 1521, having fled from the plague to Wittenberg, he heard Melanchthon, then Luther. In 1524 he was called to Magdeburg as rector of the St. John's school. He also preached there with success. In 1528 he returned to Wittenberg, preached, lectured on the O. and N. T., and assisted Luther in his translation of the Bible, in which his knowledge of medicine and the natural sciences was of advantage. He took part in the Marburg discussion, 1529; the Wittenberg conc., 1536; the Smalcald conference, 1537, and the convention of Worms, 1540. In 1539, he was called to aid Myconius in introducing the Reformation into Leipsic; but, by Luther's advice he was not allowed to go, which is the more remarkable, since L. had begun to mistrust him and Melanchthon upon the doctrines of the Lord's Supper and justification (cf. Corp. Ref. III. 159; IV. 1037). He died, after great bodily sufferings, patiently borne, Nov. 16, 1548, leaving two daughters (one married to Luther's son John) and a son, Caspar, Melanchthon's successor. Caspar, being expelled for implication in crypto-Calvinism, became pastor in Cassel, where he died in 1597, characterized by extreme Lutheranism as "optimi patris pessimus filius," because he advocated the Reformed doctrine. Cruciger, Sr., as ταχυπαφάτος, took down, with Rörer, many of Luther's lectures and sermons, and prepared them for print. He left behind many speeches, treatises, and exegetical writings, which still possess value. (See REINHOLD'S Gedächtnissrede, Corp. Ref. XI. 833; ADAMI, Vit. Theol.; BOSSECK, diss. de Cr. Lpz. 1739; Piper's ev. Kalender, 1854.)

E. SCHWARZ.*

Crusades.—After Constantine the Great built the church of the Holy Sepulchre, pilgrimages to places distinguished by Christ's bodily presence were considered meritorious, and became more frequent until they reached their height in the 11th cent. Whilst the Arabs held those places, the pilgrims were kindly treated; but when the Seljuk Turks seized Syria (1073), they so grossly maltreated, not only pilgrims, but Christians dwelling in Palestine, that a spirit of vengeance was aroused in multitudes of pious and brave hearts. The appeals of Peter the Hermit, therefore, and of Urban II. at the Councils of Piacenza and Clermont (1095) called forth zealous responses. With the cry, "God wills it," thousands of every station and age, following the devout fanaticism of the age, resolved to join the expedition, and, as their badge, wore a red cross upon their right shoulder; hence the name crusaders. Soon hundreds of thousands, from France, Lorraine, and Normandy, impelled by the hope of temporal and eternal gain, and fired by the wide-spread enthusiasm, seized the cross, and rushed into an enterprise, of whose extent and perils they had no conception. The first of these bands, collected in March, 1095, and led by Peter of Amiens and Walter the Penniless, after cruelly persecuting the Jews, and robbing their native country, met with almost annihilating vengeance, by hunger and sword, on their passage through Hungary, Bulgaria, and Asiatic Turkey. In August, 1096, however, a well-organized army of knights, mostly from France, the Netherlands, and Normandy, started by different routes for Constantinople, the appointed place of rendezvous. Its several divisions were commanded by brave and warlike men: Godfrey of Bouillon, whose ability in the council and on the field soon secured for him the highest influence; Raymond of St. Gilles, Count of Toulouse, who rivalled Godfrey's influence; Robert of Normandy, the first son of William the Conqueror; Count Robert of Flanders; Hugh the Great, brother of Philip of France; the eloquent Count Stephen of Chartres; the crafty and ambitious Boemond, Prince of Tarentum, Robert Guiscard's son; the chivalric and noble Tancred, Boemond's nephew; and B. Adhemar of Puy, the papal legate. After indescribable hardships, the host crossed the Bosphorus, and pressed on to the conquest of Nice, the Syrian Seljuks constantly opposing them. On June 2, 1098, Antioch fell into their hands through treachery. The Persian nobleman, Carboran, who had come to the relief of Antioch with 300,000 men, was also vanquished. Then first could the victorious crusaders summon courage to pursue the great object of their invasion, along the Syrian coast, towards Ramlah and Emmaus. But repeated conflicts with the Turks, and dissensions among their leaders, hindered their progress. It was not until June 7, 1099, that they reached Jerusalem. Only 20,000 warriors survived, and 39 days were spent in impatience before the enemy was compelled to surrender the city. At length, by means of batteries and scaling-ladders, they effected an entrance, July 15, and triumphantly ascended the heights of the temple. Seventy thousand infidels perished by the sword; the Jews of the city were all burned without mercy in their synagogue. Having thus sated their vengeance, the victors went with uncovered heads and bare feet, through gore and flames, into the church of the Passion and Resurrection, singing hymns as they proceeded, and there confessed their sins and vowed amendment.

Thus the zeal and sufferings of the crusaders seemed to have won their prize. But to secure permanence to this dearly-bought conquest, it was necessary to establish an organized government of the country, and provide proper management of the surviving but broken forces. For many pilgrims already thought of returning home, whereas Jerusalem was still surrounded by prowling foes. At the same time, selfish dissensions arose among the temporal and spiritual leaders of the crusades. Arnulf, the episcopal successor of Adhemar, at the head of arrogant priests, contended that a spiritual kingdom should be founded, under a temporal protectorate. The assembled princes decided upon the choice of a temporal king. Godfrey, of Bouillon, was unanimously chosen, but would assume no other title than "Defender of the Holy Sepulchre;" being unwilling to wear a royal crown where Christ had worn a crown of thorns. — Whilst these things were transpiring in Jerusalem, the Egyptian Caliph Mostali had urged an immense army, for the recovery of Palestine, as far as Ascalon. Godfrey led forth his enthusiastic hosts against him, and, Aug. 12, 1099, routed his army with terrible slaughter. Provisions and arms in abundance fell to the share of the victors, and the new kingdom acquired increased influence and security. Soon after this victory, Daimbert, Archb. of Pisa, arrived in Jerusalem; by the help of the princes, he expelled the hated Arnulf, and having, as Patriarch, demanded, in the Pope's name, that the kingdom should become a fief of the Church, constrained Godfrey to promise to defend the Holy Sepulchre and the Church as the vassal of the Patriarch and Pope. Godfrey (see Art.) died July 18, 1100. The Crusaders were, meanwhile, reduced to 2000 footmen and 300 horsemen. The kingdom was confined to the possession of Jerusalem, Joppa, Nazareth, Ramlah, Cæsarea, and some adjacent villages, and the feudal tenure of four chief baronies, of which Laodicea, was under Raymond, and Tiberias under Tancred, whilst Antioch and Edessa, the bulwark of the kingdom, sustained a less intimate relation to Jerusalem, on account of their distance, and intervening Turkish possessions. It was fifty years before the Christians subdued the entire coast to Askelon. And, as the parts taken were apportioned to those most active in their conquest, there arose in Jerusalem a feudal nobility, pledged, as in the West, to render the King forty days' service every year, and general obedience. The cities in part fell to the barons, partly remained under the immediate rule of the King. The chief barons, among whom the King was primus inter pares, presided at the diets; but they often so quarrelled among themselves that they called in the Turks to their aid. The knights of the kingdom, in its most flourishing period, numbered only a few hundred, and, with the cities, could not rally more than 5000 warriors. As the King's power was embarrassed by his relations to the feudal lords, it became still more so by the repeated strifes which arose between these nobles and numerous arrogant priests. Besides the Patriarch, who aimed at supremacy over the entire Eastern Church, and a large number of Bishops, there were five Archbishops in the small kingdom; those of Tyre, Cæsarea, Bessaret, Nazareth, and Krak (Philadelphia). To these were added crowds of poor subordinate clergy, whom the hope of gain had drawn to Palestine. Numerous monks, also, favoured by Rome, infringed upon the rights of the other ecclesiastics, and provoked open contentions. As the clergy received, besides having their own hands, tithes of all the revenues, and the offerings of the pilgrims, whilst the income of the Kings was so small that they could scarcely maintain the government, frequent feuds arose between the spiritual and temporal powers. In addition to the nobles and clergy, the new state acquired a mixed population of the most diverse character and manners. The chief and most favoured of these were the European crusaders, or pilgrims, generally called Franks, whose rapacity and cruelty made the Mohammedans hate and despise them. The offspring of those born in Palestine were called Pullani, who became worse than their parents. Besides these were the orthodox Greek Christians, Surians, the working class, whom the Latin ecclesiastics sorely oppressed. In language, manner of life, and customs, they most resembled the Saracens, who, as also the Grifons (as the Franks called the Greeks) were few in number. — The kingdom of Jerusalem maintained itself, amid constant hostilities and growing corruptions, until Oct. 21, 1187. Eight kings¹ succeeded Godfrey, who, though brave amid the perils of warfare, lacked ability and wisdom to confirm their rule. Indeed, the government would not have lasted so long, but for the aid which annually arrived in the persons of new pilgrims, and the support of the religious-knightly orders of the Hospitallers and Templars. The great influence of these orders in the kingdom calls for some special notice of their origin. About the middle of the 11th cent., some benevolent merchants of Amalfi and other Italian cities founded a hospital, with a monastery and church, in Jerusalem, for the accommodation of poor sick pilgrims. The members of this institution, called Hospitallers, took the name of their patron, St. John of Alexandria. At the time of the first crusade, Gerhard of Provence, a pious philanthropist, was at its head, and obtained from Paschal II. a distinct constitution. Gerhard's successor, Raymond of Puy, added (1118) military to the other duties of the members, and thus induced large numbers to join the order; they wore a black cloak, with an eight-cornered cross of white linen on the left breast. Their leader was called Master, and, since Hugo of Reval, Grand-Master (see Hospitallers). About the same time, Hugh of Payens and Geoffrey de St. Aldamar joined with seven other knights in a vow of chastity, obedience, and poverty, in honor of the sweet Mother of God, and for the defence of the Holy Land and pious pilgrims, according to the rule of St. Augustine. Martial and monastic objects were thus combined at their outset. This basis of a new order was laid in 1119. It soon rendered important service to the feeble kingdom. Baldwin II., therefore, cheerfully offered for their use a part of his palace, near the supposed locality of Solomon's temple; hence their name, Templars. The Patriarch of Jerusalem, also, at once recognized the order as a religious society, and St. Bernard of Clairvaux proclaimed their praise in Europe so zealously, that Honorius II. confirmed the organization, 1128, and their numbers and wealth rapidly increased. The knights lived in their houses like monks; valour against infidels was their chief virtue. Their dress was a white cloak with a red cross. Admissions took place secretly, in the assembled chapter, with simple ceremonies; their various rules, also, were kept secret, being shown only to the higher and older members (cf. Gieseler, Eccl. H. II. § 72). These two religious-military orders impressed their character upon the age, and long efficiently aided the kingdom of Jerusalem. Securing to the members a double merit, they attracted the choicest warriors of Europe; those who could not join them made the one or other order the heir of their estate. Both orders were divided into different classes, the first class being composed of knights proper, who could prove their nobility; but any one might enter the order as a fellow in arms, or a serving brother. The Grand-Masters, who had their seat in Jerusalem, had command of a strong force, and, by means of their immense revenues, could sustain many hired soldiers.

¹ These were, 1, Baldwin I., Godfrey's brother, to 1118; 2, Baldwin II., his cousin, to 1131; 3, Foulk of Anjou, the husband of Melissinda, daughter of B. II., to 1142; 4, Baldwin III., Melissinda's son, under the regency of M., to 1162; 5, Almeric, brother of B. III., to July 11, 1173; 6, Baldwin IV., Almeric's son, to 1183; 7, Baldwin V., son of B. IV., to 1186; and 8, Veit of Lusignan.

Thus supported, Baldwin I. and II. successfully defended themselves against the infidels. But when, under the feeble Fouk, the terrible Zenghi, emir of Aleppo, and his son, Noraddin, took Edessa, the news of its fall spread such alarm that nothing short of another and general crusade was thought adequate to the deliverance of the kingdom. Eugene III. headed the movement at once, offered the immunities of the feudal lords and the faithful to the crusaders, and summoned the princes of the Western Church to the rescue, through Bernard of Clairvaux (Eugen. Ep. ad Ludov. in Mansi, XXI. p. 626, &c.). Bernard (see Art.) inflamed all France. Louis VII. and most of his knights took the cross, to atone for the burning down of a church filled with human beings. In 1146, Bernard preached the crusade in Germany. At the diet of Spire, his burning eloquence fired all present; even Conrad III. was borne down by it against his will, and was the first to march forth, with 70,000 warriors, on the old course, through Hungary towards Constantinople. But, as bitter dissensions existed between the members of the Eastern and Western Churches, and as the Germans were already engaged in hostilities in Thrace, Manuel I. did not hesitate quietly to conclude a peace with the Seljuks advantageous to himself. This involved the Germans in so many difficulties and losses, that Conrad hastened to Constantinople, and advised his followers to join the French. But Louis VII. had suffered equal losses in the devastated country, from all whose heights and ravines the light-armed foe assailed him. Only after the severest toils did he, with a small part of his army, reach Syria, where Conrad met him. There they were soon joined by the North German and English crusaders, who had meanwhile taken Lisbon from the Moors. Unwilling that the enterprise should prove utterly fruitless, the united host, with Baldwin III. and the troops of his baronies, besieged Damascus. But here, again, ambition, strife, and especially the treachery of the Pullani, defeated the attempt. Well nigh consumed by hunger, pestilence, and vice, the Princes, disheartened, returned with their few remaining followers to their homes (1149).

After this failure, the Christians in Palestine met with one misfortune after another; and, although they were constantly assisted by new pilgrims, the debilitated, distracted kingdom would soon have gone down, only for the hostilities of rival houses. But after Saladin had subjected Egypt and frontier Asia, he assailed and took Jerusalem, Oct. 3, 1187. Although he treated the conquered Christians with surprising clemency, the tidings of the fall of the Holy City spread consternation and grief throughout the entire West. Gregory VIII. issued a call for titles in support of a third crusade. The Italians, with the Archb. of Pisa and Ravenna, in conjunction with the Normans, Frieslanders, Danes, and the Flemish, hastened forward with a fleet of more than a hundred ships. It was the most splendid of the crusades. The veteran Frederick I., fired with the spirit of vengeance, seized the cross, and, early in 1188, was in the field with 30,000 warriors, the flower of his nation, and marched for Constantinople, which, by his strict discipline, and the bravery of his troops, he reached without loss. Suspensions, however, prevailed, that the emperor, Isaac Angelus, had formed treaties with Saladin which were dangerous to the crusade. Frederick, therefore, treated the empire as a conquered country, and, forcing his passage into Asia, took Iconium, and reached Tarsus with but trifling losses. There he perished whilst bathing in the Cydnus (or Selef), July 10, 1190. His army fell into disorder, and became so reduced that but a remnant was left, which, under Duke Frederick of Suabia, the Emperor's second son, besieged Ptolemais (Acre). Thither had the Kings of France and England also led their hosts. Philip embarked on the coast of Palestine on April 13, 1191. Richard, after encountering a storm, delayed, to avenge himself upon Isaac Comnenus, for his maltreatment of the English, by taking Cyprus, and arrived later. Both kings now stormed Acre; but nine bloody battles, hunger, pestilence, and other misfortunes, had carried off nearly 300,000 Christians. Many nobles, and Duke Frederick himself, fell by the plague. But, before his death, he founded the Teutonic order of knights, prompted by a desire to provide for the comfort of needy and sick German pilgrims to Palestine, who were mostly neglected by the Hospitallers and Templars. After the taking of Ptolemais, disunion stopped further progress. The haughtiness of Richard drove his confederates from him, so that he soon found himself alone in the field against Saladin. After various fierce encounters, this noble foe consented to a truce of three years. With the hope of completing the conquest of Palestine at some future time, Richard, after giving Cyprus to Guido, and dividing half the land of the island among his knights, started (1192) homeward, but was seized by Leopold of Austria, sold to Henry VI., and released only on the payment of an immense ransom (BARONIUS, ad. ann. 1193; MATTH. PARIS, ad. ann. 1195).

Subsequent crusades assumed an essentially different character. Youthful enthusiasm had subsided; the zeal of the people grew cold; the princes gave more heed to their private interests; the voyages to the East assumed a more commercial character, and did the Christians in Syria and Palestine more harm than good. Innocent III., however, had a new crusade preached by Foulk of Neuilly. A number of Italian dukes and counts obeyed the call. Foremost among them were Thibaut of Champagne, Simon de Montfort, Baldwin of Flanders, and Boniface of Montferrat. The assembled host amounted to 20,000 warriors. As this force was not thought sufficient for a land-march, a contract was made with Venice to convey the army by sea for 80,000 marks. The crafty Doge, Dandolo, sought to turn the embarrassment caused by the raising of this sum to his own advantage, by inducing the crusaders to further his designs upon Dalmatia. This accomplished, they also let themselves become involved in the revolution of the Greek empire. They took Constantinople, April 12, 1204, plundered the city, destroyed rich treasures of ancient literature and art, and founded a Latin feudal empire, of which Baldwin of Flanders was crowned the first emperor. Although Innocent deprecated the conquest, he availed himself of its results, claiming for Rome the appointment of the Patriarch of Constantinople (GEOFFROI DE VILLE-HARDOUIN, Hist. de la conq. de Constant., 1198-1207). The new empire lasted only until 1261. Its establishment, however, afforded security to pilgrims on their land-route to Palestine. But it did not relieve those already there. Innocent, therefore, proclaimed another crusade—the crusade of children. It was composed of crowds of youth of both sexes, whom no authority could fully control. Some of them went by land, and fell by hunger, disease, or the sword before they reached Constantinople. Others forced an embarkation from Italy, and either perished in the waves, or were seized by pirates, and sold as slaves to the infidels. Such catastrophies were calculated to disgust men with crusades. But the Popes still hoped to wrest Christian countries held by the infidels from the power of Islam, and re-establish the supremacy of Rome over the Greek Church. They really succeeded, in the fall of 1217, to get a new crusade into the Orient. Those who took part were mostly Hungarians, under Andrew II., and Germans, under Duke Leopold VII. of Austria, Duke Otto of Meran, the Archb. of Salzburg, and other spiritual and temporal lords. Many came also from Norway, Denmark, and Northern Germany, under Duke William of Holland, by way of the North Sea, taking Alcazor on their way; these did not reach Syria until the following year. Meanwhile, Andrew II., discovering the difficulties of the enterprise, returned home with some of his best soldiers. The other crusaders, however, under the avaricious Cardinal-legate Pelagius, joined by the three orders of knights and King John of Jerusalem, invaded Egypt, and, after severe struggles, took Damietta, Nov. 5, 1219. They then moved on to Cairo, but, being ignorant of the country, the overflowings of the Nile and the resistance of the Egyptians so harassed them, that they capitulated with the Sultan, and not only surrendered Damietta, but had to leave Egypt. In Europe, Frederick II. was blamed with these misfortunes. At his coronation, 1215, he had taken the cross, and had often subsequently renewed the vow. His marriage with Isolanthe, heiress to the kingdom of Jerusalem, increased his obligations. Still he continued to evade the call. At length Gregory IX. compelled him to move. Frederick embarked at Brundisium, Aug. 15, 1227, with a large army of princes and knights; but returned in three days, on account of real or feigned sickness. Gregory excommunicated him; but he, without waiting for absolution, started again in August for Palestine. There, instead of meeting confederates, he found that even Christians secretly and openly opposed him; tidings of his excommunication had been sent before him. He therefore concluded a ten years' truce with the Sultan of Egypt, and thus secured the restoration of the kingdom of Jerusalem. He entered the city in triumph, and put the crown upon his head with his own hands, ecclesiastics having refused to do it. Then he hastened back to Italy, to check the aggressions of the Pope upon his possessions there. Frederick could now assert that he had redeemed his vow, and served believers in the East even against their will. But Jerusalem was held by them only a short time beyond the truce. In 1240, Thibaut I. of Navarre and Richard Duke of Cornwall, with many French nobles, started upon another crusade, which also proved a failure. After Sultan Khamel's death, his younger son, el Saleh, succeeded him. About the same time, the Moguls swept like a whirlwind over all Asia, laid waste the Islam states, and brought on the final overthrow of Christian rule in Palestine. This was effected by the Carizmians, who, flying before the Moguls, sent an army to Syria which joined that of the Sultan, routed the Christians at Gaza, and, in 1247, took Jerusalem, Gaza, Askelon, and Tiberias. This gave occasion to the last crusades. Louis IX. of France (St. Louis) led them, in compliance with a vow made during a dangerous sickness. His nobles hesitated; but at length, in Aug. 1248, arrangements were completed, and the King left France with a fleet, and reached Cyprus in safety. There he wintered. After due deliberation, he resolved to attack the Mohammedan power in Egypt. Damietta and Mansurah were rapidly taken. But, having imprudently pressed into the interior, the invaders suffered great losses. Louis himself had to surrender, with the flower of his knights, and then to pay 400,000 livres for liberation. He led his other troops to Syria, but, without accomplishing anything, returned home in 1254. But he still felt himself bound by his vow, and in old age made another appeal to the nobility of France. This time he first assailed Tunis, hoping to conquer and convert its king, Abu Abdallah. Instead of a willing proselyte, he found a wary foe. During a toilsome siege, many of his followers died of fever. Louis himself fell a prey to the ravager, Aug. 24, 1270. His son, Philip III., succeeded him, and forthwith raised the siege, Abdallah having made some important concessions, and returned to Europe. St. Louis was the last of the crusade heroes. The bloody conflicts for the Holy Land were ended. Religious enthusiasm yielded to more sensible or selfish considerations. After the fall of Antioch (1268) and Tripolis (1288), that of Ptolemais soon followed, May 18, 1291, with terrible slaughter. — But, although the proper original object of the crusades was not attained, they exerted a mighty influence upon European civilization. They once more brought the East and West into the closest contact, and started important movements in both continents. It is true, more than five millions of lives were lost, and for several ages papal despotism, superstition, and warlike and plundering propensities, were abetted; but there were many counterbalancing advantages. They effected a closer union between the nations of south-western Europe; prepared the way for independent national development; effected an increased unity in the state, inasmuch as the power of the king rose with the fall of the minor princes; promoted the influence of ordinary citizens, by opening the way for commerce, and the consequent accumulation and distribution of wealth; enlarged the horizon of human knowledge; inspired taste for the arts and the enjoyments of life; and, above all, released the people of that bondage of the mind and spirit by which they had been so long enthralled, and shed upon them the dawn of a higher and brighter destiny. The internal impediments to an advancing perfection of the life of the state were surmounted (WACHLER, Lehrb. d. Gesch. 255). But without dwelling upon these more general results, we shall briefly notice those which specially concern theology and the Church. The first may be found in the elevation of spiritual over temporal power, in which they both originated and resulted. They were a practical acknowledgment of ecclesiastical supremacy, having, from the first, been under the control of the Popes, if not in person, through their Legates. The crusades also secured the Pope's unlimited power over the clergy (see Legates, and Episcopi in p. inf.), and became a main source of the wealth of the Roman court, and its clergy in general. They also kindled the spirit of religious intolerance, which so zealously resisted the sects of the Cathari and Waldensians, which sprang up during the same period. The crusades furthermore strengthened the power of the papacy by multiplying orders of monks and mendicant friars. Another result was that, mainly through the crusades, the Popes succeeded in completing the hierarchical edifice, of which Gregory VII. had laid the foundation, and in organizing the entire West into a political union, subject to the Church. But then, as a counterpart to this again, it must be noticed that the spread of popular knowledge, and the consolidation of the states respectively also led to the Reformation. The influence of the crusades upon scientific theology was mediate, and of less importance; still they led to the discovery and translation into Latin of several works of Aristotle, which incited the scholasticism and theology of the middle ages to more acute investigations.¹ KLIPPEL.*

Crusius, Chr. Augustus (b. at Leuna, Jan. 10, 1715), was, next to Buddeus (see Art.), the principal opponent of Wolfianism. After completing his academical course at Leipsic, he became prof. of philosophy (1744), of theology (1750), and primarius of theol. (1757), in that university. He acquired the reputation of an acute, independent thinker, and was a man of an upright, mild character. He wrote many theological works, practical and theoretical; the principal ones are, Hypomnemata ad theol. prophetica, 3 Thle. Lpz. 1764, &c. (the views of which have been partly revived by Hengstenberg and Delitzsch); the third part also separately; Comm. in Jes. cur. PEZOLD, 1779; Moral Theol., 2 Thle. Lpz. 1772, &c. He died Oct. 18, 1775. (See Delitzsch and Caspari's bibl.-theol. u. apolog.-krit. Studien, I., Berlin, 1845. E. SCHWARZ.*

Crypto-Calvinism, the secret leaning to Calvin's view of the Lord's Supper, ascribed to the adherents of Melancthon—to those in particular who lived in the electorate of Saxony. The age in which we live may be said to have both a practical and theoretical interest in the rise and progress of the controversy between Phillipism and Flaccianism. Practical, because the principles originally involved are still represented and defended in our day, and theoretical, because the latest investigations by Heppe present problems which can only be solved by a complete history of the age of the Reformation.

¹ Sources: ALBERTUS S. ALBERICUS AQUENSIS, de passagio Godofr. de Bull., &c., libri XII., ed. Reiner Reinerus, Helmst. 1584, 4to; FULCHERIUS, gesta peregrin. Francorum (to 1124); WILHELMUS SYRII, hist. rerum in part. transmarinis gest., libri XXIII.; JACOBI DE VITRIACO, hist. Hierosol. in JACOB BONGARS; Gesta Dei per Francos, &c., II. Tome, Hannov. 1611. — FR. WILKEN, Gesch. d. Kreuzz., &c., 7 Bde.; J. MICHAUD, Hist. of the Cr., transl. by Robson, 3 vol., New York, 1855; V. RAUMER'S Gesch. d. Hohenstauffen; LUDW. HAKEN, Gemälde d. Kr. &c., 3 Thle.; H. V. SYBEL, Gesch. d. ersten Kr., 1841; MEEREN, Versuch einer Entwicklung d. Folgen d. Kr., &c.; REGENBOGEN, comment. de fructibus, &c., &c., perceperint e sacro be. lo, Amst., 1809.

First of all, it must be confessed that, for a long time after the outbreak of the quarrel, and even after its termination, the Melanchthonian tendency in the Church had been acknowledged, and that the name, "Lutheran Church," was adopted at a later period. Prior to this, the distinction between the invariata and variata (1540 and 1542) editio of the Confessio Augustana had not been received, and in part not even known. Luther himself (Gieseler, 204) wrote, May 10, 1541, an apology for "Philip and ours" to the Electors, that they might not "worry themselves to death on account of the dear Confession, to which they still held fast, though all things else failed." And yet Art. 10, on the sacrament—and this was the point in dispute—corpus et sanguis Christi vere adsunt, et distribuuntur vescentibus, had been altered into cum pane et vino vere exhibentur—a change necessitated by the further development of Melanchthon's views, according to which the entire institution of the sacrament, and not simply bread and wine, constituted the channel of grace, and the os fidei alone, the organ for its reception. Notwithstanding this alteration, Selnecker, 1571, one of the opposite party, assures us that recognita est aug. conf. posterior, relegente et approbante Luthero, ut vivi adhuc testes affirmant. The variata was regarded as the locus pletior, emendata, uberior, explicita, repetita Augsburg Confession, as the "confessio imperatori Carolo V., 1530, exhibita," under the protection of which the Protestants were placed at the Passau conference, and at Augsburg, 1555. Its contents were sanctioned, March 1558, at the Frankford Recess, and, at the Naumburg Assembly of Princes (Jan. 20 to Feb. 8, 1561), the Elector Frederick of the Palatinate, having broached the relation of the two editions, it was declared that the emended confession had been presented to the Emperor at Worms (1541), as the common creed of the evangelical countries, and that it was not designed that the confession of 1530 should be construed into any abandonment of that of 1540. Luther, however, had expressed a very favorable opinion of Melanchthon's loci theologici (Gieseler, 208). The Art. of the Marburg Conf., 1529, the union acts between the German and Swiss Reformers, the Augsburg Conf.—Philipist in character—and Melanchthon's tractatus de primatu et potestate papæ, were officially subscribed at the Smalcaldic Assembly (Studien und Krit. III. 643), whilst, as late as 1570, Luther's Smalcaldic Art. were not generally and publicly acknowledged. No wonder that (Planck, V. 2, 536) the collection of MS. writings privately made and published by Ernst Vögelin in Leipzig, should, under the title corpus doctrinæ misnicum, have obtained an official distinction, which was confirmed by the patronage of the Elector.

Though M. was regarded as "the learned authority," the people and princes still held fast to Luther, and to M. only as long as no quarrel existed between them. Up to this time, though there had been some differences between them, they were true friends. Calvin, too, bore in his hands the olive branch of peace. Of Melanchthon he wrote, 1539, de ipso nihil dubito, quin penitus nobiscum sentiat; and, in 1557, Ego, si temere comperior Philippi nomine abusus, nullas ignominiae rotas recuso. Solum quod dixi et quidem centies, si opus sit, confirmo, non magis a me Philippum quam a propriis visceribus in hac causa posse divelli; and of Luther that, though he might call him a devil, he still would honor him as a servant of Christ, whilst L. could write, spero quidem ipsum olim de nobis melius sensurum, sed æquum est a bono ingenio nos aliquid ferre; and Calvin, again: id et vidit Lutherus et probavit vehementer 1545, quo tempore testimoniis fide dignissimorum hominum constat eum in hæc verba erupisse; non inepte judicat iste scriptor. Atque ego quidem quæ mea sunt (vitia) agnosco; Helvetii si idem, facerent et sua quoque serio agnoscerent, et retractarent, jam pax esset in hac controversia (see Ebrard, Doct. of Holy Comm.).

Ecclesiastical war soon broke out. In Calvin's letter of 1539, we read Melanchthon's acknowledgement, that in the opposite party were some qui crassius aliquid requirant, and in 1537, *Scio me quædam minus horride dicere de prædestinatione, de assensu voluntatis, de necessitate obedientiæ nostræ, de peccato mortali. De his omnibus scio re ipsa Lutherum sentire eadem, sed ineruditi quædam ejus πορτικώτερα dicta, cum non videant quo pertineant, nimium amant. Fruantur suo judicio. Mihi tamen concedunt homini peripatetico amanti mediocritatem, minus stoice alicubi loqui. He, whom "nunquam placuit hæc violenta et hostilis digladiatio inter Lutherum et Zwinglium," who, as early as 1525, was afraid that the controversies on the Supper in intricatas, obscuras, et profundas quæstiones ac rixas conjectos animos a conspectu doctrinæ necessariæ tunquam turbine quodam auferri, who could say, "non aliam ab causam me unquam τειδεολογησάνας nisi ut vitam emendarem," and "ego non delector inanibus disputationibus, nec quæro subtilitates in ullo genere doctrinarum, sed quæro realia et quæ utilia sunt in omni vita"—this man, after having made the acquaintance of the Swiss Reformers, who modified his views, felt bound thus to proclaim his doctrine: ego posui in usu sacramentalem præsentiam et dixi datis his rebus Christum vere adesse et efficacem esse. Id profecto satis est. Nec addidi inclusionem aut conjunctionem. Sacramenta pacta sunt, ut rebus sumtis adsit aliud. He now laid chief stress on the substantial presence of Christ in the administration of the Lord's Supper (cum pane et vino not in, sub et cum), the indwelling of the whole Christ (integrum et vivum Christum adesse, 'caveamus, ne ita astruamus divinitatem hominis Christi,' ut veritatem corporis auferamus), and must have regarded the Lutheran view of the visible symbols as a ἀπολαρπεία, and the question de physica conjunctione panis et corporis as unnecessary. As his object was not to gain a triumph over the strictly Lutheran view, but to obtain toleration for his own theory, he for a* long time remained silent. The adherents of the former suspected him of "secret Calvinism;" most conspicuous among whom were the theologians in Jena, Flaccius at their head; later John Wigand, Joh. Fred. Cölestin, Timothy Kirchner, 1568, and particularly the fanatical Tilemann Hesshus, 1569. Princes like the noble Duke Christopher of Würtemberg († Dec. 28, 1568), Landgrave Philip of Hesse († March 3, 1567), and his successor, William, in vain sought to reconcile the contending parties. At the Conference in Worms, Sept. 1557, where the Jesuits and the Flaccians prevented a union, the ecclesiastical fight began in good earnest. In the Palatinate, under the patronage of Frederick III., the Melanchthonian view gained the ascendent. Brentius, who, in his church at Würtemberg, had hitherto advocated it, went over to the Lutheran party, and, before the synod at Stuttgart, Dec. 19, 1559, vindicated the strictly Lutheran doctrine. He made the presence of Christ depend upon his being seated at the right hand of God, in virtue of which, as man, he effected everything in a heavenly manner; and, though good Lutheran theologians, as Chemnitz and Selnekker, based it upon the fact that Christ could be where he willed to be, or upon consubstantiation, the mode of his presence now became the apple of discord. Melanchthon († April 19, 1560) lived long enough to protest against the new doctrine of ubiquity; his followers fanned the flame by a direct attempt to abolish the Lutheran dogma. An absolute rupture, however, between the two parties had not yet taken place. The peace which Duke Christopher effected at the Naumberg Assemb., Jan. 1561, by the adoption of the Augsburg Conf., without reference to its separate editions, was soon broken. The pious Elector Frederick III. of the Palatinate, worn out by the obstinacy of Frederick of Saxony and John of Brandenburg,—who, dissatisfied with the variata, demanded an alteration in the preface of the Conf.,—and intent on preserving religious peace in his own dominions, organized the church on the Melanchthonian basis, and adopted the Heidelberg Catechism, 1562,¹ as embodying Melanch. and not Calvinism. For this, at the Diet of Augsburg, March to May, 1566, he was to be expelled from the society of the Evangelicals. So honorably did he bear himself, that Augustus of Saxony exclaimed, "Fritz, you have more piety than we all." In fact, Augustus himself now faithfully followed the teachings of his theologians, who opposed not the Lutheran creed, as such, but only the ubiquity-theory of Würtemberg, and the pugnacity of Flaccius. Indeed, so conciliatory was the course of the Wittenbergers at Dresden Conf., 1562, and at the one held later, from Oct. 7–10, 1571, that Selnekker affirmed there was nothing more to be feared, as the sacramental quarrel had now been adjusted. Re-opened by the Elector's physician, Peucer, who openly opposed his position, Augustus cut off the Lutheran zealots, on the ground of the corpus misnicum, and, after the style of the Allenburg Conf., 1568, declared that he would hold fast to the corpus doctrinæ, and regard everything but that as Flaccian, dangerous error, which was to be avoided and condemned. He purified the University of Jena, expelled Hesshus and Wigand, removed the superintendent, Rosinus, from Weimar, and all the adherents of Flaccius. Thus originated, with the beginning of 1571, the Wittenberg Catechism, Philipistic in character (de cæna; credentibus, not vescentibus), in which was urged against the theory of ubiquity, Acts 3: 21, oportet Christum cælo capi; and against the zealots of Lower Saxony, the fact that Luther, in his Latin translation of the New Test., made use of "cælo suscipi." Thus everything seemed to conspire in favor of the Philipists.

Their hopes, however, were unexpectedly frustrated. In 1574 appeared an anonymous treatise, on French paper, and with a Genevese inscription, "Exegesis perspicua et ferme integra controversiæ de sacra cæna, scripta ut privatim conscientias piorum erudiat et subicitur iudicio sociorum confessionis augustanæ, quicunque candide et sine privatis affectibus iudicaturi sunt" (for a closer analysis see Heppe, II. 468). It was composed of three parts, the first of which advocated the Melanchth. view of the unity of Christ's person; the second, the altered edition of Art. 10 of the Augsburg Conf., whilst it condemned the Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation; the third discussed the way in which a concord pleasing to God could be established. Whilst Luther's name was honorably mentioned, his authority was subordinated to that of M.; nothing was said touching Calvin and his predestination theory. This book soon gained circulation in Leipzig and Wittenberg, and Vögelin, who printed the corpus misnicum, announced himself the publisher. On the authority of Planck and Löscher's historia motuum, it was generally believed that two Wittenberg theologians, Christopher Petzel and Esrom Rüdiger, were the authors; but the investigations of Heppe have clearly shown that these had nothing to do, either with the composition or the publication of the book; but that it was written by the Silesian physician, Joachim Cureus (died Jan. 21, 1573), and was never designed to be made public. The printer of it, having obtained a copy, and unwilling to bring upon himself and the Wittenbergers any suspicion, published it as anonymous. The book stirred up the old controversy. Its opponents succeeded in discovering a conspiracy between the theologians and courtiers on the one hand, and the Palatiners on the other, for the establishment of the German Reformed Church in the country, and certain disparaging remarks touching the person of the Elector, and his blind reverence for the name of Luther. The Elector, exasperated beyond measure, imprisoned Cracov, Peucer, Stössel, and Schütz, the leaders of this movement, examined their papers, and instituted a criminal process. At the Synod of Torgau, May, 1574, he had a confession of faith drawn up, and presented to the Wittenberg theologians for subscription. The aged Major put his name to it; Wiedebram, Cruciger, Petzel, and Möller refused their assent. These four were imprisoned in a small room, and, at the end of five days, conducted by a guard of soldiers to the Pleisenburg, in Leipzig. At the end of 14 days, they subscribed, but with reservations: On their return to Wittenberg, they were deprived of office and banished. Stössel died in prison, and Cracov from the effects of torture, 1575; Peucer and Shütz, at the end of twelve years, obtained their freedom.

¹ A different view of the Heidelberg Cat., by Sudhoff (see Art.).

Thus fell Philipism in Lower Saxony, and with it the Melanchthonian tendency in the German evangelical Church. For an account of its temporary triumph in 1586, and its bloody downfall, 1592, see Art. Crell. (NIEDNER, Gesch. d. chr. Kirche, 669; LINDNER, K.-gesch. III. 1, 183-6; GIESELER, Eccl. Hist.; WALCH, bibl. theolog. II. 375, &c.; PLANCK, prot. Lehrbegriff, &c., V. 2, 411-633; HEPPE, Gesch. d. deutsch. Prot. in d. Jahren 1555-81, I. 1852; II. 1853; Stud. u. Krit. 1855; EBRARD, Dogma v. heil. Abendm., &c., II.; GASZ, Gesch. d. prot. Dogmatik, 1854.) C. BECK. — Ermentrout.

Crypts, Cryptæ, κρυπταί, among the Greeks and Romans, were subterranean corridors and grottos; also covered passages at the house; and, in Christian authors, designates the subterranean vaulted graves, which, from the end of the 5th cent., were styled catacumbæ or catatumbæ. In the ages of persecution, natural caves, abandoned stone quarries, tophus and sand mines were used by the early Christians as latibula martyrum, κοιμητήρια, or dormitoria, for the dead (comp. Art. Catacombs). The general belief that the Apostles Peter and Paul had been buried in the crypt of St. Sebastian, in Rome, invested it with special glory, whilst that in Nola, where was honored the tomb of the Presbyter Felix (died in the 3d cent.) obtained great distinction in the 4th and 5th centuries. In order to accommodate the vast multitude of pilgrims who, on festival days, visited the crypts to satisfy their devotion, they were enlarged by means of passages and halls; above them churches were built, and underneath, over the graves of martyrs, the Lord's Supper was celebrated. These churches were frequently called Cæmeterium, and the crypts where confession of sin preceded the communion, the Confession. In the period ranging between the 4th and 8th cent., the C. were adorned with pictures, mosaics, and precious stones, and remained the central point of the tombs that encircled the grave of the martyr. Thus originated many ancient basilicas, the oldest parts of which are their subterranean stories.

It soon became customary for each church to have the grave of a martyr, whose bones were deposited in a small subterranean chapel, which was also called crypta (whence the German Gruft), confessio or testimonium memoria — testimonium, because these bones testified to the consecration and name of the church, and memoria, because of the remembrance of the martyr.

In the course of time, German genius applied to the basilica the "Romanic" style of architecture, introduced the nave, enlarged and elevated the choir, so that a number of steps led up to it (in the cathedral of Brandenburg, 22). This induced the construction of larger crypts, the roofs of which, composed of vaulted crosses, were supported by rows of pillars. Sometimes a second crypt was built, an addition very seldom made to the Italian basilicas. The crusades over, which must have powerfully excited in the minds of the Germans the necessity for such martyr-churches, and the German genius having passed through its first youth, the elevated choirs and crypts disappeared, and were superseded by another order of architecture, which built the cathedrals of Cologne, Freiburg, and Vienna. (Comp. Bellermann on the oldest Christ. tombs, p. 7, 12; Kugler's Manual of Hist. of Art, p. 330, 431, 540; Otto, Archæol. of Church-Art. 2 edit. p. 5.) H. MERZ. — Ermentrout.

Cudbert, or Cuthbert (Bishop of Lindisfarne; not to be confounded with Bede's pupil of the same name, abbot of Yarrow); distinguished, in the 7th century, for all Christian virtues, and for the gift of miracles and prophecy. His life was written first by a lay brother in Lindisfarne; afterwards at large (by the aid of this biography and of oral tradition) by Bede, in poetry and prose, who gives an abstract of this work in his Church History, IV. 27-32.

Cudbert was of humble family; in his boyhood remarkably indifferent to the sports of youth; and impelled towards monastic life by appearances of angels to him while a shepherd, aided, no doubt, by the influence of a pious widow, who was a mother to him from his eighth year. In 651, he entered the monastery of Mailros, then under the care of the excellent Abbot Eata, but particularly attractive to Cudbert for its eminently holy præpositus, Boisil, who became his instructor in the Scriptures, and his model. Here the pupil so emulated his master that, in a few years, when Eata, at King Alfred's order, founded the monastery of Inrhyppum (now Ripon), he made Cudbert its PRÆPOSITUS HOSPITUM. When the plague, in 661, carried Boisil away from Mailros, Cudbert, who was himself brought to the brink of the grave, became his successor, and not only trod in his steps as præpositus, but made it his special object to traverse the whole region around, and dispel by his preaching the darkness of superstition. Some years later, Eata, become abbot of Lindisfarne, transferred Cudbert thither as præpositus, to reform that cloister in the Roman spirit; and here, by his mildness and decision, he won the monks to his views. He had long shown a great predilection for hermit life. He often withdrew for days together, for prayer and religious exercises, and, at last, chose the small island of Farne, near Lindisfarne, for his residence. The fame of his holiness attracted multitudes from far and near; and, on Eata's death, in 684, he was unanimously elected Bishop of Lindisfarne, by king and council. Prevailed on to accept this office only by the most urgent entreaties, he resigned it after two years, spent as formerly in unwearied labors, particularly in preaching within his diocese, and went back to Farne, where he soon sickened, and, on March 20, 687, died. His remains were deposited in Lindisfarne, and are said to have been found eleven years after undecayed. His distinguished piety afterwards placed him among the saints.

C. SCHÜLL. — E. D. Yeomans.

Cudworth, one of the most eminent English philosophers and theologians of the 17th century. He lived when Romish and Puritan principles were in most violent conflict, when Presbyterianism, Independency, and Episcopacy were successively ascendent, but when Christian theology was greatly disturbed by Deism. Without entering into the external controversies, he became the champion of revealed truth, and the leading advocate of the Platonizing philosophy then flourishing in Cambridge, in opposition to Deism; and took a conciliatory position between the Church parties.

Ralph Cudworth was born in 1617, in Aller, Somersetshire, where his father was rector; came, in 1630, to Cambridge, which became his second home; and pursued his studies in Emanuel College, where, soon after graduating, he became fellow and tutor. In his tutorship he met with unexampled success. In 1641 he was presented to the parish of North Cadbury, Somersetshire; and, in the following year, published his discourse on "The true Notion of the Lord's Supper;" advocating the idea of an epulum ex oblatis, against the Romish idea of an oblatio sacrificii. Soon after appeared his treatise, "The union of Christ and the Church in a Shadow." In 1644 he took the degree of B. D., and was appointed master of Clare Hall, and the year after Regius professor of Hebrew. In 1647 he preached before the House of Commons on a public fast day, a discourse for which he received the special thanks of the House. In 1651, he received the degree of D. D., and was, three years after, elected master of Christ's College. At this time he married. In 1657 he was one of those who were consulted by Parliament about the English translation of the Bible. At the restoration of Charles II., he addressed a congratulatory Latin poem to the king. In 1672, he was presented by the Bishop of London to the vicarage of Ashwell; and, in 1678, became prebendary of Gloucester; and then published his celebrated work, "The Intellectual System of the Universe" — an imperishable monument of his learning and intellectual power. This work provoked attacks from various and even opposite quarters. Even those whose cause he aimed to defend, considered him so fair and moderate in stating and explaining the errors he combated, that he almost betrayed his own cause. The work was translated into Latin by Mosheim, in 1733, and a second edition in 1773. He also added valuable notes and discussions. Cudworth died June 26, 1688, and was buried in the chapel of Christ's College. It was not till after his death that the importance of this, his chief work, was duly understood. He considered Deism as destructive, not only of Christianity, but of all religion; and, therefore, brought forward against deistical fatalism, the principle of freedom and personality. The foundation of his "True System of the Universe" consists in these three ideas: the personality of God; morality imminent in God; and human freedom. His other works were a "Treatise concerning eternal and immutable Morality;" "Discourse on moral Good and Evil;" "On Liberty and Necessity;" "On Free Will;" "On Daniel's prophecy of the 70 weeks;" "On the verity of the Christian religion;" "On the creation of the World, and immortality of the Soul;" "Hebrew Learning;" and "An explanation of Hobbes' notion of God, and of the extension of Spirits."

Cudworth was not a pure Platonist. In metaphysics, indeed, he followed Plato and the Neoplatonists, but in the philosophy of nature, the Atomists, and in that of religion, Herbert. His theological position was partly determined by his philosophy, partly by the state of religion in his time. He took only the Sabellian view of the Trinity, and rejected absolute predestination as decidedly destructive of morality. He asserted the necessity of revealed religion, but perceived, also, a divine illumination in philosophy. With decided preference for the Anglican Church, he rendered to other religious communions their due. He took the middle ground between High Church and Independency; holding, with the one, the authority of a Church constitution, and established forms of worship; with the other, the necessity of inward illumination, and an orderly life. His moderate views procured for him and his adherents the name of Latitudinarians. He was a man of extraordinary learning, keen discrimination, and profound penetration; at home in literature, in antiquities, in philosophy, and in mathematics. His style is often obscure and tedious; in his sermons rhetorical, with frequent quotations in Latin and Greek. With his vast erudition, he was deservedly esteemed for his piety, and his mild and retiring disposition.

C. SCHÖLL. — E. D. Yeomans.

Culdees. A word of Celtic origin, meaning, probably, "servants of God" (celle-de, keledai, Latinized colidei, English, Culdees). The name may have been early used of the Celtic monks, but does not occur with certainty till the 12th century, in the form of colidei, in Gerald of Cambria, who puts the word with cœlibes and cœlicolæ. The same name is written kelledai in the Scottish cartularies. It afterwards came to be applied to secular priests, and continued in use in some quarters till the 17th century.

About the Culdees there are many conjectures. Some have supposed them to have been a Christian fraternity, adulterated with elements of Celtic paganism; or a primitive monastic order, derived from Egypt. Some influence of Druidism on the formation of Celtic Christianity cannot be denied; but we have no authority for it; and we can look no further for the Culdees than to the Celtic clergy, who, after the suppression of the ancient British and Scottish Church by the Roman in the middle ages, continued to distinguish themselves by that name. Yet we may properly glance here at the history of the Celtic Church in general; since this name has become current for the early Britons and Scots, and since their history best explains the later phenomena.

The Celtic Church consisted of three branches: the British, the Irish-Scottish, and the Albanian-Scottish. The British branch embraced the Romanized Britons, and flourished in the 6th century in Wales. Gildas and Bede afford materials for a correct picture of this age. The central institution was the monastery of Bangor, in Caernarvon, which, at the time of the conference on religion between Augustine and the Britons, numbered over 2000 monks, living by their own labor, and devoted to pious exercises and scientific pursuits. The abbot, Dinooth, seems to have held a position in that conference (603) which puts Bangor on a level with Hii. Yet, besides him, seven bishops are mentioned as taking part in the council. Whether these had definite dioceses at that early period cannot be certainly determined; but there are indications that they had; and it is known, in general, that the organization of the Church in Wales was at that time tolerably well developed. The monasteries and nunneries drew not only from the lower classes, but even from the princely ranks; and secularization and corruption already appeared among the priests. The difference between the Roman and the British Church came out in the above conference of 603; but really amounted to nothing; the most important points being a reckoning of Easter, which had formerly been usual in Rome itself, and a variation in the mode of baptism. Yet Augustine's arrogance repelled the Britons, and the hatred between Britons and Saxons allowed no ecclesiastical fellowship. The British Church received a fatal blow in the massacre of monks in Caerligion (Chester) in 613; and in the twelfth century only its ruins were to be seen.

The first success of Roman influences in Britain was the introduction of the Roman Easter by Elbodugus, Bishop of Guenedotia, in 768. A century later Wales submitted to King Alfred, who drew Asser, Abbot or Bishop of St. David's, to his court, and took that prelate's church under his protection, against the frequent depredations of neighboring chiefs. Of course this brought the British Church more or less under the influence of the Anglo-Saxon. Yet the suppression of the former was very gradual. Though Wales had, by the 12th century, become almost wholly Catholic, monks of the old school were still existing at the end of that century on the island of Enbli or Burdsey. Even in the city of York, which had been longest under the Anglo-Saxon power, King Athelstan, on his return from Scotland in 936, found in St. Peter's church "viros sanctæ vitæ et conversationis honestæ, dictos ad tunc Colideos," devoting themselves to the support of the poor. The king granted them certain tithes, called "Peter-corne," to aid their labor of love; and, in 1036, they founded a hospital on some crown land, given for the purpose, and transferred their revenues to it. Whether they continued as a body after this, cannot be told.

Far more important is the Irish-Scottish branch of the Celtic Church. But the primitive history of the Scottish Church is very obscure. Its flourishing period begins with the second half of the 6th century, with the missions of Columba, Columban, Gallus, &c. Ireland had then many dioceses and monasteries, which cherished learning and culture. What Bangor was for Wales, that was Benchuir, or Bangor, for the north of Ireland, Dearmach for the south. Rome sought to exert her influence on the Irish Church, and, in the matter of the date of Easter, succeeded. But, for the most part, the Irish steadfastly clung to their traditional institutions and faith, and their Church flourished until the 9th century, when the Danish invasions and incessant civil wars induced a decline, from which she never recovered. After an interval of entire obscurity, she re-appeared in history in the middle of the 11th century; and appears then, at least to some extent, under the authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury, through the Norman settlers in the south-east, who had probably come converts from England. But the decisive step towards the subjection of the Irish Church was taken by Gregory VII., who asserted his supremacy as successor of Peter, in a letter to the Irish, in 1085, and appointed Gilbert of Limerick the first legate for Ireland. Gilbert, aided by his friend Anselm, had considerable, but only partial, success in instructing the Irish clergy in the ecclesiastica officia, and procuring reform of abuses from the king. Finally, Malachias, Archbishop of Armagh, a friend of Bernard of Clairvaux, yielded himself a willing instrument of Rome. In 1152, Ireland was divided into four Archbishoprics and twenty-eight episcopal sees. Adrian IV. confirmed the papal authority there by allowing King Henry II. to conquer the island; and when the Irish princes did homage, in 1172, ecclesiastical affairs were settled on the Roman basis. Yet the new system did not come very rapidly into play; "Caelcolæ vel Culidei" were found by Girald on the two islands of a sea in North Munster; and even in Usher's time, Colidei, with a prior, were the choristers in the cathedral of Armagh; showing, indeed, the continued existence of the Culdees, yet their subordinate place.

The Albanian Scottish branch proceeded directly from the Irish Church. It was planted by Columba (see Art.) in 563, in the country of the Albanian Scots and Picts; and extended, through King Oswald, to Northumbria, where the virtues of the Celtic Church for the first thirty years shine more brightly than anywhere else. The Scottish monks labored in apostolic simplicity and self-denial for the spread of the Gospel and of learning, and for the relief of suffering, even beyond the limits of Northumbria, till the lamentable Easter controversy, in 664, destroyed their beneficent influence in the Anglo-Saxon countries, and limited it to the Celts in the North. After this time, the Romans succeeded gradually in inducing among the Scots some conformity to their own institutions; and, after the middle of the eighth century, the history of the Scottish Church becomes very obscure.

The Celtic Church, however, seems to have preserved its identity tolerably well down to the middle of the 11th century. The strife between Canterbury and York respecting the ordination of Turgot, who was chosen Bishop by a national council of Scotland in 1107, under Alexander I., is the first certain trace of the aggression of the Roman Church on the Scottish. Turgot was consecrated by York; but on his death, in 1115, Alexander applied to Ralph of Canterbury, who proposed and consecrated his monk Eadmer Bishop of St. Andrew's. This was a heavy blow on the Celtic Church. The introduction of the Norman-Roman forms and of Roman monastic orders rapidly followed, under Alexander, and especially under his successor, David I. (1124-53). The Culdees were gradually, in various ways, suppressed. Although they were still tolerated by the side of the Roman clergy, in the vain hope of Romanizing them, in 1308 their last retreat at Brechin was subjected to the see of St. Andrews. Thenceforth they were persecuted as heretics.

The Celts had a simple Bible Christianity. Their great work was the study of the Scriptures; in which they employed the more important commentaries of the fathers, and especially the older Latin translations, though with constant reference to the Greek text, and with the practical object of bringing their life into harmony with the sacred precepts; and Bede, the zealous opponent of the Celtic Church, can present to his contemporaries no higher example of Christian temperance, humility, self-denial, and unwearied missionary zeal than that of the Scottish monks. This deeply Christian spirit explains their predilection for monastic life, missionary labors, and pilgrimages. Their monastic discipline was of the most self-denying kind in all respects. The abbots set their monks a good example, both in suffering and in acting; and the respect they enjoyed with the great may be seen in the lives of Columba, Aidan, Columban, and Adamnan.

Of course, certain cloisters held a pre-eminent rank; Bangor in Wales, Bangor in Ulster, Hii in Scotland. The latter institution certainly stood at the head of the whole Albanian Scottish Church. An abbot-presbyter, with a college of elders, presided over the whole Church, and consecrated its priests and Bishops. But this furnishes no precedent, as some have supposed, either for Episcopacy or Presbyterianism. The Celtic Church certainly had its different orders of clergy, but laid not so much stress as the Roman Church on the distinctions among them. Each church seems to have had a Bishop; and the Bishops, who were at the same time monks, were dependent on their cloister, most of them being secular clergy, and hence under no vow of celibacy. The marriage of priests continued in the Celtic Church to her end.

In worship, the British branch followed the Gallic Church in her liturgy, as in her Episcopal system; but neither the Irish Scottish nor the Albanian Scottish seems to have had a fixed liturgy. In baptism they used no consecrated oil, and hardly exorcism; and did not confine the administration of the ordinance to churches. It was administered only by priests, and to children as well as adults. Whether the holy Supper was given always under both kinds can hardly be determined; it was celebrated every Sunday at Hii. Marriage was not considered a sacrament. A bishop could be ordained by one. Of festivals, Christmas, Quadragesima, Easter, and Pentecost, and the anniversaries of the founding of cloisters were certainly observed. They reckoned Easter according to the eighty-four years' cycle, and fixed Easter Sunday between the 14th and 20th day of the moon.

In doctrine, the Celts cannot have deviated from the primitive Church; for Bede himself never reproaches them with heresy, but testifies to their agreement with his own Church in holding the redemption of man by the passion, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, the Mediator between God and man. In other points they differed from Rome. They are variously accused of Pelagianism, Universalism, peculiar views of predestination, &c. But from such scattered statements as we have, mostly by enemies, we can hardly form a true judgment. Certainly nothing appears among the Celtic Christians which does not somehow show itself in other portions of the ancient Church. They are distinguished from other branches of the early Church by having preserved the simplicity, moral earnestness, love for the Scriptures, and missionary zeal of the apostolic Church longer than the rest.

Sources: Bede; Usher's Works; Dalrymple's Collections; Columban's and Adamnan's Works; J. W. Braun: De Culdeis comm. 1840, the author regrets to say was not at his hand.

C. SCHÖLL. — E. D. Yeomans.

Cumani (Comani), a nation of the Asiatic steppes, whose hordes, as early as the 11th cent., laid waste Hungary and the adjacent countries. By their bold and skilful archery, and rapid movements upon their small horses, they filled Europe with terror. After being repulsed with heavy loss by King Salomon (1070), St. Ladislaus (1089) gained a decided victory over them, and gave them the choice between servitude and Christianity. Those who chose the latter had Jazigia assigned as their home. The rest resumed hostilities, which were decided by a single combat between Ladislaus and the Cumani chief, Akos, in which Akos fell. Under Andrew II., Robert, Archb. of Gran, labored for the conversion of the C., and a bishopric was founded for them. In 1238, they sent an embassy to Bela IV., reporting that they had been defeated by the Moguls, and asking for a home in Hungary. Bela consented, and dispatched a mission to convert them; 40,000 Cumani families moved to Hungary. The C. were still a half-barbarous people, and committed many acts of violence in their new abode. Bela sought to subdue them by mildness. This failing, it was determined to scatter them over several districts. As the C. opposed this plan, it was but partially carried out. They found a special friend in Ladislaus IV., the son of a Cumani woman, who appointed some of them to the first offices of his kingdom. Meanwhile, further efforts were made to convert them; Nicholas III. induced many Minorites to enter the thorny field. Philip, B. of Fermo, sent as papal Legate to Hungary, was wholly occupied with them. He finally persuaded Ladislaus IV. to enact laws (June, 1279), requiring all the C. to be baptized, receive the sacraments, cast away their idols, and all idolatrous customs, receive religious instruction, substitute fixed houses for tents, form into congregations, restore what they had stolen from churches and cloisters, liberate all Christian slaves, &c., &c. Two chiefs, Uzuc and Tolon, pledged compliance, only reserving some unimportant customs. An abode was assigned to them between the Danube and the Theiss, with the reservation of Church property. Ladislaus made oath that, if mild measures now failed, he would subject them to Christian laws by force. But the beauty of the Cumani women prevailed against his oath. Nicholas IV. then incited a crusade in Hungary against the C., but this also failed. Ladislaus himself was assassinated (July 9–10, 1290). The C. long continued to oppose Christian efforts to convert them. Even in the 14th cent., the Popes requested Hungarian Minorites to make new attempts. These did not succeed until their nationality was absorbed by the people among whom they dwelt. Their descendants still live in Cumania. (Cf. MAILATH, Gesch. d. Magyaren I.; DAMBERGER, synchron. Gesch. d. K. u. d. Welt in Mittelalter, XI.) TH. PRESSEL.*

Cummean, Cumean, Comean. According to ancient manuscripts, a native Irishman, author of a penitential work, which has of late been critically edited and printed in Wasserschleben's Sammlung der Bussordn. d. abendl. Kirche, p. 460–493. Some suppose him to have lived before, others to have been contemporary with, Theodore of Canterbury (68–690). Fragments of his work, largely scattered through later collections, under the title of judicia Cumeani, show that he lived before Bede and Egbert, at latest in the beginning of the 8th cent. Wasserschleben refers to a Bishop of this name, who went from Ireland to Italy, and ruled the monastery of Lobbio, in the name of King Liutprand. Here, at all events not in Ireland, the penitential book was composed. The work begins with a preface: Incipit de diversis criminibus. Diversitas culparum diversitatem facit penitenti-arum, etc., and contains fourteen chapters, the several propositions of which could be almost all traced by Wasserschleben to known sources. It circulated widely in the Frank empire and in Italy, and has been frequently employed since, both in the compilation of penitential books, and in the pre-Gratian collections of canons.

MERKEL. — E. D. Yeomans.

Cunibert, Bishop of Cologne in the 7th century; born in the province of Mosel, of noble parentage (Krallo and Regina); educated in Treves; consecrated Bishop of Cologne (as is supposed) Sept. 25, 623; died about 663. One of the earliest instances of the sons of the German nobility devoting themselves to the service of the Church, that, adding the higher spiritual dignity to the secular, they might secure the greater scope of political efficiency. The desired opportunity for this offered itself to Cunibert in 630, at the court of the Merovingian Dagobert I., and in 633, at the court of his minor son, the Austrasian King, Sigebert III., where, with Pepin, he conducted an energetic administration, though one which impaired the kingly power itself. In 656, he retired into his bishopric, but, in 658, assumed the direction of Childeric II. He was subsequently canonized, and the 12th of November celebrated as his day. (See Binterim, Erzdio. Cöln, I. p. 60. Retberg, K.-G. Deutschl., I. p. 296, 302, 535, 543.)

WAGENMANN. — E. D. Yeomans.

Canigunda, St., daughter of Sigfried, first Count of Luxemburg, and wife of Duke Henry of Bavaria, with whom she was crowned (1014) as Queen of the Germans, by Benedict VIII. She had, before marriage, made a vow of perpetual virginity, with Henry's consent, who formed a corresponding resolution. Having been subsequently suspected of infidelity by her husband, she proved her innocence by walking unharmed over glowing ploughshares. She certainly never had children. Henry died in 1024. C. retired to a convent, took the veil, and spent the rest of her life in acts of devotion. She died March 3, 1040. Innocent canonized her in 1200. Her anniversary is March 3. (See Butler's Lives of the Fathers, III. 344–48.) — Another C., canonized 1690 (anniv. July 24) was the daughter of Bela IV., of Hungary. She died 1292.

TH. PRESSEL.*

Curatus, the incumbent of a beneficium curatum; i. e., an office involving the pastoral care of a given district (see Benefice). The term would apply, therefore, in its general sense, to all pastors; but it was originally appropriated, in the Roman Church, to the assistants and vicars of pastors, who were appointed to a perpetual curacy by the Bishops. In collegiate churches they were called curate-chaplains. The name does not occur in this strict sense till the 15th century; but the term beneficium curatum was in use a century before (c. 11, extrav. comm. de prae. 3, 2). From the earliest times, there was an officer representing the Bishop in the cathedrals (vicarius curatus; see Vicar); but when the old parishes were transferred to the cloisters and other foundations, or united with prebends, the curates soon became numerous and respectable. After the peace of Westphalia, the institutions with which the cures were connected were mostly abolished, though the cures, as independent benefices, remained as before.

MERKEL. — E. D. Yeomans.

Cureus, Joachim, (born in Freistadt, Silesia, 1532), was the author of the work on the Eucharist, which appeared in 1574; on account of which, the Elector Augustus, of Saxony, charging the authorship upon his counsellors and theologians, who held Melancthonian sentiments, caused them to be deposed and banished. This work was republished, at Marburg, in 1853–54.

HENKE. — E. D. Yeomans.

Cusanus, Nicholas Chryppfs (Krebs), best known as N. de Cusa or Cusanus, was born in Cues, in 1401. At the University of Padua the LL.D. was conferred upon him in 1424. But finding theology more congenial, he abandoned the practice of law, and became an ecclesiastic. In 1430 he was dean of St. Florin, Coblenz, then became provost at Minster-Maynfeld, and then Archdean, and protonator at Liege. As such he attended the Basel Assembly, and distinguished himself by vindicating the Eccl. Supremacy of General Councils. In his de Cathol. Concordantia (Opp. Bas. ed., II., 683, &c.), he contends that the Papal dignity is not bound to the Romish chair, but that only he is Peter's successor whom the regularly assembled representatives of the Church elect; that Constantine's grant is apocryphal; and that temporal princes are independent of the Popes in all matters not concerning faith. Subsequently he changed his views, and at the German diets of 1440–42, as the legate of Eugene IV., defended the claims of the Pope as zealously as he had before opposed them. (See Summa dictorum N. de Cusa, &c., in WÜRDTEIN, Subsid. diplom., IX., 1). Whatever caused this change, whilst it was long an apple of discord between Antiochus and Ptolemy. These strifes effected the downfall of the smaller princes, and Ptolemy became the sole ruler (Dion. XIX., 59, 79; XX., 21, 47). The island continued under the Egyptians until the Romans united it to their empire (STRABO XIV., 684, &c.). At the division of the Roman empire, C. fell to the Greek Emperor, and was placed under governors. At the time of the crusade of Richard, the Lion-hearted, Cyprus was under an Emperor Isaac, related to the house of Comnenus, who had usurped independent sovereignty, and whom Richard drove off, putting two governors in his place (WILKEN, Hist. of the Crusades, IV., 197-216). It subsequently became a separate kingdom, held by Guy Lusignan in fief for the English crown. In 1473 the Venetians got possession of it. From them it was taken by the Turks, 1571, who have since then held it. — The Kittim of Gen. 10:4, and Chittim of Is. 23:1, &c., are primarily the inhabitants of Citium, then of the whole island (see also 2 Macc. 4:29; 10:13; 12:2). Cyprians are named in Acts 4:36; 21:16. The first preachers of the gospel to the Greeks were Cyprians and Cyrenians (Acts 11:20). Paul and Barnabas visited Cyprus (13:4), then Barnabas and Mark (15:39). In the N. T. Salamis (Acts 13:5) and Paphos (13:6, 7, 13) are named as cities of Cyprus. — Upon ancient C., see MEURSI, op. posth. de antiq. rebusque insul. Rhodi, &c.: Amstel., 1675, 4to. CELLAR., Notit. orb. ant. II., 266, &c. MANNERT, Geogr. d. Griechen u. Römer VI., 1. p. 546, &c. Upon modern C.: POCOCKE; HASSEL, Erdbeschr. XIII., 170, &c.; BLANC, Manual, &c., 1849, III., 167, &c.). ARNOLD.*

Cyrene, the capital of upper Lybia, hence called L. Cyrenica (POMP., Mel. I., 4, 8; PLIN., V., 5; AMMIAN., XXII., 16). The city is mentioned 1 Macc. 15:23; Acts 11:20. Cyrenian Jews are named, Acts 2:10; 6:9. Lucius, a Cyrenian, is spoken of in Acts 13:1, and another, Simon, in Matt. 27:32, &c. ARNOLD.*

Cyril, of Alexandria, born in A. at the close of the 4th cent. After spending some time as monk in the Nitrian desert, he succeeded his uncle and instructor, Theophilus, to the patriarchate of Alexandria, 412, as the 24th (traditional) successor of the Evangelist Mark. He followed in the footsteps of his predecessors in ruthlessly persecuting all errorists, especially the Nestorians, (see Art.) He was also implicated in the murder of the philosophic-heatheeness Hypatia. For his arbitrary arrogance at the Council of Ephesus (431), he, and Memnon, B. of Ephesus, were deposed by an imperial decree: but he subsequently became reconciled with John. His most meritorious work is a vindication of Christianity against Julian, in 10 books. As a homilist he indulged freely in allegory and typology. His homilies were mostly written as festival programmes. Mariolatry is very prominent in them. His thoughts are often brilliant, but the style loose and otherwise defective. He died, 444. Among his doctrinal writings were those upon the Trinity, Incarnation, and the worship of God in Spirit and Truth (19 books), against the anthropomorphites. — (Sources: RENAUDOT, hist. Patriarch.

Alexandr. Jacobitar.: Par., 1713, 4to.; CAYE, Script. eccl. hist., I., 391-2; OUDIN, Comm. de Script. eccl., I., 1007; SCHRÖCKH, K.-Gesch., XVIII., 313, &c.; AUBERT's ed. of C.'s works: Par., 1638, 7 vols. fol.). HAGENBACH.*

Cyril, of Jerusalem. — It is not certain whether he was born (215) in Jerusalem. In 350 he became B. of Jer., after having been presbyter and catechete there. His κατηχησεις are not properly catechetical exercises, but 23 sermons, delivered in the Church of the Resurrection, probably during Lent, 348, partly to the unbaptized catechumens, partly to the neophytes. The last five sermons (υποταγῶναι κατηχησεις) treat of the mysteries of baptism, unction, and Holy Supper. Their genuineness has been doubted. But they possess archæological and liturgical, as well as homiletic value. Although inflated, diffuse, and illogical, they contain many practical thoughts, and are remarkably free from controversy, considering C.'s participation in the Arian (he was semi-Arian) strife. At the Synod of Seleucia, 359, he withstood Acacius, and aided in his deposeure. Thereupon the Acacians deposed C. at the Synod of Constantinople, 360. But after the death of Constantius, he regained his See. Under the Arian Valens he was once more expelled, 367. It is not known where he abode until Valens' death, 378. It is certain that he finally adopted the Nicene orthodoxy. In 381 he represented the orthodox party at Constantinople. † 386. — (Sources: SOCR. H. E.; SOZOM. H. E.; THEODORET, H. E.; TOUTTÉE, Diss. Cyrill. s., &c.; DU PIN, II., 134, &c.; TILLEMONT, Memoires VIII., 1358; SCHRÖCKH, K.-G. XII., 369, &c.; AUGUSTI, Donkw. IV.; ERSCH u. GRUBER, Encycl., XXII., 148. The best ed. of C.'s works: A. TOUTTÉE, Par., 1720, fol.; and Ven., 1763). HAGENBACH.*

Cyril and Methodius, Apostles of the Slavonians. The history of these men is still involved in darkness. The most current account of them is based upon the probably genuine letters of Pope John VIII., and the contemporaneous Translatio S. Clementis; although this account has been modified by Bohemian and Moravian influences. The complaints of the Salzburg and Passau clergy against the infringements upon their diocese, are the most reliable documents. But, according to these, and Pannonian, Bulgarian, and Russian legends, the chief labors of C. and M. were not in Moravia, but among the Southern Slavonians, along the Drave and Save, as far as Dalmatia on the S., and beyond the Raab and Danube, to the Carpathian mt. on the N. — The sources of their history, among which the Byzantine are missed, are collected in Scharfrik's Slav. Antiq., II., 471, &c., completed by Wattenbach's Beitr. z. Gesch. d. chr. K. in Mähren u. Böhmen. Wien, 1849; the Bollandists, acta Sanct. Mart., II., 14, &c.; Assemani, Kalend. eccl. universæ III.; Dobrowsky, C. u. M. d. Sl. Apost.: Prag., 1823; Mährische Legende v. C. u. M.: Prag., 1826; Blumberger, Wiener Jahrb., 1824, 1827; Palacky, böhm. Gesch., &c.; Philaret, C. u. M., &c. (deutsch), Mitau, 1847.

In the 6th, and especially the 8th cent., the Slavonians crossed the Danube and Mt. Balkan into Macedonia, Epirus, Thessalia, Hellas, and

Peloponnessus, and took almost exclusive possession of those countries. They were subdued and Christianized about the close of the 8th cent. The work spread from Thessalonica, where Greek culture received a new impulse by the introduction of Slavonian elements. C. and M. were born in Thessalonica, in the 2d or 3d decade of the 9th cent. C. early displayed extraordinary talents, and was taken to Constantinople, where his literary attainments attracted notice, won the favor of Photius, and secured success as a teacher of philosophy. Thenceforth he was surnamed the Philosopher. But his pious zeal soon became ascendant. He joined the clergy, and, with his brother M., renounced the highest political honors and withdrew into a secluded monastery. He also took part in doctrinal disputes. He contended with Photius about the unity or dualism of the soul, defended the use of images, and wrote apologies for Christianity, against the Mohammedans. The inroads of the latter led him to undertake his mission. The Jews and Mohammedans attempted to convert the Chazars, a Tartar tribe, inhabiting the country on the N. E. of the Black Sea to the lower Volga. The Chazars had some intercourse with the Byzantians, and from them had probably learned something of Christianity. Some private Christians may have sought to convert them; but they failed to win the confidence of the Chazars, and that very party which desired union with Greece, wished to obtain such advocates of the Greek Church as would be qualified to contend with Jews and Moslem. Hence they applied (960) to Michael III., who sent Constantine (Cyrill) to them. C. first went to Chersonesus, and prepared himself for the mission by learning the necessary languages. Whilst there he secured possession of the reputed relics of Clement of Rome, which he then, or at least on his return, took with him. He proceeded to the country of the Chazars, and under the protection of the prince, the Chagan, preached and disputed in favor of Christianity. Many were converted, but there is no trace of a Greek or native Church organization among the Chazars; and it is certain that most of the tribe became Moslem or Jews, many of the latter having, long afterwards, filled the office of Chagan. Constantine obtained the liberation of many captive Greeks, and returned with them and Clement's relics to Constantinople, and lived in retirement with his brother M., until another tribe applied for a missionary to the Emperor. Among the Slavonian Bulgarians and S. Slavonians, missionaries had long been laboring. They had gone from different places, and pursued their work in various ways. The Romish C. was also represented by emissaries of German Bishops, whose sees extended towards Corinthia, Carniola, and Pannonia. But those tribes felt disinclined towards the Byzantine and German national Churches, because they associated them with the idea of political subjection. They desired a native form of Christianity, and a native hierarchy, which should be subject to Constantinople or Rome only in cases of ultimate appeal. The Slavonians were most naturally directed to the Greek C., which was especially entrusted with the conversion of the Slavonian population of the empire, was, indeed, zealously engaged in this work, and seemed best suited for it. The Byzantine empire also excited less fear than the western Frankish states. The Greeks could often prosecute the mission as it was done among the Chazars, by free instruction of the people, and then leaving converts to organize in their own way. Constantine's (Cyrill's) method seems to have best pleased those tribes who were jealous of their independence. And on his return home, he again prepared himself to resume his work, and became the head of such as took interest in the true conversion of the Slavonians. There were many opportunities for learning the Slavonian language in the Greek empire. C. and M. may, in their youth, have met with a Græcised Slavonian family. C. studied the language, and sought to operate upon the Slavi by writings. For this purpose he used an alphabet, which was either a modified old one, or newly invented by him. He thus laid the basis of a Slavonian literature, by translating the Bible and the principal liturgical books. He was induced to commence his mission among the Slavi beyond the Greek empire, by an invitation of Radislav (the same, probably, whom the Germans called Rastices, the founder of a large Moravian empire). Radislav maintained his independence of the German rulers. He desired also to keep his Christianized tribes independent of the German national Church, especially those living within the sees of Passau and Salzburg. Hence he applied to Constantinople for such missionaries as had preached to the Chazars. Accordingly, C. and M. went forth. They hardly passed around the Bulgarians; but if they went through Bulgaria, they doubtless participated in their conversion, and laid the groundwork of their future influence upon that people. They reached Radislav's court about 863, which was probably S. W. of the present Moravia. They were honorably received, and began their labors by gathering a male circle of pupils around them, whom they hoped to train as native priests. They also preached, circulated their Slavonian version of the Scriptures, and commenced religious services in the native tongue. There soon sprang up a zealous Slavonian Church. The German priests, content with receiving tithes and reading the Latin liturgy, which they scarcely understood themselves, were soon deserted, and returned to their Bishops. Meanwhile, Rome and Constantinople strove with each other for ascendancy in Bulgaria, and we can easily conceive why Nicholas I., hearing of the success of C. and M. in Pannonia, should endeavor to prevent a departure there from the doctrine, liturgy, and order of the hierarchy. Hence he invited the brothers to Rome. They respected his claims, and adopted his and Radislav's idea, of re-establishing the old Pannonian see, to be independent of Constantinople and the German Bishops. They may also have cherished special reverence for Nicholas, who had displayed much love and wisdom in Bulgarian affairs. C., moreover, seems to have felt an enthusiastic regard for Rome. He and M. were about four years with Radislav and other Pannonian princes. In 868 they went, accompanied by many pupils, to Italy. They attracted great attention. In Rome, Hadrian II. had succeeded Nicholas († Nov. 13, 867). He received the apostles of the Slavi with marks of honor, and took measures to organize the new Church province. C. and M. were to be the Bishops, and their pupils the priests. But C.'s strength was failing, and he desired to spend his last days in Rome. It was here that, as monk, he adopted the name Cyrill, by which he is commonly known. He died Feb. 14, 869.

Methodius now gave verbal and written pledges of fidelity to the doctrines and regulations of Rome, was made Archb. of the Pannonian diocese, and returned to his field. The restoration of this diocese necessarily affected the metropolitans of Passau and Salzburg. Hence, in 871, a memorial appeared, setting forth the claims of Salzburg, and asking for their protection. But King Ludwig and Duke Swatopluk (Radislav's successor) paid no heed to the appeal, and at Rome the pretensions of Salzburg were disowned. But the complaints against M. as Archb. made an impression on Pope John VIII., who was averse to all the Greek and Slavonian peculiarities of the new province, and resolved to abrogate them. Accordingly, he directed Paul of Ancona to require M. to drop the Slavonian mass. M. refused, and thus gave his enemies advantage over him at Rome. Swatopluk, who was favorable to the Germans, became his accuser. John summoned M. to Rome. M. forthwith complied, fully acquitted himself, and convinced John that, if the Slavonian Church should be kept from falling over to the Patriarch of Constantinople, it must be left untouched. Moreover, Rome's simultaneous attempts to regain Bulgaria would have been frustrated by offending the Pannonian Slavi. John likewise saw that, in this case, his own interests differed from those of the German Church. Thus M. prevailed. Swatopluk was informed by a papal letter that M. was found in harmony with the doctrines, &c., of the Rom. C. and general councils. It was only required that the Gospel should first be read in Latin, then in Slavonian, and that, if the Duke and his court desired it, the mass should be said in Latin. M.'s archiepiscopal powers were confirmed, and even extended. With this letter, M. left Rome in 880, accompanied by Wichin, a German, who had been consecrated as his suffragan. Wichin, soon after their return, joined the enemies of M. and of the Slavonian Church. He misled Swatopluk by forged papal letters. S. applied to John VIII. for counsel, who replied that he had not written to Wichin, and promised to have the matter duly attended to. John VIII. died in Dec. 882, and thus M.'s main prop was broken. Wichin openly opposed M., and Swatopluk let himself be drawn into the same course. M. was compelled to excommunicate and banish them and their adherents. A letter, ascribed to Stephen VI., of about 890, upon these distractions, was evidently a forgery of Wichin, or the German party. The documents which report M.'s doings in Olmütz and Brünn are also doubtful. Probably M.'s diocese did not extend to the present Moravia, and he may never have visited it. So of some other traditions. The date of his death is differently given. We follow the Pannonian legend, which fixes it on April 16, 885. He was buried in the cathedral of his episcopal residence—the place unknown. He appointed Gorasd, a Slavonian, his successor. But the Germans were resolved to exterminate the hated Slavonian Church. Gorasd had to yield to Wichin. All the Slavonian priests were persecuted and driven off. They found a refuge among the Bulgarians, taking their Bible and liturgy with them. The Russians obtained these treasures from the Bulgarians. The two brothers are held in grateful veneration for their labors, especially by the Russians. And, after many Popes had pronounced them heretics, and the Slavonian Churches in Hungary had been laid waste by the Magyars, to the joy of the Romans and Germans, even the Romish C. acknowledges them as saints. A. VOGEL.*

Cyrus, שִׁירָא, Kūros, on coins Qurus (= the sun, according to Ctes., 49; PLUT., Artax. c. 1. Compare the modern Persian Khur, Khurshid. LASSEN questions the preceding derivation. That from κύριος [Ælian, Hesychius, &c.] is certainly wrong), is the name of the man who has generally been considered¹ the founder of the Persian monarchy, and the deliverer of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity.—For our knowledge of Cyrus we are indebted mainly to Herod., Ctesias, Xenophon, to some notices in Strabo, Diod. Sic., Plut., Alex. Polyhist., Cl. Ptolem., Thallus, Castor, Polybius, Joseph., the Iranian book of Heroes, Shah-Nameh of Firdusia, and the references to him in the O. T. canon, and apocr. books. The accounts of Herod., Xen., and Ctesias materially vary. Which shall we credit? The story of Astyages' dream, reported by Herod., is well known. Ctesias says nothing of Cyrus being related to Astyages, but forthwith tells of his attack upon Media, his dethronement of Astyages, his marriage with Amytis, A.'s daughter, and his appointment of A. as governor of the Barcanians. Xenophon, finally, says nothing of contentions between Cyrus and Astyages, but describes A. as the maternal grandfather of Cyrus, relates that C. resided from his twelfth year at the Median court, in his sixteenth led out an army against the Assyrians, &c., and having conquered Croesus and the Babylonians, received the daughter of Cyaxares in marriage, and thus acquired the right of succession to the Median throne, which he ascended after Cyaxares' death, 536, B. C.

Of far greater value than these conflicting accounts, and the brief hints found in other authors above named are the following chronological dates. According to Diod. Sic., Thallus, Castor, and Polybius (cf. EUSEB. præp. evang. X., 10, p. 488), began to reign in the 1st year of the 55th Olymp., i. e., 4154 or 4155 per. Jul., or 559 B. C. This is corroborated by an eclipse of the moon, which, according to Ptol., occurred in the 7th year of Cambyses, and is fixed by all astronomers and chronologists, in 4191 per. Jul., or 523, B. C.; so that Cambyses began to reign 529, B. C., 30 years after his father ascended the throne. The time of Nabopolassar (= Labynetus I., of Herod., and father of Nebuchadn. or Labyn. II.) is also fixed by an eclipse of the moon, about 66 years earlier, the eclipse having occurred in N.'s 5th year, and being assigned by most astronomers to 4093, per. Jul., or 621, B. C. The calculation of the Canon Ptolem., according to the improved ed. which Calvisius and Bengel used, gives the following dates:

¹ Since 1845 this has been disputed by three men: 1) Duke George, of Manchester, in his learned work, The Times of Daniel; 2) Prof. Ebrard, in the Heidelb. Stud. u. Krit., 1847; and 3) Wetake, in his less weighty book, "Cyrus d. Gründer d. pers. Reichs war nicht d. Befreier d. Juden," &c. 1849. Their aim and hope has been to effect a reconciliation of the discrepancies between the chronology of the Bible and that of profane history. But whilst failing in this, they involve both systems in greater confusion. Their arguments have been answered in the Theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1853, 3d Heft.

	B. C.
Nabopolassar reigned.....	625 — 604
Nabocolasser (= Nebuchadn.)....	604 — 561
Ilvarodame (= Evilmerodach)....	561 — 559
Niricassolasser.....	559 — 555
Noboned (= Belshassar).....	555 — 538
Cyrus.....	538 — 529
Cambyses.....	529 — 521
Darius I.....	521 — 486
Xerxes.....	486 — 465
Artaxerxes.....	465 — 424
Darius II.....	424 — 405

But what does the O. T. tell us of Cyrus? There seem to be both chronological and personal discrepancies between its statements and profane accounts. As to the former, it is probable they can never be reconciled. But what of this? That the O. T. Cyrus was the great Persian King, and that this king was no Chaldean, is too plain from the O. T. to allow of our being disturbed by those trivial difficulties. The O. T. books describe Cyrus: 1) as a Persian, Dan. 6 : 28, and God's rod against the Chaldeans and Babylonians, Is. 48 : 14;—2) as the King of Persia, 2 Chron. 36 : 22; Ezra 1 : 1, &c.; Dan. 10 : 1, 3;—3) as a general of Darius, Dan. 5 : 31, whom he succeeds to the throne;—4) as king of Media and Babylon (not Bab. and Media)

Ezra 5 : 13, 17; 6 : 2, 3;—5) as a conqueror, and the founder of a universal monarchy, Is. 45 : 1–3, 14;—6) as the fourth monarch before Xerxes, Dan. 11 : 2;—7) as overthrowing the Bab. dynasty and Chald. idolatry, Is. 46 : 1; 48 : 14; Dan. 2 : 39; 8 : 3, 4, 20;—8) as having become a worshipper of the true God, 2 Chron. 36 : 23; Ezra 1 : 2;—9) as the liberator of the Jews, &c., Is. 44 : 28; 45 : 13; 2 Chron. 36 : 23; Ezra 5 : 13; 6 : 3, &c.;—10) as God's shepherd and anointed, Is. 44 : 28; 45 : 1, whose spirit the Lord stirred up, 2 Chron. 36 : 22, 23, &c.—From the Scriptures we also learn that Cyrus received his favorable religious impressions: 1) from Daniel's part in the fall of the Babylonian kingdom (Dan. 5 : 28, 30). It was no wonder that the man who fulfilled such prophecies should cherish regard for the prophet; 2) from Daniel's position and heroic piety at the court of Darius (Dan. 6); 3) from the contrast presented to him between the vanity of idolatry and the excellence of Daniel's faith (Bel and the Dragon. v. 17). See also Jos. Ant., 11, 1, 2.

That the profane accounts of Cyrus fall short of the delineation of Isaiah and Daniel, cannot surprise us if we remember: 1) that those moments in the life of a great man in which his noblest qualities are exhibited, are most rarely known to his cotemporaries and posterity; 2) that the most exalted men are often prevented from communicating their best gifts to their fellowmen, by the popular incapacity for them, or unwillingness to receive them; 3) that Greek historians would not appreciate the new religious impressions made on C.'s mind; 4) that a universal conqueror like C., who sought (cf. Xen. VIII., 1, 23) to unite his monarchy by a religious bond, and combine all the religious influences of his kingdom in the order of the Magi, and thus reconcile the contradictions of the frontier Asiatic cultus in the native worship of fire as the material embodiment of light, would also find the religion of Jehovah, as he learned it from Daniel, essential to his plans.

PRESSER.*

D.

Daeh, Simon, an exceedingly fertile poet of the 17th cent., was born at Memel, July 29, 1605, a year earlier than Paul Gerhardt. He belonged to the renowned Königsberg school of poets, and constituted its brightest ornament. His contributions to religious poetry, and hymnology are full of pathos, and excited general admiration, and entitle him to rank with his cotemporary, the devout and genial Gerhart. No complete ed. of his poems has ever appeared. A chief source for his hymns (and those of his associated friends) may be found in HEINR. ALBERT'S "Arien," &c.: Königsb., 1638–50, fol. 8 Thle. (See Pischon, Denkm. III., 161. HENNEBERGER'S Jahrb. für deutsche Literaturgesch. Meiningen., 1854).

Cosack.*

D'Achery, Lucas, contributed largely to the literary fame of the congregation of the Maurinites, and personifies its twofold character of ardent monastic piety, and persevering literary labors. He spent nearly his whole life in monastic retirement. He was b. in 1609, in St Quentin, Picardy, early joined the Benedictines, and on Oct. 24, 1632, took vows in the abbey of the Holy Trinity, Vendome, which belonged to the congregation of St. Maurus. He soon displayed extraordinary zeal in his devotions and literary studies. His superiors called him to the central cloister of the congregation, St. Germain des Pres, in Paris, and made him principal of the library. He arranged catalogues and enlarged it. He acquired a great knowledge of books, and of the entire literature of theology and history. His attention, however, was chiefly given to the collection, printing, and publishing of rare and hidden MSS., and he soon gathered the treasures of most of the Benedictine abbeys of France and adjacent countries. He cheerfully loaned his MSS. to others, and maintained an extensive correspondence with other scholars. But for 45 years he scarcely ever left his cloister. He superintended the publ. of Hugo Menard's first ed. of the Ep. of Barnabas (Paris, 1645, 4to). He next publ. the collected works of Laffranc of Canterbury, adding some sketches of saints and other tracts (Par. 1648, fol.). Then he issued a list of old ascetic writings (Par. 1648, 4to.); the first ed. of all the works of Abbot Guibert of Nogent, &c. (Par. 1651, fol.); a rule for Anchorets, by Grimlaicus, a priest of the 9th cent. (Par. 1653). The rapid accumulation of MSS. compelled him to publ. his Veterum aliquot scriptorum, qui in Galliae Bibliothecis, maxime Benedictorum, supersunt, Spicilegium, 13 vol. 4to., Par. 1655-1677, of which De la Barre publ. a new ed., with the addition of many MSS. subsequently discovered by Baluze and Martene, Par. 1724, 3 vols. fol. Finally, he contributed the material of the Acta Sanct. ord. S. Benedicti, which Mabillon published in his own name. He died, after a protracted illness, April 29, 1685. (See Du Pin's Bibl. d. auteurs eccl., XVIII. 1445; Nicéron's Nachrichten, &c., publ. by Rambach, XVI. 73-79.) A. VOGEL.*

Dagon, a god of the Philistines (Judges 16 : 23, &c.; 1 Sam. 5 : 1, &c.; cf. 1 Macc. 10 : 83). Gaza and Ashdod are mentioned as places where he was worshipped, and where he had temples, priests, feasts, and images, until the times of the Maccabees. Jerome, on Is. 46 : 1, names those and other cities of Philistia, as seats of the Dagon cultus. From the passages above quoted, we gather that he was a chief god of the Philistines, that their princes participated in his feasts, and worshipped him. To him they ascribed their national prosperity. And the existence of places with his name, Beth Dagon (Joshua, 15 : 41; 19 : 27), and Caphar Dagon, mentioned by Eusebius, shows how widely his worship was anciently extended. According to Philo of Biblos, p. 26, Dagon belonged to the gods of the first rank in the land.

According to the physical idea which lies at the basis of this divinity, Dagon, like Atergatis (see Art.), was a fish-god. The simplest and only correct etymology of his name proves this. The etymology of Philo and the Lex. græc. nom. hebr. in Jerome, Tom. II. 202, $\bar{\text{ד}}\bar{\text{ג}}\bar{\text{ו}}\bar{\text{ן}}$ = barley, is erroneous. It is, indeed, approved by Beier in Selden, 289, Orelli in Philo, and Movers in Ersch, Phönix. 405, b., who compare Dagon with Ζεύς ἀρότριος or ἀρούραιος , the superintendent of agriculture. But it appears from 1 Sam. 5 : 4, that Dagon, like Atergatis, was represented with the tail of a fish and the bust and hands of a man. If, in this passage, $\bar{\text{ד}}\bar{\text{ג}}\bar{\text{ו}}\bar{\text{ן}}$ is in apposition to the head and hands, it must designate the fish-body of the idol, as even Kimchi saw, who translates: tantummodo forma piscis relicta est in eo. Kimchi immediately refers to an ancient tradition: Ajunt, Dagoni infra ab umbilico suo fuisse formam piscis, propterea vocatur Dagon, et supra ab umbilico suo formam hominis, quemadmodum dicitur etc. (cf. Beier, 299). Abarbanel, also, says: Dixerunt sapientes, Dagonem habuisse formam piscis ab umbilico qua superiora, et qua manus et pedes humanum. But Dagon must not be identified with Atergatis. The former is a male, the latter a female deity (cf. 1 Sam. 5 : 3, 4, both the Hebrew and the LXX.). He is spoken of as male in a myth in Philo, 28, which assigns a wife to him. And the son of Atergatis, Ichthus (= a fish), can have been none other than Dagon (see ATHENÆUS, VIII., 346). It is true that fish-deities, like doves, are the usual symbols of female fecundity. But the fish is also a symbol of water, and hence of all those vivifying powers of nature which, in warm climates, are chiefly brought into operation by means of water. And the gods which pour these fructifying streams upon the thirsty earth, are usually regarded as males, like the cloud-gathering, rain-causing Zeus. How such gods came to be styled fish-deities, is explained in the Art. Atergatis. And this expansion of the signification of the fish-symbol explains how such a god as Dagon might also be regarded as a god of agriculture. (See SELDEN, de Diis Syris, II. 3; WINER's Lexicon.) J. G. MÜLLER.*

Daillé, John, one of the most learned Reformed theologians of the 17th cent. was b. in 1594, at Chatellerant. From 1612, for seven years, he enjoyed the company of Du Plessis-Mornay, in Saumur, as teacher of his nephew. In this capacity he travelled through Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and England. After two years' absence from his native country he returned, resumed his studies, and, in 1623, was ordained. For a while he labored as preacher at the castle of Mornay, arranged the memoirs which the latter left behind, and, in 1625, was appointed preacher in Saumur. But in 1626, already, he was called to the congregation in Paris, where he labored with great distinction, as a preacher and an author, until his death, in 1670. His work, De usu patrum in decidendis controversiis, Genev. 1656, is especially prized. It appeared in French as early as 1631, entitled De l'employ des pères, &c. An English translation of this (attributed to Thos. Smith, M. A. of Christ's College, Cambridge) was issued in 1651. A revised American ed. of this has been publ. by the Presb. Board of Publ., Philad. 1842. Daillé dates the corruption of the Christian Church from the 4th cent. — He occupied the post of president of the last national French Reformed Synod, at Loudun, 1659. As such, he labored to quell the excitement raised against Amyrant (see Art.), and vindicated him against the charge of Universalism, in an Apolo-gie des Synodes d'Alençon et de Charenton, the mildness of which towards the condemned doctrine was especially disapproved in Holland. The sermons of D. have been issued in several volumes. — His only son, Horace, died as a religious refugee in Heidegger's house, Zurich. (See BAYLE, Art. Daillé.) HERZOG.*

Damascus is one of the most ancient and important cities of Syria. In the O. T., the name is given in three different forms (see 1 Chron. 18 : 5, 6; 2 K. 16 : 10, &c.); in the N. T., simply

Δαμασκός. The Syrians call it Darmsûk; the Arabs Dimasckk or es-Scham (the name of the country). The etymology of the word is obscure. To say nothing of earlier derivations (comp. STEPH. Byzant. ed. Westermann, p. 97; MICHAEL. Suppl. ad Lex. Hebr. II. 455, sq.), among modern scholars, Simonis derives it from

דָּמָא and דָּמָא = to be red, in reference to the color of the earth around D. Gesenius traces it to its Arabic name = properavit, strenuus fuit, referring to its commercial activity (Thesaur., 346); although Arab etymologists refer the signification of the name to the rapid building up of the city (see SHULTEN's Jud. geogr.; LEX. GEOGR., ed. Juynboll, I., 409). Hitzig (see Ztschr. d. deutsch. morgenl. Gesellsch., VIII., 219, &c.), even traces the name to the Sanscrit tām-āksha = red-eyed, with reference to the god Dionysus, whom he identifies with King Damascus, the founder (JUSTIN. XXXVI., 2) of the city. The antiquity of the city may be inferred from Gen. 14:15; 15:2. From Gen. 15:2 some concluded that it was built by Abraham or Eliezer (D'HERBELOT, Bibl. Orient.). We find the first reliable notices of the city in 2 Sam. 8:5, 6; 1 Chron. 18:5, 6; 2 Sam. 10:6, &c.; 1 Kings 11:23, &c.; 15:18, 19; 2 Chron. 16:2-7; 1 Kings 20:1-34; 22:1, &c., in connection with accounts of hostilities between the Kings of Judah, and Israel, and those of Damascus (see Aram, David, Ahab, Ahaz, Hazael, Rezin). — After the battle of Issus, Damascus fell into the hands of Alexander M. (ARRIAN. II., 15; CURT. III., 12, 13), and then was attached to Seleuc.-Syrian empire (see 1 Macc. 11:62; 12:32. Cf. ERSCH & GRUBER, Encycl. Th., 22, Abth. 2, p. 114). Pompey reduced Syria to a Roman province (B.C. 64). Herod the Great erected baths and theatres in D. (Jos. B. J., I., 21, 12). Paul was converted on his way to D. (Acts 9), and subsequently its governor (see Aretas) sought to apprehend him (2 Cor. 11:32). After its conquest by Alexander numerous Jews settled there, and had several synagogues (Jos. B. J., I., 2, 25; II., 20, 2; Acts 9:2); many early embraced the gospel (comp. Acts 8:1; 11:19). Subsequently D. became the seat of a Christian Bishop (ASSEMANI, Bibl. Orient., II., &c.). The city was taken from the Christians by the Moslem under the Caliph Omar (ABULFED. Annal. I., 222; ELMACIN., 21); they still hold it. At first it belonged to the Caliphate, but it was rent from that by Achmed ben Tulun, 877. Subsequently it stood successively under the Ikshidite, Fatimide, and Seljuk dynasties, until Hulaku put an end to the rule of the Seljuks, 1260. In 1516 Selim I. took the city from the Mamelukes, and incorporated it with the Turkish empire (see HAMMER, Gesch. d. Osman. Reichs, II., 481, &c.). — Damascus lies on the eastern base of Antilibanus, in a well-watered (2 Kings 5:12) fertile plain, the beauty of which led Orientals to call it one of the four terrestrial paradises. Of the streams which water it from the adjacent mountain, the Barada, has been identified with the Abana, and the El-Fidsche with the Pharpar of 2 Kings 5:12. But the El-Fidsche is rather a strong and beautiful fountain, which, after a short course flows into the Barada (see KITTO, Journal VIII., July, 1853; BIBLIOTH. SACRA, 1848, p. 763). According to Robinson and Thompson (Bibl. Sacra, 1849, 366-71) and Porter (KITTO, l. c.), it seems clear that the Pharpar is the present A'wadsch, which rises in Mt. Dschebel Heisch (Hermon), flows south of Damascus, and, without touching the city, is the principal stream in its vicinity. It enters the Barada near the sea. The Barada (called Chrysorrhoas, by STRABO, XVI., 520; PLIN. V., 18(16); PTOL. V., 15; but by STEPHAN., Byz., and Δαμασκός, Βαρδίνης) rises in the elevated plains of Zebedâni, in Antilibanus, is swollen by many tributaries, and enters the plain of Damascus near the village of Dummar. From this point it supplies a number of canals dug for the irrigation of the plain, and which render it exceedingly luxuriant in vegetation, but also generate fevers. It empties into a small lake, the Boheiret el-Merdach, about 15 miles E. of Damascus.—The city itself is one of the most regular and cleanly of Oriental capitals, and contains about 109,000 inhabitants, viz. 75,000 Mohammedans and Druses, 14,000 Christians, 5000 Jews, and 15,000 foreigners, &c. The houses are externally mean, but magnificent within. The streets are narrow and long (one running from N. E. to S. W. is thought that named in Acts 9:11). Among its public buildings the splendid mosque of Caliph Walid ben 'Abd el-Malik (formerly a church dedicated to John the Baptist) is most prominent (see HAMMER, l. c., 484). The castle in the western part of the city is said, by Richter, to have been built during the crusades. Damascus, also, has its sacred localities. About 1½ miles E. of the city the place is shown where Paul was converted. In the city the houses of Judas and Simon (Acts 9:11, 17, &c.), and the window from which Paul escaped (2 Cor. 11:33) are pointed out. The reputed house of Naaman has been converted into a hospital for lepers. (Sources: ABULFEDA, geogr. ed. Reinaud, p. 252; The Travels of EBN JUBAIR ed. Wright, 262-301; Ztschr. d. Deutsch. Miss. Gesellsch. VIII., 346; VITRINGA, Comm. in Jes. I., 652-4; Pococke, II., 171; TROILO, Orient. Reisebeschr., 575, &c.; RICHTER, Wallfahrt. im Morgenl., 138; ROSEN-MÜLLER, Bibl. Alterth., I., 2, p. 284; ERSCH u. GRUBER, l. c.)

ARNOLD.*

Damasus, Popes. I.—Born 306, probably in Rome, was Archdeacon of the Church in Rome from 355-366, and then became B. of Rome. The opposition between himself and the Deacon Ursicinus, though decided in favor of D. by Valentinian I., gave rise to sanguinary strifes, and to a protracted schism, which extended to other provinces. To keep the schismatic clergy from falling a prey to the temporal rulers, who were still mostly heathen, and often subjected those clergy to the torture, Gratian decreed (378) that the Roman Bishop should have full jurisdiction over those clergy of the hostile party who had not been expelled from Rome, and guaranteed to him, at the request of a Roman Synod of the same year, the necessary support of the temporal authorities.—Damasus contended against Arianism, and held a Synod in Rome, 368, which condemned the two Illyrian Bishops, Ursacius and Valens; and another in 370 which condemned Auxentius, of Milan. He likewise endeavoured to settle the Antiochian schism, and attended the Council of Constant. 381. He was intimate with Jerome, who, at D.'s suggestion, undertook to revise the Latin version of the Bible. After his death he was canonized. His anniv. is Dec. 11. His writings (especially letters and poems) have been thrice publ. by Ubal dini, Rome, 1638; Merenda, Rome, 1754; Paris, 1840.—II. Bishop of Brizen. Elected Pope in 1048 through the influence of Henry III., but died in 23 days after his elevation. The suspicion that he was poisoned has but a slight basis. Herzog.*

Damianus, St., named commonly with his brother, St. Cosmas. These two Sicilian physicians who, in the time of the Diocletian persecution, maintained privately their loyalty to their faith, were ordered by the procurator Lysias to sacrifice publicly to the gods; refused, were tortured and beheaded (303), and therefore canonized. Their bodies are said to have been conveyed to Rome, where a church was built to their honor, and the 27th of September devoted to their memory, on which day Luke 6: 18-23 is read, because they were physicians, and have been, throughout the middle ages, the acknowledged patrons of physicians and apothecaries; and their pictures are to be known by the apparatus of medicine and chemistry in the background. The eleventh century, in its Jerusalem zeal, even created a Cosmas-Damianus order of knighthood, the members of which were sworn to protect, succor, and heal pilgrims on their road. But the order soon sunk under the unfavorable conditions of the times.

2. Damianus, a Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria († 601), who explained the doctrine of the Trinity much as Sabellius had done. The Godhead (θεοτης) of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost was an essential quality (ουπαρξεις), distributed between them so, that together, not each for himself (καθ' αυτον), they were God, and their union constituted the divine μιαν ουσιαν και φυν. His disciples were called Damianites, and also Angelites, from their meeting place in Alexandria, the Angelium; and by scoffers Tetradites, because, worse than the Theites, they had four Gods, Father, Son, Holy Ghost, and that higher, absolute φους. (ALT.)

3. Damianus, or Damiani, Peter, born at Ravenna, 1007, of poor parents with a large family, who gave the newcomer so poor a welcome, that the wife of a neighboring priest had to plead with his mother to save him from cold and starvation, and thereby preserved the life of one who lived afterwards to abolish the very name of "a priest's wife." His parents soon after dying, Peter fell to the care of a poor married brother, who sent him, half naked and half starved, to feed swine. At a still later time, another and older brother, named Damianus, took the boy; and being himself a clergyman, and rapidly lifting himself in his profession, seems to have inspired the whole family, and especially to have rescued Peter from his miserable condition, and put him upon the high-road to become the prop and pride of them all. Peter, in gratitude, took his brother's name, as Eusebius did his friend's, Eusebius Pamphili. He studied in Ravenna, Faenza, and Parma, soon returned to his native place to teach, and won honors and wealth. But, at the age of 30, he unexpectedly left all, and became a hermit. This was no sudden inward change, however, in his life. His rude and passionate soul had early accustomed itself to submission to a foreign will, and insight not his own, and to the joys of humility and self-subjection. From a brutal world and a brutalized clergy, he turned his wondering gaze upon those heroes of extreme renunciation and self-torture, who, since the close of the tenth century, had edified people and princes in Italy. Taking example especially from his fellow-countryman, Romuald, the disinterment and glorification of whose body had determined him to a holy life, he began his self-inflictions. To master his lustful instincts, he would leave his bed at night, stand in the neighboring river until stiff with cold, then run around a church or other sacred place, repeating multitudes of psalms, until the first hour for prayer in the morning. Clad in haircloth, and denying himself all kinds of necessities, he daily housed and fed the poor and sick much better than himself.

But longing to bring some great offering, he cast behind him honor and earthly happiness for ever, and betook himself to the society of the hermits of Fonte Avellana, near Gubbio, with whom he had before some acquaintance, a society established about A. D. 1000, by Ludolf, one of Romuald's friends. Here he soon so distinguished himself as to become, first, Prior, then Abbot, and teacher and master of discipline besides to all the other cells and cloisters in the neighbourhood. A fiery zeal for penance then ruled among the hermits; they plagued themselves with innumerable prayers, ceaseless fastings, and other self-imposed deprivations, punishments and tortures, considered as wholesome means of discipline, as well as justifying and meritorious works. Error was systematized into madness; religion shrunk within the circle of the psalter and scourge; naked monks lashed their own shoulders, before the assembled convent, with rods and leather thongs to the music of the psalms, a hundred blows to a psalm, or 15,000 blows to the entire psalter, an equivalent satisfaction for 5 years sins. This glowing folly a scholar of Damianus, one Dominicus (called Loricatus, because he added to all his torments a suit of iron armour on his naked body) carried to perfection, when, to gain time and multiply the blows, he preferred the inner and more rapid to the uttered and of course slower recitation, and succeeded thus in absolving 12 psalters in one day, lashing himself to death. A reaction followed which Damiani had to oppose with his pen, while he softened his followers' zeal with a general order that whipping should not be compulsory, nor exceed 40 psalms, or 4000 blows at once. Damiani enlarged and established the hermit congregation of Fonte Avellana (which, in 1570, after its complete decline into worldliness, was merged in the Camaldulensian congregation of St. Muran), and made his personal renown its glory. Men soon told marvels of his power, similar to those of Moses, and even those of Christ, and these soon raised him to an eminence in the Italian Church which made him head and leader of the new and strict monasticism, and, afterwards, of the whole of that energetic party which, inspired by extreme ascetic and subjective church ideas, demanded a thorough reformation of the clergy. Damiani, the admirer, became the successor of Romuald, before whom Pope and Emperor had bent, but excelling him by virtue of the fact that, not from the saddle of the war-horse, but from the professor's chair he had entered the cell, and, therefore, not only by speech and character alone, but with the pen, he could, as one of the cultivated men of his day, explain his heart to the world. But he wanted Romuald's simple natural greatness, and even that of some of his own disciples. The wide and various activity to which he felt himself called, or which he was compelled by others to exercise, limited his independent influence on the age. His first appearance was as Censor, in an epistle from the wilderness to Pope Gregory VI., requiring him to set aside unworthy, and especially Simonist bishops, naming him of Pesaro as one of the worst. When Henry III. entered Italy, Damiani's saintly fame was in its bloom, and the emperor used it to make popular his great schemes of reform, allying himself to the hermit as Otto III. had allied himself to the knight. The Synod of Sutri was, perhaps, one of his suggestions. Henry recommended him to the new Pope, Clement II., and bade him go to Rome and declare what should next be done. Damiani joyfully confided in Henry's powerful regulations for a permanent change in the order of things, and was well pleased to exert his influence to realize his own convictions, but knew too much to go to Rome in person. From the mysterious invisibility of his cell, therefore, he sent his warnings forth to Clement, to strike and spare not against criminal and obstinate bishops, some of whom he named. To Leo IX., in the same way, he sent his celebrated liber gomorrhianus, in which he describes the sodomies of the clergy, but into which, also, he had gathered with an all too credulous pen a thousand slanders, and described sins of the flesh with shameless carefulness. He denounces the lazy indifference of the upper orders, and declares all married and unchaste unmarried priests thrust from the Church, but in the end confesses that this unchastity had gone so far, and became so universal, that it was to be handled not too roughly, lest the whole Church fall into ruin; that all penitents were to be restored to their places to carry on the sacred duties of religion. Leo received from this literary popular saint his rare manuscript with extraordinary marks of pleasure and respect, decided in favour of its theory in regard to all the clergy who had fallen from chastity, but also formularized still more precisely Damiani's inconsistent conclusion. The Pope himself was vacillating between a more subjective and a more objective expression of the character and powers of the Church, the priestly office and the sacraments, and now he hesitated in his measures of reform. Clearer sighted and firmer was Hildebrand, his follower, but virtual master in Rome; a man who, when Gregory VI.'s designs to elevate and free the Church, had come to naught, had looked on from a distance and convinced himself of the existence of elements of power which a bold successor of St. Peter might summon, and marshal to victory against the dominating secular power without the Church, and the debased and world enslaved clergy within its walls. And one of the mightiest of these elements he had found to be the trans-Alpine old Benedictine monkery, which had won for itself, with the higher clergy, an independent and very respectable position in the form of the congregation of Cluny, feeling itself also called to take part in the ordering of the Church. In Italy the anchorites had split irreconcilably with the Benedictine Cœnobites, and this was Hildebrand's great obstacle; for he himself was a Benedictine, and looked forward to making Monte Cassino the vestibule of monasticism, the headquarters of the Papacy, the school of future Popes, after men had learned that Cluny in these respects was not indispensable. But Monte Cassino and the rest of the old foundations had been brought into disgrace by Romuald and the ascetics, and held themselves aloof from the popular furor. Yet any attempt at reformation must steady itself by this mighty reaction against the evil case of Church and world. Especially the spirit of the populace in the cities, dangerous alike to the hierarchy, the monarchy, and the aristocracy, must be put to service. The papal autocracy must, by means of the people, hold in check the political rulers and the combined spiritualities, and first, for this object, must organize a popular insurrection against the impure clergy, independent of Rome, and, therefore, favorable to the nobility; and so these hostile elements must be harmonized in an unconditional subjection to the Roman chair for a struggle for the freedom and purity of the Church. This plan Damiani furthered, without knowing it, and without devoting to it an orderly and steady activity. He had known Hildebrand under Gregory VI., and rejoined his ranks as a reformer under Leo IX. These greater men understood, laughed at, and watched over his weaknesses. He jestingly calls Hildebrand, in his letters, his flattering tyrant and Saint Satan. They also knew where his strength lay, and honored and used him with the boldest confidence. He negotiated with Monte Cassino, and fixed decisively upon Italian monkery his own chivalric asceticism, his extravagant credulity, and his inspiration for the limitless power of the Pope, which grew until, after the death of Henry III., we hear no more of an Imperial vocation to examine and reform the Church. In 1058 Stephen X., the first anti-imperial Pope, called Damiani to Rome, and, after a hot struggle, compelled him to become Bishop of Ostia and head of the College of Cardinals, to which he immediately addressed an earnest missive, and another to Desiderius, abbot of Monte Cassino. During the unworthy papacy of Benedict X., he kept up his saintly zeal by diligent preaching; but well weary of it by the time Nicholas II. ascended the throne, and opened the war of Hildebrand by sending Damiani, 1059, as legate to Milan, where a democratic opposition to the high nobility and clergy had allied itself with a puritanic opposition to an enslaved and depraved clergy. He seized the opportunity, by help of the enraged people, to subject the successors of St. Ambrose to the successors of St. Peter, and to form in all the bishoprics of Italy popular associations in the service of the Pope. Damiani was sent to Milan with Anselm, of Badagio, who had opposed the Archbishop on the people's part, and had been removed for that reason to the bishopric of Lucca; and he was daring enough to risk his whole mission by publicly seating his colleague on his right hand, and the Archbishop Guido on his left. This indignity to their independence roused a fearful uproar among the noble Milanese, but Damiani with the utmost confidence and decision, enunciated unheard-of dogmatism respecting the sole investiture of the Roman Bishop by Christ, and of all other Bishops by him; proclaimed it heresy to withhold the highest honor from Rome, or not to honor other churches as belonging to Rome. The Archbishop succumbed to this effrontery and pacified his clergy. The subjugation was complete, but the subjected in their turn wrenched the deadly weapons from the legate's hands, declared unreasonable the unsparing persecution of all the clergy for Simonists and Nikolaitans, as he had advised; and compelled him to solemnize his victory simply by compelling all, the Archbishop not excepted, to renounce simony, submit to churchly penance, and reinstate the learned and more moral of them in their offices. The radicals, the puritans, or "pataria," as they were called, had not, indeed, all their wishes granted, but were wonderfully emboldened by the humbling of the clergy and the strengthening of Rome. Damiani now informed Hildebrand of his success, laid down the Cardinal's robe, and, disgusted that his hot, unpractical zeal could not accomplish all at one blow, feeling out of his sphere in the regiment of the Church, debarred from the indulgence of his darling penances, and in danger of sliding down into a maelstrom of worldly sins, he fled back to his wooden bowl, his psalter, and his scourge. But he had become too great for his cell, and the voice of Hildebrand called him out again and again into the spiritual fight. The death of Nicholas, in 1061, made open a field for the two great, clearly marked, and sharply opposing parties. The friends of the absolute power of Rome were also the enemies of simony, worldly learning, licentious living, and the marriage of the clergy; therefore, the friends of a free and useful, scientific, and matrimonial life for the clergy in alliance with an upright municipal and national Christianity, found themselves ranged beneath the banners of the States and of the Empire. The Empire made its intention plain to propose no disciple of Hildebrand for the papal throne. Hildebrand resolved to elect a Pope himself; and only preferred Anselm, Bishop of Lucca, to the most prominent and popular man of the party, Damiani, because he felt that he would be a more docile, skilful and cunning instrument. Anselm became Alexander II. The Upper-Italian party made Cadalous, Bishop of Parma, Pope Honorius II. Damiani hesitated not a moment to accept an extraordinary mission to assist Alexander, and with marked success. We find him in Florence, rousing the pataria, led by the Camaldulensians, to cry "down with the Bishop," as a Simonist, and, after a long conflict, Peter the Fiery granted the Florentines what they wished. We find him at Monte Cassino, performing miracles, making stricter rules, and enriching the liturgy. As legate in France in behalf of monkery, he freed the abbey of St. Medard from its invader, and secured to Cluny its privileges against the Bishop of Macon. We see him received at Cluny with the highest honors, and charmed with the piety of that powerful and learned place. The Council of Mantua, in 1064, at which he was not present, declared for Alexander, in whose defence he had written several books. He was father confessor to the dowager empress Agnes, who retired, in 1062, to the Romish cloister of St. Petronella, and gave to her written advice when, in 1065, she was sent across the Alps to influence her son, Henry IV., who wished to divorce his newly married wife; and Archbishop Sigfried of Mayence was inclined to gratify him, if, in return, he would compel Henry of Thuringia to pay tithes; but the Pope decided, when it came before him, as all former Popes had done, for morality against licentiousness, and a stringent marriage law was, with honorable firmness, decreed to curb the boundless and changeable lust of the powerful. This was, moreover, good policy, since a contest for the upper hand between the King and the papacy was inevitable and close at hand; and it was just the time to show the people that Rome was the guardian of virtue and right, and the highest judge of good morals upon earth; nor could it have had a better representation in such an affair than the aged and honored Damiani, strong in virtue, and immovable in courage, before whom the father and the mother of the King had bowed themselves. In 1069 he again left his cloister for Frankford and Mayence, warned the Archbishop, and by threats and adjurations charged the King to maintain the marriage bonds. Henry was compelled to yield. It was the last great act of Damiani. At home, however, he wrote indefatigably to Pope and Cardinals, Bishops and monks, and to his intimates among the laity admonishing and instructing epistles. Even in poetry, he let his natural wit and humor flow. His best epigrams were on Hildebrand. He was not always quite friendly with Alexander, who had suppressed his Liber Gomorricus, fearing lest its shameless statements of the lewdness of the clergy might bring the sacred office into contempt in the eyes of the laity, and lead directly to the immorality which it lashed. But Damiani had an extremely high opinion of his book, and treated Alexander's crafty and covert measures with very little respect. Unpleasant words passed at last between them upon the Church of Gubbio, which seemed to be negligently governed, whereupon Damiani recounted his efforts and sufferings for the Pope and complained bitterly of his treatment, yet soon after forgot his grievances in a new service. The Archbishop of Ravenna was dead, and the bishopric must be subjected to Rome. Returning from this work successful, Damiani fell sick of a fever at Faenza, and died

Feb. 23, 1072, one year before the tragedies commenced, which he had done so much to bring upon the stage.

John, a monk, one of his scholars, wrote a life of Damiani, from fresh monkish and family traditions; but, with a narrow comprehension, pictures him only as the hero of the monastery (Acta SS. mens. Febr. 3, 406, sqq. Acta SS. ord. S. Ben. sec. VI. p. II, 245, 599, sqq.). The annals and chronicles of the 11th century, and especially Damiani's own numerous writings, furnish us a fuller and wider view. These were given first completely collated by Constantinus Cajetanus, of Monte Cassino, in 4 folio volumes, at Rome, 1606. Later editions appeared at Paris, 1610, 1642, 1663, and at Venice, 1743. Jacob Laderchi, of the Oratorians, treats at greatest length of Damiani in his book, Vita S. Petri Damiani S. R. E. Cardinalis Episcopi Ostiensis in VI. Libros distributa, T. T. III, Romæ, 1702, 4. Compare, also, Mabillon, in the Annals of the Benedictine order (T. IV. V.), and Schröckh in the Christian Church History (Th. 22, s. 523-545).

ALBRECHT VOGEL. — Lesley.

Dan was Jacob's first son by Rachel's maid, Bilhah (Gen. 30 : 3, &c. ; 35 : 25), and the progenitor of one of the most numerous tribes of Israel (Numb. 1 : 39 ; 26 : 41), only Judah and the double tribe of Joseph exceeding it. But the circumstance that in Numb. 26 : 42 (cf. Gen. 46 : 23) only a single branch of Dan is named, the Shuhamites, indicates a rapid decline of this tribe. During the exodus, Dan, with Asher and Naphtali, was located on the north side of the tabernacle (Numb. 2 : 25, &c.), and led up the rear (10 : 25); it was therefore associated with the cognate tribes of Joseph and Benjamin (LENGERKE, Kendân, I. 477, &c.). Accordingly, Dan should have occupied a corresponding locality in Canaan (Josh. 19 : 40, &c. ; cf. Jos. Ant. 5, 1, 22). But the Danites were never able completely to wrest the district assigned to them from the powerful Amorites, who seem to have retained portions of it to the time of Solomon (1 K. 4 : 19 ; cf. Judges 1 : 34, &c. ; Josh. 18 : 1, 3, &c.). Of the cities allotted to Dan (Josh. 19 : 40), many, as Ekron and Joppa, never were secured by them; others (like Beth-She-mesh) fell into the hands of Judah, as did also Eshtaol and Zoreah (Josh. 21 : 16 ; 1 Chron. 6 : 59 ; Josh. 15 : 33 ; Judges 18 : 1-12). During the expedition against Jabin, under Deborah, Dan "remained in ships" (Judges 5 : 17), and seems, therefore, in part, at least, to have dwelt along the coast. But soon after, a portion of this warlike and enterprising, though greatly diminished tribe, seems to have quit its narrow limits, moved northward, and suddenly taken the rich and flourishing city of Laish; probably a Sidonian colony, situated near the sources of the little Jordan (cf. Robinson's Palestine, II. 439). This city and its adjacencies were then occupied by Dan (see Judges 20 : 1 ; Josh. 19 : 47 ; Movers, Phönik. II. 2, 159, &c.). On their way to Laish, the Danites robbed one Micah of Mt. Ephraim of sacred objects, used in an unlawful image-worship of Jehovah, and persuaded a Levite, who had been serving Micah, to join them. After taking Laish, they set up Micah's graven image, and made it the centre of their worship (Judges 18). This continued until the exile. After the revolt of the ten tribes, Jeroboam made Dan one of the two chief cities of their worship (1 K. 12 : 29, &c. ; 2 K. 10 : 29). The location of Dan brought its new inhabitants into active traffic with the neighboring Phœnicians, for it lay on the main road from Phœnicia to the Euphrates, and became a station for passing caravans. Another portion of the Danites remained in the district originally assigned to them, near Eshtaol and Zoreah (Judges 13 : 2, 25 ; 16 : 31), but seem to have been overpowered by the Philistines, and then to have merged into the more powerful tribe of Judah; so that the above-named colony was the only distinct representative of the tribe remaining at the time of the exile. This may be the reason why, in Rev. 7 : 6, Dan is omitted.—This sketch of the tribe, as well as the heroic deeds of Sampson, illustrates the appropriateness of Jacob's benediction, in its allusion to the import of Dan's name, to judge, and of the saying of Moses, Deut. 33 : 22. (See EWALD, Gesch. Isr. II. 1, 292, &c., 305, 322, 343, &c. ; III. 1, 153, &c.)

RUETSCHI.*

Danæus, Lambert, known as the author of the first system of Ethics, treated separately from Dogmatics (see Stud. u. Krit. 1850, p. 22, &c.). He was b. at Orleans, 1530; first studied law, then theology. Of his many works, the Ethices christianæ, libri tres, 1577 (improved 1582), is best known. He also wrote a Physica christ. and a Politica christ. His strict Calvinism appears in his Loci communes. (See ADAMI, vita.)

HERZOG.*

Daniel. The name of this prophet is borne by an O. T. book, which has exerted the most decided influence upon N. T. literature. It is intimately related to the apocalypse of John, and to its predictions even he who is the way, the truth, and the light for science also, directs special attention (Matt. 24 : 15). Its genuineness was not disputed for nearly 2000 years, excepting by the heathen Porphyry (in his Λόγος κατὰ χριστιανῶν). Its spuriousness, however, upon the premises of rationalistic criticism, seems to have gradually become a more unquestioned fact from the time of Semler and Eichhorn. Even the historical reality of such a person as this Daniel has been recently contested, and that upon the very evidence which has hitherto been thought to prove his existence. Beyond the book bearing his name, Daniel is mentioned but thrice in the O. T., Ezek. 14 : 14, 20 ; 28 : 3 ; and, as Hitzig affirms, in a way in which a cotemporary would hardly be named. But Hitzig's affirmation is arbitrary. Daniel is named between Noah and Job, because, as N. was a righteous man of the old world, and Job a righteous man of the ideal world, Daniel represented, intermediately, the cotemporaneous world. If Daniel was brought to Babylon early in the reign of Jehoiakim, he must have been 50 years old in 572 (Ez. 29 : 17), and must by that time have been the wonder and admiration of all his fellow exiles. So that the mention of him by Ezekiel corroborates the statements of the book of Daniel. Daniel's grave is still shown in Susa. People of all religions perform their devotions at it; and an insult offered to it would be punished with instant death.—The book of Daniel stands, in the Hebrew Bible, between Esther and Ezra, for historical reasons. It is placed among the hagiographa, not among the prophecies, because these were the writings of such as were specially called to the prophetic office: i. e. of proclaiming orally, or in writing, the word of God. Though Daniel, like David, and Solomon, possessed the gift of prophecy, and therefore may be called a prophet, he was not a prophet by his office and position. Origen, (see ENGELMANN, Ueber d. Charism. 113), says correctly: Non si quis prophetat, ideo propheta est. Ac profecto si quis propheta est, is quidam prophetat, sed vero qui prophetat, non continuo etiam est propheta. This position of the book, therefore, casts no suspicion on its genuineness (HENGSTENBERG, Beiträge I., 23, &c.).

The chief objections of modern criticism, to the genuineness of the book, are undisguisedly based on its wonders and predictions. And even Porphyry's sneers are exceeded by those of Hitzig, who would persuade us that Onias IV., a cotemporary of Antiochus Epiph., wrote the book.—That wonders occurred during the period of the exile is not surprising. It had been foretold that such (as in Egypt) should attend the termination of the Babylonian exile (Micah 7:15). Neither can the minute particularities of the book disturb us, since overwhelming external and internal proofs show that it is Isaiah who (chpts. 40–66) so minutely describes Cyrus, more than 150 years before his birth, and also foretells the grandeur and energy which the word of God, as it would then be spoken, should possess (Is. 51:15, &c.). It should even call forth a new heaven and a new earth. This was fulfilled in Ezekiel, but still more in Daniel, who takes up the vision where the perspective of Isaiah's prophecy had narrowed down to a point, and opens it anew. All the prophets after Isaiah merely unfold his prophecies. Daniel's intensive and comprehensive prophecies sustain a similar relation to those of subsequent periods, and, after prophecy ceased, to the history of the next succeeding ages. The speciality and extent of his predictions do not, therefore, invalidate his book. These peculiarities are explained by his position in the history of redemption, and by his own personal position, at a heathen court, among magi courtiers. This gave his prophecies an universal character. The wide and enduring influence of prophecy, exercised in such circumstances, is seen in the repetition of Balaam's (Numb. 24:24) in Dan. 11:30. But if Balaam's words were so enduring, how much more abiding would be the influence of a prophet like Daniel!

The plan of the book of Daniel corresponds with that of the other O. T. prophetic books. Facts and chronological order impinge, the former prevailing. There are two divisions: history, c. 1–6, and visions, c. 7–12. In c. 1–2:4, the language is Hebrew; from 2:4 to c. 7 Aramaic; thence to the close Hebrew, the visions being intended for his own people. The radical correspondence of its Aramaic with that of Jer. 10:11, and of Ezra affords circumstantial proof of the date of its composition. It also contains many foreign words, probably of Arian derivation, and three names of musical instruments, which sound like the Greek words ξύλας, συμφωνία, and ψαλτήριον (3:5), and point to the age of the Seleucidæ. And it is quite reasonable to suppose that Greek musical instruments should then have been known in so commercial a city as Babylon (see Brandis, Allg. Monatschr., 1854, 2). The Hebrew of Daniel bears special resemblance to that of Ezekiel, which is doubtless included in 9:2, and Habakkuk. In a word, the character of the language corresponds with that of the period to which it claims to belong.—Among the historical facts reported in the book, the following require explanation. In 1:1 it is said Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, &c., in the 3d year of Jehoiakim's reign. That Jehoiakim was also led captive to Babylon is clear from 2 Chron. 36:6, &c. (see LXX.). But how could this have happened in J.'s 3d year? Josephus' explanation (adopted by later Jewish chronology), that it occurred in the 3d year of J.'s tributary bondage to Chaldea (2 Kings 24:1) is unavailing. For c. 2 dates from N.'s 2d year, whilst his 1st is the 4th of Jehoiakim, the year of the battle of Carchemish, which decided N.'s conquest of frontier Asia, and soon after which he became sole monarch. The siege of Jerusalem, therefore, must have been one connected with that battle, until which J. was a vassal of Egypt, not of Chaldea. And as the book of Kings mentions but one campaign of N. against Jehoiakim (2 Kings 24), it must be this in Dan. 1:1. But Jerusalem cannot have been taken in the 3d year of Jehoiakim. It is obviously improbable that this should have been done before the battle of Carchemish, and Jeremiah 25 expressly makes the Chaldean rule in Judea begin in Jehoiakim's 4th year. Hence J.'s 3d year must be considered the extreme terminus a quo of N.'s coming to Jerusalem. In Jehoiakim's 3d year, N.'s army moved (during Nabopolassar's lifetime yet); in J.'s 4th year, Pharaoh Necho was overcome at Carchemish (Jer. 46:2); then followed the subjugation of Jerusalem (cf. Jer. 36:9). Jehoiakim was dragged to Babylon, and then sent back (LXX., 2 Chron. 36:8; 2 Kings 21:18) under pledges of vassalage, to Jerusalem. After 3 years he revolted, but died before N. could again reach Jerusalem.—In c. 2 a new difficulty meets us. If we could assume that D. reckoned the term of tuition from Jehoiakim's 3d year, and N.'s reign from J.'s 4th year, the problem could be easily solved; the designation of N., as king of B. (1:1) would then be, obviously, a prolepsis. But the difficulty is not insuperable even if we hold that Jerusalem was taken after the battle of Carchemish. Its full, satisfactory solution, however, must await more accurate historical evidence of the date of the commencement of N.'s rule, than Berosus furnishes, who merely says that at the opening of the campaign N. had not yet succeeded his father to the throne.—The narrative in c. 5, has been often assailed. Profane lists of kings name no Belshazzar, and it is not clear whether on the night of the feast only B. was slain, or the Chaldean kingdom was also overthrown. Daniel's explanation of upharsin and the connection of 6:1 with 5:30.

favors the latter; but it is striking that 5 : 30 mentions only the former fact, whilst the latter is intimated in other accounts (HEROD. 1, 191; XENOPH., Cyr., 7, 23. Comp. Is. 21 : 5). Profane history is, otherwise, unfavorable to this view of 5 : 30. Herod. says Babylon was taken under Labynetus II. Berosus (in JOSEPH., c. Ap., 1, 20) makes Evil-Merodach, son of Nebuchadn., N.'s next successor. Then followed Neriglissar, Labosordach, and finally Naboned, whom Cyrus, after taking Babylon, banished to Caramania. But these accounts may be harmonized with those in Daniel in the following way : 1) Belshazzar is the youth Labosordach, i. e. Nabo-Sadrach (Bel-Nabo); for the interference of the queen (5 : 10) implies the youthfulness of the King, and B.'s allusion. v. 13, favors this supposition (cf. 6 : 1). 2) The book reckons B.'s years from the death of Evil-Merodach (see Jer. 27 : 7), since B.'s father Neriglissar, being merely a son-in-law of Nebuchadn., could reign only in B.'s name. Hence Evil-M. was murdered after reigning two years, and B. after reigning 4 years and 8 months, during 4 y. of which time his father was regent. 3) The dynasty of Nebuchadn. ceased with B. (comp. Dan. 9 : 1 with Jer. 27 : 7). But now Astyages, the Median king, considered himself the heir of the Chaldean throne, and Naboned, elevated by the conspirators who slew Belshazzar, became his vassal, but soon leagued with the Lydian king and revolted. This led to the war, first against the King of Lydia, then against Naboned. After Cyrus took Babylon, Astyages appointed his younger brother Darius (the Cyaxares of Xen.) King of Babylon. — The abbreviated statements of Dan. 5 : 30; 6 : 1, remarkably agree with this scheme. The dynasty of Nebuchadn. became extinct with B.; for Naboned, even according to Berosus, is only ῥῆς βασιλείας ἡ βασιλεία. The Chaldean kingdom, indeed, continued, but merely as a Median inheritance. The treasonable interregnum of Naboned was terminated by Darius, the Mede, (son of Darius (Cyaxares) the brother of Astyages), seizing the government. This Darius is undoubtedly the Cyaxares II., of Xen., (Dárajavus is the general title of ruling kings). The Cyropedia may be a mere historical romance; but this coincidence proves that the Darius of Dan. 6 : 1, is not a purely imaginary person. Even recently an inscription was found with the names of Cyrus and Cyaxares, and Cyrus is made the son of Cyax. (u. ak. shat. ri = Uwak-shatra = sole monarch). If Xen. was right, why not Daniel? (See Deutsch. morgenl. Ztschr. 8, 3, 547; BRISSONIUS de regno Pers., 1, 1, c. 14, 130; DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth. II., 672, &c.).

With c. 7 the visions begin. Passing over other points of less difficulty we ask : is it probable that the little horn, in 8 : 9, which persecuted the people of God, is Antiochus Epiph., and that in 7 : 8, &c., a king springing from the Roman empire? The general character of both agrees; both are the anti-Christ, symbolized by a little horn which rises up against three other horns. Is it probable that the three horns in c. 8 are post-Alexandrian Greek rulers, but those in c. 7, Roman rulers? May it not rather be supposed that the variations in the description no more require two persons, than those in the delineation of the four empires in c. 2 and 7 require but two. Furthermore: by 9 : 27 the enemy rages a $\frac{1}{2}$ week = $1 + 2 + \frac{1}{2}$ year, which accords with 7 : 25; whilst the duration designated in 12 : 7 forbids a reference of the matter to a pre-Antiochian period. How unlikely that different events should be measured by the same time? And yet to Daniel's eye they must have been closely associated; for there is no intimation that a long period lay between the Antiochian persecution and the troubles of what Daniel considered the last times. — The most reliable solution of this problem is this. The prophecy of the anti-Christ applies to several events, each one of which, successively, more fully exhausts its import. Its first, partial fulfilment was accomplished in the person of Antiochus Epiphanes. A subsequent one occurred in the destruction of the temple by the Romans (comp. Matt. 25 : 14, with Dan. 9 : 26, &c.). Its final, and exhaustive, fulfilment awaits "the end of days" (2 Thess. 2 : 4). For it is a law of the history of Redemption that the fulfilment of a prophecy will constantly repeat itself, until its significance has been fully exhausted. The Antiochian afflictions of the Church were not the last. The book of Daniel, however, seems to predict them as the last, (comp. Is. 10, and Hab. 2), because the prophet's horizon was bounded by them. But the limits of his horizon did not bound the view of the spirit of prophecy in him, or circumscribe the true intent of the prophecy itself.

Those who deny the genuineness of this book, derive proof against it from the fact that its eschatological visions date immediately from the time of Antiochus Ep. But such inferences would displace the history of all prophetic literature. Is. 7-12 must then have been written in the midst of the Assyrian troubles. And the LXX. version of Daniel was probably made about the time assigned by these opposing critics to the origin of the book; for 1 Maccabees adopts some LXX. expressions, and this version contains other traces of having been prepared near the time of the Antiochian persecution. But if we compare the larger uncanonical additions found in the LXX., the prayer and song of the three young men after 3 : 23, Susanna, &c., with the original Hebrew-Chaldaic form of Daniel, these apocryphal legends afford strong proof of its true prophetic character. — See, besides the works already named, HÄVERNICK, Neue krit. Untersuchungen, 1838; AUERLEN, Der Prophet D. u. d. Offenb. Joh., &c., 1854; HOFFMANN, Weissagung u. Erfüllung I., 276-316. For the literature upon the subject, KEIL, Lehrb. d. Einl. in d. A. T., 1853). DELITZSCH.*

Dante Alighieri, born at Florence in May, 1265 (Par. XXII., 112-120), died at Ravenna, Sept. 14, 1321, two centuries before the Reformation, to the history of which his biography, nevertheless, strictly belongs, as one of those numerous connecting links between the earliest and latest self-adjusting and self-restoring efforts of the Christian Church. The latter half of his life was spent in exile and misery, to which, however, he owed his best spiritual experience, and we the Divine comedy. After various and active services to his native country, including military service, and after a two months possession of a priory in the summer of 1300, he received from the hands of the Guelph faction, to which he was obnoxious, his first sentence of punishment and banishment, Jan. 27, 1302; his second, March 10, 1302; and his third, Oct., 1315. His goods were confiscated, and himself driven from home and family. The charge against him was barratry, or the undue application of his powers of office to his private benefit, a charge evidently untrue, since he condemns this sin expressly to the lowest hell in his Inferno (XXII., 53, 87-136; XXI. 41), and since his final sentence was based solely on the ground of contumacy. His wife was Gemma di Donati, and of his six children but three survived him, Pietro, Jacopo, and Beatrice. His descendants, by the female line, still continue at Verona, where he first found a refuge (Par. XXII., 70), and Count Serego Allighieri has dedicated many writings to his illustrious ancestor. (Compare Victor de Saint-Maure's La div. Com.: Par., 1833, tom. 1, p. 219. M. Valérie, Voyage historique et littéraire, tom 1, p. 293, 313). The origin of his name, on the male side, was unknown even to himself (Par. XVI., 43-45). His whole life was devoted to Church and State, not only in the speculative learning spirit of Mary, but in practical Martha service; but the bloom of his life was poetry, in which all his thinking and doing, all his science and will, were concentrated and crystallized. Not a branch of human activity or knowledge was strange to this Christian theologian and philosopher preaching the gospel; this statesman, soldier, jurist, honoring the law; this historian analyzing mediæval and ancient history; this physician and astronomer demonstrating from visible nature the invisible and eternal power of God. But his crowned genius was poetry, transcribing from the dictation of his spirit what his spirit saw, (Inf. 11, 8; Prg. XXIV., 52-54), accompanied from his earlier youth by song and music on the one side, opening their ears to the melodies of Paradise (Prg. II, 112-114; Par. XXIII., 97-102), and on the other the descriptive art inventing the divine architecture of Purgatory (Prg. X., 28-102; XII., 16-69). It remains only to analyze his literary history.

1) Vita Nuova, or New Life, was the first love of his young life of undoubting immediate faith, in which his morning star is seen to rise and set again. Beatrice is the true and actual incarnation, or, as he expressly calls it, the anagogical allegory, lying at the base of the corporeal real. With this, 2) the Convito is closely connected, both in contents and in form, consisting of 15 tracts and 14 cantos, of which but 4 tracts and 3 cantos are complete, the rest being found elsewhere. At the feast the star of love again goes up, but in another form and with painful vacillations of the pilgrim's heart between the upper and the lower worlds, and faith-knowledge, or activity of a spirit overcoming the doubts of reason, is seen following the earliest and more childlike faith (Par. IV., 124-132). Then comes 3) his Canzoniere, a sestine of cantos, sonnets, ballads, and madrigals, not all implicitly accepted as genuine by critics.

Then 4) two books, de vulgari eloquio, in Latin, treating first of speech, man's privilege, then of the Italian as a mother tongue, and of its dialects, and, finally, of the forms of poetical and oratorical art. 5) His Epistole, in Latin, of which 14 ed. were collated by Ales. Torri (1842), reveals all the circumstances of the statesman, theologian, and poet. 6) A Questio de duobus elementis aquæ et terre, is also ascribed to him as written at Verona, in 1320, a year before his death, treating scholastically the elevation or emergence of land, and its final and efficient cause as the concealed-sense or world-allegory. More authentic is, 7) his celebrated De Monarchia, the date and prompting cause of which are to this hour disputed among the critics. Boniface VIII., in the bull Unam sanctam, Nov. 24, 1302, had vindicated the supremacy of the Pope over his vassals, king and emperor, and condemned as Manichæan dualism the co-supremacy of the empire over the Church; and now Dante proves that the two powers of Church and State were co-equal, like two swords divinely and immediately bestowed, as the old Saxon code had announced a century before. He compares the Jewish people after Abraham, with the Roman people after Æneas, as chosen by God for universal dominion (comp. Com. IV., 3-5). But the celebrated Defensor pacis of Marsilius, of Padua, following in 1328, and the imperial diet at Rens, in 1338, showed that the freedom of the empire was rather helped on than hindered by Dante's book, which Pope John XXII, at Avignon, forbade and condemned to the flames in spite of the opposition of the Emperor Louis of Bavaria, and his Pope, Nicholas V. It has been translated into Italian, in 1499, by Marsilius Ficinus. 8) The Rime Sacre, or seven penitential psalms, and the Credo—all in triple measure—were first discovered by Abbot Quadris, in 1752, and are not yet accepted as certainly genuine. The traditions are that he wrote them to prove himself no heretic, or as Tertiary in the Franciscan Order (Inf. XVI., 106; XXVII., 67) as a century later the Troubadour Folco, of Marseilles, had joined the Cistercian order (Par. IX., 37-42). Luther also began his translation of the Bible with these seven psalms, in 1517. 9) The bucolics of Dante, in Latin hexameters, letters, addressed to the poet, John de Virgilio, at Bologna, are the dying swan notes of Dante; dum loquor, en comites! et sol de monte rotabat.

But the ripe fruit of Dante's life, borne through its whole latter half, is, 10) the Commedia (afterwards divina Commedia), in terze rime, in 100 songs, the first of which, an earnest memorial to death encircling life in mid career, introduces the 33 next, which describe the knowledge of self and sin as a journey through the hells down to the centre of the earth, where rebellion against God is punished in Lucifer, and treachery to Church and State in Judas, and Brutus and Cassius; then 33 songs describe the course of penitence through purgatory on to the earthly paradise, and all the forms in which the dualism of Church and State appeals with warnings to the soul in a procession of grand visions. Then follow 33 songs of the saved soul passing through all the starry spheres of heaven, from the moon up to the highest empyrian of the celestial paradise, where the restless soul finds rest and full enjoyment, and freedom from the hunger and thirst of all desire; and the poet, proved and weary with his eight days' pilgrimage, is vouchsafed the sight of the Triune Deity, and in its midst the God-humanity, and the taste of the powers of the future world. In this divine poem are concentrated not only the poet's life, but all the myths and legends of antiquity. Here all life has reached its term, al fine di tutti i disii (Pr. XXXIII. 46), and explanation. Here is glorified whatever in his early vita nuova is seen by faith afar off, in misty vision; whatever in his Feast is arranged and examined by science on all sides; whatever in his songs and sonnets is wailed or chanted by the tenderest sentiment, turning its loves and hopes on woman, and baring its heart to the woes of the world; whatever of eloquence his book on language teaches, or of worldly wisdom his letters exhibit, we have it here, enthroned in majestic order, like the assembling at the final judgment. The hint of America in the midst of the world ocean, given by his dissertation on land and sea, here comes in again; and every admonition to obedience, virtue, alms-giving, self-continnence, and sacrifice, scattered through his treatises on the monarchy, his sacred songs, and his eclogues, is here repeated, intensified, and enlarged to its true and noblest form.

The inexhaustible literature upon Dante, since the time of Jacopo della Lana, claims some notice, especially the Bibliografia Dantesca of Viconte Colomb de Batines (1845, 1846). German translations, most of them with notes, have appeared, in prose by Bachenschwanz, at Leipzig, 1767, 8, 9; by D. Hörwarter and Von Enk, at Innsbruck, 1830, 1; and in rhyme by Kannegieszer, 1820, fig. 1825, 1843; Streckfusz, 1824-34; Bernd. von Guseck, 1841; in imabico, without rhyme, by Philalethes, 1839, 40, 49, and by Kopisch, 1842. Partial translations at Braunschweig, 1763, in the "Versuchen über den Karakter und die Werke der besten italienischen Dichter," and by A. W. Schlegel, 1794-7, and by K. Graul, 1843. Among Germans of this cent. whose works upon D. have merit, we name F. W. Schelling, 1803; H. Leo, Hist. of Italy; Uhden; Ad. Wagner; F. C. Schlosser; Al. von Humboldt; Dr. Blanc; K. Witte, B. R. Abeken; Oeynhausien and Karl Förster of Reumont; Dr. C. G. Carus; Dr. Lutterbeck; Dr. C. B. Schlüter; Prof. K. Hegel; Dr. E. R. Arndt, Bähr, Wegele, Ruth, Bellermaun, Nordmann. — It is not to be doubted that in Germany, Dante, like Shakspeare, wins a deeper sympathy as time advances, although many learned men, to whom the spirit of Dante was foreign, have been precisely the ones to advance most diligently and worthily the study of his works. Lately (1853), Bernh. Tauchnitz has published an edition of the Div. Comedia, after the Bartolinian Codex in Udine (on the German border, where Dante found a friendly asylum for a time), at Leipzig, where the first German translation was made, and where is still extant, in the Pauliner-Kirche, an ancient monument of Markgraf Dietzmann's of Meissen, with an inscription in elegiac verse, ascribed by tradition to the Florentine poet, and learnedly annotated by Dr. Nobbe, of Leipzig. See also a commentary on Dante, from the evangelical standpoint, by Dr. Baumgarten Crusius, De doctrina Dantis Aligerii theologica (1836), and the writings, since 1834, of C. F. Göschel. In France there appeared, in 1854, Dante hérétique, révolutionnaire et socialiste. Révélations d'un Catholique sur le moyen age, par E. Aroux ancien député; and Dante, révolutionnaire et socialiste, mais non hérétique. Révélation sur les Révélations de M. Aroux et défense D'Ozanam, par Ferjus Boissard. Nothing remains but the appearance of a book on Dante, neither revolutionary nor socialist, but heretic, to make the quarrel complete.

O. F. GÖSCHEL. — Lesley.

Darius (on coins Dariawusch, which nearly corresponds in sound with the Hebrew name, and is an official, royal title). In the O. T., three Persian kings of this name are mentioned: 1. Darius the Mede (Dan. 6 : 1), a son of Ahasuerus (9 : 1; 11 : 1). As in 6 : 28 he is called the immediate predecessor of Cyrus, he seems to correspond with Cyaxares II., whom Josephus (Ant. 10, 11, 4) calls a son of Astyages, an uncle of Cyrus, and who, according to Xen. Cyr. 1, 5, 2, succeeded his father A., but surrendered the government to Cyrus (1, 4, 22; 4, 58; 5, 5, 44), to whom he gave his daughter, Amyasis (Ctes. fragm. ed. Lion. p. 7), in marriage. Others suppose that Astyages, Cyrus' grandfather, himself is meant, because Herod. 1, 109, says he had no male issue, and that Cyrus was his immediate successor (so Euseb.). But Astyages was so well known that it was unnecessary to name C.'s father; and Darius was politically so insignificant that it was more in point to mention A.—2. Darius, son of Hystaspes, after the murder of Pseudo-Smerdis (Ezra 4 : 7), obtained the crown, as one of the seven chief Persian princes. He was a son-in-law of Cyrus, reigned from 521-486 B. C., and greatly enlarged his kingdom by conquests. He is known in history for his expeditions against Greece, and in the O. T. for his favor to the Jews (Ezra 6 : 10; Hag. 1 : 1; 2 : 1; Zech. 1 : 1; see Theol. Stud. 1854, 1).—3. Darius the Persian (Neh. 12 : 22) must be D. III., or Codomannus (1 Macc. 1 : 1). Upon the relation of Darius I. to Cyrus see Cyrus.

VAHINGER.*

David, the second king of Israel (1055-1015, B. C.), was the youngest of eight sons of Jesse, (1 Sam. 16 : 10), whose family was among the most influential in the tribe of Judah (see Judah, tribe of). Among his ancestors were Nahshon (Numb. 1 : 7; 2 : 3, &c.; Ruth 4 : 20), Boaz, and three heathen women noted in the O. T. history, Thamar, Rahab, and Ruth. Thus, in this family we see how the promise to Abraham (Gen. 12 : 3) strove, consciously or unconsciously, after its fulfilment towards the heathen. The remarkable preservation of piety in this family, amid adverse circumstances, is exhibited in the book of Ruth.—Of this family David was the noblest scion. He was reared according to the simple manners of his times. Even his youth was eventful (1 Sam. 17 : 34, &c.). He early acquired a reputation for his poetic and musical talents (1 Sam. 16 : 18). At this period of his life the prophet Samuel was sent by Jehovah to Jesse's house, to anoint one of his sons as future king of Israel, in Saul's stead. David had to be called home from the flock he was tending. Neither he, nor the family, probably understood the significance of the anointing; at least matters moved on with them as before. But from that day the Spirit of the Lord, which departed from Saul, rested upon David. As a cure for his troubled spirit, music was recommended to Saul; and the known proficiency of David upon the harp led to his being called from Bethlehem to the court. He soon won the king's favor, and became one of his armour-bearers. Ere long a war with the Philistines called Saul into the field, and David being thought too tender for warfare returned to his father's flocks. But one day his father sent him to the army to obtain tidings of his brothers. There he heard Goliath's taunts, saw the terror of the Israelites, and learned Saul's offer of his daughter to the man who should overcome the giant. David accepted the challenge, and with his sling and a few pebbles in his hand, and divine faith in his heart, slew the foe. Thus 1 Sam. 17:22-58. But modern criticism pretends to find many contradictions between this account and 1 Sam. 16; 21, &c. These "contradictions," however, may be easily explained. Joab (2 Sam. 18:15) had ten armour-bearers. Saul had probably a much larger number. In times of peace these were members of the court, on whom the king conferred the post as a mark of personal favor. But when war broke out he needed men skilled in battle as his armour-bearers. David's deficiency in this respect appears from 1 Sam. 17:38-40. Hence his return home during the war. His being called a man of war in 1 Sam. 16:18, is (as even Winer admits) merely a prolepsis. The inquiry of Saul in 17:55, &c., has reference to David's family descent and relationship, which Saul, in his state of mind, might easily have forgotten. The assertion that 17:54 is against historical facts, is itself unhistorical (cf. Josh. 15:63; Judges 1:21); and the cavil that David is said to have taken Goliath's armor to his own home, whilst Goliath's sword is subsequently found at Nob, surely presents no insuperable difficulty (17:54; 21:9).

That David's victory saved all Israel was acknowledged by Saul and the people. But when the women sang David's praises, Saul's envy was excited: he remembered Samuel's words (15:28). Whilst Saul's dislike of David grew into hatred, his children became more warmly attached to him, especially Jonathan. Saul was pledged to give David his eldest daughter Merab in marriage, but broke the promise. Meanwhile David won the heart of a younger daughter, Michal. In this Saul saw a plan of getting rid of David. He consented to his marriage with Michal upon a condition which seemed likely to prove fatal to David (18:25). David, however, more than succeeded, and Michal became his wife. During continued hostilities with the Philistines, David increased his fame as a hero—but also Saul's hatred. Saul attempted to assassinate him, and to induce others to aid in the plot. Jonathan befriended David, and, with Michal's aid, enabled him to escape to Samuel at Ramah. Several attempts of Saul's servants to bring him back were thwarted. At length

Saul himself went after him, but he too was seized by the Spirit, and failed. Jonathan then attempted to reconcile his father to David, but unavailingly, and, after renewing their oath of mutual friendship, David fled to Nob, to consult the urim and thummim. Ahimelech, supposing him to be a special messenger of Saul, gave him food and Goliath's sword. He then fled for safety to Achish, king of the Philistines. On being detected he feigned madness, and thus escaped to the cave of Adullam, near Bethlehem, where 400 men gathered around him—mostly relatives whom Saul persecuted. Saul learned from Doeg what had been done for David at Nob, and took bloody vengeance on the priests there. Only Abiathar escaped, and fled to David with the urim and thummim. David's parents, to escape Saul's vengeance, had moved into Moab.—David's company daily increased, but he strictly refrained from all hostilities against Saul. On the contrary, when the Philistines besieged Keilah, he hastened to its relief. Saul commanded his army to surround Keilah, and seize David, who, by divine admonition, fled to the wilderness of Ziph. Here, also, Saul's men had enclosed him, when another invasion of the Philistines drew them off. But as soon as those were repelled, Saul resumed his persecution of David, who had fled to Engedi. There Saul fell into David's power, who piously refrained from harming him. David's noble conduct wrung from Saul a humiliating confession of his own meanness.—David's subsequent forbearance toward the churlish Nabal exhibits him in a similarly noble light. (But in 1 Sam. 25:1, THENIUS is right in reading Maon for Paran). After Nabal's death David married his widow, Abigail, Saul having given Michal to another. Soon after this David abode in the wilderness of Ziph, and Saul again came out against him with 3000 men; but David, with 600 followers, fled once more to Achish, who welcomed him as a reputed enemy of Saul, and assigned Ziklag as his abode. Whilst maintaining this ambiguous and fatal position, David engaged in several expeditions against the southern foes of Israel, the Amalekites, Gezrites, Geshurites. But a new war broke out between Achish and Saul, and showed the peril of David's position. The suspicions of the Philistine lords afforded him relief. Instead of fighting against his own people, he returned to Ziklag, and repelled some Amalekite freebooters. But the joy of his victory over them was dampened by the tidings of the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1:19-27).—David then went to Hebron, and there, in his 30th year, was chosen king by the tribe of Judah. Abner, however, had Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, proclaimed king of the other tribes, at Mahanaim. This schism continued 7½ years, when the eleven tribes (Ish-bosheth having been assassinated by one of his own men, whom David punished with death for the deed) joined David, and had him anointed at Hebron. Then David moved to Jerusalem, took Mt. Zion from the Jebusites, and built a tower upon it. After a victory over the Philistines, he turned his attention to the reorganization of the worship, which, since Eli's time had fallen into disorder. He probably then already thought of building a temple, and in this view had the ark brought to Zion. But Nathan, the prophet, was directed by the Lord to tell him that it must be built by a man of peace, not by a warrior. Accordingly David dropped his plan, and devoted himself to the firmer establishment, and extension of the theocratic state to the limits prophetically prescribed (Gen. 15:18; Ex. 23:31; Deut. 11:22-24). Thus the choicest country between the Euphrates and the Nile was acquired, and an equal and independent position secured between the great eastern and western powers represented by those rivers. His extreme severity, especially towards the Ammonites, must not be ascribed only to the customs of the times. He also inflicted a judicial punishment, as the Lord's instrument, for their crimes and idolatries. But, in the midst of these wars, he was ensnared in the double sin of adultery and murder, for which God reproved him through Nathan, and punished him with the death of Bathsheba's child and other domestic afflictions—the violation of Tamar by her half-brother, Amnon, for which he was murdered by her full brother, Absalom, who then fled to his maternal grandfather, the king of Geshur. Absalom was not allowed to see David's face for five years. Meanwhile, Absalom courted popularity among the lower classes, and had himself finally proclaimed king in Hebron. David humbled himself under these judgments, and fled. But soon an army of faithful friends gathered around him. A battle was fought with the rebels in the wood of Ephraim, and Absalom perished. David's intense grief at Absalom's death was not merely the operation of natural tenderness, but anguish at the thought of the evils which his own earlier follies had entailed upon his house (2 Sam. 12:10; Ex. 20:5). This rebellion was scarcely quelled when another threatened, caused by the envy of the other tribes at that of Judah; this also was soon extinguished (2 Sam. 20). Here (2 Sam. 21) an account of a three years' famine is inserted, which probably occurred earlier. To judge correctly of the measure of relief adopted, the ancient oriental views of the solidarity of the family, and of blood-revenge must be duly considered. David next ordered the people to be numbered, against Joab's counsel, and the warning of Gad, the seer. For this sin, the Lord threatened vengeance. Of three evils, David preferred falling into the hands of the Lord, and 70,000 people perished of the plague. The sin of numbering the people was two-fold. 1. David was not an autocratic, but a theocratic king, and arrogated authority not belonging to him, in adopting such a measure without God's approval or command. 2. But the chief sin lay in the purpose of this census. David's martial exploits had reached the limits divinely set for them. To have pressed them further would have converted the theocratic state into an universal monarchy. His past achievements and present circumstances favored such an ambitious project. Why should not David become a world conqueror, and Jerusalem the metropolis of an universal empire, as Alexander and Rome subsequently became? The history of the world proves that when a conqueror has once advanced upon his course of victory, no hand can arrest his progress but God's. The census showed that there were 500,000 men of war in Judah alone, and 800,000 in Israel, though not all the tribes were numbered. Hence the Lord rebuked this ambitious scheme, which was so contrary to his own purpose in establishing Israel. By the plague David was punished for his pride, and the people for their repeated insurrections against the Lord's anointed.—David had now waxed old, and appointed Solomon his successor. A conspiracy formed in favor of Adonijah was discovered by the vigilant Nathan, and subdued. To guard against similar attempts, David had Solomon at once proclaimed and anointed king (2 K. 1). Feeling that death was at hand, he gave directions for the punishment of Joab and Shimei, whose merited penalty had been delayed, on account of their peculiar participation in his own sins.—David's personal character has been violently assailed by such men as Bayle, Voltaire, Tindal, &c. They overlook the fact that the Bible by no means describes him as faultless, but faithfully reports his crimes, and makes him humbly deplore and confess them with his own lips (Ps. 51, &c., &c.). At the same time his virtues cannot be denied.—His relation to the history of redemption is most peculiar and remarkable. The aim and import of the O. T. history, to prefigure, prophesy, and testify of Christ, concentrate in him as in a focus. He is the progenitor of Christ after the flesh, and the blessing of the promise is transferred to him (2 Sam. 7). Thenceforth all the prophets describe Christ as Jesse's branch and David's son. His kingdom is an emblem of the Messiah's; his life, in its special providences, a type of the Messiah's, through humiliation to exaltation, through sufferings to glory. Hence so many of his psalms (see Art.) contain prophetic allusions to Christ, who is his son and his Lord. (See CHANDLER'S Life of David; DELANY'S do.; EWALD, do., Lpz. u. Gera, 1795; HESS, STOLBERG, H. EWALD, in their histories of David; NIEMEYER, Karakter. d. Bib. IV. 125, &c.). KURTZ.*

David of Dinant. The Synod of Paris, 1209, besides condemning Amalric (see Art.) condemned some heretical writings, and, among the rest, quaternuli magistri David de Dinant. Hence it is inferred that David was an adherent of Amalric, though this does not necessarily follow. Nothing further is known of him. But he seems to have founded a school, for, according to ALBERTUS M., summa, p. I. tr. 6, q. 29, art. 2, there were quidam hæreticis who followed him; and TH. AQUINAS, in sec. sent. lib. dist. 17, q. 1, art. 1, designates quidam moderni philosophi as adherents of David.—(See KRÖNLEIN, de genuina Amalr. a Bena, &c., Giss. 1842; Stud. u. Krit. 1847; p. 272, &c.). HERZOG.*

Deacon (διακονος) is, in general, every one doing service, especially Church service, but, more particularly, one officially appointed to subordinate duties. In progress of time the ideas received special limitations. As the Church was primitively organized mainly upon the model of the synagogue, there were, besides rulers and elders, other officers, corresponding to the ἐκκλησιασται (Luke 4:20, see VITRINGA, de synag. III. P. II. c. 4). Those officers who joined the new congregation no doubt retained their functions (Acts 5 : 6, 10; see ROTH, d. Anfänge d. chr. K. 1837, p. 162, &c.). In the course of time, however, a more effective arrangement became necessary, and deacons were appointed to have charge of the alms, serve at the agapæ and Lord's table, and to assist the elders (Acts 6 : 1-6). They also seem to have taken part in teaching (1 Tim. 3 : 8-13). The example thus set in Jerusalem was followed elsewhere; and afterwards the strict separation between the clergy and people led to more distinct rules for this office. Thus Ignatius says: Diaconi non ciborum et potuum ministri sunt, sed eccl. Dei ministri (ad Trall. c. 2, &c.). In the 3d cent. they were enjoined to persuade the rich to acts of charity, to warn the unruly, &c. (see Apostolic Ch. Directory, c. 23, &c.; Apost. Constit. III. c. 19; II. c. 57; comp. JUSTIN M., Apol. I. c. 67). At a subsequent period they were often compared to Levites (ISIDORE [† 636] in c. 1, § 13, diss. XXI), and corresponding rules, &c., were applied to them (Numb. 8 : 24; Conc. Carthag. III. a. 397, c. 4 [c. 5, dist. LXXVII. c. 14, Can. CXX. q. I.]; Conc. Agath. a. 506, c. 16; Tolet. IV. a. 633, c. 20 [c. 6, 7, dist. LXXVII.], &c.; Novella, CXXIII. c. 13). Clement V., at the Council of Vienna, 1311, required them to be at least 20 years old (1 Chron. 23 : 24, 27; 2 Chron. 31 : 17); the Council of Trent required them to be in their 23d year (see HARTZHEIM, Conc. Germ. IX. fol. 128, 129). In the Romish C. the deacon occupies the lowest grade in the hierarchia ordinis (Conc. Trid. s. XXIII. c. 17, de ref.) belongs to the ordines majores, and is therefore bound to celibacy. The Pontificale Rom. defines his duties thus: Diaconum oportet ministrare ad altare, baptizare, et prædicare. As the priest's assistant, he is called, Episcopi auris et oculus, item et os cor et anima (Const. Apostol. II. c. 44). He baptizes by the Bishop's approval (TERTULL. de bapt. c. 17; c. 13, pr. dist. XCIII. Gelas. a. 494, &c.). Previously, he also assisted in confession, &c., but later, was allowed to officiate only in the act of reconciliation (REGINO, de causis Synod. I. c. 300, &c.). Sometimes he preached, but usually only read the Scriptures. The deacon is ordained by the Bishop by laying on of hands, but without unction (c. 12, dist. XXIII., Nicol. I. a. 964; gratiam vers. c. 23, Can. I. q. VII. § 4). Hence, and for other reasons, it is disputed whether the consecration of a deacon is a sacrament, or only a sacramental rite (BENED. XIV. de synodo, lib. VIII. c. 9); and whether he possesses a character indelibilis. The original number, seven, became the rule (Acts 21 : 8), although more or less were occasionally appointed according to circumstances. (Concerning deacons in the Rom. C., see THOMASSIN, vetus ac nova eccl. discipl. I. 1, c. 51, 52, 53; II. c. 29-33. BINTERIM, Denkw. &c., I. 335-86. CASP. ZIEGLER, de diaconis, &c., vet. eccl. Viteberg, 1678. BINGHAM, Orig. eccl. II. c. 20. AUGUSTI, Denkw. XI. 194, &c.) In the Greek C., the position and functions of the deacons are the same as in the Rom. C., only they may marry (see Celibacy).

In the Evangelical C. the office varies in its character. (See Anglican C.) In the Lutheran C. deacons are such as were chaplains or assistant ecclesiastics in the Rom. C. They became the second parson, or in distinction from the first, as the parson, they were called preachers. If there were more than two, an archdeacon and subdeacon were appointed. At first the deacons were subordinate to the parson, but they soon acquired an equality, and performed like functions. They were paid out of the common funds, which mostly consisted of the town legacies; hence the office of deacon and magistrate were often combined. Recently the title second and third parson has been substituted for that of deacon. — From the office in this form must be distinguished deacons as associated with elders. The Reformers desired to restore the office in its primitive sense (Luther's works, Walch XIII., 2464), and rules to this effect were early adopted (Richter, K.-ordn. d. 16 Jahrh. I., 116, 117). — The Reformed C. from the first earnestly attempted this restoration of the office (Richter, l. c. I., 66, 122-3). Calvin regarded the office as one of the four essential to Church government (Geneva Ch.-directory in Richter, l. c. I., 346. Conf. Gallicana, art. 29; Belgica, art. 30, 31; Bohemica, art. IX.).

H. F. JACOBSON.*

Deaconesses were appointed by the primitive Church to serve their own sex in matters to which the deacons could not with propriety attend, though they sometimes assisted the brethren also (Rom. 16 : 2). The women named in Rom. 16 : 12 were probably deaconesses. No other traces of the office are found in the N. T.; Tit. 2 : 3; 1 Tim. 3 : 11; 5 : 9, &c., cannot allude to such. Tit. 2 : 3 refers to the reception into the ταγμα χηρών, χηρικών, among the distinguished class of πρεσβυτείδες, of such widows as were for their sex, what presbyters were for men (see CHRYSOST. hom., 31, de diversis N. T. locis; EPIPHAN. haer., 79, 4; TERT. de virg. vel., c. 9; probably also HERMAS, I., v. 2). The 11th can. Conc. Laodic., which abolished the office, calls them viduæ seniores in distinction from deaconesses, to whom the title widow was soon synonymously applied, because widows seemed best suited for the office; though such were not exclusively selected, much less aged widows. In Tertullian's time a maiden of 20 years was admitted in viduatum (De virg. vel., c. 9). The Cod. Theod. does fix the 60th year, with reference to 1 Tim. 5 : 9; but the Conc. Chalc. reduced the age to 40 years. They were installed by the laying on of hands and a benediction (Constt. apost. VIII., 19). But the Conc. Nic. forbid this, lest it should be thought they were designed εἰς τὸ ἱερατεῖον (EPIPH. haer., 90, 3). They attended the poor, the sick, prisoners, and sometimes assisted in preparing female catechumens for baptism (4th Conc. Carth., c. 12; Constt. Ap., VIII., 28). Though the preparation of the catechumens may have devolved upon presbytresses. The office soon ceased. In France it was abolished by the 1st Synod of Orange, 441, c. 26. It never existed in Germany. The title was retained but to designate prioresses in nunneries. According to BONA, rer. lit. I., 25, 15, it was first fully abolished in the 11th cent. There were still deaconesses in Constantinople at the close of the 12th cent. (BALSAMON Comm. in Conc. Chalc., c. 15). But the Jaco lites retained them. What led to the abolition of this office was the fact that, after Constantine M., the State assumed the care of the poor and sick, and infant baptism by affusion became more common. HERZOG.

Deacons' and Deaconesses' Houses.—We select these terms thereby at once to designate something different from the diaconate in the primitive sense. The terms deacons and deaconesses, as they have recently become current in different portions of the Evangelical C., express a new form of religious activity, which, however recent, seems to have widely and permanently enlisted the zeal of Christians. The particular terms themselves may not be the most happy; Brethren's and Sister's houses might be preferable. But the name is a small matter, if there be unanimity in regard to the thing itself. And although what has thus far been actually accomplished, might hardly be thought worthy of a separate article in this work, the idea which underlies this new movement, and its relation to corresponding beneficent operations in the earlier history of the Church, invest it with peculiar importance.

These institutions are not a resuscitation of the primitive apostolical diaconate, but an evangelical remodelling of those earlier ecclesiastical corporations, orders, &c., which aimed to relieve the poor, the sick, the forsaken, prisoners, and children, &c., but which were interrupted at the time of the Reformation. The want of such charities has of late again come to be deeply felt. By their abrogation, not only were vast pecuniary means diverted from their beneficent current, but a large amount of personal Christian labor, devoted to deeds of mercy, lost. And yet all the Reformers maintain that it is the duty of the Church to care for the poor, sick, &c., and that to neglect this is to deny the Lord himself. Abundant quotations in proof of this might be made here from their writings, and from the directories of that period. Whilst they exposed the evils of the various monastic and nominally charitable institutions of the age, they advocated the substitution of such modified forms of beneficence, as would afford a proper field for the cultivation and practice of Christian love and mercy, and, at the same time, secure to the needy proper relief (see LUTHER, Walch's ed. of his works, XIX., p. 1801, No. 55; pp. 1937, 2064, 2236; 1797, &c.; 781, § 70, 71; XII., p. 373, § 76). And yet such modifications were not then devised and adopted. Although some of the property obtained from dissolved monastic, &c., institutions, may have been appropriated to the establishment of schools, poor-houses, &c., the ecclesiastical fraternities themselves were wholly annulled. There were, indeed, sufficient reasons for their abrogation. They had become radically corrupt and dead; they were devoid of true faith and piety; they had long been an occasion of great offence (Walch, XIX., p. 1797; 1830; 780). It is no reproach, therefore, to the Reformation that it abolished them. They had fulfilled their mission, and properly made way for something better. And yet the evangelical substitutes failed to appear. The leaders of the Reformation, and the Church during that and the subsequent period, were too intently engaged in spreading and establishing true doctrine, and restoring religious morality, to allow of their giving due heed to the claims of Christian charity, and it was but rarely that a voice was heard to plead these claims, as was done by Balthasar Meissner, Prof. in Wittenb. († 1626), in his tract, Consilia theol. de quibusdam defectibus in et ab eccl. Evang. tollendis.—A remarkable parallel occurs during the 17th cent. between the Evang. C. of Germany and the Romish C. of France. After the suppression, in France, of the Brethren of the common life, the Romish system of Orders took a new start, and almost exclusively for practical purposes, but upon the basis of the Romish error of righteousness by works. It thus presented the most decided contrast to the views of the Reformed C., and a justification of the zeal of the Reformers against such institutions. The Evangelical parallel to this movement was exhibited in the rise of A. H. Franke's orphan house in Halle, which became the parent of many daughters. About the same time a Bible Union and Preacher's Seminary arose in Halle, the latter of which sent forth thousands of pious ministers. But still there were no fully incorporated charitable institutions. The earliest approximation to these is found in the Consortium theologicum of Valentine Löschner, in Dresden. In those days, however, the renewed Brethren's Church (Moravians), became a vast missionary ordo of the Evang. C., which labored not only to spread the Gospel among heathen, but to revive true piety among nominal Christians. The seed of faith and love thus sown was preserved amid the overflowings of infidelity, and even amid the divine judgments which visited State and Church during the 18th cent., until at length the time came for it to sprout and yield fruit. We shall briefly notice some of the charitable fraternities which have thus far been organized upon this new evangelical basis, limiting our review to societies of brethren or sisters exclusively devoted to services of mercy, under the control of the Evangelical Church.

I. Brethren's Houses.—In each of these institutions the members are called (and call each other) brothers. Their bond of union is that of living faith in Christ. Only such are admitted as have already acquired some Christian experience. They must, except in that of Beuggen, be 20 years old, free from military service, from engagements of marriage, and cannot marry unless special permission is obtained. After undergoing a novitiate the brethren engage in the duties of the institutions, which are usually devoted to the care and training of, mostly poor, children, and also of the sick. They impart instruction chiefly in the Holy Scriptures, but also upon subjects belonging to a general education. In this respect the education imparted in the Brethren's houses corresponds with that of the public schools, without their being, properly, seminaries. Still there is a difference in the aims of the several houses themselves: at Beuggen the object is to train teachers, whilst at the Rauhe Haus they admit thoroughly trained teachers. The children, besides being instructed, are also taught some useful occupation; and after their dismissal they maintain an intimate relation with the house, applying to their old teachers for counsel and advice.—The Brethren at Beuggen, in Baden, belong to the institution established there in 1820, which is also a house of correction for children; it has thus far had 500. The Brethren devote themselves to the instruction and training of the poor. Of 163 who have belonged to it, 143 have been sent out, who have had about 7200 children under their care at a time. They labor mostly in Switzerland, but are also spread among Germans in Russia, Hungary, N. America, Africa, and the East Indies. The institution is under the direction of Inspector Zeller, who also edits a Monthly sheet, containing reports of the doings of the Brethren.—The institution at Lichtenstern, Würtemberg, opened in 1836 for the training of teachers of poor-schools, is a daughter of that of Beuggen, and has the same aim. It contains 60 children. Since 1839 there have been 67 Br. in connection with it, who have had 2680 children under their care at one time. Their public organ is the Süddeutsche Schulbote. The Inspector is the Rev. J. Völter.—The Brethren of the Rauhe Haus, at Hamburg (since 1833), devote themselves, primarily, to the children's institute of the Rauhe Haus. Thus far 393 children have been admitted. The fraternity now numbers 170 members, from all parts of Germany; 40 of them are at present in the House; the other 130 are laboring at almost as many different posts. All the members have previously acquired some trade. In the House they occupy seven different departments "Convicts" called respectively: Nain, Emmaus, Bethel, &c. There is a theologian at the head of each department, as a chief assistant and counsellor; under him each "Convict" has a convict master, novice-master, a Schriftführer, and an elderly experienced Brother, as a family-brother, who has immediate charge of a family of 12 boys. There are strict rules for the management of each department, and the regulation of its duties. There are periodical two weeks' meetings of the Brethren, under the direction of the principal, in which the Brethren alone take part, and consult together in reference to the common objects of the institution.—Each day's labors are begun and ended with a common religious service, which all, numbering with the children about 200 persons, attend; during the day the Brethren alternately teach and labor in familiar intercourse with the children.—The Brethren sent out maintain intimate fellowship with those who remain at the institution, by reading every Sunday a passage of Scripture annually appointed for each Sunday, by a stated monthly concert of prayer, by communing twice a year, on the same Sunday, in whatever place they may be at the time, by means of a common fund raised out of their own means for mutual relief, and the relief of their bereaved widows and orphans, by frequent correspondence, and circulars issued from the institution, and by the "Fliegende Blätter" there published.—The 130 Br. sent out, are scattered abroad in Germany, Russia, Turkey, Italy, England, Texas in the United States, and serve in a great variety of capacities, as city missionaries, as superintendents of houses of correction, teachers, colporteurs, &c. &c.—The above-named theological assistants form the "candidates'-convict," which now has nine members. Thus far 44 such theologians have belonged to the institution, the most of whom have been called to congregations, and 18 of whom have engaged in part, or permanently and entirely, in the service of the "inner mission" of Germany. Four of them have undertaken the establishment of corresponding institutions at Duisburg, Erlangen, Züllichow, and Neinstädt.—The Institution of Deacons, in Duisburg (since 1844), under Inspector Engelbert, connected with a "candidates'-convict," is a house of refuge and hospital; it accommodates 30 children. About 51 Br. have thus far been attached to it, of whom 20 are still in Duisburg, whilst others are laboring at different places. Their public organ is the "Sonntagsblatt für innere Mission."—The Brethren's Instit. at Düsseldorf, under Director Georgi (since 1847) has 14 members. Down to 1851 ten Br. had been sent out as managers of houses of refuge, and teachers. Their organ is the "Menschenfreund and the Düsseldorfer Kinderzeitung."—The Brethren's Instit. at Züllichow, near Stettin (since 1850), and that at Neinstädt (1850), have but recently commenced operations. They are beginning to send out Br. into Pomerania and Saxony, who labor to educate and aid the poor, and as colporteurs. The organ of the Neinstädt instit. is the "Volksblatt für Stadt u. Land."

II. Institutions of Deaconesses.—1. In Germany. The parent of all these is that of Kaiserswerth on the Rhine, founded by minister Fliedner, 1836, and which has greatly excelled all others in its efficiency. Planted in the midst of a Romish population, and beside Romish charitable societies (the Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of the child Jesus, &c.), this evangelical institution has continually grown, and given new proof of the energy of the principle of justifying faith, which animates it. It embraces seven branch institutions, which are united into one whole: a hospital which annually accommodates 600 sick persons; a teachers' seminary which has already educated 500 female teachers; an infant-school with 40 children; a small orphans' house for girls; an asylum for released female convicts (the earliest institution of this kind); an asylum for females of diseased minds, opened in 1850; a maternal institute for deaconesses, 1836. This last is more or less served by all the others. Those admitted (unmarried women under 40 years of age) become sisters on probation, and after being found worthy, are installed as deaconesses. They either become teachers, or, which is more usual, assume the care of the poor and sick. They continue in the institution, discharging these duties, until they are sent to some designated post of labor, from which, however, they return again, when the work assigned is accomplished. They pledge themselves to five years' service as deaconesses. To 1853 it had 163 sisters, of whom 119 were deaconesses. More than 100 are laboring beyond the institution, in private houses, in 26 public hospitals, in orphan asylums, asylums for the aged, infant-schools, &c., in almost every part of Germany, but especially along the Rhine; also in Berlin, London (the German hospital), Pittsburgh, Constantinople, Smyrna, and Jerusalem. They have found it impossible, thus far, to respond to all the applications for help.—There is a separate house, Salem, for such members as have become sick, or exhausted in the service.—Similar institutions exist in Dresden (since 1847), Berlin (1847), Ludwigslust (1847), Breslau, Königsberg (1850), Stettin and Karlsruhe (1851), Stuttgart, Neudettelsau, &c.—2. In France there are at present two such institutions; one in Paris: Instit. des Diaconesses des églises evang. de France, founded, 1841, by Pastor Vermeil. It has six branches, a hospital, a Magdalen asylum, a house of discipline for young girls, a manual labor school (apprentissage), to train female domestics. It has 20 sisters in Marseilles, Montpellier, &c. The other Diaconessate is in Strasburg, and was started by Pastor Härter of that city, 1842, who has since then conducted it. It has a hospital, a Magdalen house, a house of correction for discharged female culprits, and a school for young servant girls. Of its 60 sisters, those sent out are mostly engaged in Alsace.—3. In Switzerland. The institution, founded in 1842 by Pastor Germond, at Echallens, fell a prey to the revolutionary fanaticism of 1848, and was transferred, in 1852, to St. Loup, where sisters are trained to take charge of the sick, and of orphans. There are 19 sisters belonging to it, and the hospital contains 30 beds. Some of the sisters have spread as far as Turin and Toulouse.—On Nov. 10, 1852, another institution was opened at Riehen, near Basel, and similar ones exist at Boudry and Berne.—4. In Holland one was opened at Utrecht in 1844. It has 14 sisters. Besides admitting sick persons into the hospital, the sisters attend them in private houses, and in stations in the hospital at Nymwegen. They also serve in the Magdalen asylum of Pastor Heldring, in Steenbeck. Similar sister-associations exist in Groningen and Amsterdam.—Besides the above there are similar institutions in Stockholm, Sweden, Pittsburgh, United States,¹ and in London (the instit. of Nursing Sisters, started by Elizabeth Fry; St. John's House, 34 Fitzroy-square; "the Sisters of Mercy," in Davenport and Plymouth; and the "House of Mercy," in Clever, near Windsor).—(See Flüedner's Armen-u. Krankenfreund, Oct., 1853; Nathusius' Volksblatt, 1854, No. 20; Barnes, Church of the Future; Thiersch, Vorles. über Kathol. u. Protestant. I., 280; Rothe, Ethik, III., 422, &c.; Sartorius, von d. heil. Liebe, III., 94). WICHERN.*

Deborah.—1. A nurse of Rebecca (Gen. 24: 59; 35: 8; Judges 4: 5).—2. A prophetess and judge in Israel. She was the wife of Lapidoth, and belonged to the tribe of Ephraim. She owed her influence to her prophetic gifts, and obtained a place among the judges of the land, by being employed as Jehovah's instrument in delivering Israel from Jabin's tyranny, which had oppressed the land for twenty years. Then Deborah, as the Lord's prophetess, required Barak to lead the hosts of Israel to battle, promising that Jehovah would give the foe into his hands (see Barak). Deborah's answer to Barak (Judges 4: 6) has been misconstrued by some into language of derision and scorn. It does imply that there was something lacking in Barak; this, however, was not natural courage, but full confidence in the prophetic authority of Deborah's call. After the overthrow of the enemy, D. celebrated the victory in a glorious song of triumph (Judges 5), the authenticity of which is now freely admitted by all critics. (Commentaries have been written upon it by C. H. HOLLMANN, Lips., 1818; KALKAR, Othin., 1833; KEMINK, Ultraj., 1840; HERDER, Geist d. hebr. Poesie, II., 235, &c.; BÖTTGER, Bibl. Stud. d. sächs. Geisteslch., I.-III.; J. v. GUMPACH, Alttest. Studien: Heidelb., 1852, p. 1-138). KURTZ.*

Decalogue, from ἡ δεκαλογία sc. βιβλος or νομοθεσία, the common name for the Ten Commandments among the Greek fathers; or the Ten Words (LXX. οἱ δέκα λόγοι, τὰ δέκα ῥήματα) which constitute the groundwork and the sum of all the laws of Moses (Ex. 20: 1-17, and ch. 21-23; comp. 24: 7; 34: 28; Deut. 4: 13; 10: 4); hence called the covenant (Deut. 4: 13), which Jehovah is represented as having himself declared unto Israel, whilst the other laws were proclaimed by Moses. Comp. Philo de decal. § 5, ed. Mang. II. 183. They were engraven on both sides (Ex. 32: 15) of two tables of stone, which, as the testimony of Jehovah to his people, were preserved in the ark, in the holy of holies (Ex. 25: 21²).

The decalogue is recorded also in Deut. 5: 6, et seq. Apart from minor variations (for the most accurate collation, and variations from Samaritic text, vid. Vet. Test. ed. Kennikott, vol. I., p. 149), the principal differences between these records pertain to the fourth and the tenth commandments. In Exodus, the rest of God after the six days of creation is assigned as the reason for the Sabbath; in Deuteronomy, the deliverance from the bondage of Egypt. The tenth commandment begins, in Exodus, Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house; in Deuteronomy, Thou shalt not desire thy neighbor's wife. The Septuagint conforms the order in Exodus to that of Deuteronomy; but the change is not sustained by any of the other old authorities.

¹ Instead of these more completely organized institutions, many Evangelical churches in the U. S. have Dorcas and other charity societies, the general aim of which is the same. These are, indeed, comparatively limited and irregular in their operations; and yet the relief which they annually afford to the sick, the poor, and especially by providing necessary comforts for destitute children, is in the aggregate very considerable. In this way thousands are fed, clothed, and cared for, who do not share in other more public charities. This proves, at least, the existence of a spirit of Christian compassion kindred to that which has led to the organizations described above, and affords ground to hope that permanent and effective schemes of Christian charity will ere long be generally adopted.—Thus far the Episcopal churches and Friends of this country, have exhibited the most zeal and liberality in the founding and maintenance of asylums and hospitals for the infirm, aged, and sick. Such institutions exist in all our principal cities.

² On this passage to be explained by reference to 34: 1, vid. Hengstenberg, Beiträge, III. p. 387; and Bertheau, die sieben Gruppen mosaischer Gesetze, 1840, p. 98.

³ Hitzig maintains that upon the second table was engraven an entirely different decalogue, that, namely, which is recorded in Ex. 34: 12-26; vid. his "Ostern und Pfingsten im zweiten Dekalog." For criticism see Hengstenberg and Bertheau.

Division of the Decalogue; vid. Treatises by Sonntag, in Theol. Studien, 1836; also by Züllig, ibid. I. II. 1837; especially Geffcken on "Eintheilung des Dekalogus und den Einfluss derselben auf den Cultus, 1838.

There are three methods of enumeration. The first method, which came to prevail in the Romish Church through the influence of Augustine, and is retained by the Lutherans, holds Ex. 20: 2-6 to be the first command, the essence of which is expressed in v. 3, verses 4, 5, and 6 being regarded as merely explanatory. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house" is then taken for the ninth; and "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man-servant," &c., for the tenth. Yet Augustine (Quæst. in Exod. 71) decides in favor of the order as given in Deuteronomy; and is followed among modern biblical scholars by Sonntag.

The second and third methods of enumeration agree in holding the prohibition of the different species of lust to be but one command, the tenth; but differ in the division of the first and second. The second method, current among the Jews, takes Ex. 20, v. 2 to be the first commandment, and v. 3-6 to be the second, the one being regarded as requiring faith in God as the all-perfect being, the other faith in him as one God, and prohibiting idolatry; whilst the third method, received by the Greek Church, the Reformed Church, and by Socinians, takes v. 3, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me to be the first, and v. 4-6 to be the second.

Of these methods the most ancient historical testimony is in favor of the third. Compare Josephus, Ant. III. 5, 5; Philo quis rerum div. hæc. § 35. M. I. 496, de decal. § 12, M. II. 188; and Origen, homil. in Exod. 8 (ed. Lommatsch, tom. IX. p. 91). Origen is acquainted also with the conception of the first command, which is peculiar to the first method, but knows nothing of a division of the tenth; for he raises the objection: quodsi ita putetur, non complebitur decem numerus mandatorum. Et ubi jam erit decalogi veritas? The first clear trace of the Jewish or second enumeration is to be found in the Gemara of Babylon (Tract. Maccoth, 24 a.). As regards the Romish, or Augustinian, conception of the first commandment, the remark ought to be made that it is sustained by one of the two accentuations which accompany the masoretic text, and by the Jewish collection of Sabbath Lessons; and, it is very probable, was handed down by ancient Jewish tradition.

The decision of the question as to which of these methods of enumeration is correct, depends properly on a consideration of the internal structure of the decalogue; and this results, without doubt, in favor of the third, or Philonian method.—The theory which limits the first command to v. 2 (Ex. 20) is contradicted by the form of the verse itself; as Origen remarks: hic sermo nondum sermo mandati est, sed quis sit, qui mandat, ostendit. Verse 2 exhibits the being of God, and deliverance from the bondage of Egypt as the ultimate ground of all the obliga- tions of Israel; and resembles the formula which introduces and concludes the commands given in Lev. 18 (comp. Lev. 19). Hence the connection of v. 2 and 3 is very intimate. Israel shall have no other gods before Jehovah, because he revealed his power over heathen gods and his faithfulness to his people in bringing them out of the house of bondage. Thus also does the argument lose its force, which is derived in favor of uniting v. 2-6 into one commandment, from the opinion that, if v. 3 be taken as a separate command, it seems to have no basis; for v. 2 is not merely introductory to the whole decalogue, but a special reason for the first command in verse 3.

The separation of v. 2-6 into two commands is sustained decidedly by the difference as to matter between v. 3 and v. 4. The requirement to worship Jehovah only does not as such prohibit the worship of Jehovah under the form of an image; and the prohibition in v. 4 and 5 does not specify, as some Lutherans claim (e. g., Gerhard, loci ed. Cott. v. V. p. 244), the worship of heathen gods, but pertains to a particular form of the worship of Jehovah.

As regards the last command, a division may indeed be justified by the record in Deuteronomy, according to which we may make a distinction between cupiditas impuræ voluptatis and cupiditas inordinati lucri. But the record in Exodus is undoubtedly the original one; and according to this, no essential difference can be shown to exist between the ninth and tenth commands, as given in the Romish method of enumeration. Hence even Luther combines the two in his Catechism. Other variations affect the order only in which the other commands follow each other; and show that the Jews and primitive Christians used greater freedom in the enumeration of the commandments than prevails in modern times.

Another question pertains to the division of the Decalogue into two tables, in reference to which the O. T. contains no express declarations. If the Philonian, or third method of enumeration be correct, five commandments must be assigned to each table, as was done by Philo and Josephus (Ant. III., 6, fin.). (Comp. Iren. II., 42 [24, 4]). Each of the first five is distinguished from the rest by being referred to a ground or motive, and by the formula, "the Lord (or Jehovah) thy God." The first table develops love to God, the second, love to man. (Matt. 22: 37-39). The command to honor father and mother is put on the first table, because the relation of children to parents is that of devotion to the representatives of God on earth; and, standing last, it forms the transition to the duties of the second table.—Eph. 6: 2, has been frequently cited to prove that the second table begins properly with the command to honor father and mother; and Ambrosiaster, accordingly (Ambrosii opp. ed., Paris, p. 248), has assigned four to the first, and six to the second table. The usual reply is, that this command, though last on the first table, may be designated as the first in the Decalogue to which a promise is annexed. But the correct explanation of Eph. 6: 2, is: "which is a first or principal command in a promise, that is, because it is connected with a promise." Interpreted thus, the passage has no bearing upon the position of the command on the tables of the Decalogue. — (Comp. Winer, in loco.) Calvin, also (Inst. II., 8, 12), whom the Reformed Church follows, decides in favor of the division into four and six, because if the fifth is put upon the first table, we ignore religionis et caritatis distinctionem; and refers to Matt. 19: 19. — In the Romish and Lutheran Church, on the other hand, it became usual to refer three to the first, after the example of Augustine, and seven to the second table. (Comp. Cat. Rom. ps. III., C. 5, 9, 1, and Luther's Larg. Cat.). This division receives some support from the circumstance that three and seven are sacred numbers, and that thus the tables are nearly of equal extent.

Following Philo, we may analyze the contents of the Decalogue as follows: The first com. of the first table affirms the principle of monotheism in opposition to polytheism in the first command; and in the second, the immateriality of the divine being in opposition to the deification of nature. In the third, it enjoins reverence for God in all the actions of life by specifying a violation of reverence which is most likely to occur. In the fourth, it establishes public worship by affirming one of its fundamental elements. In the fifth, it recognises the parental relation as of divine authority by commanding children to honor their parents, and thus lays the foundation for the sanctification of social life.

The second table is evidently determined by the threefold conception of actual sin — of the hand, mouth, and heart (Ps. 24: 4) — frequently occurring in the O. Testament. Thus Thom. Aq., Savonarola (vid. Rudelbach, Savon. and his Times, p. 406), Hengstenberg, Beitr. III., p. 600. The law forbids, first, sins in act, namely, injury done to the life, the matrimonial relations, and the property of a fellow-man; then forbids sins in word, or injury done to his good name by falsehood; and finally, forbids even the desire to possess what another possesses, thus revealing the obedience required by the law to be a spiritual or internal obedience, which can become complete only in the sanctification of the heart. This exposition of the last command is sustained by the manner in which the verb לֹא תִחָדָד, is always used in Deuteronomy. It is assumed also by Paul in Rom. 7: 7, comp. Prov. 6: 25. — The unity and completeness of the Decalogue affords a striking proof of the genuineness of the Pentateuch.

The theological controversies touching the Decalogue, have reference to the extent and dignity of the law which it proclaims. Vid. Baumgarten's Unters. theol. Streitigkeiten, edited by Semler, Vol. III., p. 226, et seq.

The spiritual warfare which the fathers of the Reformed Church waged against the idolatrous practices of the Romish Church, led them to lay special stress on the prohibition of image-worship, Ex. 20: 4. Zwingli viewed the Romish method of enumeration as a mutilation of the Decalogue productive of the worst consequences; yet insisted that, whether counted as the first or a part of the second, the prohibition of image-worship should by no means be omitted. (Vid. Geffcken, p. 33 and p. 267, et seq.). The catechism of Leo Judæ (1534), contains it as the second. (Geffcken, p. 270). Hence, it is an error to refer the introduction into the Reformed Church of this method of enumeration to Calvin. Ex. 20: 4, however, only forbids the use of images as objects of adoration, whilst the Reformed theologians condemn any connection whatever of images with Church cultus; and thus give the prohibition an application that goes far beyond the literal meaning of the words. (For Zwingli's view, vid. Zeller, das theol. System Zwingli's, p. 107). In expounding the second command, Calvin is content to say: duo tantum hic vetat, ne quas faciamus imagines vel Dei effigendi vel adorandi causa; (Cat., Genev. ed., Niem., p. 141; comp. Inst. II., 8, 17), but in applying it he concurs in the extreme views of Zwingli. (Geffcken, p. 52).

Here the controversy hinged between the Reformed and Lutheran Church as to the true method of enumeration. Luther retained the Romish enumeration, because averse to any change which could be avoided without prejudice to the gospel; and the fanaticism of Carlstadt gave him occasion to maintain that the divine command does not prohibit the making of images, but only the conversion of images and pictures into idols, or means of idolatrous worship. In this matter freedom of conscience must, therefore, be allowed (Luth. Erl. Ausg., XXIX., p. 144, 148). This position led the Reformed theologians to accuse the Lutherans of mutilating the Decalogue, and doing violence to the Word of God. The Lutherans in turn not only vindicated Christian liberty in diaphoris and exposed the extravagance of the Reformed, but endeavored also to defend the Romish enumeration as correct. (Comp. Gerhard; Pfeiffer, dub. vex. cent. I., loc. 96; opp. Vol. I., p. 124; and Walch, Einleit. in die Religionsstreitigkeiten ausser der evan. Luth. Kirche., III., p. 409).

Following the Church Fathers, the Reformers held the Decalogue to be a complete summary of the moral law. It is the lex moralis in distinction from lex ceremonialis; (Apol. A. Cf. ed. Rech., p. 60; Loci Com. ed. Arg., p. 357; Cal. Inst. II., 8), and contains the aeterna Dei regula, which is essentially the lex naturæ; Christ added nothing to the Decalogue, but only expounded it. But a distinction must be made between that which is essential and non-essential, permanent and transient; and among the latter, not only Luther and Melancthon, but Calvin and other Reformed theologians included the sanctification of the seventh day. (Riveti explic. decal. in opp., Vol. I., p. 1335). It was left for Puritanism to maintain the sanctification of the Sabbath as a permanent moral obligation; yet in transferring the obligation from the seventh to the first day of the week, it evades the logical consequences of its own theory. (West. Conf. Ch., 21). For the controversy on the identity of the Decalogue and the moral law, vid. Baumgarten's Unters. theol. Streit. III., p. 229; and Buddei theol. mor., p. 369.

Another controversy sprung up between orthodox theology and Socinianism, as to the dignity of the Decalogue. Socinians admitted it, indeed, to be a summary of the moral law of the O. T., (the fourth command, a part of the ceremonial law, excepted; Cat. Racov. q. 268), but regarded its contents as greatly inferior to that of the moral precepts of Christ. (vid. Fock, Socinianismus, p. 560, et seq.). At a later period, however, they went much further; denying all moral significance to the Decalogue, they viewed it simply in the light of a civil enactment.

OEHLER.—Gerhart.

Decapolis (Matt. 4: 25; Mark 5: 20; 7: 31) is the name of a district lying beyond the Jordan, including ten cities and their suburbs (Jos. Vita, c. 9; PLIN., hist. nat., V., 16, 17). It lay in the N. E. part of Palestine, near the sea of Galilee, and its inhabitants were mostly heathen (Luke 8: 26, 37, 39; Jos., B. J., 3, 9, 7). The Romans, about the time Archelaus began to reign, placed it under the Syrian governor (EWALD, Isr. Gesch. 3, b. p. 517), so that it was reckoned with Syria (Jos. Vita, c. 65). Under the Romans it enjoyed peculiar advantages (Jos., Ant., 14, 4, 4; 17, 11, 4, &c.). Pliny names the cities in the following order: Damascus, Philadelphia (the Rab-bath of Deut. 3: 11; 2 Sam. 11: 1), Raphana (1 Macc. 5: 37), Scythopolis (Bethshan, 1 Sam. 31: 10), Gadara (opposite Scythopolis, and chief city of Perea, Matt. 8: 28; Mark 5: 1), Hippon, Dion, Palla, Gerasa, and Canatha. It is noteworthy that Damascus occurs in this list; for Jos., B. J., 3, 9, 7, says Scythopolis was the largest city of Decapolis, whereas Damascus is much larger than S. And instead of Raphana, PROLEX., 5, 15, puts Capitolias. LIGHTFOOT, hor. hebr., 563, &c., adds Cesarea Phil., Caphar-kanaïm, Capharzemach, Beth-goberim, and Orbu, otherwise unknown towns. Although these cities were not geographically connected, they were commercially leagued together, for the special advantage of their predominantly Greek population; the number thus associated may have varied at different times. (See EWALD, l. c. 2, p. 336, &c.). Whether this league was formed before or after the time of Herod M., is unknown; but it probably terminated with the destruction of Jerusalem. VAHINGER.*

Decius was elected Emperor of Rome by the army, in 249, and soon after confirmed the choice by a victory over Philip, at Verona. Decius ascended the throne with vast schemes. He was determined to restore the power of the city as the ruling metropolis of the empire, to resuscitate the ancient Roman spirit, and restore its institutions and religion. In the execution of these schemes he had to suppress civil wars, repel Barbarian invasions, overcome rivals, and check the aspirations of ambitious generals. He divided the government, appointed Cesars, and placed them over the provinces. But this endangered the unity of the empire. To save this he had to remove everything which tended to increase the peril. Now one of the most threatening social powers within the empire was Christianity, which had been tolerated so long, without being suspected as in its nature inimical to the ancient Roman institutions and religion, that it had almost imperceptibly increased and spread into all parts of the Roman world. Personally Decius, like Trajan, was hostile to Christianity only as he thought it a political league. It seemed necessary, therefore, to the successful prosecution of his schemes, that Christianity should be exterminated. He accordingly ordered a general persecution in 250. This persecution is usually reckoned the seventh; but its extent, severity, and effects entitle it to be called the first general persecution in the Roman empire. Persons suspected of being Christians were required to sacrifice to the gods, and offer incense to the image of the Emperor. Those who refused were warned, mildly punished, then, if they persisted, put to death. The property of those who fled was confiscated. The effect was terrible, and many denied their faith. Numbers fled to the deserts, and became the forerunners of monasticism. But thousands remained steadfast, and were honored as confessors. The leaders of the congregations were most severely dealt with (see Cyprian and Dionysius). Among others who fled were the seven Ephesian youths, who hid themselves in a cave, where they are said to have fallen asleep, and not to have awaked for 200 years.—Decius died (251) without accomplishing his object. The Church, purified by the fires which had consumed much bad material, came forth brighter and stronger than ever.—(See Lapsi; EUSEB., H. E., VI., 40–42; CYPR., sermo de lapsis; GFRÖRER's K.-gesch., I., 553–6; BURCKHARDT's Zeit Const. d. Gr., p. 22. Cfr. PAULY's Realencycl., II., 880).

A. VOGEL.*

Defensor matrimonii.—The Romish C., ordinarily, allows of divorce only as to connubial intercourse (separatio quoad mensem et thorum), the bonds of marriage remaining unbroken (see Marriage). A complete dissolution of those bonds is secured by an annulling of the marriage. In order to correct the growing evil of doing this on frivolous grounds, Benedict XIV., in an encyclical letter of Aug. 26, 1741, Quamvis quaternæ vigilantia, and a bull of Nov. 3, 1741, Dei miseratione (Bullar. Magn. ed. Luxemb. T. XVI. fol. 41, 48, &c.), directed attention to the matter, and required each Bishop to appoint some duly qualified person in his diocese as a matrimoniorum defensor. It was made the duty of this officer to attend the courts before which applications for the entire annulling of marriage came, and oppose them, even to the last appeal, unless, after thorough investigation, they were found to be entirely justifiable. The office was soon established throughout the Romish C. It is an admirable one, and is worthy of universal introduction. Austria and Prussia have, in part, adopted the measure (see v. Savigny, Darstellung d. in d. preusz. Gesetzen über d. Ehescheidung unternommenen Reform, Berlin, 1844).

H. F. JACOBSON.*

Dei gratia.—St. Paul usually speaks of himself as being called to the apostleship "by the will of God" (1 Cor. 1: 1). It was natural for Bishops, who thought themselves successors of the apostles, to employ a similar designation. Felix of Rome, 356, styles himself, Per gratiam Dei episc. Afterwards Dei or Christi nomine, miseratione, miser cordia, were used by ecclesiastics, as well as by civil officers. Rothaire, in his edict for the Lombards, 643, calls himself, in Dei nomine rex, anno Deo propitiante regni mei octavo (WALTER, corpus jur. Germ. I. 683). Ethelbald: divina dispensatione rex Merciorum, 716. Since Pipin, Dei gratia has been in vogue, Charlemagne used it, and, since the 7th cent., the German Bishops (PERTZ, Monum. Germ. III. 33). Subsequently other expressions were added, especially, apostolicæ sedis gratia, or providentia (HARTZHEIM, Conc. Germ. I. 43); so Adalbert, Archb. of Mayence, in a letter to Calixtus, 1121, and Eberhard II., B. of Bamberg (PRZ, thes. noviss. anecdot. VI. 368). But the phrase came into general use first since the 14th cent. (See GEISLER, de titulo; Nos Dei gr. Lips. 1677, 4to; TILESII, de sensu tituli: Nos Dei gr. Regimont. 1723, 4to.; HEUMANN, de tit.: Dei gr. Gotting. 1727, &c.; MABILLON, de re diplom. lib. II. c. II. § X.; BINTERIM, Denkw., &c., I. Th. II. 150, &c.) II. F. JACOBSON.*

Deism. — The term is used in a metaphysical and in a theological sense. Metaphysical Deism, a system of modern origin, holds, in opposition to Atheism, that there is a God, and, in opposition to Pantheism, that he is not only to be distinguished from the world, but is also separated from it. His relation is external. Once created, the universe moves on in its course according to the laws of nature, without the interposition of God. Theism, on the contrary, holds an internal relation of God to the universe; namely, that he has created, and now preserves and governs it as a whole and in all its parts.

Theological Deism teaches that Christianity is a system of natural religion — a faith in God which is according to the dictates of the reason. Whatever is not conformable to the human understanding is to be set aside as being no part of the Christian religion. As to its matter, Deism is naturalism; for it takes natural religion to be the norm and the sum of revealed religion. As to its form, it is rationalism; for it accords to the reason the right, independently of all authority, to examine and purify the Christian religion.

This species of Deism arose in England during the 17th and 18th centuries, under the influence of the Reformation, of philosophy, and general culture, combined with that of Socinianism, the criticisms of Spinoza and the social condition of France. The progress of the Reformation in England being one of violent conflict, many parties sprung up in opposition to the Established Church — a state of things that awakened a desire to find some basis upon which all the divisions of Protestantism might unite. — Francis Bacon, of Verulam, († 1626), reduced knowledge to experience as its source (Empiricism), and thus originated a particular school of philosophy, whose influence modified the general culture of the nation. Though he drew a clear line of distinction between knowledge and faith, theology and philosophy, and based the belief of Christianity upon the word of God, some of his disciples applied the principle, that philosophy is an induction from experience, to Christianity also. Thomas Hobbes († 1679) developed the principle to its last results. All knowledge is derived from sensation (Sensationalism instead of Empiricism), and will from sensual desire: hence, good and evil as such do not exist; nor is there a moral law: religious faith and worship have arisen partly from perverted reflection upon experience, partly from fear and have been "formed" into positive religion by founders of governments and lawgivers: the Scriptures aim at the establishment of a kingdom of God; its teachings may in part be above reason, but cannot be against it: the Church is a society, dependent like a civil corporation upon the will of the sovereign, who, as its head by divine right, determines what is to be taught and believed. The influence of these principles upon the general mind was deep and broad. Deeper and broader still, however, was the influence of John Locke († 1704). Deriving all knowledge, all religious and moral ideas, from two sources, sensation and reflection, he ascribes to the reason the authority to decide upon the reality and true meaning of Revelation; and maintains that, though Revelation communicates truths in the simplest style which the reason could not have discovered, or at best could have apprehended only under a scientific form, it can nevertheless communicate such truths only as do not contradict the reason. The reason does, indeed, not originate, but it can comprehend, Christian truth. Thus Locke strengthened the rationalistic tendency, though on account of his belief in Revelation many orthodox Christians adhered to him.

The line of Deists, however, begins properly with Edward Herbert, Lord Cherbury († 1633), a civilian and a scholar, who unfolded his religio-philosophical theory in two larger works: De veritate, 1624, a critique on knowledge, and De religione Gentilium, 1633, a critique on faith; and in two smaller works: De causis errorum, and de religione laici. Herbert regards religion as the highest specific attribute of man; and reduces it to five elementary truths: 1, The existence of God; 2, the duty of adoration; 3, virtue and piety as the principal constituents of adoration; 4, the duty to be sorry for sin, and forsake it; 5, Divine retribution in this life, and in the next. Natural religion, he maintains, originally pure, degenerated through the innovations of the priests; and the Christian religion, resting on these same principles, was corrupted by the hierarchy. Nevertheless these five main pillars of pure religion, lying back of all questions which divide religious parties, remain unshaken; and are sufficient for the attainment of salvation, even without a revelation. Revelation is not necessary, though not impossible, and even under certain conditions credible. — Charles Blount († 1693), author of anima mundi, 1679, and of Oracles of Reason, 1695, adopted the theory of Hobbes concerning the authority of State in matters of religion and the five articles of Herbert, in connection with the notion that an originally pure pagan religion was corrupted by the pretended revelations of selfish priests; and though he did not attack Christianity directly, sought nevertheless to bring it into disrepute by means of wit and satire (1660–1689).

After the revolution of 1689, when William III. was elevated to the throne, the freedom of the press established by law, and the Reasonableness of Christianity, propounded by Locke, became the received maxim, the seeds of Deism, previously sown, began to sprout and grow rapidly. John Toland, an Irishman of considerable learning († 1722) published a work, entitled Christianity not mysterious (1696), in which, adopting the Lockean method, he attempted to show that the Gospel was neither contrary to, nor yet above reason; that the truths of revealed religion, because useful and necessary, were as easily understood as the known properties of wood, air, or water. To establish so extraordinary a theory, Toland argued, from the nature of the reason and of knowledge, from the Bible and the Church fathers, that there were no mysteries in primitive Christianity; but that, in the course of time, they were foisted in by a spirit of accommodation to Judaism, and to paganism, and by philosophy. A violent controversy ensued; the book was publicly burned by order of the Irish parliament; and the author escaped a judicial prosecution only by a sudden flight from Dublin. Toland was followed by Anthony Collins, a personal friend, and a disciple of Locke. In 1713 he published anonymously a Discourse on Free-thinking, in which, opposing blind submission to authority, he vindicates free thinking, that is, thinking without faith, as the right of man, which should never be restrained; for it is allowed by the Bible itself; the prophets of the Old Testament were free-thinkers; Christ would have men search the Scriptures; and Paul acknowledges the freedom of human judgment when he reasons from premises; besides, the men most distinguished for virtue in every age have been free-thinkers. This book, pervaded by a spirit of bitterness towards Christianity, the Church, and mankind, called forth numerous replies, of which that by Bentley, the celebrated philologist, is the most ingenious and forcible. Yet all the opponents of Collins and Locke agreed with them that there can be no absolute contradiction between the reason and revelation, and that thought must be free; free, however, they meant in the true sense of the word, and not led captive by the prejudices of infidelity. A work by Whiston on prophecy gave occasion to Collins, ten years later, 1724, to attack indirectly the evidences for the divine authority of Christianity, in A Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christ. Rel. After criticising the hypotheses of Whiston, he proceeds: The principal evidence for the truth of Christianity is certainly to be found in prophecy, but must be drawn from it by means of allegorical interpretation: each new revelation is based upon a previous one; thus the truth of Christianity depends upon the revelations of the O. T.: that Jesus of Nazareth is the promised Messiah, the fundamental doctrine of the Gospel, can be proved from the O. T. only; for neither miracles nor the authenticity of the books of the N. T. can establish the truth of Christianity: if, therefore, the proof derived from the O. T. be valid, Christianity rests unshaken upon its true foundation; if not, it is groundless. But the proof which the writers of the N. T. derive from prophecy, depends upon typical and allegorical interpretation; apostolic Christianity, accordingly, is based upon types and allegories; hence if, with Whiston, allegorical interpretation be rejected as weak and fanatical, the foundation of the Christian religion is destroyed.—The whole argument tends to make the impression that Christianity is of doubtful authority, because the only possible method of establishing its truth is not conclusive. In the controversy which arose, some maintained that Christianity does not rest positively upon the O. T.; others that the prophecies of the O. T. have actually been fulfilled; whilst some admitted that, in single instances, the evangelists and apostles erred in their interpretations. The discussion of the evidences from prophecy led to a discussion of evidences from miracles; and the allegorical method of interpretation was transferred from the one to the other. Thomas Woolston († 1731) endeavored to show (Discourses on the Miracles of our Saviour, 1727–30) that, if the narratives be taken literally, the historical truth of the miracles must be called into question; and, therefore, concluded that the letter of the narratives, as it conveys no rational sense, must contain a mystical meaning. That is to say, the New Testament is not to be understood literally, but allegorically. The most forcible reply to Woolston was the examination of the Witnesses of the resurrection, by Sherlock; a work that, 15 years afterwards, provoked an attack upon the evidences of the resurrection, by Peter Annet († 1768). Laying aside the restraints of allegorical interpretation, Annet took ground against the conception of a miracle; discarded the miracles of Paul; impugned his character; and betrayed a spirit of proud hostility to the whole Gospel history.

When Deism had come to the conclusion that there is nothing mysterious in Christianity, that the liberty of reason in matters of religion must be unlimited, and had repudiated the evidences derived from prophecy and miracles, the question arose: in what, then, does the positive truth of Christianity consist? The answer was: the substance and end of the Christian religion is morality. This was the thought unfolded by Shaftesbury († 1713) (Characteristicks, 1714). The created world is a harmonious whole; the morally good consists in the beautiful; and the beautiful is the end of religion and the perfection of virtue. Virtue is its own end; hence, the promise of reward in heaven is prejudicial to virtue. A decided but cunning enemy, Shaftesbury concealed his hostility under cover of indirect attacks upon the Christian faith.

The most complete summary of Deism was brought out in 1730, by Matt. Tindal († 1733). The work is entitled, Christianity as old as the Creation; or, the Gospel a republication of the Religion of Nature. True religion, this “great apostle of Deism” agrees, is natural religion; and consists in the practice of morality, in obedience to the will of God, or in a manner of life which is agreeable to the reason of things. Natural religion is absolutely perfect; hence revealed religion cannot add anything to it, nor detract from it. The Christian religion is identical with natural religion; in as far as new, it is a restoration of those original principles taught by nature, which have been distorted by superstition. As revealed religion coincides with the religion of nature, reason must sit in judgment on all the doctrines of the Christian faith. The fundamental idea of Tindal was shown to be contrary to history, and untenable, by J. Conybeare, in his Defence of Revealed Religion;

though, like many others, he fails to recognize the essence and true dignity of Christianity. The complement of Tindal's a priori deductions is a work on the True Gospel of Christ, by Thomas Chubb († 1747), the glove-maker. Chubb examines the discourses of Christ, in order to determine his doctrines, precepts, and design; and infers from them that Christ enjoins those things only as duties which are in themselves obligatory; that it was his mission to revive a sound view of morality, and reduce it to practice by the organization of pious associations; and that the Gospel is, therefore, not a matter of belief, but a system of morality, which is identical with the religion of nature. Applying this method of reasoning to the Old Testament, Thomas Morgan († 1743) perverted the history of the Jews, arrayed the teachings of the New Testament against those of the Old, rejected the atonement and other doctrines as the dregs of Judaism, and, in opposition to Judaistic Christianity, proclaimed himself proudly a "Deistic Christian." Lord Bolingbroke, carrying out the principles of Tindal, Chubb, and Morgan to their legitimate consequences, viewed religion as a measure of State policy, re-affirmed the pure Gospel to be nothing more than natural religion, rejected the doctrines of the Church as the foolish innovations of men, and dismissed the effort to reconcile true philosophy to the Scriptures as vain.

The opinion now began to prevail that reason and revelation are irreconcilable, and Deism, in doubt of its own theory, passed over into skepticism, which was fully developed by Hume († 1776). Thus, the entire effort to reduce Christianity to natural religion by a process of logical reasoning, resulted in doubting the truth of all religion. English Deism operated as a strong support to the naturalism of France and the rationalism of Germany.—Vid. View of the principal Deistical writers, by John Leland; Versuch einer vollst. eng. Freydenker-Bibliothek, by Thorschmid, 1765–67; Gesch. des engl. Deismus by Lechler, 1841.

G. V. LECHLER. — Gerhart.

Demoniacs. Among all the miracles wrought by our Lord, the healing of demoniacs, or those possessed of devils, formed the most remarkable class. They are so, partly, because of the difficulty of ascertaining definitely the nature of the disease, as it is described in the N. T.; partly, because no completely analogous cases occur, either in the O. T., that of Saul being only similar (1 Sam. 18 : 10 ; 19 : 9, 23), or since the times of Christ and his apostles; for the mere assertions of persons psychically disordered that they are possessed, require, at least, more thorough investigation.

To throw light on this obscure subject, we must first compare the expressions of the N. T. concerning demoniacal possessions, as to the appearances presented; then examine the different views on the subject; and finally, endeavour to decide concerning it, agreeably to the spirit of the Christian faith, and the settled principles of natural science. — The N. T. often speaks of the entire class of these afflicted persons, and designates them as οἱ δαιμονιζόμενοι (Matt. 4 : 24; Mark 1 : 32), and as ἐνοχλούμενοι ἀπὸ πνευ-

μάτων ἀκαθάρτων (Luke 6 : 18). The evil spirits producing this state are called δαιμόνια (Matt. 10 : 8; Mark 1 : 34, 39; 3 : 15; 6 : 18; Luke 9 : 1; 10 : 17), or, indiscriminately, πνεύματα (Matt. 8 : 16; Luke 10 : 20), or πνεύματα ἀκαθάρτα (Matt. 10 : 1; Mark 3 : 11; 6 : 7; Luke 6 : 18). The curing is called, with reference to the spirits, ἐκβάλλειν (Matt. 8 : 16; 10 : 1, 8; Mark 1 : 34, 39; 3 : 15; 6 : 13); with reference to the possessed, δραπετεύειν (Luke 6 : 18; 7 : 21), or ἰάσθαι (Matt. 15 : 28); and of the disciples of Christ it is said, τὰ δαιμόνια or τὰ πνεύματα ὑποτάσσεται αὐτοῖς (Luke 10 : 17, 20).—That the N. T. writers do not here mean only physical disorders is admitted, even by the chief rationalistic expositors. Δαιμόνια means evil spirits in the service of Satan, the prince of the kingdom of darkness. But who are these evil spirits? Are they fallen angels, or departed souls of ungodly men? Josephus thought they were the latter; and the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies consider as demons the souls of the giants, who, Gen. 6 (in this view) had been begotten by devils with the daughters of men. But all such conjectures have no value, except as they are found to agree with the Scriptures. There is no reason for taking the term ἀκαθάρτος in a sense which it long ago lost. The LXX., in places without number, uses the word to signify not merely "unpurified," but simply "impure;" and so, in Matt. 3 : 30, an unclean spirit is mentioned, which cannot be a human soul, but only Satan himself. The wicked spirits in Rev. 16 : 13; 18 : 2, cannot be departed souls, but devils. It is thus by far the most natural to understand by those δαιμόνιοι, real devils, i. e., fallen angels.

But a more important question is, what these spirits did in their victims. Their connexion with the men is indicated variously; by the word δαιμονιζεσθαι, "to be possessed of a devil," which defines nothing; by ἐνοχλεῖσθαι, "to be vexed, tormented" (Luke 6 : 18); by δεῖσθαι, "to be bound" (Luke 13 : 16); by ἔχειν πνεῦμα, "to have a spirit" (Acts 8 : 7; 16 : 16); in Josephus by εἰσδύεισθαι, "to intrude" (Wars, 7, 6, 3); by ἵστασθαι, "to take one's abode in" (Ant. 6, 11, 2);—the severing of that connection by ἐξελθεῖν, "to go out" (Matt. 8 : 32, &c.); which of course presupposes the ἵστασθαι of Josephus, though not necessarily a mere mechanical fixedness in space, but a dynamical inbeing, a working, as is implied by the "binding" and "vexing." That a change was produced in the bodily functions, by an influence foreign to the human constitution is manifest throughout. The soul loses power over the body. An alien force has intervened, producing disturbance and constraint in the command of the soul over the bodily organs. But the conscious soul itself is never displaced by the demon, is not the seat, or directly the subject of his influence. He acts on the nervous system, and produces phenomena like those commonly witnessed in the bodily states under other sorts of nervous derangement. The influence is not upon the moral nature, but upon the invisible element of the physical system. Judas, indeed, was morally affected by Satan (John 13 : 27); but Judas was a hardened sinner, and not a demoniac.

The phenomena were various. 1. A sort of magnetic clairvoyance. The demoniacs knew Jesus to be the Son of God, while yet this mystery had not been published. The damsel at Philippi had this clairvoyant faculty with reference to Paul and Silas (Acts 16 : 16). 2. Raving, as in bursting fetters, in going naked, and in violent outcry. 3. Epileptic spasms. 4. Loss of speech. The mute must have been clearly distinguishable from ordinary cases of natural infirmity, since other dumb persons are never called demoniacs. In Mark 9 : 17, the dumb lunatic was not disabled by any crippling of the lingual muscles, nor by being deaf from birth, but by nervous disturbance, running into frantic delirium. Thus, too, the mute demoniac, Matt. 9 : 32. 5. Lameness in the body (Luke 13 : 11), which must have been analogous to the cases of aphony. So also Matt. 12 : 22, with the person blind and dumb. And 6. In Matt. 17 : 15, the influence produced lunacy, and Mark 9 : 18, emaciation [or, as some explain the word, convulsive rigidity]. In this person last mentioned, we observe the union of the most complicated phenomena. Epilepsy, preceded by frantic shrieks, with morbid inclination, on approach of the attack, to frequent dangerous places, in the vicinity of fire and water; coincidence of the spasms with the change of the moon; continued dumbness (perhaps as idiotic stupidity); together with emaciation, as a natural consequence of the fits. In all these diverse symptoms there appears the distinct impression, as well in the patient as in the people around, that the case is caused by an alien influence. In the raving Gadarene, even the power of speech was under the control of the demons, who speak, not in his name, but with his organs, Mark 5 : 9; Luke 8 : 30. Even the appeal, μη με βασανίζης, Mark 5 : 7; Luke 8 : 28, must have come from the demons; being connected with the clear recognition of Jesus by his name.

Thus much of the effects of the influence. It is further remarkable that a plurality of demons could exert their pernicious power in one man. Supposing this derangement a psychical phenomenon, we may still inquire whether it might not have become possible by some moral fault. But the person in Mark 9, and the parallels, who had been possessed from childhood decides against this, and makes the affliction appear as a mere misfortune, a fruit of the general sin. The other thirteen out of fourteen cases may as well be taken for misfortunes as this. There is certainly, as Lange says, a just and clear distinction to be made between abandoned sinners and demoniacs, between the sphere of demoniacal suffering, and that of demoniacal acting. The passage, Matt. 12 : 43, concerning the unclean spirit, who, finding his house swept and garnished, returns with seven other spirits worse than himself, does not oppose this view. It does not require us as a general rule, to account for one's being possessed of a demon, by supposing the person guilty of special sin; though in particular cases, a predisposition to become subject to the influence may have been produced or heightened by gross vices.

As to the manner of healing the demoniacs: The Lord cast out devils "with a word." He gave the disciples the same power; and even one unknown to the disciples, cast out devils in the name of Jesus. Nay more. When Christ says (Matt. 12 : 27), "If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your sons cast them out?" he implies that even unbelieving Jews could do this; though, as appears from Acts 19 : 13, they sometimes failed. Josephus relates (Ant. 8, 2, 5), that demons were cast out by incantations and medicines, pretended to have been derived from Solomon. Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. cap. 85) speaks of those who used arts in exorcism as the heathens did, and says the demons will not be subjected by any name of kings, just men, prophets, patriarchs, but only by the name of God. — It is remarkable that the demons, before they came out, vented their rage on the possessed (Mark 9 : 20; Luke 9 : 42); that the possessed himself dreaded healing (Mark 5 : 7; Luke 8 : 28); and that the disciples of Jesus were dispirited. The demons (Luke 8 : 31) were afraid of being compelled to go out into the abyss, and preferred to venture into the swine, not foreseeing the uncontrollable and disastrous rage of the animals under the strange distraction.

Concerning the different opinions relating to the scriptural statements on the subject of demoniacs, little need here be said. Down to the last century, the accounts in the New Testament respecting the character and the cure of these maladies, were received uniformly in the spirit of religious faith. Opinions varied only as to who or what the demons were, and not at all as to the fact of their existence, or their influence over particular persons. The doctrine drawn out by the scholastics related not so much to the fact or the nature of the diabolical possession, as to the power of casting out the devils (exorcism) (comp. Thomas Aquinas and others). The presumption was that demoniacs continued to be met with. Gisb. Voetius (III. p. 1157, etc.) gives a collection of Catholic forms of exorcism. The power of exorcism was considered by the Protestant scholastics as a charisma sine infallibilitate eterna salute connectione. These discussions acquire some practical importance from the application of exorcism in baptism. When the heathen Germans were converted, every adult applying for baptism solemnly promised to renounce the devil and his works. This simple vow passed, strangely enough, into a form of casting out devils, became joined in this form with infant baptism, and has thus been received into some portions of the Lutheran Church. It is here and there claimed, lately, as an indispensable part of the baptismal rite. But the subject of the rite is not a demoniac; and the moral bondage under sin, which is quite another thing, cannot be removed by exorcism.

When we recollect that the 16th and 17th centuries were the flourishing period of witchcraft, we are not surprised that in the 18th and 19th there came a mighty change. As it had been readily assumed that demoniacs were continually found, and all real or pretended phenomena of that dismal aspect were freely ascribed to the devil and his angels, so, upon the vanishing of this delusion, when the principle alleged to be devilish comes, at the present, to appear as something altogether natural, we are liable to take the cases given in the times of Christ and the apostles as only natural phenomena, not then understood. But while Grotius himself has left demonism unquestioned, while not only Hermann, Gronau, Zeibich, Marek, Deyling, and Storr, but even Ernesti, have adhered to the old view, the first to raise doubts have been Hobbes, Bekker, and Wetstein. Semler was the first to assert that the New Testament demoniacs were cases of common disease; and after him came Gruner, Farmer, Timmerman, Cäsar, Kirchner, Winzer, Nanz; and from them this view passed into all the rationalistic writings.

Since the effects of the influence on demoniacs were derangements of the nervous system and the corporeal organs of the soul, it requires but the least acuteness to pronounce them nothing more than diseases. Diseases they were, to be sure; if the cerebral action were disturbed even to madness; as much a disease as inflammation of the brain. If a demon could so impair the spinal marrow as to bring on epileptic fits, the effect is as much a disease as would be the desiccation of the marrow from natural causes. But what does this comparison of effects decide? The question still remains: Were the diseases from natural causes or demons? Rationalism can show no proof that they might not have been caused by demons. The objector must assert his own opinion, that there are no fallen spirits, that no influence can reach men from the spirit world; and take that as his proof that the demoniacs of Scripture were only cases of natural disease. Is it objected that the heathen, before and at the time of the Saviour, believed in demoniac influence, and therefore the faith was a mere superstition of the age? The demons of classical antiquity were gods, not devils, and there is no analogy between them as to the effects ascribed to them. But even if the cases were alike, would it follow that the doctrine of demoniac influence was a mere superstition, because the heathen believed it? Is the belief of the existence of the moon a superstition, because the heathen speak of the moon? If it could be shown at all that the belief in demoniacal sufferings and torments had its root in the old heathen belief in corybantism, and that this view passed over to the Jews, there might be some show of reason in the above conclusion. But we have seen that heathenism, prior to Christianity, had no knowledge of possession, in its proper sense; that its Bacchantes, Corybantes, &c., bore no comparison to demoniacs. The heathen might, of course, have learned from the Jews to consider evil spirits as the cause of those phenomena; or their instinct might have led them to the same conclusion. They might have recognized demoniacal influence in those real cases of it which occurred to them, or have erroneously attributed all similar diseases (as epilepsy), to a like cause. But it by no means follows that their consciousness of the existence of such influences, rested upon superstition. The rays of revelation which illumined Israel, cast glimmerings of light into the heathen world; and beside the realm of prophecy, we see that of a human presentiment, which, though obscured by error, concealed a germ of truth. Assuming, therefore, that even prior to the time of Christ the heathen meant, by their στυγεροὶ δαίμονες, not the general influence of malicious, inimical deities, but individual demons possessing individual bodies (souls from Tartarus), it by no means proves the N. T. doctrine of demoniacs false.

Equally invalid is the objection that demoniacal possessions do not now occur. We do not meet this with a mere contrary affirmation; for how should we prove their occurrence? There are insane persons who, indeed, regard themselves as possessed, but further investigation is needed to verify those impressions. Truly evangelical physicians, who have paid attention to this subject, declare they have never met with a case of real possession. The only complete proof of possession, in my opinion, would be, if, upon being commanded in the name of Christ, the unclean spirit should come out, and the patient be relieved of his sufferings. But just such proof the N. T. furnishes. Even Jews succeeded in effecting such release (Jos. Ant., 8, 2, 5, comp. Matt. 12: 27; and Justin, dial. c. Tryph., c. 85); and though, through blindness, they used some formulas from Solomon's writings, or roots and bandages (Just., l. c.; Jos. l. c., and B. J. 7, 6, 3), they attributed to them no medicinal effect, but merely some magical influence. The cures, therefore, were effected by the command uttered in Jehovah's name, and in spite of the attending superstitions. They must, therefore, have been cases of real possession; for a mere bodily disease cannot be cured by a command.—But here again rationalism has taken refuge in the assertion that it was a mere fixed idea which took possession of the mind, and could, therefore, be expelled by a mere authoritative word. This view must excite the laughter of all physicians to insane asylums. They know that "fixed ideas," which are the result of some physical derangement, cannot be permanently cured by such illusive frauds. Until the corporeal cause of them is removed they will remain fixed. So of demoniacs.—But, it is said, that possession was a bodily disease, cured by the command of Christ; and that the cases are called demoniacal possessions, merely in accommodation to the Jews who supposed them such. Apart, however, from the consideration that this theory of accommodation ascribes to the Lord conduct at variance with morality and truth, we find many passages in which he discourses upon the subject of possession in a purely theoretical way, and without having an actual case before him, assumes the reality of such cases, develops a theory of them (Matt. 12: 25, &c.), and never utters a word to undermine the common belief in them (Matt. 10: 8; 12: 43, &c.; 17: 21; Luke 10: 18, &c.; 11: 24). Those, therefore, who persist in maintaining this view soon find themselves driven to hold, that Jesus himself was in error upon the subject, and in bondage to the erroneous prejudices of his times! But the absurdity of this rationalistic inference, converts it into a proof that the foolishness of God is wiser than the craftiness of man.—Most untenable of all is that wavering half-way scepticism which combines the opinion that Jesus erred in regard to these cases, with some faith in his divine mission and power to work miracles. Whilst those who hold this view accede that supernatural powers dwelt in the person of Jesus, they arrogate to themselves a superior ability to decide upon the precise nature of the maladies he cured. But they never saw N. T. demoniacs, to say nothing of curing them. Jesus, however, both saw and healed them. Why then should their opinions of the nature of the malady prevail against the judgment of him who commanded the storm and the waves, and could, moreover, look into the very heart of man? The sceptic's Christ, who is in doubt as to the nature of demoniacal possessions, is not the Christ of the Bible, still less the Son of God, but the fiction of modern conceits. — Decided infidelity, alone, can, consistently with itself, assume that Christ erred as to the cause and nature of possessions. Such infidelity may then reconcile itself with the N. T. in its own way. It may take refuge in the absurdity of natural explanations of miracles, and represent its Christ as applying all sorts of medicines (wholly unknown to modern pharmaceutics) working rapid cures, behind the backs of his disciples and of other witnesses; or may seize that most wonderful of all hypotheses — the hypothesis of myths. But to him who has learned to know Christ as his Saviour and Redeemer, as the Son of God who overcame sin, nature, and death, will, for the sake of the person of his Lord, receive what he has taught concerning demoniacs, as the depth of wisdom, before which his own limited and defective knowledge must bow in submission. Let the external appearances and symptoms of the malady seem ever so analogous to natural disorders of the nervous system and the mind, Christ declares that it was caused by the operations of the spirits of darkness, fallen angels, who insinuated themselves between the soul and its more delicate corporeal organs, subjected the latter to their pernicious influences, and thus produced those fearful disturbances of mind and body. The question, whether such cases really still occur, is irrelevant. For as it cannot be legitimately inferred, that because there were demoniacs in the time of Christ, the period of the sharpest conflict between light and darkness, therefore there must be such cases now; so neither can the reverse proposition be urged, any more than it could be argued that, because the dead do not now arise, Christ did not arise from the dead.

The business of evangelical and unprejudiced natural science, therefore, can only be to assume the facts as set forth, and then to attempt to show their relation to the known laws of psychology, physiology, and nosology. A fact which lies beyond and above all natural investigation, is the existence of a kingdom of darkness, a host of fallen angels. Christ teaches that there is such a kingdom, and this satisfies a healthy reason. And that which Christ and his apostles (Eph. 6: 12) affirm concerning the influence of those fallen angels upon mankind, we see corroborated by daily experience. Over against the Providence of God, we see the caricature of a quasi-providence of evil, which no human conspiracies serve to explain. Without and against their own will, hostile human powers have worked into each others hands. And there are times when no very keen scent is necessary to perceive the fumes of the abyss, which often intoxicate millions at a time, and often penetrate, like a subtle poison, the heads and hearts of the most pious people, seeking to render Christianity sickly, and the salt unsavory. — That beside this influence upon the religious moral sphere, like influences upon the physico-psychical sphere are possible, can be the less controverted, since the former influence is not to be considered a purely spiritual one, operating directly upon the will of man (for this would destroy man's freedom and responsibility. See GISEBERT VOZET., I., 943, sq. BURMANN, Synops. theol., I., 46, 54), but upon the lower faculties of the soul, and through these upon the imagination, and because these very faculties, with their organs, are open to the most manifold operations.

Thus we reach the physiological sphere. Who the fallen angels are, and what their powers are, we must learn from the teachings of Christ. But the constitution of human nature, and the union of soul and body, lies open to physiological observation; so that, however, difficult and problematical even this sphere of inquiry may be, we still can obtain definite and reliable data. — We begin with those more external maladies, which are most analogous to the sufferings of the possessed, in their appearance and symptoms. — Epilepsy is no disease, but merely a symptom, for which there may be various causes; these, however, are mostly to be found in the spine or brain. — Lunacy, also, is no disease in itself, but the effects of an excitability attending various disorders of the nervous system, under lunar influences. The injurious influence of the moon is not unknown in northern latitudes, but shows itself most in warmer climates. (Ps. 121: 6, comp. REIL, Archiv. f. Physiol., I., 133; KRETSCHMAR, de astr. in corpus hum. imperio: Jena, 1820.) — Blindness, aphony, gibbosity of the spine, are also maladies which may arise from divers causes. Only let us remember here, that there is a hysterical aphony arising from mental dulness and an eclipse of the soul, and likewise a hysterical gibbosity, and in warm countries, with nervous persons, a blindness caused by looking into the full-moon. Insanity, frenzy, and all falsely called "soul diseases," are, according to the results of the most recent investigations, not diseases of the soul, but of the more delicate corporeal organs of the soul. The recovered insane person is the same individual after as before his disease. The substance of the soul lies deeper than earthly consciousness, and in its knowledge, will, and character remains intact, whereas the action of man's consciousness of earthly objects may be checked if the requisite bodily organs are crippled. In such cases there is a reaction of the soul and body upon each other. The influence of the soul upon the body is well attested by physiognomy, &c. Covetousness, which is a purely spiritual vice, may fix itself in the brain, and become a monomania. So, indeed, of every vice. In like manner the body may act upon the soul, by a reflex influence of the overexcited organs (in vices) upon corresponding desires, and by influences which have their seat in re-manner in the soul, but in the body only, and which do not excite desires, but disturb and confuse the consciousness; thus by wounds on the head, nervous fevers, poisoning of the blood, &c. That bodily sufferings resulting in such maladies may be the effect of sin, no one will deny; but even then the sin is only the mediate cause of the insanity.—But when consciousness has once lost its balance, the innate evil desires, freed from restraint, break out most violently in the beclouded soul.—Now, in all these maladies—from epilepsy to madness—the immediate cause of suffering and derangement is a diseased irritation of single nerves, or of the entire spinal and ganglionic system, or of the membranes of the brain. We know, also, that such irritation may be produced by other than grosser corporeal, material means, as, f. i., in animal magnetism. If, therefore, it is possible for men to act upon each other through the medium of nervous influences, then the same nervous system may be susceptible of analogous influences streaming over into it from a non-human being, from a fallen angel. The influences of the latter may be different, more violent and terrible. But it is still, in every case an excitement of the nervous life, and the phenomena will be similar.—There is, therefore, not a single point, in regard to which the teachings of Christ concerning demoniacs, contradict the results of physiological investigation. Nay, both are in full harmony. There is nothing inconceivable, even, in the fact that a number of demons work together upon one human nervous system.—Neither can it be doubted that the nervous system of animals, is susceptible of similar, and even of higher degrees of excitement (as the horse) from external causes, than that of man. There is, consequently, nothing unreasonable in the case related in Matt. 8:32. DR. EBRARD.*

Denmark.—1. *Introduction of Christianity.*¹—Before the 9th cent. the Christian religion made little impression upon the inhabitants of Denmark. They had, indeed, heard much of its progress in other countries, but still clung to their old worship. The first missionary, Willebrord, of Utrecht, is said to have landed in South Jutland or Schleswig, not far from Ripen, in the beginning of the 8th cent., and met with a hospitable reception from the king of that region; but, according to Alcuin's account, he found the Danes a savage people, and the king more cruel than a wild beast, and harder of heart than a stone. He succeeded in getting, partly perhaps by purchase, 30 boys, whom he intended to educate for future missionaries. One of them, of noble descent, was St. Sebaldus (Siwald), who afterwards went to Germany and labored with great success at Nuremberg, where he died. Of the others tradition says nothing.

By degrees, however, Christianity and civilization approached the frontiers of Denmark. Charlemagne had subjugated the Saxons, and imposed upon them the laws, civil and ecclesiastical, of the Frankish empire. But the Eider put a bound both to his conquests and his conversions. He left the district of Holstein without a complete church organization, and when he concluded a peace with the neighboring Danes (811 and 813), made no stipulation in favor of Christianity. Although the beginnings in Holstein were very weak, confined to two or three strongholds, which afforded protection to the missionaries, it was something to have a Christian state on the borders of Denmark, and the final conversion of the Danes was only a work of time. To the Carolingians this must have been a matter of great importance; but the Danes were a free people, and little inclined to obey a foreign ruler; they could scarcely brook the sway of their own petty kings. Hence their conversion had to be accomplished chiefly by the power of the Word, aided by friendly negotiations and political events. Men were not wanting, who, braving all toil and danger, were willing to labor for the good of souls, until a knowledge of the truth and the progress of civilization gradually brought about a complete change among the rulers and the people. This explains why two centuries elapsed, during which Christianity overcame far greater obstacles in other lands. But the long struggle was not without advantage; for when at length the Christian faith, planted by German teachers and strengthened by English influence, gained the victory, its diffusion was more general, and its root firmer than among the other nations of the North.

The beginning of the work was occasioned by the political relations of certain chiefs in South Jutland to the Frankish emperor, and for nearly a century it was confined to that portion of the nation inhabiting the peninsula of Jutland. There, shortly after the death of Charlemagne, a dispute for the throne arose between two princely houses, and the pious emperor, Louis, made prompt use of the circumstance. His first envoy to King Harold Klak, who sought his aid, was the Archbishop Ebbo, of Rheims, a Saxon by birth, zealous for the conversion of the heathen. In 822, as legate of the Pope, Ebbo reached the city of Hedeby, now Schleswig, and preached to the King and the people. The next year he was sent with other imperial envoys to the court of the rival king, and thus penetrated further into the country; but, although during his stay in Holstein, he only made short journeys over the Danish borders, he did not cease to educate native Danes to act as missionaries. One of these, Ansfried, was afterward sent to Sweden; but the quiet labors of Ebbo, who returned to his diocese some years later, were greatly enlarged by his successors. When, in 826, King Harold was compelled to yield to the sons of Godofried, he fled to the court of the emperor, and was baptized with his wife and child at Ingelheim. Many of his people followed his example. All he saw there made a deep impression, but the most important fruit of his visit, was the sending forth of the apostle of the Danes, Ansgar, (see Art.), who laid the foundations, pointed out the means, and sowed the germs of Christianity far and wide, with permanent results.

Rembert, his successor in office (865–888) opened communication with New Corvey, and

¹ E. Pontoppidan, Annal. eccl. Dan. dipl. 1 Th. Copenh., 1741. Münter, Kirchengeschichte v. Dänemark u. Norw. Cop. 1 Th. Leipz., 1823. N. M. Petersen, Danmarks Hist. in Hedenold, 1–3, D. Kbh., 1834–37.

and introduced the use of compurgators; in certain cases the fire-ordeal was retained, even in ecclesiastical law, until wholly set aside by the Papal legate in 1222. St. Canute, who took great interest in the welfare of the slaves and freedmen, as well as the extirpation of pirates, attached new and heavier penalties to several crimes, e. g., death to murder, theft and robbery; but the mode of judicial procedure in Denmark continued as of old. Hence there was no inquisitorial process in criminal cases; all action proceeding only from the offended party or his avengers. And this state of things made it necessary for the church, not only to instruct the people by word and doctrine, but to assume also civil and judicial functions. When this began it is hard to say. At first the heads of the Church used only spiritual means; in 1055 they compelled King Svend Estridson himself, by threat of the ban, to put away his beloved queen on account of consanguinity, and after perpetrating, in 1071, a bloody deed, he had to atone for it by severe penance before the church-door. The King submitted, but whether the civil law gave power to the clergy to enforce a sentence, we do not know. No trace of it stands on record. There existed, however, ecclesiastical courts over which the Bishops presided. They took cognizance of offences against the Church, but in the course of time their jurisdiction became so widely extended as almost to overshadow those of the State. Still, amid all the confusion they may have exerted a beneficial influence upon the morals of the people.

The same may be said of the system of guilds, first introduced from England, as regards the security of the citizen. The first guild was established in honor of Canute the Saint; the second, in honor of Canute (Knud) Laward, who was killed in 1131, and canonized in 1170; the third, in honor of Eric Plougpenning, who was murdered in the 13th cent.; but besides these three royal guilds, there was a vast number of others composed of workmen and traders, all of which hallowed their bond of brotherhood by religion, and enriched the churches with altars and vicarships. They outlived their age, and in the end proved an injury to public morals as well as to the administration of justice.

In the great revolution of the 12th cent., the Church also took part. The German emperors, as in the 10th cent., then strove to make the spiritual band a stepping-stone to supremacy over Denmark, but with just as little success. The Archbishop Absalon led and supported the kings in maintaining their independence. This movement, in connection with many internal discords, promoted the transition from a democratic to an aristocratic monarchy. During the reign of Eric Eiegod the whole people still participated in the public counsels, but under Waldemar the Great (1157-82) the peasantry were forbidden to appear armed at the diet, and with the loss of arms went their vote, and at length they remained away altogether; only in the courts of justice did the freemen retain their old privileges. The kings began, after the fashion of the Bishops, to style themselves such "by the grace of God," and when the people rebelled on several occasions, and Waldemar had won the throne for his family by the sword, he had himself crowned by the Archbishop in 1157, and his minor son chosen as his successor, and crowned afterward in 1170. The canonization of his father, Knud Laward, which was connected with the coronation of his son in Ringsted, served also to increase the dignity of the crown. The king now drew around him the lords, who took the place of the people. The clergy at that time had acquired great possessions, in part by the entrance of men of the most distinguished families into their ranks, and in part by gifts. The dissensions after the death of King Niels, compelled the Bishops and their noble allies to place themselves at the head of public affairs, and when Waldemar had united the kingdom under his sceptre, he advanced the nobility, and appointed from their number royal bailiffs, or feudatories, over the whole realm. Against these two classes of lords an insurrection broke out in Schonen in 1180, but it only served to strengthen the power of both. The government was gradually established on this basis, the provincial laws were recorded and greatly multiplied, and at length a general statute-book, that of Jutland, appeared in 1241. All this was accomplished by the help of the great men of the Church, for, during the whole period, the crown and the crosier stood in the most friendly relation to each other.

The progress of the hierarchy was not a little furthered by the archbishopric. This office, till 1223, was in the hands of two allied families, the last of which (Skjalm Hvides), in the 12th and 13th centuries, gave to the Church 11 Bishops and Archbishops; both sprang from the race of Palnatoke. The first Archbishop, Ascer or Ansgar (1104-37), put an end to the intercourse with England. His nephew and successor, Eskil (1137-77), took a lively interest in the monastic system. Educated at Hildesheim, he entertained a profound reverence for the great Bernard, of Clairvaux; he paid him a visit, kept up a constant correspondence with him, and filled his new monasteries with monks from Citeaux and Clairvaux. They are said to have done good service in uprooting the remains of heathenism and promoting morality. He finished also the cathedral of Lund in 1145, and increased greatly the splendor of the worship there, besides enlarging the school attached to it. Coming into collision with the government in Waldemar's time, he spent 7 years abroad, and at length, with the consent of the Pope, resigned his office into the hands of Absalon, in order to end his days at the tomb of Bernard († 1182). Absalon (see Art.), more renowned for his heroic deeds and statesmanship than for theological and scientific culture, but strong in his love for the fatherland and the Church, did the most for the organization of both.

In 1201 he died. Andreas Sunesen, his nephew, succeeded him (1201-23). Like him in patriotism and zeal for the Church, he surpassed his predecessor in learning. In the times of these Archbishops, intellectual culture in Denmark rose to its acme. The first Danes, who strove after higher knowledge, had visited Bologna; in Lucca, and at Piacenza Eric Eiegod had founded hospitia for their accommodation; later, they frequented German schools, like Hildesheim, but from the middle of the 12 cent. found their way to Paris alone, and very many men of the first families entered its famous University, where then already a Collegium Danicum (the second in order of the many colleges) was established. The "Paris-clerks" received the best positions at home, and frequently maintained with the first men of the age (as Bernard and Innocent III.) a correspondence, which must have exerted upon them a great influence. Many French monks also, among whom was William of St. Genoveva († 1203), went to Denmark. One fruit of this love of science was seen in the first native contributions to the history of the fatherland. Through the persuasion of Absalon, the national sagas and traditions, up to 1187, were collected and published by Saxo Grammaticus and Svend Aagesen. The canon law was brought into use and explained by William, former abbot at Ebelholt. Andreas Sunesen expounded the civil law in Latin, and as he was a Doctor of Theology, and had, perhaps, taught it in Paris, where he had been at least once Rector of the University, he composed in verse, also in Latin, a work on Christian dogmatics, and another on the Seven Sacraments. Homer, Bishop of Ribe († 1203), founded a considerable library, and books were important articles of presentation in the will of Absalon. The least of this circle of men was Gunner (1221-51), one of the framers of the Jutish code. Some Danes also who remained abroad have won a name in literature. Schools there were likewise at home, attached to the cathedral-churches and in the monasteries; but none of them rose to any eminence; we know that Gunner taught many of the younger clergy in his own house. But this fair dawning light of science was extinguished toward the middle of the 13th cent., by the unhappy conflicts which sprang up between the throne and the hierarchy. The troops of mendicant monks, who, from 1221, thronged into the country, may have aided also in bringing about a change in the spirit of the age.

The monastic system formed itself, according to the circumstances of the new Church, in the usual way, and nearly all the Danish lords' convents (Herrenklöster)¹ belong to this first epoch of the middle ages. Those founded by Canute the Great seem chiefly to have been designed for the spread of the faith; hence some of them in the cities were converted into chapters or took their place, whilst others gave way to unions of the parochial clergy. In the country they did not flourish, and most of them went down in the 12th cent. The oldest monks were the Benedictines, who came from England; yet we find early traces of the Cluniacs, who were then called in Denmark "the Black Friars," but only a single cloister of this order (that of All Saints in Lund) survived for any length of time. The 12th cent. was the golden period of the Danish monasteries; kings, bishops, and nobles vied with each other in doing them honor. The Benedictines continued to flourish; but the Cistercians, through the favor of Eskil and Absalon, seem to have acquired rapidly many large and wealthy convents; the Premonstrants and Augustinians followed after. The monks of these orders, or at least the heads of the convents, were brought from Citeaux and Clairvaux; from the same source Eskil obtained Carthusians, but they soon left a land, whose climate did not agree with their rule. The monasteries did little for the strengthening of Christianity, but much for civilization and general culture, the instruction of youth, and the preservation of the sciences. The first book, written in Denmark, was produced by an English Benedictine in the monastery of St. Canute at Odense. Saxo and Svend Aagesen were monks, and Absalon commanded the Cistercians of the monastery in Sorø, founded by him, and richly endowed by his father, to note down the events of the times, and from other cloisters were issued, not only chronicles of the same kind, but also historical biographies, and the first work on medicine (Henrik Harpestreng, † 1244). The language used was Latin. Here reigned a fresh love of poetry and historic narrative, the last reflected splendor of a national life, soon to be smothered by stupid legends and spiritual bondage. Monasticism itself, at the close of our period, aided in this sad work; the Mendicant Friars, at the command of the Pope, came thither, and monasteries of both the great orders, Franciscans and Dominicans, rose in all the cities.

It remains to show how celibacy and investiture, the two great levers of the hierarchy, were introduced into Denmark. From the middle of the 11th cent., the Popes had frequently complained of the evil practices of the Danish Church, and exhorted the kings to send noble youths to Rome to study the canon law. Among these evil practices may have been reckoned the marriage of priests, for the custom was so general that the Archbishop, Eskil, himself was married, or is said to have been. From the 12th cent. onward, the Popes sent legates to Denmark again and again, but with little effect. During the episcopate of Ascer (Ansgar) the first decree concerning the separation of priests from their wives is said to have been issued (1121); but they gave little heed to it, and public opinion was so divided that a knight in Sealand, who had founded a monastery, rode about (1130), in order to enforce celibacy at the point of the sword, on which occasion a few priests were murdered by the peasants; on the other hand, in the insurrection in Schonen (1180), the peasants demanded the abolition of celibacy. The Bishops and Archbishops, especially Absalon, took up the matter, supported by papal legates and the power of the ban; and though Innocent III. had to yield (since he granted the possibility of marriage as a privilege), Gregory de Crescentio came (1222) to Denmark to enforce the decree. Several hundred priests then appealed from the Pope to a General Council; but the legate, at a national synod convened in Schleswig, caused the papal decree to be read, and deprived the children of priests of the right of inheritance. Another legate, Otto of St. Nicolas, turned (1230) the sword of the Church against the wives, so that they also fell under the ban, whilst the priests were suspended, and at length excommunicated. Thus they succeeded, by severity and kindness (e. g., in 1263 not less than 50 sons of priests were admitted to office in the Church), and by a pledge given to do away by degrees with public concubinage (still recognized by the law of the land as legal marriage); but in spite of all the laws, it continued in secret; for the national Council at Copenhagen, in 1425, found it necessary to renew the prohibition. In the more distant north it was still practised.

¹ So all the monasteries in Denmark, endowed with property and lands, were called, in opposition to those of the Mendicants and Hospitallers.

The great controversy of the age of Gregory and his successors did not affect the Danish Church. In the 11th cent., since there were no chapters as yet, the king filled the bishoprics. A papal legate appointed the first Archbishop; but during his term of office the idea must have sprung up of the right of choice by canons and the people jointly; for at his decease, 1137, both exercised it in Lund and Roeskilde. King Eric Emun, it is true, favored Eskil, on whom the people wished to confer the rich inheritance; but after his death, Eric Lam acted on a new principle. At the first national Council, held in Lund (1139), he brought about a dispute respecting the right of choice between two clerical corporations in Odence, and had the decision so confirmed by the Pope, that the one alone (without mention of the people) should have authority to fill the vacant seat of the Bishop from their own number, or at pleasure. Even Waldemar the Great resigned the right which he claimed, of nominating the Bishop of Roeskilde, when, in 1158, a dispute arose there between the clergy and the people. Thus the choice, without any express law, passed out of the hands of the kings. The chapters, on their part, had no intention of going counter to the royal wish. The result was that Absalon, on the recommendation of the King, received all their votes, and most of the Bishops in Ribe at that time came from the court; the parties elect also did not hesitate to do homage to the crown. The people were soon obliged to yield to the papal legate, and only high ecclesiastical authority appeared to threaten the freedom of choice. Eskil obtained permission to appoint his successor; Peter Jacobson received from the Pope the expectancy of the see of Roeskilde (1198), and a papal legate presented Gunner to the Viborg chapter. In the beginning of the 13th cent., also, some examples occurred in which the chapters disregarded the wishes of the king; but for the first time, toward the middle of it, the parties elect refused to do homage; the development of the hierarchy had completed itself.

II. From the 13th cent. intercourse with France gradually ceased, and the connection with Germany became stronger and stronger. The same was the case with Rome, and a door was thus opened for the introduction of many abuses.

The taxes on church-lands first caused the Danish clergy to look to the Pope for aid. It was soon found that the new decretals, taught at Paris, and praised by the mendicant friars, promised a far greater independence of the State than the civil law. The first man of note who took this ground was the Archbishop, Jacob Erlandsen (1254-74). He was a scion of that race from which nearly all the Archbishops and many of the Bishops had sprung. He had become acquainted with the new papal law, probably in France and Italy, was an eyewitness of the contest of the Popes with the house of the Hohenstaufen, had served Innocent IV. as chaplain, and, as deputy of the Danish Archbishop, had defended him with skill at the Council of Lyons (1245). The Pope appointed him Bishop of Roeskilde (1249), in the place of Niels Stigsen, who had died in exile. He very soon showed himself a most determined hierarch, referred to the Pope in all matters, and followed the new decretals as the voice of heaven; hence he treated with contempt all native laws and all the wishes of the king, in defiance of whom he appointed Bishops, convoked synods, and published decrees; he usurped supreme authority over the ecclesiastical domains, exempted the peasants of the Church from the jurisdiction of the civil courts, and lessened in every way the rights of the State. But when King Christopher, his son, Eric Glipping (1259-86), and his grandson, Eric Menved (1286-1319), attempted to maintain the prerogatives of the crown, a conflict arose, like that of the Hohenstaufen, which lasted for more than half a century. No means were left untried by the ecclesiastical dignitaries to accomplish their end. The throne, it is true, gained the victory; but, as the nobles took advantage of the strife to increase their power, scarcely anything was left but the shadow of royalty. In this contest, the lower clergy wavered between the duty they owed to the King and the fatherland, and the obedience they owed to Rome.

In a totally different way the heads of the Church at length obtained what they had sought through the aid of the Pope; at the death of Eric Menved there was no heir to the crown: the choice of a King and the supreme power fell to the lords; the peasants had become in part bondsmen; the formation of a burgher class had been stifled in the germ. When now the spiritual and temporal lords elected the brother of the deceased, Christopher II., who had made common cause with the murderers of his father, and was ready for anything in order to win the sceptre, they laid down to him certain conditions in the first covenant (1320). Thus a charter was formed, under which the Church could secure and extend her rights and privileges, and in which, also, a mediation was obtained between the Church and the State, since a share in the government of the kingdom was granted to the prelates. The clergy were now freed from the payment of taxes, exempted from the jurisdiction of the civil courts, and rendered inviolable in their persons and property, except at the command of the Pope. Another very important article forbade the King to declare war, or enact any law without the consent and advice "of the prelates and the best men of the realm." After a reign of 13 unhappy years, Christopher died in 1333, and his decease was followed by an interregnum, during which the Church had to protect herself as she best could.

True to the royal house and the nation, several

Bishops labored to place the last scion of the old race on the throne. Waldemar Atterdag (1340–75) found faithful council and support from the clergy alone, although the severe and not always just rule of the great Restorer in that troublous time demanded great sacrifices on the part of the Church. Taxes were levied; Copenhagen, till then an episcopal city, passed into the hands of the King, and the sacred vessels of the Churches were given up; but the kingdom was saved. He was not, however, a very devoted son of the Church, although he visited the Holy Sepulchre in 1345, and the Pope in Avignon in 1364; it concerned him little, when the Pope placed him under the ban for making that pilgrimage without his permission; yet he did not disdain to use ecclesiastical weapons, for he complained in 1370 of his own subjects to the Pope; but when the latter, moved by their counter-complaints, reproved him for his cruelty, and threatened him with excommunication, he is said to have declared in bitter words the independence of the crown, and Gregory XI. did not venture to put his threat into execution. The national Church in the reign of Waldemar declined not a little in wealth and honor, and needed careful supervision. The great plague, the “black death” (1338–50), unfruitful seasons, the flood of 1362, and other calamities, were regarded as judgments of heaven upon her. At length some nobles and Bishops united in the monastery of Viborg (1375), in order to restore and maintain her rights. A change occurred at the death of the King (1375). His daughter, the wise Margaret, ruled as guardian and regent of Denmark, and then of all the three kingdoms of the north. The pious spirit of this “mother of the clergy” exhibited itself in donations and institutions of every kind, as well as the faithful observance of every religious duty. The charter, which she subscribed in the name of her son, confirmed “the liberties and rights of the Church, to the fullest extent they had ever been enjoyed,” and this remained the rule for all after ages, with one addition: “as they may be granted by the Holy Roman Church and Christian Princes.” The enumeration of the special rights and immunities was gradually completed. But the most important event of the times of Queen Margaret was the formation, through the Calmarian Union and other circumstances, of the State-Council, which, for Denmark in the 15th cent., represented both the people and the crown, now exercising the functions of the one (in the election of the King, taxation, legislation), and then of the other (during his absence, or an interregnum), whilst it took part with the King in all acts of government. In this Council sat all the Bishops of the realm by virtue of their office, along with 2 to 4 prelates from the monasteries or chapters; a like or less number of lords, chosen by the King, formed its secular element. Thus peace between the Church and the State was guaranteed, unless the Council should be at variance with itself, which did not happen until the opening of the Reformation. The freedom of the national Church, also, from the papal see, was in some measure secured; the Archbishops discontinued their visits to Rome; the two-fold position of the Bishops mediated between the decrees of the Pope and the State; they even aided in framing the article of the charter which forbade the conferring of a benefice on any foreigner. The Pope conceded this point, but, notwithstanding, in 1488 and 1499, claimed the old privilege. The secularization of all the higher clergy was the sad result; many Bishops now employed suffragans or coadjutors, in order to devote themselves wholly to worldly business; the canons did the same thing, and the high councillors of State were regarded as little more than noble feudatories of the Church. Whether the Church was endangered thereby is uncertain; it is said that, towards the close of the 15th cent., the Hussite heresy found its way into Denmark, and that many nobles who marched with King Hans, in 1500, against the Ditmarskers, were infected with the new doctrines, and resolved, on their return, to divide the fiefs of the Church amongst themselves; but they all perished, and the story may only have existed in the fancy of the monk who tells it. Canonicates were at length given to boys of noble birth, and in 1519 it was decreed, that no one who was not noble, could become a bishop. Under this title, also, the highest earthly sovereignty could be enjoyed; the Bishop of Roeskilde possessed, beside his tithes, so many estates that he owned a third of all Sealand. The Bishops, moreover, exercised royal prerogatives, such as the coinage of money, the appropriation of stranded vessels and goods, the conferring of patents of nobility, and the like; and since they frequently took part in the administration of justice in their dioceses, we can readily see how the last Bishop of Roeskilde, when the throne was vacant, could assert with truth that “the Bishop was king in his own diocese.” Hence the Reformation had to be also a civil revolution in Denmark.

By this union of the Church and State, the old ecclesiastical tribunals were able to keep their ground. Up to the time of Waldemar IV., they had only dealt with criminals of importance, but after that their sphere was largely extended. The execution of sentences in private cases was linked with great difficulties, owing to the Danish laws; but the clerical court had the ban of the Church as a means of compulsion. The Popes had used it even against Kings; whoever refused to submit was put to great cost and trouble. When now the clergy laid down the necessity of appeal to the Bishop’s court, it became the universal custom. The jury was chosen by the Bishop or his officials from the people or nobility; and the rule by which judgment was given was the Common Law, yet so that the Canon and Roman Law could be used, in case it appeared more just, or in case of defect in the national code. In the 15th cent. this clerical administration of justice increased to such a degree that the civil courts fell into decay; this occasioned great complaint. Christian II. proposed to check the abuse, because “poor people were condemned and deprived of the sacrament on account of debt and other matters, the adjustment of which belongs to the civil courts;” but nothing was done, until Frederick I., at the time of the Reformation, put an end to this lucrative practice. All causes of a spiritual nature were still left to the ecclesiastical courts, as well as all those in which the clergy were involved; Pope Nicolas V. granted, in 1449, at the request of the King, that all such cases should be first tried in the land itself, by its own judges, and not by the papal nuncio in Germany, or any other, which article was embodied in the royal charter. Christian II. attempted to do away with appeals to the Pope, by erecting a new supreme court for the kingdom, but failed in his scheme.

In spite of all the secularization and abuses the spiritual wants of the people were not badly cared for. In the days of Waldemar II., a papal legate caused the monk, who was a candidate for a bishopric, to preach before him in Latin, only because he did not understand Danish; the Dominican friars preached in the mother-tongue, and one of them in the 13th cent. wrote an exposition of Luke. The order of worship received much attention in the 14th cent.; many new festivals were introduced, and church-singing was greatly improved. King Waldemar IV. loved music; Eric, the Pomeranian, obliged the canons to do their duty, and established singing in several churches. The "black death," which at first diminished the number of the churches, rather inspired terror than penitence: the Flagellants made their appearance, but were put down by the king, even before the Pope interfered. The plague and the consequent famine led to the appointment of an annual day of humiliation. In the Danish churches we find no trace of foolish customs elsewhere in vogue; sacred dramas, then so common in other countries, appear to have been unknown, and with all the excessive decoration of churches and altars, and in spite of the many masses for souls, the gospel was still preached in the mother-tongue. A translation of the Bible existed in the 15th cent., fragments of which yet remain, and although all the missals and breviaries, except one, were in Latin, the whole service was not performed in that language. But, shortly before the Reformation, there must have been great neglect, since many parishes had only one clergyman, and he often living in a distant monastery. In the towns, however, were found pastors, vicars, and mass-priests in large numbers.

When, in the 15th cent., a call for a reformation was made throughout Christendom, the need of it may have been little felt in Denmark. The Papal schism had not disturbed her peace; no heresies existed there; true, indeed, the Pope had appointed, in 1402 (just when Eric the Pomeranian, had won the hand of an English princess), an inquisitor for Denmark, and in 1421 another was appointed by the Bishop of Schleswig for the north; but in both cases it may have been precaution rather than necessity (only a few Waldenses had penetrated into Ditmarsken), and hence the Papal Inquisition makes no figure in Danish history. The government and the higher clergy might have desired a limitation of the Papal power; the people were only anxious for the moral reformation of their spiritual guides, at least the rebellious peasants of Schleswig, in 1439, cherished such hopes from the Synod at Basel. The Danish Church, however, was prepared to profit by these movements. Of her two representatives at Costnitz, the Bishops of Schleswig and Ribe, the latter, Peter Lykke, greatly distinguished himself: an accomplished theologian, he delivered a speech against Huss, in which he exhorted the Emperor to uproot the heresy; against the Pope he advocated liberal principles, was sent as ambassador to the Spanish Pope, and chosen as one of the procurators of the German nation. At home, in 1425, when Archbishop (1418-36), he convened a national council, which issued 30 decrees in favour of reform. At Basel the deputies were the Bishop of Ribe and the archdeacon, Jens Iversen Lange, jur. utr. dr. and afterward Bishop of Aarhusen. The Basel Decrees were accepted in Denmark, but the direct result was only a few statutes enacted by particular Bishops. The only greater reform of the 15th cent. concerned a numerous order of monks; the strict observance of their rule was revived in most of the Franciscan monasteries.

There was one event of special importance. King Eric, the Pomeranian (1412-39), introduced the first Carmelite friars from Germany, and erected for them several convents, in order to profit by their learning. They paved the way for the great Reformation.

In learning there was slow progress after the 13th cent. From the days of Mg. Mogensen, advocate of Eric Menved, who created an epoch in logic, through the whole 14th cent., many Danes went to Paris; but dialectic scholasticism was ill-suited to Denmark and canon-law little needed. In the beginning of the 15th cent., there was some improvement; the Archbishop, Peter Lykke, distinguished himself as a theologian; a monk in Odense, Thomas Gheismer (of Stralsund), attempted to bring down the history of the nation after the chronicles of former ages. King Eric, the Pomeranian, also loved learning, and had a special fondness for history; a chronicle of his age bears his name. As he called the Carmelites to Denmark, so he was the first to broach the idea of a Northern University. But the Pope refused permission to teach theology, and added other conditions, which delayed the work for half a century. The Danish students, instead of Paris, now went mostly to Cologne, Prague, Erfurt, Rostock, Leipsic, and Greifswald. At length Christian I. (1448-81) founded the Danish University. On a visit to Rome, in 1474, he obtained the full consent of the Pope; Copenhagen was chosen as its seat, whilst Sweden placed hers at Upsala. The Church was to furnish the means, and the Bishop of Roeskilde to be chancellor. But the funds were scanty, and the royal deputy, Mg. Peter Albrechtsen, the Vice-chancellor, brought the first teachers (1479) from Cologne, then the abode of a gloomy scholasticism. Hence the new institution bore little fruit, and the King could hardly prevent the students from going abroad. At length two monastic orders united their efforts to found at the University a college, which exerted a most important influence in favor of the Reformation. The Carmelite provincial established it for the young men of his own and of the Cistercian Order, and King Christian II. (1513-23) endowed it. The head of the College, the Carmelite monk, Paul Eliä, was by a reasonable share of classical culture, and the study of the Church Fathers, raised far above the reigning barbarism and formalism, and was filled beside with a love for the Holy Scriptures, and a great zeal for practical piety. About this time several laymen also brought home some of the first fruits of the revival of letters, and the call of the Saxon Reformer reached the ears of the enlightened sovereign. For the last time (1517-18) were the Danes defrauded by the dealer in indulgences, Arcimboldi (see Art.); Paul Eliä is said to have condemned the traffic in the cloister at Helsingöer before Luther attacked Tetzel. But the Reformation did not spring from this cause in Denmark.

3. *The Reformation.*¹—If the will of a king could have accomplished it, Denmark would have been one of the first countries to receive the Reformation. The clear-sighted, but inconsiderate and cruel Christian II. (1513-23) had long cherished the desire to reduce the ancient rights and privileges of the nobles and clergy. Related to the Saxon princes, and surrounded by a trusty circle of friends and advisers, among whom was Paul Eliä, he followed with sympathy all that was done at Wittenberg. He wished to begin the work at once. Scarcely had Luther issued his Address to the German Nobility, when he asked (1520) for a German teacher to preach as royal chaplain to the people of his capital; a follower of Carlstadt, Martin Reinhard, was sent, but made little impression, although at first supported by Paul Eliä. In 1521 the King made an attempt, by a new envoy, to procure Luther himself, or Carlstadt, or some other. The issue of the Diet of Worms gave him some hope of Luther, who in those days could not have viewed with indifference the offer of a mighty monarch of three kingdoms; but Carlstadt and Mg. Gabler only responded to the call. They found a great change of circumstances. Troubled by the consequences of the Stockholm massacre, exhorted by his brother-in-law, the Emperor, and threatened anew by the Pope for the decapitation of two bishops, the King saw himself obliged to yield; in the Netherlands, where he met Alexander at the Imperial Court, he promised to retrace his steps, although he expressed to Erasmus the conviction, that the Church needed the very strongest medicine. Carlstadt retired before his return, and the light confined itself to the narrower circle of the king and his intimate friends, by whom a beginning was made at the translation of the N. T., after Erasmus. Paul Eliä was no longer in this circle; he had broken with the tyrant, and had already taken offence at the breach of the Reformation with Rome. The King now tried what could be done by laws; a voluminous code was prepared in 1521, in which many changes were made in regard to ecclesiastical affairs; the independence of the national church was aimed at, as well as the limitation of the hierarchy; one of its statutes even made the marriage of the clergy of every grade a condition in the purchase of property. But when, in the autumn of 1521, the legate, John de Potentia, came to Denmark to investigate the part played by the King in the Stockholm massacre, the latter was not only obliged to annul that statute, but to alter much else, before the code was published, in 1522, as a special law for the cities. It was short-lived; for after the deposition of the King it was abrogated and burnt. His yielding to the legate was of no avail. The nobles and prelates renounced their allegiance, and in 1523 placed his uncle, Frederic I., on the throne. The exiled King and his adherents, who followed him abroad, continued, however, to labor for his restoration and the cause of the Reformation at the same time. He caused the first Danish translation of the N. T. to be printed at Leipsic in 1524, and sent it to Denmark, adorned with his likeness and accompanied by an apology, drawn up by his most important co-laborer, Hans Michelsen. Luther also espoused his cause against the Danish magnates. But his religious instability stood greatly in the way of his political interests, and he was so weak, that in 1530, at Augsburg, in order to secure the aid of the Emperor, he again renounced the evangelical faith, and in Norway (1531) promised to uphold the Romish Church. The party, which afterward took up arms for him, raised the banner of Protestantism once more, and in the darkness of a prison (from 1532) he returned to his true convictions, and consoled himself with the Danish Bible († 1559).

The relation of the Reformation to the fugitive King must have done it more harm than good. Frederic I. (1523-33) was bound by treaty to punish to the death all heretics, followers of Luther, and others; the entire Council of State and the nobility pledged themselves to put down heretical preaching and the books of Luther, and the government at least had to forbid books which might open the way for the return of the exiled King. But the considerate Frederic, from conviction as well as policy, was favorable to the Reformation, and did not refuse his protecting hand, when it penetrated from several quarters. And now appear on the stage of action the duchies bordering on Germany. In both the good work was soon begun under German influence. From Holstein it spread rapidly into Schleswig, supported by the Low Dutch translation of the N. T. (1523), and a living intercourse with Wittenberg and Lower Saxony. The Duke and Prince Christian (since the Diet of Worms a faithful adherent of Luther), the nobles and the burghers embraced it. Since 1522, the vicar, Hermann Tilst, one of its ablest champions, had preached at Husum; the burghers protected him, the King appointed him his chaplain. Others made their appearance in other cities; and, in 1524, the King proclaimed toleration, so that no one, whether Papist or Lutheran, could be molested on the score of his religion. Immediately the government, or the citizens, called many evangelical teachers from Germany. The chapter of Schleswig offered a sum of money for the defence of the Catholic faith; but neither the Bishop, Gottschalch v.

¹ Pontoppidan, Reformationshist. d. Dänischen K.: Lübeck: 1734, and his Ann. Eccl. Dan., 3 vol. Münter, Den danske Reformationshist.: Cop., 1802; and his Kirchengesch. Dänem. u. Norw., 3 Th.: Leips., 1833. C. T. Engelstoft, Paulus Eliä, en biographisk historisk Skildring.: Cop., 1848 (also in N. Hist. Tidsskr. 2 Bd.).

Ahlefeldt, nor the other heads of the Church, ventured to oppose the tide; the evangelical party had only to contend with fanatical Anabaptists and adventurers (especially Melchior Hoffmann); but, after a religious conference held in Flensburg (1529), they were banished. Very quietly and gradually the mass-priests were pensioned off; and the mendicant cloisters deserted, or applied to other uses. When the cities had effected these reforms, a visitation of the country was undertaken in 1527; but the churches, in lack of a common law, took various measures, according to the usage and caprice of the patrons and congregations: the Bishop's tithes ceased; the others were much diminished; worship had no fixed rule, and so it continued till 1542, when the new ecclesiastical law was published. So, too, the Romish churches continued along with the new, until at last they were reduced to the chapter and a few cloisters. As late as 1528, the Bishop purified a desecrated village church, and preached the customary indulgence; and when, in 1533, he was invited to the election of the King, he had the boldness to demand that the new sovereign should pledge himself to restore the Romish worship, and that the heir of the duchies should promise to leave the remaining ecclesiastical foundations unchanged, until the two kingdoms to which the duchies belonged, should obtain their final reformation. This occurred in Denmark (1536), but the rest of the Romish churches in Schleswig held their ground much longer; the Bishop died in 1541; an evangelical successor was chosen, and supported by the revenues of the cathedral; but the estates of the bishopric and chapter were entrusted to the hands of evangelical prelates (scholars and princes), until confiscated in 1661. One nunnery was retained as an asylum for women of noble birth, as well as three in Holstein for the same purpose.

The rapid progress of evangelical preaching in the duchy was soon felt in the kingdom, but the issue there was very different; native teachers were needed, and the hierarchy prepared itself for stout resistance. Apparently profound peace reigned during the first years of the new king, till 1526; but the fire glowed under the ashes. Some men had become acquainted with the Gospel abroad; several were even then at the university of Wittenberg; from the school of Morten Borup, in Aarhus, went many future preachers of the truth; in the Carmelite college, at Copenhagen, and other schools, over which Paul Eliä stood as provincial, biblical Christianity was expounded, and the wants of the Church considered. The Danish translation of the N. T. was eagerly read, and awakened no little doubt concerning doctrine, and gave occasion to discussions upon religious topics. Luther's writings also crept in through the booksellers, e. g., his Short Forms for the study of the Ten Commandments, which Paul Eliä translated in 1524, and published in 1526. This man also took an active interest in a translation of the Psalms of David, which his scholar, Frands Wormordsen, of the Carmelite college, had made, after the version of Luther, and published in 1528. But this same Paul Eliä vacillated between the sharp contradictions of the old and the new, when they came into collision, and hence his name has come down to us dishonored (Paul Vendekaabe, i. e. weather-cock). Drawn more and more into controversy, his irritable temper grew hot, and he poured out the roughest abuse upon the leaders of the Reformation. And yet, with all this rude behavior, he always sympathized with them to a certain degree, though he never succeeded in gaining the full confidence which he deserved. Like another Erasmus, he wished a Reformation confined to dogmas, and without a breach with Rome.

The new light began now to spread beyond the circle of the learned. In 1525, the King sanctioned the circulation of the Bible, and in 1526, appeared as an open advocate of the Reformation. Part of the Danish nobility sided with him; the scarcity of money aided the cause. In 1566, it was decreed that no money should go out of the kingdom for the confirmation of the Bishops and other clergy, but that such confirmation must be sought from the canon, thus making the national Church independent of Rome. When now evangelical preachers appeared, the burghers soon acknowledged the truth, and the peasantry kept back their gifts and part of the tithes. The movement began in Jutland: from Schleswig, especially Hadersleben, where many German preachers and teachers were assembled at the court of the prince, the new doctrine spread, in 1526, over the whole peninsula. It found its first strong foothold in Viborg; a man then dwelt there who distinguished himself above all others as the Reformer of Denmark. Hans Tauson, a Johanneite monk, a native of Fyen, had been sent, in 1522, at the expense of the monastery of Antvorskov, to the German universities; but, attracted by the fame and writings of Luther, had exchanged Cologne and Louvain for Wittenberg, where he became thoroughly imbued with the new doctrine. His prior recalled him, threw him into prison, and sent him to a more learned prior at Viborg. But here he preached the Gospel, was shielded by the citizens from the power of the Bishop, and at length (1526) accepted as a chaplain of the King. A school was established by royal consent, and put in charge of another disciple of Luther, Jörgen Sadolin, who was assisted by several monks. And so it was in other cities which the new preachers entered, with letters of safe-conduct from the King. In vain the Bishops warned; in vain they invited the zealots, Eck and Cochlæus, to come and fight the heretics; in vain they reminded the King of his coronation oath. The Council of State even thought the issue of such letters imprudent: but the King defended himself by saying, that he did not protect the Lutheran heresy, but the preaching of God's Word; that the privileges he had sworn to respect were mostly of a secular kind. The movement, however, demanded a legal sanction; in Odense (1527) a diet was held, which laid the foundation for reform. The prelates were obliged to yield many of their claims, in order to preserve the rest. But when the entire Council of State wished to restore the power of the Bishops over the ministry, on condition that they would suffer the Gospel to be preached, the King insisted on the toleration of Lutheranism, and a thorough reform of the clergy. He succeeded in forming a constitution in which full religious liberty was guaranteed, until the meeting of an Œcumenical Council. By a royal decree, the monks and the clergy were allowed to marry. Thus all spiritual jurisdiction was taken from the Bishops; they did not yield, however, but kept up a long and desperate struggle.

On the basis of the Odense Constitution, the new Church soon rose. The art of printing now did great service; the evangelical teachers, Tausen at their head, sent forth numerous pamphlets and books, devotional, liturgical, and polemical; a new translation of the N. T., after Luther, by Christian Pedersen, appeared; every attack of the Romanists, especially of Paul Eliä, was stoutly repelled. In Viborg (1529), all the churches of the city, save the cathedral, with the Bishop and his chapter, were organized upon evangelical principles. From 1528, Malmöe became a new and very important centre for the Eastern part of the kingdom; hither flocked the teachers who were driven from Copenhagen, mostly from the school of Paul Eliä, and, with the approval of the King, founded, in 1529, a high school, from the old church revenues: in the same year, all that remained of Romanism was expelled from the city. In Copenhagen, the King himself opened the door by calling Hans Tausen to the church of St. Nicolas, in 1529, and within one year, the Reformation had progressed as far as in Viborg. His removal led Tausen to ordain evangelical preachers; this act was followed, especially in Malmöe. Such was the advance of the new Church, as to its cultus and ministry; its confession came in 1530. In this year the evangelical cause received a new impulse from a diet held in Copenhagen. The Bishops had desired an investigation; they wished to prove the new teachers to be heretics, and complained of their assumption of the right of ordaining. The King may have cherished the design of compelling them to yield. Both parties, as usual in judicial cases, were summoned before the supreme court, composed of the King and the Council of State, in order (as was said) to bring about a Christian Reformation and concord in the realm. With confidence and lively hope, the evangelical preachers of the whole kingdom obeyed the summons, and on the 9th or 11th of July offered a confession of faith in 43 articles, which, though of independent origin, very closely agrees with that of Augsburg. This confession was explained to the people in all the churches, and the city was won. The prelates had now to look abroad for aid; a Dr. Stagefyr and a Dr. from Bomberg responded to their call. They preferred 27 points of complaint against the doctrine and conduct of the preachers; the latter answered, and preferred 12 of their own. But there was no decision; the prelates postponed their reply to the defence of the heretics, and the preachers strove to procure from the King a decree in favor of the Reformation; but he could do no more than promise to support them in the preaching of the Gospel. Neither party was satisfied; but the evangelicals, who had passed the ordeal unhurt, gained new strength, and assumed in part what the King had not ventured to grant. In several cities the mass was now abolished as idolatrous; in Copenhagen the cathedral was stormed by the people and closed by the government. The university was dissolved. In Viborg the cathedral was reformed, and in many cities the convents were evacuated, not always without violence, and once, in Schonen, with bloodshed. The King gave the monasteries and churches to the cities, the former even to particular men; he caused the gold and silver found in them to be used for the needs of war, and laid heavy taxes upon the clergy. With the extinction of the service for which they were bestowed, the nobles withheld the gifts of their ancestors. Everything threatened the downfall of Romanism. The enraged prelates held their peace; after a hot battle for the mass, Paul Eliä refrained from publishing his severest controversial work, and it seemed as if some of the Bishops felt the necessity of submission. Knud Gyldenstierne, the diocesan of Fyen, called Jörgen Sadolin as preacher to Odense, caused him to translate the catechism of Luther and the Augsburg Confession and commanded the pastors to employ themselves with such doctrine; he wished it to be tested. Several other circumstances gave brighter hopes to the evangelical party, whilst Tausen urged upon the King the need of reforming the Bishops by the exercise of his royal power. But suddenly relief came to the prelates; Frederick died in April, 1533.

No successor had been chosen, and a new election could not immediately take place, owing to the connection of the kingdom with Norway; there was also a diversity of opinion: the prelates feared Duke Christian, and preferred his minor-brother, who might be won over: the election was postponed a whole year. During this interregnum the prelates triumphed, and made an attempt to suppress the Reformation. In spite of a majority of votes, they converted an ambiguous resolution of the council into a law, by which to abolish religious liberty; all teachers were to be subject to the Bishops; who were to have the sole care of instruction and worship; those without call were to be banished, or prosecuted in the civil courts; no convent could be broken up, and it was proposed to restore those that had been, as well as to erect a high school for the education of the clergy. Such a law was the more dangerous, because the Bishop, aided by a few of the councillors, was to administer the government in each diocese, during the vacancy of the throne. But it soon became apparent, that they could not succeed; for as soon as they made a beginning with Hans Tausen, and condemned him to banishment, the indignation of the people rose to such a height, that the Bishop found it prudent to come to terms, and surrender the preacher and the churches to the citizens; yet all the Bishops were not disposed to make the same use of the law. Some of them began a systematic persecution, and, where they had the power, many preachers were driven off and punished, and many churches wrested again from the citizens. The ban of excommunication was freely used. But it came too late to produce any effect upon public opinion; even Paul Eliä now advocated the cause of the Romish Church only from the standpoint of Erasmus, thinking that harmony should be sought by mutual concession, and the reference of all disputed points to a future council. But he found no hearing; the evangelical party desired nothing less than victory. The power soon vanished from the hands of the Bishops and their allies; after the lapse of one year, the country was reduced by foreign enemies, civil war, and domestic discord to the most wretched condition. The leaders who fought for the imprisoned King Christian had to embrace Protestantism, and aid in uprooting by force of arms the remnant of the old faith. With the bloody insurrection of the peasants the religious strife had very little to do; their attack was directed against the nobility, and the Bishops were only regarded as worldly magnates. The latter soon found themselves compelled to make common cause with the nobles of Jutland and Fyen, and to look even to the Lutheran duke for aid. The choice of Christian III. (1534) determined the success of the Reformation. He confirmed, not the privileges of the clergy, but religious liberty to both confessions; the reorganization of the Church he postponed, although he promised the cities who submitted to him an evangelical constitution. His resolution was already taken; the weakness resulting from the protracted internal disorders, had led him to cast his eye upon the wealth of the Bishops, against whom popular hatred was turned, blaming them more than they deserved, as the authors of the public misfortune. As soon as the capital yielded, the King assembled some lay councillors, passing over the Bishops; on Aug. 12 it was secretly determined to deprive the Bishops of their spiritual and secular office, and confiscate their temporalities. All this was promptly done by the King. He then convoked a general diet at Copenhagen, and laid before the estates, among whom the clergy were wanting for the first time, the new constitution of the realm. It was adopted by acclamation. To the King and the Council of State was committed the task of disposing of the confiscated property, in behalf of the crown, of science, and of the new Church, whose organization was also placed in their hands.

Thus the struggle ended. The Gospel was to be taught, and, in fact, was already so freely preached that no one opposed it beyond the cloisters and chapters, where the Romish faith and worship were kept up for a long period, although under limitations. The imprisoned Bishops, with one exception, were released, after renouncing their claims, and otherwise provided for; three of them embraced the Gospel, two of whom married, and one even regained his seat in the Council of State. Paul Eliä vanishes from history; for the tradition that he entered into the service of the new Church is unsupported: he may, like many others, have buried himself in a cloister. Some of the monks emigrated, especially the mendicants, who were forbidden to beg on pain of death.

According to the decision of the diet, the episcopal estates and the so-called lord's cloisters went to the crown, and were (the cloisters, after the monks had died out) converted into fiefs and castles, and for the most part alienated in the course of time. The convents of the Mendicants and Hospitallers, in so far as not already done, were transferred to the cities, and changed into great public houses for the poor; the Carmelite college of Paul Eliä at length became a dwelling for students. So, also, a third of all tithes in the whole land (the King's tithe) and the chapters fell to the crown; the tithe was devoted in part to the university, the schools, and the wants of the Church, and in part remained as a revenue of the estates of the crown, and went with these, or by purchase, into other hands. The chapters, by the advice of Luther, were retained for the support of scholars; but under the pressure of public necessity, they also were alienated in 1660. The village churches were attached to the crown, in so far as they were managed, when not under a patron, as was seldom then the case, by a royal feudatory, and their revenue was not always applied to religious purposes; afterward they became private property, the owner receiving the third of the tithe (which was everywhere retained) and other revenues of the Church, on condition of keeping the buildings in repair; and such ownership, till 1849, gave noble persons the right of appointment, or, since 1806, of presentation to the pastoral office. The nobility also obtained their share of the rich booty, not only directly, by investiture, but indirectly, by gift and by the right of reclamation, which was confirmed by all subsequent treaties of the crown.

In the new organization of the Church, the Wittenbergers had much to do; for King Christian III. cherished all his life long the highest respect for the great Reformer and his associates. He requested the aid of Bugenhagen and Melancthon, but as their attendance at the Council of Mantua prevented their coming, he called, in the beginning of 1557, a synod at Odense, where a discipline was prepared for the Church. It conforms strictly to those of Germany, especially of Brunswick and Hamburg; yet varies somewhat in its form. It was written in Latin, and sent to Luther for his approval. In the summer Bugenhagen arrived, crowned the King, and completed the discipline by adding a provision concerning the monks; on Sept. 2 it was published, and placed in the hands of the superintendents of the Church. It was then subscribed by two representatives of each chapter, and by the most distinguished evangelical teachers of the kingdom and the Danish duchy; later, it was translated into the vernacular tongue by the now Bishop of Sealand, Peter Paladius; still another translation was made, and this version, with sundry changes, was adopted by the Council of State at Odense, in 1539. It bore, as yet, the name of Church discipline for both kingdoms, and the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein; its application to the latter countries may have been superseded by the new discipline, drawn up by Bugenhagen in Low German, and accepted at Rendsburg in 1542, or it may only have been in force for the Danish congregations existing there; in the following century, Norway framed one of her own, with little change; but Iceland, when it passed to Denmark, after the overthrow of the Drontheim archbishopric, to which it belonged as a Norwegian colony, was brought under the same law in 1551.

With this discipline, the Danish Church at once received her first superintendents; to each diocese a Bishop and a royal officer (diocesan feudatory) were appointed. The first Bishops were Palladius and five of the chief Reformers, besides one for Ribe. Why Hans Tausen was overlooked then we do not know, since, in 1542, he became Bishop of Ribe. On Sept. 2, they were all ordained by Bugenhagen, for the discipline provided a special form of episcopal ordination. With the diocesan feudatories, they now began their work of visitation. Many churches were suppressed, and three often entrusted to one pastor. In the country, most of the priests who for ten years had embraced the new doctrine, were suffered to remain in office; the city parishes had long been supplied with preachers. These, however, were reduced to great straits, whilst their rural brethren derived a fair livelihood from the glebe lands; hence, in 1542, the King's tithe was devoted to the support of the pastors and churches of the cities. Two great synods were held at Copenhagen in 1540, and at Antvorskov in 1546, for the settlement of doubtful questions. Along with the Church, the university of Copenhagen was reformed; Bugenhagen drew up the plan after the model of Wittenberg; the King furnished the means from the church property; the whole endowment was 50,000 thalers, which now yields about 70,000 p. an. The Bishop of Sealand was to be the professor of divinity. To its theologians was committed the task of producing the first complete translation of the Bible; this was accomplished by the classic pen of Christiern Pedersen, who closely followed that of Luther; it appeared in 1550. Schools of learning were also founded in every city from the revenues of the old Church, and placed under the supervision of the Bishops. But for popular education, very little could yet be done.

It required years to introduce the new system; and only when the Danish Bible appeared (1550), the new parochial appointments were ratified by the King and Council (1555), and the first liturgy (Altarbuch) by Palladius (1555) was published, could the external work of the Reformation be regarded as complete. About this time the men who labored most in the blessed cause ended their lives: Frands Wormorsen died in 1551; the King and Bishop Sadolin in 1559; Peter Palladius, in 1560; and Hans Tausen in 1561.

4. *Since the Reformation.*¹ As regards the order of worship, it remains essentially the same until the present day. In the 17th cent. it was confirmed by the ritual-book of 1685, and the altar-book of 1688. At that time the last vestiges of the Latin service vanished. In 1783, exorcism was abolished. Several attempts have been since made (1785, 1805, 1830) to secure a thorough revision of the ritual, but without success; even that begun in 1839, under the auspices of the government, has proved a failure. A few customs still survive from the age of the Reformation, such as mass-singing, the use of the surplice, the cope, the pallium, and candles on the altar. In 1739, preaching on week days was generally abandoned, and, in 1770, on saints' days also. Here and there in the country, special sermons for fasts, seed-time, and harvest occur. The Danish Rogation day falls on the 3d day after Easter. Into Schleswig many German usages have worked their way. The liturgy of Adler, introduced into both duchies (1797), has done much to destroy uniformity of worship. The ecclesiastical system culminates in the Bishops, who, soon after the Reformation, received the title of superintendents. Their number remained the same as in the Catholic times, only the seats of two were changed. He of Sealand has his residence in Copenhagen; he of Börglum in Aalborg. Afterward, the diocese of Schonen was separated from Denmark, and Fyen divided into two small ones. Instead of two Bishops, Iceland received only one. The diocese of Schleswig perished in the partition of the duchy; after many changes by superintendents and general superintendents, it has now again recovered its Bishop, but without episcopal ordination. The Bishop of Sealand is the primate of the Danish Bishops; he ordains them, anoints the King, and takes the precedence in rank, but has no other privilege beyond the rest. Till 1830 he was professor of theology in Copenhagen. His diocese, in course of time, has been increased by the addition of Greenland, the Farøe Islands, and the Danish colonies outside of Europe, whilst, on the other hand, the island of Rügen has long been separated from it. The King appointed the first evangelical Bishops, after they had been first elected by the city pastors of the diocese, and thus it was until the rise of absolutism, in 1660, gave the right of choice to the crown. The Bishop had, indeed, no parish, but was bound to preach in the whole diocese and the place where he dwelt. With this duty was connected the visitation of the schools and churches. Each bailiwick (Hard), of which, at the time of the Reformation, there were from 13 to 36 in a diocese, according to its extent, had, from 1536 to 1806, a provost, elected by the pastors and the Bishop, and, from 1660, confirmed by the King. In 1806, official provosts were appointed, for the management of the school-system, which were again, in 1822, superseded by district-provosts; these districts embraced 2 or 3 bailiwicks (Hards). Along with the bailiffs they constituted the board of education, and were bound to visit the churches. Formerly these provosts, with the Bishop and the bailiff of the chapter, assembled twice a year, partly to receive the new laws of the King, and the admonitions of the Bishops, and partly to hold a judicial court. Since the introduction of absolutism, the provost court constituted the lowest tribunal, and is presided over by the provost and the civil judge; the highest is the general court, in which no clergyman can have a seat. The diocesan synods are now held once a year, and the attempt has been made to give them a higher interest by the discussion of subjects connected with dogmatic and pastoral theology.

¹ H. Ushing, Kirkeforfatningen i de Kongelige danske Stater, 1-4. Del. Sorøe, 1786-9. J. L. A. Kolderup-Rosenvinge, Grundrids af den danske Kirkeret, 2 vol. Cop. 1851. A. F. Bergsøe, den danske Stats Statistik, 1-4 vol. Cop. 1844-53. (Comp. the hist. works; Pontoppidan, Ann. Ecol. 3-4 pt. till 1700. L. Helweg, den danske Kirkes Historie efter Reformationen, 1-2 vol. Cop. 1851-55 till 1825. C. T. Engelstoft, Liturgiæns Historie, Cop. 1840, and his Om geistligheden som Rigsstand i Danmark, Cop. 1850; also in N. Hist. Tidsskr. 4 vol.) H. N. J. Jensen, Versuch einer kirchl. Statistik des Herzogthums Schleswig, Kiel, 1843. J. Wiggers, Kirchliche Statistik, 2 vol. p. 375, ss.

At first the pastors were elected by seven men of the parish, and by the magistrates in the cities, wherever a noble or the crown did not possess the right of patronage; in 1660, this privilege of the parishes and the magistrates was absorbed by the crown, and, in 1849, that of the nobles also. As regards the discipline of members, there are old statutes requiring it, but they are no longer observed. At the present time, the propriety of appointing a parochial board in each parish is agitated, a measure which could certainly accomplish great good. The pastor is the supervisor of from two to three schools in his parish. The children are here taught until the time of their confirmation, which takes place at the end of their 14th year, unless it be performed earlier by special dispensation. There are in all 110 so-called personal chaplains, who are the vicars of aged or sick pastors. In former times, co-pastors or deacons existed in the cities; since 1803 their number has been much diminished. Altogether, there are 1024 pastors and 69 provosts in the 8 bishoprics; in Schleswig 209 pastors and 10 provosts, under one Bishop.

At first the Bishops, with the deputies of the clergy and of the university, as well as those of the chapters, were admitted to the royal diet when financial matters were discussed. From the 17th cent. they acquired the full right of members, took part in the election of the King and other public affairs, and played, as the allies of the people, a very important part in the diet of 1660, where they contributed largely to the change in the form of government. This diet did much to raise the position of the clergy. When, afterward (1834), the popular element was introduced, they were represented by two members, selected by the King until the present constitution was adopted (1849) according to which any citizen can be chosen by the people as their representative.

The external government of the Church was very badly provided for; no trace is found of a consistory, either as a court of morals, or as an executive board. The name was indeed applied to a court which had cognizance of matrimonial causes, from 1542-1797, when it was dissolved. The State undertook the regulation of morals; the Kings issued their decrees, which the civil courts enforced by fines and other similar penalties. All this was abolished in the 18th cent. The special control of the Church was limited to the Bishop and the diocesan feudatory, which latter was obliged to share it, from 1581-1660, with the other feudatories of the district. By these officers the King administered the affairs of the Church; he did, indeed, consult with the Bishops and other learned men, but acted indirectly through his chancellor, and frequently of his own free will. In the revolution of 1660, a consistory was proposed, but rejected; a court of chancery was established, and to it was entrusted the care of the Church, justice, the poor, and public instruction; for a time it was aided by the counsels of another (General-Kirke-Inspection-Collegiet, 1737-91), which exerted very little influence. In this century the government of the university, and in 1805 that of the high-schools, passed from its control, and it only retained the Church and the common schools, until, in 1848, a special ministerium was appointed to take its place (Ministeriet for Kirke-og Underviisningsvesenet). The administration of the Schleswig Church, in so far as it was not included in the dioceses of Fyen and Ribe, was entrusted to a special court of chancery, and is now, with the entire government of the duchy, committed to the ministerium for Schleswig.

The ruling principle up to 1848 was, that the King had supreme power over all the affairs of the Church. It was not, it is true, directly conferred upon him, but as he was, in fact, the protector of the new Church, and led her to victory, the charter of 1536 made it his first duty, for the honor of God and the spread of the faith, to promote the divine word and doctrine; and as he became an absolute sovereign in 1660, it was boldly asserted in the law of 1665 that, as the highest judge and ruler on earth, he possessed over all and everything in the Church and religion, as well as the State, unlimited power, only that his religion must be according to the unaltered Augsburg Confession. The result was, that the Kings strove to preserve unity in the Church; they kept out of the realm all that differed from the Lutheran faith as taught in Wittenberg, and a law was inserted in the last royal charter (1648), that he durst permit no other. The Saxon symbols were the rule of doctrine, except the Formula of Concord, which was forbidden in the kingdom, and later (1647), only introduced into the duchies. In 1683, the following were adopted as the symbols of the Church: the Small Catechism of Luther, and the unaltered Augsburg Confession, along with the three oecumenical creeds. No attempt has been made to change these, and the present fundamental law of 1849, which designates the national Church as Evangelical Lutheran, has only assumed its historical name.

And yet the absolute sovereigns have suffered other religious parties, under various restrictions, to enter the kingdom. In some places (Altona, Fredericia), complete religious liberty has been granted; in others, the dissenters have special privileges. Of Jews, first admitted in the 17th cent., and, since 1814, placed in a very favorable position, there are now in the kingdom 4000 (and about as many in the duchies), but their number is decreasing. The same is true of the Reformed, who have 900 in the one (and 700 in the other). The Roman Catholics, who in the beginning attached themselves to the French and Austrian legations, and are subject to the greatest disabilities, although native Catholics, since 1834, are eligible to office, have built at Copenhagen (1843) a handsome church; a short time ago there were only 900 of them in the kingdom (and 1300 in the duchies). If to these we add a small congregation of Moravians in Copenhagen (there are several in the duchies, especially in Schleswig, where, since 1771, they have had a considerable colony at Christiansfeld), and some Greek Catholics, with a few Anglican Christians, mostly attached to the embassies, we have all the religious parties which, beyond the free cities, are allowed to worship publicly; besides these, there are in the duchies Mennonites (200) and Remonstrants (100). The number of dissenters, compared with the whole population, can scarcely exceed $\frac{1}{4}$ p. c., and in the country, the ratio is only 1 to 4000. All sects, till 1848, were strictly forbidden to make proselytes, and apostasy to Roman Catholicism or Judaism was not at all permitted in a subject. Hence, when the New Baptists, before 1848, began to spread their doctrines, an attempt was made to compel the baptism of the children, and to banish the dissenters to places where religious liberty was allowed; but the government held back, and the new constitution has, by the fundamental law of 1849, changed the position of all dissenters. This law has raised the confessional character of the State, because no one is now prevented from the full enjoyment of his civil rights on the score of religion. Thus full liberty of conscience and worship is granted, in so far as it conflicts not with morality and public order. But the law does not promise any support to dissenters in their worship, and only releases from ecclesiastical taxes those who belong to acknowledged religious denominations; otherwise, they are obliged to pay them into the school-fund. This constitution has already given rise to a law which permits civil marriage only to those who differ in belief, or belong to a denomination not recognized; but other laws are still wanting. Because no form is provided by which such legal recognition can take place, some sects occupy an uncertain position; the Mormons have made use of this circumstance, and have for some years pursued their plans, unchecked by the State.

The national Church has the promise of an establishment by law, but still waits for its fulfilment, in order to carry on her battle with closed ranks, and under freer forms than of old, not so much against variant doctrines, which have spread little, but rather against the vice, the deadness, and the infidelity which are the abiding foes of the Christian Church on earth.

DR. ENGELSTORF, Bishop of Fyen.—Porter.

Dependence, or a feeling of dependence on God. The phrase expresses the immediate relation of human consciousness to God, which lies at the foundation of every religion. Nietzsche justly remarks, in his dissertation on the Religionsbegriff der Alten (Stud. u. Krit. Vol. I. p. 541), that even the Greeks have no words to express piety, but such as represent it to be a felt dependence on God, or a state of subordination and humility. In many languages, accordingly, the religious feeling is designated as a sense of fear; in Hebrew, e. g., as אֱלֹהִים פֶּחַד; in Greek, εὐσεβεία; in German, Gottesfurcht; in English, fear of God. The same idea is indicated by the words used in the N. T.

to describe the nature of religion: φόβος θεοῦ, εὐσεβεία, θρησκεία, λατρεία, δουλεία (Acts 10:2; James 1:27; Rom. 12:1; John 16:2). It is the basis, also, of the well-known derivation of the word religio, by Lactantius (Inst. div. IV. 28). It indicates, therefore, an enfeebled conception of religion, to ignore the natural feeling of dependence, and, with Reinhard, Morris, Doederlein, and other so-called supernaturalists, to define it only as a modus Deum cognoscendi et colendi.

This enfeebled conception of religion among the Protestants of Germany, during the latter part of the last century, resulted from various causes. Orthodoxy viewed religion as sound doctrine. Pietism was constitutionally averse to scientific theology. And Kant, ignoring the significance of religious feeling altogether, substituted in its stead the knowledge of duty, as prescribed by divine precepts. Protestantism was prepared thus for a powerful reaction, when Schleiermacher, under the modifying influence of the philosophy of Spinoza, Fichte, and Jacobi, promulgated the theory that the essence of religion consists in the feeling of dependence on God.

This view of religion was first presented in his Reden über die Religion (1st ed. 1799; 4th ed. 1831). Feeling is the peculiar sphere of piety. Piety consists in the single states of feeling which arise from the operation of God in us, conditioned on the influence of the world from without; which implies the dependence of religious feeling on God (Sämtl. Werke, I. p. 196). The origin of this feeling Schleiermacher explains thus: The universe is an uninterrupted activity, continually revealing itself to us. The single thing exists not by itself, but as a part of the whole; one finite object does not contradict and exclude another; but each is the expression of the infinite. To receive and be moved by the influence of the single and finite as the expression of the universal whole, is religion. On p. 200, Schleiermacher expresses this idea also thus: a feeling is an emotion of piety, not when a single thing as such awakens the feeling, but when, in the single, the universal whole, as the revelation of God, affects us, that is, when not the single and the finite, but God enters our life, in whom alone the particular is one and all; so that, in turn, there is not some one single power excited in us, but our whole being (as distinct from, yet a part of the world), or the divine in us, is called forth through feeling (vid. p. 254).

The fundamental idea of Schleiermacher's Reden was developed, twenty-two years later, in his Glaubenslehre,¹ but with this definite modification; the nature of religious emotion consists in the feeling, not of dependence only, but of absolute dependence. And absolute dependence in feeling means, according to Schleiermacher, to be conscious of self in relation to God ("sich seiner in Beziehung mit Gott bewusst sein"). To apprehend this theory properly, we must bear in mind that Schleiermacher conditions the sense of dependence not on the influence of single things, as single, but on the influence of single things as part of a whole (Anm. 5, Reden ueber die Religion, p. 269, et al.). Single things, as single, occasion but a sensational self-consciousness: "for we have not a sense of dependence on the whole, considered as an aggregate of parts which condition each other mutually, and of which we are one, but only as a union based on a oneness which conditions both the all and the relation we, as a part, bear to the other parts." The truth involved in the peculiar theory of Schleiermacher, the pantheistic tenor of which is manifest, has been expressed by Deinhardt: "The genesis of religion lies in the consciousness of our limitation and nothingness" (Beit. zur rel. Erkenntnis, 1844, p. 9). Or, as Elwert says: Religious feeling is something original, something wrought in us immediately by God, and religion is a peculiar and independent sphere (Wesen der Religion, Tübing. Zeitschrift, 1835, 3, p. 52).

¹ Der christliche Glaube nach den Grundsätzen der evang. Kirche im Zusammenhange dargestellt, 2. Aufl. 1830.

The more Schleiermacher opposed the prevailing errors and prejudices against religion of his time, the more numerous were the attacks made from all sides upon his doctrine. Rationalism preferred the charge of mysticism. The orthodox alleged that, if religion belongs only to the sphere of self-consciousness, it is exclusively subjective, and can have no connection with the objective authority of the Scriptures (Olshausen, Stud. u. Krit. 1830, 3, p. 362; Steudel, Tüb. Zeitschrift, 1831, 1, p. 1, et seq.) And speculative philosophy declared, in the person of Hegel: If religion rests on the feeling of dependence, the animal has religion too (Vorl. über Phil. der Religion, Werke, Vol. II. p. 100). To which Deinhardt aptly replied: Limitation does not give rise to religion, else the animal would indeed be religious; but the consciousness of limitation involves both the consciousness of the infinite and the destination for the infinite. But the most prominent theologians of the age, those who are laboring most earnestly to reconcile faith and knowledge (De Wette, Nitzsch, Twisten, Ullman, J. Müller, Lücke, Hagenbach, and others), have received the Schleiermacherian theory, though with some modifications, and developed it more fully.

We are by no means, however, of the opinion that the Schleiermacherian theory is exhaustive of the nature of religion. The feeling of dependence on God certainly lies at the basis of, and is manifested in all forms of religion, and leads man to humility before God. But the feeling of dependence, considered simply as such, is not religious; it has no moral element—an element that is not wanting in any form of religion. It is from an ethical standpoint, accordingly, that Schleiermacher's doctrine requires modification and emendation. It is only through the functions of the conscience that the feeling of dependence is developed into religion. If, on the one hand, it may be said that there can be no religion in which the feeling of dependence has no place, on the other, it may also be said that there are feelings of (absolute) dependence which do not belong to the sphere of religion.

DR. SCHENKEL. — Gerhart.

Deposition (depositio), as distinguished from suspension and degradation (see Penalties, eccl.), consists in permanently depriving an ecclesiastic of the rights and dignities of his office, whilst he still (according to Rom. Cath. rules) retains the office itself. It requires a formal process against the person accused, and the penalty must, in some countries, be concurred in by the civil authorities. The grounds of deposition may rest partly upon universal rules of public service, partly upon the special obligations of the clerical office, in respect of doctrine, preaching, and conduct.

A. H.*

Deputies. 1. In the Greek C., δενόταροι, a lower class of officers, who attended the clergy, upon solemn occasions, with burning tapers; they also cleared the way for priests in their public walks (Du CANGE, cerosferarius and deputatus; SUICER., δενόταροι). They form no distinct order, and hence may marry a second time. 2. In the Romish C., "deputies" occur in some parts, as overseers of the regiunculae, or districts divided into larger deaneries. Usually they are under the dean as assistants; but sometimes they receive directions immediately from the Bishop, and then the dean's relation to them is that of primus inter pares. — 3. In the Reformed C. of Basel, "deputies" for churches and schools, were instituted by a regulation of 1529, to have a supervision over the preachers and schools. The office still exists in a modified form.

HERZOG.*

Derbe, a small city of Lycaonia (strictly, Isauria), S. of Lystra, whither Paul and Barnabas fled, and where they preached (Acts 14: 6, 20). Paul again visited it, after his separation from Barnabas, and associated himself with Timothy, whose native place Derbe probably was (Acts 16: 1). Caius (Acts 20: 4) was also of Derbe. Steph. Byzant. (p. 100, ed. Westermann) calls it Δέρβεια or Δάβεια, which, in Lycaonian, means a juniper tree. (See STRABO, XII. 569; PROL. V. 1.)

ARNOLD.*

Desire. In a state of wakefulness, a number of conceptions continually arise from within, whether upon some external occasion or not. Some are dark, others vivid. Coming with a higher degree of vividness, one fixes the attention, and makes the impression, more or less distinct, that the object of it is of advantage, or the contrary. If of advantage, we desire it, whether the object be already in existence, or yet to become a reality. There is a direction of the will towards the object; a tendency of self to come into possession of it. If strong and abiding, the desire becomes a longing, which may be more or less intense.

The original seat of desires, according to the Scriptures, is the heart (Prov. 4: 23); and from the state of the heart they derive their moral character (Luke 6: 45; 12: 34); for desires, as such, are neither good nor evil. As there are natural desires, for the satisfaction of the wants of our sensual life (Luke 15: 16; 16: 21), so there are desires also for the highest and purest good (Ps. 42: 1; Matt. 5: 6). In this sense, desire is attributed to the Old Testament saints, and even to angels (Matt. 13: 17; Heb. 11: 16; 1 Pet. 1: 12). Christ also, who was without sin, had desires both for natural and spiritual things (Luke 12: 49; 22: 15; Matt. 4: 2; John 19: 28). The apostle desired to be with Christ (Phil. 1: 23); and believers are exhorted to desire the sincere milk of the word (1 Pet. 2 : 2; comp. Heb. 6 : 11; 1 Tim. 3 : 1). Indeed, the excitement of desire or aversion through definite conceptions of objects is, in itself, so far from being sinful, that it belongs to the constitution of human nature. Desires become sinful when they originate in the opposition of the flesh to the spirit, when the flesh lusteth against the spirit (Gal. 5 : 17); when a man gives place to this opposition, and desires what is contrary to the law of God, and pollutes his image in the soul. Every desire of this kind is itself an internal sin (Matt. 5 : 28; Mark 4 : 19; Rom. 1 : 24; 7 : 7; 1 Cor. 10 : 6), and begets other sins (James 1 : 14, 15; Matt. 15 : 19; 1 John 2 : 16). Hence it is that ἐπιθυμία generally signifies the prava concupiscentia, even in places where it is not expressly designated as such (Rom. 6 : 12; Eph. 4 : 22).

In how far now evil desires have their root in our sensual nature; how they are not indeed produced, but excited by the law (Rom. 7 : 7); whether there is an inborn evil tendency; how connected on one side with the fall, and on the other with the work of redemption; in how far its dominion is, not wholly eradicated, but broken in the regenerate—these and other questions are so closely interwoven with the doctrines of sin and justification, and with the differences existing between the Roman Catholic and the Evangelical Protestant Church, that we must refer the reader to the extensive treatises which discuss these subjects. But both Churches agree in this, that the regenerate, who have put off the old man, corrupt according to the ἐπιθυμίας τῆς σαρκὸς, endure chastening, are watchful and sober (1 Thess. 5 : 6), deny worldly lusts (Tit. 2 : 12; 1 Pet. 2 : 11), and crucify the flesh with the affections (Gal. 5 : 24); for the life in the Spirit is contrary to the life in the flesh (Gal. 5 : 16; Rom. 6 : 12).

E. SCHWARTZ. — Gerhart.

Desserviens, in the French C., are clergy having charge of chapels of ease, succursales ecclesiarum, as distinguished from parochiales eccl. (see Du FRESNE, s. v.). They were dependent upon the parish to which their chapel belonged. Older canon law also distinguishes between clergy who officiate independently, and priests who serve at the will of the bishop. Napoleon thought of this arrangement when he attempted to restore the Church, which had been almost overthrown by the Revolution. See Concord. of 26, Messidor IX. (July 15, 1801), and the Art. organiques de la convention of 18, Germ. X. (April 8, 1802). In accordance with these articles, the pay of the curés was assumed by the State. Hence, their number was kept as small as possible. But as the parishes or cantons thus became too large for the curé of the ecclesia cantonalis, other clergymen were set over the remaining churches, the succursales (Art. organ. 31, 60–63). These were now first called desserviens. They are instituted or recalled by the bishops. As the chief difference between them and curés consisted in their smaller compensation, and as this difference gradually disappeared, it seemed anomalous that they should be more dependent on the bishops than the curés. This led to frequent dissensions concerning the position of the desserviens, who form the great majority of the priests in France, Belgium, and along the left bank of the Rhine. (See Krit. Zeitschr. f. Rechtswissensch. &c. Heidelb. 1848, Bd. XX. H. III. 47, &c. Institut. diocesana par Mgr. l'évêque de Digne. Paris, 1845. Acta consilii Provinc. Auscitaniae. Auscis, 1854. Acta cons. Avenion. Prov. Avenion, 1850, p. 81, 82. Art. Chaplain). H. F. JACOBSON.*

Determinism. This is the name given to the theories which regard the moral and religious activity of man as absolutely determined by forces, whether operating from without or from within, which are not a part of himself, and thus reduce human freedom to a mere semblance, or deny it altogether. Determinism is, therefore, of various kinds. Dogmatic determinism, e. g. that of Luther, denies the freedom of man, and refers the causality of his actions exclusively to God (de servo arbitrio), in order to exalt the majesty of the divine government. The philosophical determinism of La Mettrie, on the other hand, transforms man into a machine, or into a plant, in order to deny the existence of God and of spirit in general. Nevertheless, all have this feature in common. They regard the determinative influences which man experiences as an infinite plus, before which human personality disappears as an infinite minus. This view rests upon the fact that man appears to be infinitely conditioned, and upon the assumption that liberty, in order to be real, must be absolutely arbitrary. In other words, it ignores the fact that God is the highest personality; that he rules and approaches man as such; and that, therefore, the operation of God upon man, which comprehends all true motives, is according to the idea of personal reciprocity, that is, according to the nature of love. Determinism raises, as regards the divine rule, power above love; as regards human experience, external necessity above spontaneous activity, or the limitations of man above the demands of freedom; and, in its judgment of his inner life, the nature and experience which he shares with lower orders of creation, above that which is peculiar to his own personality. The conception of the impersonal beclouds the three fundamental conditions of freedom, namely, a clear idea of divine personality, the truth of human personality, and the certainty of reciprocal correspondence between both. Having lost the knowledge of absolute love, and with it also the knowledge of freedom, determinism is so far forth, therefore, to be regarded as a perpetuation of ante-christian pagan philosophy.

Love unites apparently contradictory elements—necessity and freedom. Without the light of love, both are perverted; the one becoming blind compulsory force, and the other abstract arbitrariness. Each is a caricature, and, reacting, calls forth an opposite error—blind force, an extreme theory of freedom; and arbitrariness, dogmatic determinism. The latter proceeds on the valid assumption that abstract arbitrariness is a figment; for man is always determined either by external circumstances or internal states; and justly maintains that there can be no middle ground between being determined by motives and self-determination.

But the great error of dogmatic determinism is that it overlooks the peculiarity of man's intellectual and moral nature, in virtue of which he makes the motives influencing him his own motives, or recognizes the complement of his being in that by which he is determined. It makes account of all the factors but the central one—himself as a person. Man is certainly determined not only relatively but absolutely. But just at the point where his state of being determined culminates, he gains his freedom. For when he is determined in his inmost being, he is active under his own true form of self-determination. Hence, a man is a thousand times more free when yielding to the power of divine grace, than when, in seeming playful caprice, he kills a fly on his hand. It is this last form of freedom—arbitrariness—that dogmatic determinism must have in its eye when it shuts up, as in a hard shell, the deep religious feeling of absolute dependence upon God. It should not, therefore, be a matter of surprise that just this dogmatic determinism has developed, with much spirit, the doctrine of freedom which, among the ancients, is peculiar to the Stoics, and, among moderns, to the Calvinists. For the Calvinists are those that have broken through the hard shell of determinism, and unfolded the most glowing doctrine of freedom—the doctrine concerning the bridal relation of the soul to Christ. The case is the same with the dogmatic determinism of all the Reformers: it enclosed the consciousness of justification by faith—the religious germ of the highest feeling of freedom.

Those deterministic theories, therefore, which are only incomplete expressions for a sound religious feeling of dependence, in opposition to false abstract doctrines of freedom, are to be distinguished from the fundamental forms of determinism essential and proper.

It is characteristic of determinism that it does not reconcile freedom and necessity, but holds them in such contradiction as to destroy freedom. There is a fatalistic determinism. It raises compulsive necessity above the divine being and government; and is exemplified in the doctrine of fate among the Greeks, of the iron rule of Allah among Mahomedans, and of an eternal immutable purpose among supralapsarians. There is a pantheistic determinism. Necessity is made to flow from the unchangeable connection of all things. The free acts of men are but the play or manifestations of the universal spirit; illustrated in the philosophy of the Hindus, the ethics of the Stoics, and the system of Spinoza. We get a modification of pantheistic determinism when special stress is laid on the dynamic co-operation of man. There is a materialistic determinism. The want of freedom is referred to the connection of the soul with matter as evil; as was done by the Persians, the Gnostics, and especially the Manicheans. Ancient materialistic determinism reappears in the form of modern naturalistic determinism, when human conduct is referred to the force of sensible or sensuo-psychical motives; as is done by French sensationalists.

Phrenological determinism is a higher form of this species. The most refined form is rationalistic determinism. Self-determination disappears in the controlling force of conceptions (Priestley), or the conclusiveness of reasons (Leibnitz). But just as fatalistic determinism is infinitely near the feeling of the profoundest doctrine of freedom without reaching it, so is rationalistic determinism related to the understanding. Some writers have also made a distinction between mechanical, rational, and metaphysical determinism.

Compare Lehre von der Freiheit des menschlichen Willens, Göttingen, 1836, by Herbart; on the Schleiermacherian determinism, Die Christliche Lehre von der Sünde, by Julius Mueller; on the development of Schl. determinism, the work of J. P. Romang; on Free-will and Determinism, the treatise by L. Ph. Fischer; on the speculative conception of freedom, on Free-will, &c. the Zeitschrift für Philosophie und spekulative Theologie (vol. III. p. 101 et seq.). See also Philosophische Dogmatik, by Lange.

LANGE. — Gerhart.

Deusdedit (= Deo datus and Adeo datus), sometimes called Adeodatus I., b. in Rome, according to one account the son of a sub-deacon, was elected Pope in 615, as successor of Bonif. IV. He died in 618, and accomplished but little. Tradition adorns his life with many wonders, and his reign with spurious decretals. He was canonized; his anniversary is Nov. 9.

HERZOG.*

Devolution, the right of, is, properly, the prerogative of conferring a benefice, the presentation to which belonged to another person, but was forfeited for the time. It originated in the decree of the Lateran. Conc. 1179 (c. 2, X. de conc. praeb. 3, 8), that all inferior (c. 12, X. eod.) benefices and offices should be filled within six months after becoming vacant. In case the Bishop neglected this duty, the chapter should act; if it devolved upon the chapter, and this showed remissness, the Bishop should fill the vacancy. If both failed, the Metropolitan should appoint an incumbent. At the Later. Conc. of 1215, Innoc. III. decreed that, if the election to an episcopal vacancy, or prelacy, of a regular church, was unnecessarily delayed beyond three months, the constituents should forfeit their right of choice for that occasion, and it should devolve upon the nearest dignitaries (c. 41, X. de elect. 1, 6. See further regulations in the TT. de supplenda neglig. praelatorum, in the Decretals of Greg. IX. [1, 10] and Clem. V. [1, 5]). The present law is, that if the right of presentation, nomination, &c. is not exercised within the legal limit, through culpable neglect, or is not exercised canonically, it at once devolves upon the nearest superior dignitary, who must discharge the duty as the original patron was bound to do (devolutio fit cum qualitatibus et personis, quae in prima erant collatione). The neglect of Bishops to appoint, devolves the right upon the Archb., on whom, also, the appointment to a bishopric rests, jure devolutionis. But in case of an uncanonical choice, the right of appointment to the see devolves upon the Pope; if he delays it three months, it reverts again to the original constituents. In a wider sense, the right of devolution is the prerogative of superior ecclesiastical dignitaries to take extraordinary measures whenever necessary jurisdiction is not exercised by the first proper authorities. This is one of the essential rights of the papal primacy.

SCHURL.*

Devotion, devotional exercises. Devotion is the religious collection and lifting up of the thoughts, the turning of the soul to God, in its transition from meditation to prayer. It is the blossom of the former and the bud of the latter, or, rather, that pious frame in which meditation and prayer combine. Devotion, therefore, includes two distinct elements; that of a self-determining act, by which the individual collects his thoughts from worldly things, and sets them upon spiritual things; and that of a happy spontaneous act of the mind, in which he finds himself in communion with the witnessing Spirit of God. — In devotional exercises, the former element is more prominent. They are acts by which man strives to pass over from the thought of finite things, in which, as a sinner, he has become more or less absorbed, to the realization of eternal things. Foremost among these is public worship; then family worship, silent meditation, reading the Bible and other edifying books, prayer, and retirement. — The more a person occupies an external religious position, the greater will be his danger of mistaking these exercises for devotion itself; and even when he does his best, these acts will constitute formally fixed points in his religious life. But the more inward, deep, and free his piety, the more varied and rich will be his devotions; and thus they will point to a time when his whole life will become an uninterrupted act of devotion. This result, however, cannot be attained by omitting all self-discipline in the case, under the impression that devotion must, from the start, be the spontaneous offspring of a free and happy soul. For as in other things legal discipline is the road to moral liberty, so in the case of devotion. None who neglect the practice of devotion will ever taste its blessedness.

LANGE.*

Dexter, Flavius Lucius, a son of B. Pacien, of Barcellona, was entrusted with various offices by Theodosius and Arcadius, and intimately associated with Jerome, whom he induced to write the de viris illustr., which J. dedicated to him. Jerome, in his work, says Dexter had written a general history, which he had not yet read. The work was lost; but the Jesuit, Romanus de la Higuera, pretended, about the beginning of the 17th cent., to have found it in a codex of the Cloister Fulda. But the codex could never be found there by others.

HERZOG.*

Diaconicum designates, in the Greek C., a liturgical manual, used by deacons, or, oftener, a small separate space in a church. Philostorgius, 7, 3, mentions it as a structure occupying a prominent place, συννότης, in a church in Constantinople, into which a statue of Christ was taken, — perhaps a semicircular projection from the bema (see Architecture). These diaconica were used as closets for articles used by deacons; also for the private meetings of the ecclesiastics of the church; sometimes delinquent ecclesiastics were imprisoned in them (in the 5th cent. δειακονία, probably from δειακός, was used). In the 8th cent., diaconicum occurs in this sense (see Du Cange, Constant. Christ. III., 82, p. 48; and his Gloss.) HENKE.*

Diaspora, dispersion, the. Thus the Jews living beyond Judea are styled (John 7 : 35, &c.; see Jews). — In modern times, the term has been applied to similar cases. The Moravians (see Art.) have their diaspora. For a more special use of the term see Rendtorff, d. ev. Diasp. d. preuss. Monarchie, &c., Berlin, 1855.

HERZOG.*

Didymus the blind, b. in Alexandria, 308, though deprived of sight in his 5th y. (Jerome; Palladius says in his 4th y.), acquired extensive erudition, treasuring the lectures he heard in a well-disciplined memory. Thus he became one of the most learned men of his times, in all the branches of knowledge then cultivated. He also diligently studied the Bible. He became one of the teachers and leaders of the Alexandrian school (see Art.), and died in 395. Jerome, Palladius, Ambrose of Alex., Evagrius, Isidore of Pel., &c., were moulded over his writings. Although he opposed the Arians (Socrates, IV. 23), he was charged with Origen's heresy, whose περι αρχων, Jerome says (adv. Ruf. l. 1), he vindicated. Hence his condemnation by the 2d Council of Nice. Most of his writings (chiefly commentaries upon the SS.) have been lost (see a list in Jerome's viris illustr., and in Fabricius, bibl. græc. V. VIII.). Still extant are: 1, his work upon the Spirit, in the Latin of Jerome, publ. Cologne, 1531, Helmstädt, 1614. It is one of the best ancient works on the subject, though Jerome's version may not be unaltered (see Basnage, animadv. in Did., &c., in Canisii lection. ant. I.). 2. A brief exposition of the canon, or cath. epp., at Cassiodore's request, inst. div. scr. c. 8, transl. into Latin by Epiph. Scholast.; found in the Max. bibl. Patr. Lugd. 1677, IV., 319, &c. This shows his adherence to Origen. 3. Fragments of a Greek work against the Manichæans (see Basnage, l. c.). 4. Three books upon the Trinity, discovered by Aloysius Mingarelli, publ. by his brother, Ferdinand, the Camaldulensian (Rome 1764), who tries to show that this is the book to which Socrates (IV. 25) refers. — (See Schröckh, K.-G. VII. 70, &c.; Guericke, de Schola Alex. I. 79, 83, &c., 333, &c.).

HERZOG.*

Didymus, Gabriel, b. 1487, a Bohemian, was one of those violent characters who caused Luther so much anxiety, and constantly endangered his great work by their fanatical preaching and measures. He embraced the Reformation from its start, and forthwith commenced preaching upon grace, predestination, against the adoration of the host, private masses, &c. In connection with Carlstadt, he also vehemently denounced schools and universities, and invited the people to take matters into their own hands, in correcting abuses, if the proper authorities would not move with sufficient energy. In 1549, Moritz of Saxony deposed him for his connection to the Leipsic interim. He died an individual in 1558. (See SECKENDORF Lutheranismo, II. 181, &c.; GIESELE 97; BRETSCHNEIDER, corpus ref. I. 548; TERNE, Versuch einer suff. Nachricht von d. G. Did. &c., Lpz., 1737.) HERZOG.*

Dies iræ, the celebrated sequence for All Soul's Day, used in the Rom. Cath. C. not only on that day, but in all masses for the dead and funeral solemnities, dates from the 13th cent. Whilst some regard L. M. Frangipani, a Dominican, as the author, Barth. Albizzi, of Pisa, in his "Liber conformitatum, 1385," has testified that the Franciscan, Thomas of Celano, a village in Albruzzo Ulteriore, according to the view of many of his contemporaries, is entitled to the honor. About 1221, T. was custodian of the Franciscan convents in Mayence, Worms, and Cologne; in 1230 he returned to Italy, and in 1249 wrote the biography of his friend, St. Francis († 1226), under the title of "Legenda antiqua;" and at that time the poem is supposed to have appeared. The Franciscan, Waddingus, in his "Scriptores ordinis Minorum, 1650," gives strong reasons to support this view. At all events, the "Dies iræ," as found in the Missale Romanum, with 19 three-line stanzas, was in use in the Church in the second half of the 14th cent., and is spoken of by Albizzi as well known. It occurs, with a crucifix, on a marble slab in the Franciscan Church at Mantua, introduced by 4 stanzas, the first of which runs thus: cogita anima fidelis—ad quod respondere velis—Christo venturo de cælis," whilst, among many other minor variations, the last three stanzas of the received text are replaced by this: "consors ut beatitatis—viva cum justificatis—in ævum æternitatis." These additions and alterations were made, it seems, by a monk of this convent, and hence the sequence, in old books, often bears the title: "meditatio vetusta et venusta de novissimo judicio."

The passage in Zeph. 1: 14–18, especially v. 15, as translated in the Vulgate, no doubt suggested the poem. Use has also been made of Ps. 102: 27, and 2 Pet. 3: 10, and in order to show that the destruction of the world is a universal idea, and not merely Christian, the poet refers to the prophecy of the Sibyl, which begins: "væ quas illa dies deprendit" (ed. of the Sibylline Oracles by Castalio, Helmstädt, 1673, p. 13). Although it is scarcely possible to transfer this sublime and stirring hymn, so full of harmony and rich in thought, into another language, no less than 80 versions have been published in Germany. The earliest is that of Freder, in 1550; the present cent. alone counts 55. We may mention those of G. Herder, Schlegel, F. von Meyer, A. L. Follen, von Wessenberg, Döring, Claus Harms, Bunsen, A. Knapp, and Dr. H. A. Daniel. The last preserves the peculiar metre of the original (Tholuck's liter. Anzeiger, 1839; Nos. 67, 68). Many attempts have also been made to translate it into English, but without any great success. We give the names of Drummond of Hawthornden, Crashaw, the Earl of Roscommon, Evelyn, Sir Walter Scott (a free paraphrase of a few stanzas occurs in his Lay of the Last Minstrel), Isaac Williams, and R. C. Trench. In all, the double rhymes of the Latin are sacrificed (see Sacred Poets of England and America, p. 546, R. W. Griswold; N. Y. 1849).

At the same time, this sequence has given rise to the most magnificent musical compositions by the best masters, such as Palestrina, Durante, Pergolese, Joseph and Michael Haydn, Abbot Vogler, Winter, Cherubini, Gottfr. Weber, Neukomm. But the finest of them all is the Requiem of Mozart (1791), during the preparation of which he passed into eternity. The most comprehensive works upon the "Dies iræ" are by Dr. Lisco, preacher in Berlin, and Dr. Daniel, in Halle; the former in his monograph, "Dies iræ. Hymn. auf d. Weltgericht; Berl. 1840;" the latter in his Thes. Hymnolog. II. 103–131; Hal. 1844.¹

C. E. Koch. — Porter.

Dietrich v. Apolda (or Thüringen), b. about 1229, a Dominican of Erfurt, is the author of two works, still prized: 1) Vita S. Dominici, publ. by Surius and the Bollandists in the 1st vol. for August; 2) Vita S. Elisabethæ, Countess of Thüringen (in CANISIUS lect. IV. See FABRICIUS, bibl. lat. VI. 630).

Dietrich of Neheim, after being deprived of a benefice in Bonn, became scriptor apost. of Gregory XI. at Avignon. In 1377, he accompanied Gregory to Rome, where he served until 1410 as papal abbreviator. At the schism, D. took sides with Urban VI. Boniface XI. appointed him (1395) Bishop of Warden; but he had to yield this to the anti-Bishop, and even failed to secure the see of Cambray, offered as a substitute. He therefore remained in Rome. Afterwards he attended John XXIII. to Constance, where he died in 1417. He was rather a fertile writer, and though he long dwelt at the papal court, was a zealous adherent of the general Councils. His position convinced him how greatly a reformatio in capite was needed. His chief work is upon the Schism (1378–1410), in three books, publ. in Nuremb. 1532, Basel, 1560, and a fourth entitled nexus unionis; an important source. For its frankness it was put in the index. The four books were often publ. together. The tract, de necess. ref. eccl. in capite et membris was inserted by von der Hardt (Acta Conc. Const., I.) as the work of Peter d'Ailly; but he afterwards corrected the error. It was undoubtedly written by Dietrich. — (See FABRICIUS, bibl. lat. V.; MEIBOM, narratio de Theod. Niem. in his script. rer. Germ.) HERZOG.*

Dietrich, Veit (Vitus Theodorus), b. 1506, in Nuremberg, after preparatory training, went to the university of Wittenberg, and soon attracted the notice of Luther and Melanchthon. In 1527, he became Luther's amanuensis and table-fellow; he also accompanied him to the conference at Marburg, and (1529) to Coburg, where he remained with L. during the diet of Augsburg. He rejoiced in this edifying fellowship (see the dedication to his ed. of the ennar. L. in proph. Micham, and his letter to Melanchthon of July 30, 1530). After remaining 14 y. in Wittenberg, and being made magister and adjunct of the

¹ A valuable notice of this hymn may be found in "Miscellanies by W. R. Williams, New York, 1851," pp. 78–90. Dr. Williams furnishes the original text (with the various readings, &c.), and two of the best English versions, that of R. C. Trench, and one by an anonymous American author. The latter is one of the most successful English imitations of the metre of the original.

philos. faculty, he left, against Melanchthon's wish, probably on account of some disagreement with Luther. He returned to Nuremberg (1535), not certain as to his future course. As he was about to leave N. for Tübingen, it was resolved to retain him. Feeling under obligations for assistance received during his academical studies, he was the more willing to comply. Melanchthon approved of the plan in a letter to Baumgärtner, a councillor of N., and patron of Dietrich (written Wednesday after Martinmas, 1535). He likewise encouraged D. to accept the proffered post, and assured him of Luther's love and regard, adding: novi ejus naturam minime tenacem esse simulatum. Erit et tuæ humanitatis meminisse illud Hesiodum; ἢ τις αὐδὲς ἦγγε' εἰ παύσεται, δεξιοδάα, and requesting him occasionally to write to L., and not to spurn (aspernari) his friendship (Mel. to D., Feb. 6, 1536). — The post offered was that of preacher at St. Sebald's, which he assumed early in 1536, and retained until his death. He now devoted his energies to the Church of his fatherland, and maintained correspondence with the leaders of the Reformation, especially with Mel., whose many letters prove the confidence he bestowed on D. He signed the Smalcald Art. in behalf of Nuremberg, and, 1546, attended the Regensburg colloquium (SECKENDORF, comm. III., 153, 623). It was he who informed Luther of the unhappy end of Dr. Eck (1543); this brought down upon him the invectives of the Romanists, and the reproach of a contentious theologian. In the discharge of his office in N. he was drawn into various contests; amidst these, Mel. often advised him to follow Baumgärtner's counsel. But Dietrich advisedly did not often consult B. He opposed the attempt of his colleague, Osiander, to abolish general absolution. The result was that private absolution was dropped; it was first restored again by the Augsburg interim. By order of the magistracy, D. introduced (1542) the Reformation into some Palatinate districts, which Nuremberg had obtained by purchase. This proves that he had not lost the confidence of the magistracy by the sermon which he had shortly before preached against them. In 1543 he had a dispute with Osiander regarding the laying of hands on candidates for ordination, a custom rejected by D. as popish. Luther, whom he asked for counsel, did not wish to reject the custom (Mel. to D., Oct. 1543), whilst Mel. fully approved of it. D. prevented it, and it was not adopted until 1583. He more justly opposed the rite of elevation, which had not yet been abolished; and, on his own responsibility, omitted it on St. Thomas's day, 1543. Osiander resisted, and even Melanchthon thought he acted rashly, and exposed himself to the suspicion of Zwinglianism (cf. Mel. to D., Feb. 13 and March 22, 1538). But his agenda shows no trace of an approach to the Reformed doctrine (comp., also, Kinderpredig von fürnembeste Festen, a. 1546; and Mel. to D., Sept. 6, 1543. See Cruciger). He, indeed, acknowledged a synecdoche in the words of institution, and did not go so far as to affirm a hypostatical union of the body and blood of Christ with the elements, but assumed a real connection, as of fire with the glowing iron, or of the wine with the chalice containing it, and thus differed from Mel., who held to a real presence in a sacramental form, h. e. ut signis positis adsit vere Christus efficax (Mel. to D., April 23, 1538; comp. May 24, 1528.) It is remarkable that D. urged separatim tradi corpus et sanguinem (Mel., ibid.; Cruciger to D., April 18, 1538), and that neither M. nor C. would concede this separation. M. even affirmed that it was unknown to papists, as though D.'s views went beyond theirs.

This leads us to speak of Dietrich's chief labor in liturgical matters. The magistracy of N. directed him to prepare an agenda for the city and its districts. The first issue of 1543, and succeeding ones till 1639, are entitled: AGEND-BÜCHLEIN FÜR D. PFARRHERREN AUFF D. LAND. But it must also have been used in the city. The last ed. is that of 1755; from the close of the cent., another liturgy took its place. D.'s, however, was used in preparing the new Bavarian Lutheran agenda. Mel. approved of D.'s work, but misses the form for excommunication (Oct. 25, 1543).

Dietrich's last years were beclouded, partly with sickness, but chiefly by the unhappy state of Church affairs. On account of the number of strangers drawn to N. by the Emperor's visit (1547), the council advised the preachers to abstain from preaching upon disputed points, D., in a sermon on Ps. 37: 3, disregarded the request, and was silenced for a time. — But the attempt of the Emperor (1548) to force the Augsburg interim upon all the ev. States, caused him still greater pain. In the Opinion which he drew up (see Strobel, Nachricht v. d. Leben D., &c., 1772) in the name of the clergy, and presented to the council, he acknowledged that obedience in all proper things was due to the Emperor; but that to demand it in matters affecting the soul's salvation, would cause the shedding of innocent blood. This opinion was accompanied by the submissive answer of the council to the interim. It was of no avail. Nuremberg (1549) accepted the interim, all but a few points. Among other things, the elevation of the elements was restored. D. thought of leaving N., but Melanchthon dissuaded him. His death (on March 24, 1549) was doubtless hastened by grief. — As an author, D. held a subordinate place, and yet rendered good service by editing many edifying works, especially Luther's Comm., part of which he transl. into German (see Mel. to D. Nov. 16, 1544) and some smaller works of Melanchthon. His own productions were chiefly sermons, and many of these for the young. During his sickness, in 1548, he published an instructive exposition of Isaiah. His intention to prepare similar expositions of the other prophets was frustrated by death. The ep. theologorum Norimb. ad D. Rupertum, 1539, though also signed by Dietrich, was written by Osiander. D. composed some hymns, and founded several Christian institutions in Nuremberg. — (See Corp. ref. for his corresp. with Mel. and Cruciger, 1537–49; many of D.'s letters have been lost. Strobel, l. c.)

HERZOG.*

Dieu, de, Louis, b. 1590, in Flushing, where his father was an ev. preacher. His grandfather, also called Louis, was in the service of Charles V., and accompanied him to Algiers, and on his expeditions to Germany. It is said that, having shown some leaning to the Reformation, Charles V, warned him that it would not be in his power to rescue him from the Inquisition, if he fell into its hands. This may be so or not; but the report that he was won over to the Reformation by Calvin, during a voyage to England, is certainly false. Louis, after completing his studies, was invited by prince Maurice, of Orange, to succeed Uyttenbogard as court-preacher at the Hague; but he preferred living away from the court. In 1619 he became prof. of theol. in the Walloon college of Leyden, and happily filled this post until his death, in 1642. He occupies an important place among the exegetes of the Reformed C. He wrote Animadv. seu comment. in quatuor Evang. Lugd. Bat. 1631. Animadv. in Acta Apost. 1634. Animadv. in D. Pauli apost. ep. ad Rom.—Accessit spicilegium in reliqua ejusdem apost. ut et cathol. ep. 1646. Animadv. in V. T. Libros omnes, 1648. All collected, Amstelod. 1693, fol. He also wrote grammatical (see Aramaic Language), and other smaller works (see Bayle). His principle of N. T. interpretation is laid down in the words of his preface to the Oriental grammar: facilius Europæis foret Platonis Aristotelisque elegantiam imitari, quam Platoni Aristotelive N. T. nobis interpretari.—(See MEYER, Gesch. d. Schrifterkl. III. 415–16; R. SIMON, hist. crit. d. comment. du N. T., c. 35; BAYLE, s. v.) HERZOG.*

Dignity, or prelacy, is the distinction connected with a secular or ecclesiastical office, or post of honor. An eccl. dignity may attach to every incumbent of an office with which any pre-eminence is associated (see Benefice). But the term is also used in a narrower sense, in which a dignitas requires an eccl. office attached to a jurisdictio propria, whether ordinaria or extraord. and delegata (see Jurisdiction). Among those possessing a dignity, therefore, are: 1) dignitates pontificales, prælaturæ sensu proprio, who originally enjoyed this pre-eminence, all Bishops having a see of their own; hence the Pope, Primates, and Archb., but not merely suffragan or titular Bishops; 2) dign. majores, præl. secundariæ, on whom it has been subsequently bestowed by special act, as Cardinals, Legates, Nuncios, former Archdeacons and Arch-presbyters, the heads of chapters, cloisters, orders of knights, who have been released from and invested with episcopal jurisdiction; 3) dign., præl. honorariæ, personatus, who have no jurisdiction, but whom custom merely regards as prelates, as Provosts and Deans in chapters. The rights of dignitaries are, apart from their particular official position, various eccl. honors, as precedence of rank upon solemn occasions, a distinctive dress, incensation, &c., together with various civil prerogatives, special titles of honor (Right rev., &c.). II. F. JACOBSON.*

Dimissory letters (literæ dimissoriales, dimissoriae, ἀπολυτικά) are, in modern usage, papers certifying that the bearer has been duly dismissed from the eccl. jurisdiction to which he belonged, in order to take charge of a congregation, &c., in another. Even according to ancient canon law, no clergy could leave his diocese for another without such letters (Gratian. dist. LXXIII.; Conc. Trullan. a. 692, c. 17, in c. 1, can. XXI. qu. II.; comp. Du FRESNE, s. v. formata, &c.). Subsequently, to prevent abuses, it was insisted upon that strange clergy should not be allowed to perform religious services, as preaching, &c., without having certificates of dismissal and recommendation; new parishioners were also required to present similar papers.—Besides these literæ dimiss. perpetuæ, there were temporales given to those ordained by a strange eccl. superior. In the ancient C., clergy were ordained for a particular post. Each Bishop in his own diocese designated the post, and ordained to it. To allow a member of his diocese to be ordained by the B. of another, he gave the person a litera dim. perpetua. But, subsequently, absolute ordination was also allowed, by granting a transient dismissal for the purpose of ordination. The person to be ordained then received from his B., whom sickness, &c., might prevent from acting, a lit. dim. or formata (sigillata). One of the earliest specimens of these, dating from the 10th cent., may be found in GALLANDI, de vetustis canonum collect. P. I. p. 385. Others besides Bishops obtained the right of granting such letters (see c. 3, de temp. ordinat. in VI. [I. 9]; Bonif. VIII. Conc. Trid. s. VII. de ref. c. 10, s. XXIII. de ref. c. 3, 10).—As the Pope is ordinarius of the whole C., he has unlimited power to grant dismissals. Cardinals can grant them to such as have lived three years in their houses (FERRARIS, bibl. canon. s. v. Ordo, art. III. nr. 37). The episcopal Vicar-general can grant them in the Bishop's absence, or by his special permission. The Vicar-capitulary can do it only after the see has been vacant a year (FERRARIS, l. c. nr. 40, &c.). Abbots are limited in granting dim. to the monks subject to them; and exempt prelates, even though holding an episcopal jurisdiction, require a special papal privilege.—The dimissory letter (called referenda by the Council of Trent) is either directed to a particular B. for the imparting of the tonsure, or of a single order, or it is general, as facultas de promovendo a quocunque. H. F. JACOBSON.*

Dimorites, the title given, first by Epiphanius, hær. 77, 23, to the followers of Apollinaris the younger (see Art.), because they held that there were but two human parts in Christ, the λογος and the body, and that the Logos in him took the place of the reason. Sozomen. (H. E. VI. 25) calls them Vitalians, from Vitalis; Facundus of Hermiane (pro def. trium capit. Par. 1679) Synusiasts, because they held that Christ's flesh was of one substance with his divinity. But this name applies only to one of the two Apollinarian parties, the Polemians, whose leader, Polemo, taught (see PLOTIUS, bibl. cod. CCXXX.) that the doctrine of the two natures in Christ was an invention of Athanasius, the two Gregorys, Basil M., and the Italian Bishops. Opposed to these were the Valentinians, whose leader, Valentinus, seems to have swerved the least from the doctrines of Apoll. (Theodoret, hær. fab. IV. c. 8, 9). According to this, Augustine's division of these sects (in his de dono persever. c. 69) is incorrect. He names three parties: 1, those who said Christ had no soul; 2, those who said he had no rational soul; 3, those who taught that the Word was converted into flesh.

HERZOG.*

Diocletian, C. Aurelius Valerius, son of a Dalmatian slave, seized the reins of the Roman government when it was on the verge of ruin. His talents and exploits soon elevated him from the rank of a common soldier to an equality with the first generals. Looking upon his election as Emperor, which took place Sept. 17, 284, as the fulfilment of a prophecy delivered by a Druidess, he acknowledged no power but his own, and held himself responsible to no man. To perpetuate Imperialism, he associated with himself Maximianus, under the title of Augustus (April 1, 286), and two subordinate Emperors, Galerius and Constantius Chlorus, as Cæsars, who were allied to the Augusti by adoption and marriage. These latter, it was intended, should, in the course of time, take the place of himself and Max., and be succeeded by others whom they had chosen as Augusti. There was always to be a chief Emperor, Diocletian's special successor, clothed with absolute authority. Twenty years he assigned as a limit to every reign. Thus, while establishing a school for the education and trial of rulers, he rescued the empire from the rivalries of ambitious aspirants. Finding even in his name (Diocles, the Zeus-famed) a divine vocation to universal dominion, he assumed the title Jovius, whilst Max. took that of Ilerculus. He caused himself to be addressed Dominus, and to be prayed to as a god. Thus did he make use of religion to fortify his Imperialism, and to extend his sway. — During the reign of D. took place the last conflict between Paganism and Christianity. The Græco-Roman heathenism having failed to satisfy the wants of the soul, some sought consolation in the mystic rites of the Orient and the worship of Hecate, of Isis and of Mithras; whilst others manufactured a sort of theism which, resolving the manifold ideas of a supreme power then prevalent into one abstract divinity, worshipped it under the form of the sun and the lights of heaven. Christianity, which was tolerated during the reign of Gallienus, and the conflicts of the forty tyrants, had quietly penetrated the social system, and numbered more adherents than any specific form of heathenism. As it sought not only to save the souls of individuals, but to gain possession of entire nationalities and empires, it necessarily came into collision with Oriental paganism and the Theism above-mentioned. Had Diocletian, who adhered to the former system, fully and clearly understood the relation it sustained to Christianity, instead of allowing the number of Christians in the army and in his court to increase, and intrusting them with important offices, he would, from the very start, have unsheathed the sword of persecution. But the priests, who, according to D.'s plan of government, were to consecrate the rulers to their high position, as the vicegerents of the father of gods and men, recognized in Christ the destroyer of their authority, and became the deadly enemies of the Church. Besides, it is quite probable that Galerius, who was in the hands of the priests, may have obtained a knowledge of the object of the Christians, who aimed at the possession of the empire through the instrumentality of Constantius Chlorus and his family. The reign of D. was drawing to a close. Galerius, the priests, the pagan courtiers and generals, demanded the extirpation of Christianity. A bloody persecution ensued. The heathen State religion received a mortal wound. The Theism above-mentioned succumbed, and Christianity ascended the throne of the Cæsars.

Galerius having ordered (298) all the soldiers to take part in the offerings to the gods, many abandoned the army, whilst those who remained were exposed to the charge of treason. On the birthday of the Emperor, the centurion Marcellus, at Tingis, in Africa, having been summoned to sacrifice, indignantly threw away his sword, and refused obedience. Death was the reward of his fidelity. A fierce persecution was now visited upon the Christians, 303. On Feb. 23, the festival of the permiralia, the cathedral in Nicomedia was plundered and destroyed, and on the 24th an imperial edict put up, which forbade the assembling of Christians, and ordered the delivery and burning of MSS. Bibles, and the demolition of church buildings. Christians in office were bound to sacrifice, on penalty of losing their situations and their rights as citizens, whilst Christian slaves were never to be set free. Revolts breaking out in Armenia and Syria, a second edict was published, ordering the imprisonment of the officers of congregations who were falsely accused of having originated them. A third soon followed, which decreed that, if the Christians voluntarily offered sacrifices, they should be set at liberty; if not, they should be forced into compliance; and a fourth, which ordered that all, without distinction, should be compelled to sacrifice. A terrible panic ensued. Whilst many delivered up the Sacred Writings, which were burnt, many others concealed the Bible, and gave up in its stead other books, or acknowledged the having it, but refused to hand it over. The number of those who suffered death was very great, and the steadfastness of the Christians, some of whom even courted martyrdom, grew with the increasing furor of their enemies. The persecution having lasted two years in every part of the Roman empire, the Western excepted, where Constantius Chlorus was satisfied with the tearing down of churches, Diocletian, together with Maximian, retired into private life, May 7, 305. Galerius and Constantius now became Augusti, and Maximinus and Severus Cæsars. His father having suddenly died, Constantine was nominated by the army Augustus, in July, 306. As Constantine favored the Christians, he came into collision with all the other Augusti and Cæsars, who now continued the persecution begun by Diocletian. Galerius, whom his Cæsar, Max., alone equalled in bloodthirstiness, ordered (308) that the ruined temples should be rebuilt, that the Christians should offer sacrifices and eat of the meat, and that all market provisions should be sprinkled with the sacrificial wine. Many fell martyrs to his cruelty; amongst them the tribune Mauritius, with his 70 soldiers. On the approach of death, Galerius put a stop to the persecution. In an edict of 311, he acknowledged the failure of his design—the extirpation of Christians—granted them the free exercise of their religion, and called upon them to pray to their God for his welfare and that of the empire. After his death, Maximinus renewed the persecution in the Orient, and Maxentius in Italy. In the latter country, the victory of Constantine put an end to it, 312; in the former, Licinius continued it until compelled to a peace by Constant., 314. Diocletian, having lived long enough to see all his designs frustrated, poisoned himself, 313. — (Sources: EUSEB. H. E. VIII.; the treatise ascribed to LACTANTIUS, de mortibus persecutorum, c. 7, &c.; BURCKHARDT, d. Zeit. Constant. Gr.; GFRÖRER's allg. K.-G. I. 557-570.

A. VOGEL. — Ermentrout.

Diodorus, of noble descent, was a Presbyter in Antioch; from 378, Bishop of Tarsus; died about 394; one of the chief masters of the Antiochian school, and, in dogmatics, its founder. Having finished his classical course at Athens, he prepared himself for usefulness in the Christian Church under the distinguished Eusebius of Emesa (HIERONYM. vir. illustr. c. 119). As Chrysostom, who pronounced his eulogy, says nothing about his having presided as abbot over a monastery in Antioch, the report to that effect must be regarded as fallacious (SOCRAT. h. e. 6, 3; SOZOM. 8, 2; orat. in Diodor. c. 4; Opp. ed. Montfaucon, T. III. p. 749). Julian describes him a walking skeleton, with pale face, sunken cheeks, wrinkled body; and Chrysostom as the shadow of a human being (FACUND. defens. 4, 2). — Diod. spent the greater part of his life in combatting the enemies of the Church. In Antioch, Julian had restored the temple of the Daphnian Apollo; the sects had their conventicles, Arianism opposed the Nicene Confession; and Valens, whilst persecuting the Christians, countenanced their adversaries. His writings, chiefly polemical, were directed against heathen, Jews, and heretics. From Porphyry (περί ζώων και θνσίων) and the errors of Hellenism (περί θεού και ιλης ελληνικης πεπλασμένης), he turned against Plato and Aristotle. His dogmatic works are more positive in their character, e. g., περί του εις θεός εν τριάδι—περί οικονομίας—περί νεκρών αναστάσεως. Heretical notions about the soul are refuted in περί ψυχής. Whilst Arians and pagans visited him with bitter hatred, Chrysostom prized him as a martyr. — Diod. was a vigorous defender of the Nicene Creed, and introduced responses into the service of the Church. During the exiles of Meletius, who became Bishop of Antioch, 360, he, together with his friend, Flavian, undertook the care of the bereaved congregations (CHRYC. orat. in Diodor. c. 4), and, when expelled from them, he assembled the faithful on the neighboring mountains, on the shore of the Orontes, and other concealed places. In the year 372, he was compelled to fly from the city, together with Meletius, to Armenia, where he became acquainted with Basil. On the return of M., his fidelity was rewarded with the bishopric of Tarsus, 378. He took part in the Œcumenical Council of Constantinople (381), which made him Metropolitan over Cilicia (SOCRAT. h. e. 5, 8). An imperial edict (381) nominated him the fourth among the Bishops (cod. Theodos. 1, XVI. tit. 1, 7, 3).

In his conflict with Apollinarianism touching the relation of the two natures in Christ, Diod. advanced a theory which contained the germs of later Nestorianism. The two principal treatises on this subject are: προς τους συνουσιαστας, and περί του αγίου πνεύματος (Phot. bibl. cod. 102). From extracts of the former by Marius Mercator (ed. Baluze, p. 349, sqq.) and Leontius Byzantinus (c. Nestor. et Eutych. 1, 3, in Canis. lectiones antiquæ ed. Basnage, I. p. 591, sq.), it seems that D. distinguished a double son of God, the divine Logos and the son of David, the latter by nature, the former by grace. Mary did not beget the Logos, but the man, through the Holy Ghost. As the divine Logos is essentially and absolutely perfect, what Scripture (Luke 2:52) says concerning the growth of the Redeemer can only be applied to his humanity. The mystery of the incarnation consists in the assumption by the Logos of a perfect human nature. The relation of the two natures is the indwelling of the Logos in the man Jesus. In virtue of this connection, though not in the strict sense, the son of David may be called the Son of God, and worship may be directed, in the same way, to the humanity of Christ, provided the two natures be not intermingled or confused. Whilst the Spirit abode momentarily in the prophets, he dwells in Christ permanently, and in all his fulness. As the Scriptures teach that sin was the reason for the incarnation, the coming of the Son in our flesh was not necessitated by a law of the divine Being, but resulted from the free determination of God.

This view of Diod., whilst it did not dissolve the divine-human person of Christ, yet tended to destroy the substantial, organic unity of the two natures, failed to satisfy the demands of a more advanced state of dogmatic theology. In the course of time, when Nestorianism came to be regarded as a heresy, Diod. was looked upon as its forerunner. With the year 432, Cyrill of Alexandria called for the condemnation of Diod. and Theodore of Mopsucsta. The Church of Syria, however, adhered to its great teacher, and an imperial edict terminated the controversy. Cyrill stirred up an odious disputation, but was rebutted by Theodore. Instigated by the Monophysites, Bishop Flavian, of Antioch, pronounced an anathema against the writings of Diod. and Theodore, 499. From this time forward, the Greek Church regarded the christology of D. as heretical.

In exegesis, Diod. rejected, on the one hand, the allegorical theory, which puts into the text the fancies of an interpreter, and, on the other, the literal theory, which merely dissected words, without grasping their inner spirit. Following the laws of language, and of a true historical exposition, and regarding the Bible as a system of organic truth, he endeavored, whilst making the Messianic element the centre of his views, to do justice to the historical, as well as to the ideal meaning of Scripture. From this standpoint it was, that he wrote the εις διαφορά θεωρίας και αλληγορίας against the Alexandrians. His principle was susceptible of various applications, and, whilst his commentaries, as a whole, are characterized by a learned exposition of the text and by clearness of statement, they do not do justice to the supernatural, typical element of Scripture.

The cool, ratiocinative bent of his mind led him to lay great stress on the cosmological argu- ment for the existence of God. In his lost treatise, περὶ εἰσαγωγῆς, l. 8—of which Photius has preserved some extracts (bibl. cod., 223)—he proves that, as all things are undergoing a continual change, and as an eternal changing is a contradiction per se, God must have created the world. And as eternal punishment impugns the divine predestination of man to a happy immortality, in his περὶ αἰωνοῦς (Asseman. biblioth. orient. III., l. p. 324) he asserts the finiteness of the pains of hell. "As the worth of good works is as far short of their reward as the struggles of this life are short of the duration of eternity, so also will punishment be overcome by the greatness of the Divine clemency."

For a complete catalogue of his works, see Suidas (Διόδωρος ed. Bernhardt, T. I., p. 1379, sq.), the Nestorian Ebed Jesu (Asseman. bibl. orient., III., l. p. 28, &c.) and Fabricius (bibl. græc. ed. Harles., T. IX., p. 277, sqq.). Diod. was worthy of the honor with which his age crowned him. Though not a productive genius, and not unfrequently deficient in depth and thoroughness, he combined with a comprehensive erudition a sharply-defined individuality. His life was blameless. Even his participation in the breaking of a promise by Flavian (Socrat. h. e. 5, 5, 9, 15; Sozom., h. e. 7, 3, 11) was based upon a good intention (Theodoret., h. e. 5, 23). Some of his pupils were numbered amongst the most distinguished teachers of the Church; of them the two great fathers of the Greek communion, Theodorus, of Mopsueste, and John Chrysostom. Comp. NEANDER, St. John Chrysostom, 3 ed., I., p. 27.—ERNESTI, opusc. theol., p. 498, sqq. SEMISCH.—Ermentrout.

Diognet. Epistle to, a valuable relic of Christian antiquity, of the post-apostolic age, is a reply to certain inquiries on the part of him to whom it is addressed. Struck with the contempt of death exhibited by the martyrs, he desires information concerning the nature of Christianity, its difference from heathenism and Judaism, and the reason of its late appearance. This request the epistle meets by a concise sketch of Christian morals and doctrine. It opens by declaring heathenism to be nothing but the worship of lifeless images of wood and stone, and Judaism, with its equally sensual worship of the one God and Creator, as though the All-sufficient had need of bloody offerings, rather folly than piety, and its minute ceremonial law more worthy of ridicule than serious refutation. On the highest position God has placed the Christians. Indifferent to the divisions of national and social life, but worthy of admiration on account of their strict morality going beyond all law and their fervent charity, they are to the world what the soul is to the body, homeless on earth, in spirit and conversation citizens of heaven. The divinity of the Christian religion has its warrant, objectively in its establishment by the Son of God, the world-creating Logos; subjectively, in the joyful dying of the martyrs, the sign of God's presence. All true knowledge of God depends on revelation. The eye of faith is the spiritual organ, which sees God revealed. From the beginning the Father had communicated to the divine Son the counsel of redemption. His long-suffering permitted the generations before Christ to give free rein to their desires and lusts, not because it was pleasing to him, but because he wished to make it plain that no power of their own and no merit of works could win the crown of life. After the measure of their sins was full, God revealed himself in the incarnation of his Son, who, without sin himself, became the ransom of the lost. From the assurance of justification wrought by his righteousness arises trust in the paternal goodness of God; from both, love, which, essentially god-like and fearless of the terrors of death, in its elevation above the world and its spirit of self-sacrifice, gives even here a foretaste of the mysteries and blessedness of heaven.

These are the fundamental ideas of the epistle, whose origin, from internal evidence, must date about the middle of the 2d cent., when the Church, already sharply sundered from the Jews and prepared by many a baptism of blood, was waking to a consciousness of the part she had to take in the history of the world. Its reigning simplicity, along with its references to novelty of Christianity and persecutions, has led many to give it a higher age. Hence it is placed in the reign of Trajan (Möhler, Hefele), or in that of Hadrian, either before (Herbig) or after (Otto) the outbreak of the Jewish war. Dorner offers another conjecture. He finds the first traces of an alliance of Christianity with Hellenic philosophy, in the free, universal standpoint of the epistle, in its ethical doctrines, especially its eudæmonism, and in the author's styling himself a scholar of the Apostles, the characteristic marks of the person of Quadratus. From a palpable misapprehension of what it says in regard to the continuance of Jewish sacrifices and customs it has even been assigned to the age of the Apostles (Tillemont). But there is really no strong ground to support any of these views. With Dorner (die Person Christi, I. p. 178) we may perhaps say: "Since the work proceeds from what is eternal in Christianity, it bears so few certain marks of any particular age, that any period might claim it as its own. From his title ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων, which cannot be given here as a mere compliment, we learn that the receiver of the Ep., Diognet, was a man of rank and culture. But the supposition, that he and the Stoic philosopher, who taught Marcus Aurelius, were identical, has scarcely more to support it than the fact that they lived about the same time. In the MSS. the Ep. bears the name of Justin Martyr, but the majority of the ablest modern critics do not consider him as the author. For the arguments against its genuineness, see Semisich, Monogr. üb. Just. Mart., I. p. 172, ss.; on the other side, Otto, Epist. ad. Diog. Just. nomen prae se ferens, 1845, ed. 2, 1852. The difficulties are, 1. The language and style, which are manifestly not those of Justin, and 2. The views expressed. And here the most important points of difference are, a) The conception of heathenism as a worship of dead images made by human hands, whilst Justin regarded them only as the symbols, forms of manifestation and temporary abodes of demons identical with the gods; b) The disparaging opinion of Judaism, without the least intimation of its divine origin, whilst Justin advocated the unity of God's revelations in the O. and N. T.; c) The complete silence respecting the activity of the Logos before the incarnation, which forms with Justin the fundamental idea, to connect the otherwise sundered worlds before and after Christ in one great whole. With him the universal character of Christianity rests specially on this. It is his answer to the charge of novelty made against it by the heathen (Apol., I, 46). Hence this epistle could not possibly be the work of Justin, standing in such flat contradiction as it does, with his view of the world before Christ. It never alludes to the idea of the λόγος σπευματικός, for it recognizes neither the prophecies nor Christophanies of the O. T. Suddenly, unexpectedly, Christianity bursts into a world under the power of sin. Not the necessity of a gradual unfolding of the plan of salvation, as Justin teaches, but the design of God, first to bring mankind to a consciousness of the need of saving grace, was the reason, according to the Ep., why the work of redemption was postponed.—It contains no particular marks of Gnosticism, although it seems to lean somewhat in that direction.—Independent of the general question as to its genuineness, the last two chapters (11, 12), undoubtedly belong to a later period. Even in the MSS. they are noted as suspicious. The language, the contents, the spirit, all look the same way. Their aim was to reduce the too free expressions of the Ep. to the standard of a stricter orthodoxy. The probable time of their origin was the 3d cent. According to Bunsen (Hippolytus u. s. Zeit., I. p. 138), they form the conclusion of the recently discovered heretical work of Hippolytus, and the body of the Ep., the beginning of one composed by the Gnostic Marcion in his earliest period. Both hypotheses are groundless. The oldest edition of the Ep. is that of H. Stephanus, 1592; Otto's, corrected after MSS., (Opp. Just., ed. 2, 1849, II., p. 156, sqq.); then Hefele (patr. apost. opp., ed. 3, p. 300, sqq.). Of the older critical works upon it we may mention: Böhl (opusc. patr. select. I. 109, sqq.), Möhler (gesam. Schrift. I. p. 19, sqq., Patrologie I. p. 164, sqq.), and von Grossheim (de Ep. ad Diog., 1828). The latest critical revision by Hollenberg (der Brief an Diog., 1853) strengthens the argument against referring it to Justin. SEMISCH.—Porter.

Dionysius, of Alexandria, surnamed the Great, a disciple of Origen, succeeded Heraclas both in the Catechetical school (232), and in the Bishopric of Alexandria (247). In 250 he was involved in the Decian persecution. Like Cyprian, he was called upon to justify his flight, with which, however, the accusation of too great rigor against the lapsi could not, in his case, be connected. Having been seized notwithstanding his flight, he escaped further consequences by an unexpected deliverance. After this he was engaged in the religious struggles of his age, generally as mediator, as in the schism of Novatian. His views in favor of a milder discipline he urged both in numerous letters, as also, according to Euseb. Ch. Hist., VI., 46, by his works, περὶ μετανοίας (to Conon), and περὶ μαρτυρίας πρὸς τὸν Ὀριγένην. His course in the contest concerning the baptism of heretics, was similar to this; since, though in principle on the Roman side, he wished to honor the views of his opponents, and maintain union with them. See his letters in Euseb. Ch. Hist., VII. During the persecution of Valerian, 257, he had to endure a grievous banishment first at Cephro in Lybia, and afterwards at Colluthion, in Beroetis, which, however, did not prevent all intercourse with Alexandria, and also saved him to the time of Gallienus, by whose edict, 260, he was once more set free. Even sadder than his past experiences were those which were forced upon him by the seditions, murders, pestilence and famine, which were afflicting Alexandria. We find him once more engaged in two doctrinal struggles of his times; the first of which reminds us of a declining age, the other of the aim of theological development, which was just now assuming a more definite form. Of the spirit of the Alex. school he has given a testimony in his triumphant refutation of Chiliasm, the expiring light of which was once more flaming up under the auspices of Nepos (see Art. Chiliasm). In the doctrine of the Trinity, however, he strove in vain to make the views of Origen prevalent. In his opposition to Sabellianism he was carried too far into the opposite extreme, so that Dionysius, of Rome, charged him with dividing the Deity, and reducing Christ to a mere creature with a beginning in time (see Athanas. de decr. Synod. Nic., 26). In reply to this he wrote his συγγραμματα, by which he rescued his orthodoxy. Shortly before his death (264) he wrote a letter against Paul, of Samosata, age and sickness having prevented his attendance at the Synod of Antioch.—D. is the most important of the disciples of Origen, and a worthy scion of the older Alex. school. He did not, however, possess that resolute independence, which in doctrine could effectually combat the tendencies of the age. He is, nevertheless, an important leader of the Church in his times, of a noble and conciliatory disposition, though the greater freedom of his views assigned him often the ungrateful task of a mediator. In his brief comparison of the Gospel and Apocalypse of John, undertaken to prove a diversity in their authors, in the treatment of which question he has not yet been excelled, he shows himself a commentator of superior education, and sprung from the school of Origen: see MÜNSTER, de Dion. Al. circa Apoc. sentent., &c.: Copenh., 1826; and LÜCKE, Einl. in d. Offenb. Joh.—His narratives and pictures from life are fresh and richly colored, and yet terse and vigorous. The few authentic remnants of scriptural explanations which have reached us, show him to have equalled the first preachers of his age, and to have held truly evangelical views of the method of salvation.—Of his numerous polemic, ascetic, exegetic, and apologetic works, only scanty fragments have reached us. Most of these are found in Eusebius. They have been gathered by GALLANDI, bibl. vet. patr., etc., III. p. 481, seq.; de MAGISTRIS, Rome, 1796, fol.; ROUTH, rel. sacr. II. et IV. WEIZSÄCKER.—Reinecke.

Dionysius, the Areopagite, works ascribed to him. According to Acts 17, 34, Dion. A. was converted to Christianity by Paul. Dion., of Corinth, tells us (Euseb., III., 9 et IV., 23) that he was the first Bishop of Athens, where also, according to a tradition resting upon Aristides the apologist, he suffered martyrdom.—The following works are extant under his name: 1. περὶ τῆς οὐρανίας ἱεραρχίας; 2. περὶ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς ἱεραρχίας; 3. περὶ δεινῶν ὀνομάτων; 4. περὶ ἁγίας θεολογίας; 5. ten epistles; an eleventh, Ἀπολλοφάνης, is a later addition by a different author. These works are first met with about A. D. 532, hence, shortly after the Neoplatonic school at Athens had been closed (529) by command of Justinian, and a portion of its adherents had emigrated to Persia. During a colloquy of the monophysite Severians with the Catholics, held by command of Justinian at Constantinople, under the presidency of Hypatius, they were quoted by the Severians, whilst H. denied their authenticity, since they were unknown to the fathers, such as Athanasius, and Cyril, of Alexandria. Notwithstanding their disputed authenticity (Photius, cod. 2) they soon acquired high favor in the Greek Church, where they are furnished with scholiæ and paraphrases by various authors, and pass as the type of mystical theology. In the West, where mention is first made of them, though in a hesitating, doubting way, by Gregory the Gr., they became better known after the Emp. Michael had presented (827) a copy of them to Louis the Pious, and were the more highly honored, when, in consequence of the discoveries of Hilduin, Ab. of St. Denys, their reputed author was identified with the great patron saint of France. After this they pass as a fountain of theological wisdom; the mystics find in them the source of their doctrine, and the scholastics write comments on them: thus, John Scotus Erigena, Hugo of St. Victor, Albert M., Thomas Aquinas, Dionysius Carthusianus, &c. — In the age of the Reformation their authenticity and the identity of the two saints were again called in question by Laurentius Valla and Erasmus (Comment. to Acts 17), and the fact was pointed out that they were unknown in the first five centuries, and presupposed dogmatic forms and Church institutions, which were undoubtedly of later origin. Catholic theologians also, as Sirmond, Launoï, Morinus, do not deny the facts; and the apologies of the Jesuits, Halloix and Delrio, are thoroughly refuted by Dallæus (de script. quæ sub Dion. A. et Ignat. Antioch. nom. circumferent.: Gen., 1666); the arguments of the latter once more weighed and confirmed by the Catholic LE NOURRY (Adparat. ad Biblioth. Max. Patr.: Par., 1703). Their unauthentic character remained after this undisputed, and the attempt of Kestner in his Agape, Jena, 1819, to reassert their authenticity, is a complete failure.—After having thus been shown to be unauthentic, their origin and design were investigated. Earlier theologians, as le Nourry, supposed from dogmatico-polemical allusions that they had been composed in the interest of the Cath. doctrine on occasion of the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies. Others (le Quien, Venema), regarded their author as a Eutychian or Monophysite. But, though in these writings, a reference to these doctrinal controversies cannot be denied, it is nevertheless far too general, too cautiously orthodox and incidental, to be regarded as the peculiar motive of the fiction. A closer acquaintance with the development of the Neo-Platonic philosophy and mysticism afforded the conviction, that the true explanation of these works and of their design, must be found in it. Suidas already had noticed their accordance with Neo-Platonism, and had concluded that the Platonists, especially Proclus, had made use of the philosophy of the apostolical father, suppressing, however, his name. Appolinaris, the elder, on account of his philosophical views and other literary labors, was regarded by others as their author. (Thus Cave, script. eccl. I., 177. Paulus, in his review of Engelhardt's Dion. Ar. in the Heidelb. Jahrb., 1825, XI.). This is contradicted by the churchly-dogmatic, and especially the philosophical basis of the work. With more plausibility their origin was ascribed to Synesius, after 410, Bishop of Ptolemaus, who, indeed, was more Platonist than Christian theologian. (Thus la Croze, Beschreib. d. christl. Relig. in Æthiop., a. d. Franz. Danzig. 1740, p. 17, etc.). But with all similarity these writings nevertheless differ from Synesius, both in style and particular views. In more recent times Baumgarten-Crusius has supposed (de Dion. Areop. Progr., Jen., 1823; reprint. in his Opusc. theol., Jen., 1836), that these writings design a complete transfer of the Greek mysteries into Christianity, as also to oppose Gnosticism with a mystical system of religion, whence their author must be an Alexandrian from the beginning of the 3d century. Though the former supposition seems plausible, yet the latter is an anachronism, since the gnosis combatted by the author is not the older gnosticism. Engelhardt (die angebl. Schrift. des Ar. Dion. übers. u. m. Abhandl. begl., Sulzbach, 1823) has without doubt pointed out the true historical place of these writings; they belong to the later Neo-Platonic school, whose most important representative was Proclus (see Baur, Gesch. d. Lehre v. d. Dreieinigk.; Ritter, Gesch. d. christl. Phil.). — The ideas of God and the process of religious life (of the supersensuous monas, from whom by an emanation the universe, the νοῦς with the κόσμος νοητός and the ψυχὴ with the κόσμος αἰσθητός, originates; and to return to whom, by being purified of the material and by illumination, is the highest aim of religious life), as they had been developed by Plotinos (see Vogt, Neu-Platon. u. Christenth., Berl., 1836), the later adherents of this doctrine, Porphyry, Jamblichus, had sought to render practical, by endeavoring to infuse by means of them an ideal character into the heathen belief of the gods, and connecting with it theurgy and mystic rites as means of induction into the monas. Proclus, the last Coryphæus of this school at Athens, had striven to carry forward this tendency, but also to give it, by means of logical formulas, a strictly scientific appearance. He classified the higher and lower existences (gods, etc.), emanating from the monas, into three triads (see Ritter, Gesch. d. Phil., IV., p. 679), making the latter to proceed from the former, in which also they are contained, and to have part in the higher, and be led back again into the highest, only by their connection with the order next preceding them: e. g. men through the dæmons, eto. (RITTER, ut supr., p. 665). The heathen theurgy of these hierophants, being no longer tolerated in the Christian state, had to retire into obscurity; their philosophy, however, maintained its influence even among the confessors of Christianity. — The ideas of this school the Pseudo-Dion. seeks to portray as the true and original sense of the Christian doctrine and institutions, as the deeper, recondite, divine science, which, in the manner of St. Hierotheus, is made accessible to youths by himself and other teachers. That only can be taught concerning God, which he himself has revealed in the Scriptures and a kindred occult tradition teaches; which, being in a certain measure nearer to the celestial than the other, passes in a spiritual way from spirit to spirit (Div. Nom., I., 2, 4; III., 2, 3; Hier. Eccl., I., 4). The leading thoughts, occurring in endless repetitions, are: God, the monas, superior to all existence, thought, limitation, and attribute; the good, is the ultimate foundation, substance, and life of all things through the goodness with which he — like the sun which, not by reflection or design, but from its very existence pours out its beams — brings everything into existence, and maintains in its place all that has cause to exist. Through this irradiation exist all purely spiritual beings, rational and irrational souls, and even lifeless substances (Div. Nom., I., 3, 5; IV., 1, 2). The relation of the ray to the centre, of the numbers to the monad, the qualities to the subject, are used to illustrate how the one can be the cause of all and in all, and yet above all, and no part of all (Div. Nom., V., 6, 7; XIII., 2). But everything also strives to reach the one, as the ground and end of its being. — Theology, in order to reach this existence which is supersensuous, incapable of being reduced to forms of thought and incomprehensible, must proceed per thesin and per aphæresin, must be cataphatic and apophatic; i. e., must affirm of it, as the cause of all, all which is found in that which is: but again, since what is, is limited and hence a mere negation — deny it all and regard the absolute as above both affirmation and negation (Theol. Myst., I., 2). Thus God, from his emanations, and from that which is in them, the spiritual, psychical, corporal and lifeless sphere of existence, has received his names, such as goodness, life, beauty, salvation, redemption, etc., in the interpretation of which, however, the ethical always vanishes to make room for the physical. In all these names only the power, effect, etc., which we receive from God, is expressed: as he is in himself, he cannot in this manner be understood; for the cause, though it impresses its image upon the effect, is yet above the effect. Properly, therefore, God must be reached cataphatically, i. e., we must deny of him all the limitations found in positive existence; and, setting aside sense, must ascend not only to the light of intellectual vision, but setting aside this also, must plunge into the mystical contemplation of him, who has made darkness his habitation (Theologia mystica). This movement of the soul to the One, is regarded as being in a circle, in which the soul, being freed from the outward, collects its own harmonious powers, and being thus inwardly reconciled, ascends to him who is above all existence (Div. Nom., IV., 9). — This mystical inward reunion is, of course, not attainable by all. Those who attain to it are called to be mystagogues, and to elevate others. This elevation cannot be reached in the subjective way of a free exercise of reason, but by means of a hierarchic process, the order of which is given already in the doctrine of emanation, as given by Proclus. A hierarchy is the holy order, science, and energy assimilating to God, by which those who are parts of it are, each in his manner, purified, illumined, and perfected (Hier. celest., c. 3). The Hierarchia celestis describes the order of the angels, or supermundane spiritual beings, who have received illumination unmixed with matter; every revelation of God is through their agency; the legal hierarchy of Moses, as well as the incarnation of Christ (H. C., IV., 3, 4; V., 2). The order of angels divides into three triads: 1, thrones, cherubim, and seraphim: 2, rulers, principalities, powers: 3, angels, archangels, dominions. — In accordance with our own nature, the hierarchia ecclesiastica is replete with sensuous symbols; for through such we are lifted up to spiritual contemplation (H. E., I., 2). Here, also, three triads are given (H. E., V. 1–3). In every hierarchic office are to be distinguished: 1, the holy consecration; 2, those who consecrate, the mystoi; 3, those to be consecrated. The consecrations are: a, baptism (ῥανσμός); b, communion (συνάξις); c, unction: the mystoi are: a, the hierarch (bishop); b, the priest; c, the liturgue (deacon): the deacon purifies, the priest illuminates, the bishop perfects: among the consecrated are: a, those to be purified (catechumens, energumens, etc.); b, those to be illumined (the baptized, who take part in the mysteries); c, the higher monks. The descriptions of church customs are generally true to the actual state of the case. The substance of these mysteries, if it is separated from a mass of luxurious verbiage, is simply a symbolical representation of the manner in which we advance in the divine life — through a moral asceticism. — From the above it is evident that the doctrines of sin, God, redemption, in their true sense, do not belong to these writings. The author enters upon no thorough discussion of them, and excuses his omission by referring to his theological hypotyposes (Theol. myst., 3, etc.), which undoubtedly never existed. Though striving to keep up in general an appearance of orthodoxy, he does not in particulars adopt the entire orthodox terminology. Evil, to which he devotes most space (D. N., IV., 18, sqq.), has no real existence, but is a mere limitation, want, which belongs to all not absolutely good. God knows the evil as good; for all spirits, souls, bodies, etc., the evil consists in a departure from the good which properly belongs to them. Thus human nature, though created καθαρὸν, has nevertheless voluntarily departed from the divine life which would have elevated it to immortality, and has chosen mortality instead (H. E., 3, 11). — In the doctrine of the Trinity, that which is one must not be divided; e. g., the names which belong to the whole Deity, be applied to one of its persons: nor must that which is different be confounded. But inherent differences cannot exist in the absolute. According to the Scriptures the father is the fonsal deity; son and spirit are branches of the theogonic deity. How this is, can be neither understood nor expressed. All such Trinitarian terms are mere expressions of the cataphatic theology, which must be set aside by the truer negations of the apophatic (Theol. M., 3, 5).—In the want of a proper theological basis, and in the prevailing principle of a hierarchic mediation by angels, no room is left for an orthodox christology. The ontological basis for the being of God in Christ is perhaps the same as that for the being of God in man in general; only the real, actual appearance of it in Christ, is a new one. The divinity of Jesus, which is the cause of all things (especially of every hierarchy, II. E., I., 1), fills all things, and in all things holds the parts in union with the whole, has taken upon himself perfect and unchanged human nature (D. N., 2, 10, 3). The incorporeal Jesus has become corporeal, without giving up his incorporeity (Theol. M., 3, ep. 4). The divinity of Jesus is nothing else than the incorporeal one, which, regarded as causality, produces in the world the effects which are called salvation, redemption, etc. His human appearance is the actual manifestation of the original relation of the incorporeal absolute and humanity, which was destroyed by the aberration of man.—The object of this effort to blend Neo-Platonism with Christianity was, to conciliate both the heathen philosophers of the Athenian school, and the orthodox Christians; to do which the more effectually, the name of Dion. Ar. was used. The philosophers charged the Christians with having stolen the Neo-Platonic ideas to the detriment of the Greeks: the author wished to show that N.-P. had appropriated many Christian ideas. On the other hand he wished to introduce into the Church a mode of thinking, which, he was convinced, would lead to a deeper apprehension of Christian truth. He succeeded in introducing into the Church a mystical philosophy clothed in a Christian garb, at the very time when its heathen representatives had been silenced by the State. The best edition of the works of Dion. Ar. is that of Balth. Corderius, e soc. Jesu: Par., 1615; Antwerp, 1636, in 2 vols., fol. It is accompanied with the explanations of Maximus, Pachymeres, and other learned apparatus. It was reprinted in the Opera D. A., ed. rec. Corderii: Brizix, 1854. K. Voort.—Reinecke.

Dionysius, of Corinth, became, an. 170, Bishop of that city (Eus. in Chron.), and distinguished both for the conscientious discharge of his duties in his own diocese, and for his counsels and instructions to others. Eight epistles, called Catholic, were known of him in the ancient Church; they were addressed to the Church in Lacedæmon, Athens, Nicomedia, Gortyna in Crete, Amastris in Pontus, Gnossus, Rome, and one to a Christian sister called Chrysophora. They are lost, except their general contents and a few fragments in Eusebius, Eocl. Hist., IV., 23, which are valuable for their information concerning the churches to which they were addressed. Jerome, in Catal. C., 37, metes considerable praise to Dion. for these letters. HERZOG.—Reinecke.

Dionysius, B. of Rome, 259–269, successor of Sixtus II. When yet R. presbyter, he took sides in the controversy concerning the baptism of heretics with Stephan; and, in connection with a colleague, Philemon, wrote a letter concerning it to Dionysius of Alex., who had declared against Stephan. Dion. A. replied by a vindication of his views. As Bishop he is known particularly by the part which he took in the Trinitarian controversies, and which was of no inconsiderable influence. Several Ægypt. Bishops had declared the letter of Dion. A. to Ammonius and Euphranor against the Sabellians heterodox, and accused him before the R. Dionysius. The latter brought the matter before a Synod, in the name of which he also wrote to the Al. Dion., requesting him to explain himself more fully concerning the accusation, and giving the general opinion of the Synod on the point in dispute (Athan. de synod., c. 43, compared with his de sentent. Dion., c. 13). Dion. A. replied with his ελεγχος and απολογία, giving in his adherence to the Roman view. Hereupon Dion. R. wrote an encyclica to the Ægypt. bishops, combatting both the Sabellians and the opposite error. Of this writing Athanasius makes mention in his de sent. D., c. 13, and gives a lengthy quotation from it in his de decret. Syn. N., c. 45. This fragment is all that remains of him. He rejects in it three errors: the Sabellian; that of those who sunder the divine unity into three hypostases or deities; and that of those who make the Son a creature (ποιημα) of the father. He is not remarkable for speculative acumen. "The Logos is united with the Father, the Holy Spirit dwells in him. The Son is not created, but conceived. He is the word, wisdom, and power of God: hence, unless there was a time when God was without these, he is uncreated." A third letter of D. was addressed to Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, in order to comfort the Christians in their afflictions. The bearers of this letter were also charged to buy up the captive Christians of this Church. As late as Basil M. the letter was preserved by this Church.—Bas. M., ep. 70. MÜHLER, Patrologie, I., 640. DORNER, Entwick.-Gesch., etc., I., 746, 764.

HERZOG.—Reinecke.

Dionysius, Exiguus, one of the prominent and influential Latins of the 6th century, was by birth a Scythian, and acquired at Rome, where he also became abbot, a considerable education. He died in 556. He is known more particularly as the author, by his Easter-cycle, of the common Christian æra, and by his collection of Canons (see Canons and Decret.). He translated also several Greek works: 1, the epistola paschalis of Roterius; 2, the life of St. Pachomius, to which he furnished a preface; 3, the Epistle of Proclus, Patr. of Constantinople, to the Armenian clergy (in 435); 4, the laudationem in sanctiss. Theodoros, delivered, 429, in Constantinople against Nestorius, by the same Proclus, when yet B. of Cysicus; 5, the de conditione hominis of Greg. of Nyssa; 6, the hist. invent. cap. S. Joan. Bapt., by the archimandrite Marcellus, of Emesa; 7, the Synodical epistle of Cyril, of Alex., and of the Alex. Synod against Nestorius, besides twelve Anathematisms.—See FABRICII, bibl. lat., lib. IV. HERZOG.—Reinecke.

Dionysius, the Carthusian, called also D. Rickel, D. Leuwis or Leeuwis, born 1403, of the noble family v. Leuwis at Rickel, a hamlet near Looz, in the diocese of Liege, desired in his 18th year already to be received into the Carthusian order; being refused, because the rules of the order required an age of 20 years in order to admittance, he went to Cologne, where he studied theology and philosophy, and published his first work, de ente et essentia. In his 21st year he entered the Carth. monastery at Roermonde, and remained there until his death in 1471, a model of monastic rigor verging on cynicism, a model of an iron diligence, which produced countless works. From the special divine revelations to which he laid claim, he was called doctor ecstaticus. He stood high in honor and influence, his counsel being sought by the highest dignitaries of Church and State. In 1451 he accompanied Cardinal Nic. v. Cusa on his missionary journeys through Germany and the Netherlands, on occasion of which he wrote his de mun. et regim. legati, and zealously assisted the Cardinal in his reformatory labors. He wrote a mass of works in support of what the papal court called a reformation of the Church; prevented a civil war between Arnold, Duke of Guelders, and his son Adolphus; and, after the fall of Constantinople, urged, in his ep. ad. princ. Cath., a new crusade against the Turks.—His works, above a hundred, are enumerated by Rzovius, ad a. 1471, N., XXI., and in THEODORUS PETREJUS, bibl. Carthus., p. 50–84. His chief work is, enarrationes or commentarii to the O. and N. T., 7 vols.: Col., 1530–36. For criticism and philology they are worthless, but they abound in patristic quotations, and in mystic-allegorical conceits. Schröckh, XXXIV., 117, etc.—Nor was D. orthodox Catholic on all points. A translation of his de quatuor novissimis was placed in the index, as it taught that souls in purgatory were not sure of their eternal salvation. He also wrote comments on Dion. Ar.: Col., 1536; Peter Lomb.: Col., 1535; Thomas Aq., and others, besides a refutation of the Alcoran. His life, by the Carth. THEOD. LOER, Col., 1532, is reprinted in the Acta SS., March 12, Tom. II., fol. 245. His revelations are given also in the Chron. Cart. of Dorlandus, Col. 1608. See FABRICII, bibl. lat. lib., IV. WETZER AND WELTE. HERZOG.—Reinecke.

Dippel, John Conrad ("Christianus Democritus") b. Aug. 10, 1673, at Frankenstein castle, displayed as a child a strange inclination to religious quibbling; in his 9th year he fell out with his catechism. In his 16th year he entered the university of Giessen, where he was spoiled by the unseasonable praise of his teachers. He became a violent partizan with the orthodox against the pietists, and demonstrated his zeal by indulging in open revelries. In Strassburg, whither he had gone to oppose the influence of Spener, he lectured upon astrology and chiromancy, also preached, but scandalized his calling by his irregularities, so that he had soon to leave the city. After various adventures, he published, in 1697, Orthodoxia orthodoxorum, and, in 1698, a defence of orthodoxy, entitled, Papismus Protestantium vapulans, oder das gestäupte Pabstthum d. Protestirenden. In both he rejects the inspiration of the SS. the efficacy of the sacraments, and justification by faith. Subsequently, he went to Berlin, and, despite the squandering of his estate in previous failures, prosecuted experiments in alchemy. In Berlin, he was imprisoned for an attack upon court-preacher Meyer, and his son-in-law, the Swedish minister; but, after being cautioned, he was released, and secretly went to Frankfort on the M., and thence to Amsterdam. Leyden bestowed the M. D. upon him. His pamphlet, Alea belli Muselmannici, 1711, caused his expulsion from Amsterdam. He went to Altona, where imprudent expressions led to his being again imprisoned. He was sent in chains to Copenhagen, and thence taken to the island of Bornholm. After seven years' imprisonment, the Queen of Denmark procured his release. He next went to Christianstadt, and, in 1727, to Stockholm, where the court honorably received him; but for his heterodoxy, he might have become Bishop of Upsala. Again compelled to flee, he found at length an asylum in that common refuge of all persecuted fanatics, the Witgenstein castle, Berleburg. He prophesied that he would live till 1809, but died suddenly, April 25, 1734. In 1733, he published "Hauptsumme d. theol. Grundlehren d. Democriti." Ackermann, his panegyrist, compares him to Luther, but censures his imperiousness, and his violence against opponents. Altogether, Dippel presents a peculiar mixture of mysticism and rationalism, of pietism and frivolity.—(See ACKERMANN, Leben D., &c.; HOFFMANN, H. V. do. Darmst. 1783; Adelung, Gesch. d. menschl. Narrheit, I. 314, &c.; STRICKER, hess. Gelehrten- u. Schriftstellergesch.; WALCH, Rel.-Streitigk. &c. I. 764–5; II. 721–55; HAGENBACH, K.-gesch. d. 18. u. 19. Jahrh. I. 164, &c.). *HAGENBACH.

Diptychs, in the ancient C. were registers of the names of persons, living or deceased, whom the priests had to mention in the prayer preceding the consecration of the sacramental elements. These were, ordinarily, persons who had brought with them the bread and wine needed for the sacrament. But, besides these, such as had rendered themselves deserving in other ways were entered upon the register. Thus the people, to show their reverence for the first four Œcum. Councils and Pope Leo, desired, "Quatuor synodos diptychis, Leonem episcopum Rom. diptychis!" and, until the 12th cent., the diptychs of the different churches contained, on the leaf for the dead, the names of all the Bishops whose memory was specially revered; on the leaf for the living, the names of the king, princes, and others who had rendered service to the Church. And as it was a proof of orthodoxy to be enrolled upon the diptych, so it was equivalent to excommunication to be erased from it. The Greek and Armenian Churches retain the custom of reciting the diptychs; in the Western C., the following formula in the old missal of Pamelius, Memento, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuarum, et eorum, quorum nomina ad memorandum conscripsimus ac super sanctum altare tuum scripta adesse videntur, implies that it was thought sufficient to place the diptychs upon the altar, and refer to them only in a general way. The Missale Rom.

merely directs the priest to pause a moment at this point, and silently think of those for whom he desires to pray. II. A.*

Diseases of the Israelites in Palestine. The Israelites in Palestine were subject to none of those endemic diseases which prevailed in Egypt. Even epidemics sent to punish them raged but a short time. And during their sojourn in Goshen, they seem to have mostly escaped the plagues of those districts flooded by the Nile. Even leprosy was not endemic in Palestine, or among the Israelites. Its occurrence there and in Syria was of a sporadic and milder character (2 K. 5 : 1, 27, &c. &c.). Tacitus still testifies to the salubrity of the country (Hist. V. 6). Among milder epidemics, there occur: during the summer, dysentery; in the spring and fall, fevers (Lüdecke, Beschr. d. türk. Reichs, p. 60). In summer they prevail more in mountainous districts, in winter, throughout the plains and cities. Intermittent fevers (tertian typhus is very common in Arabia and Syria) are confined to marshy districts. March and October are the most sickly months. Acute and rapid diseases chiefly prevail. Among chronic diseases, the climate is especially productive of hypochondria and hysteria (Jost, Gesch. d. Isr. I. 12). Gout and rheumatism are common in Syria and the surrounding districts; but there, as in other countries, the cure is, providentially, near at hand, in the warm and sulphur springs of Tiberias, &c. (comp. John 5 : 2).—Individual cases of disease will chiefly claim our attention; although, on account of the various, and, at times, contradictory views of physicians who have written upon Biblical nosology, we cannot with certainty classify the single cases mentioned in the SS. Among these, we find named in the Pentateuch, Consumption (Levit. 26 : 16; comp. Deut. 28 : 22), including all forms of hectic fever, which, with its fellow, typhoid fever (in the various forms of petechial typhus, yellow fever, and pestilential bubo) carries off the largest portion of our race. It is called שִׁחָהּ from an Arab. root, meaning thin, lean, سَكَا, phthisis, שִׁחָהּ and רָזַן from רָזָה, to be lean (Is. 10 : 16). The emaciation results from a diseased condition of the organs of assimilation and secretion, and of the nervous system. (Upon the frequency of tubercular C. among oriental, especially Egyptian, Jews, see Pruner, Krankh. d. Orients, 337, &c.). A case of local decay (atrophia) without fever is mentioned Matt. 12 : 10; such cases probably result from a paralysis of the nerves, deficient or interrupted innervation of the muscular tissue, &c. In Deut. 28 : 22 (comp. 32 : 24; Levit. 26 : 16; Hab. 3 : 5), three terms are used to designate fevers or inflammations. Whether they express different forms of fevers (inflammatory, gastric and gastric-nervous intermittents, &c.), or designate distinct diseases, it is difficult to decide (see monogr. REUSSELIUS, de pestil., Deut. 28 : 22; Jena, 1681); so of the cases stated Matt. 8 : 14, &c.; Luke 4 : 39; and John 4 : 46–52; but in both, the fever seems to have been of an acute character. The fever of the father of Publius, Acts 28 : 8, was the mere accompaniment of the chief disease, the dysentery, with which old people are apt to be afflicted, on account of the weakness of the lower bowels. Among other acute diseases of the vascular system, mention is made of sun-stroke (Ps. 121 : 6, and, doubtless, 2 K. 4 : 19; Judith 8 : 3; Jonah, 4 : 8). It is said to occur often in Jericho (ROBINSON, I. 553, &c.; BUEHLER, Calendar, p. 40). If, besides affecting the face and hands (erythema), the brain is reached, hyperæmia and inflammation of the membrane of the brain ensue, and death follows in from 3–7 days (PRUNER, l. c. 118, 297, &c.). Even those who recover suffer long with pain and weakness in the head, or become insane.—Among chronic diseases of the vascular system, diseased sexual issues are named (Levit. 15 : 2, 25; Numb. 5 : 2; 2 Sam. 3 : 29; see Purifications). These were not hemorrhoidal issues, for they certainly proceeded from the sexual organ (רִשְׁתָּהּ; comp. PHILO, I. 88; Jos. B. J. 5, 5, 6; 6, 9, 3; Mischna tr. sabim, II. 2). MAIMON. ad tr. Sab. II. 2, supposes gonorrh. benigna is meant (comp. RICHTER, spez. Therap. IV. II. 551). But then stopping it would be a cure, and not a stat. impurit. (Levit. 15 : 3). MICHAELIS (or. bibl. XXII. 1, &c.; Mos Recht, IV. 282) and others think gonorrh. virulenta is meant; but this hardly occurred prior to the origin of the lues venerea (in the 15th cent.). Some, indeed, find the first traces of syphilis in Numb. 25 : 1, &c. (comp. Josh. 22 : 17) and think that the measures adopted were intended to prevent contagion. But those measures were certainly a theocratic penalty inflicted, and of the nature of the plague, which was supernatural, nothing is said. Perhaps it was the plague as in Numb. 16 : 41, &c. WINER (Lex.) supposes it was blennorrhœa urethræ, not gonorrhœa (the term for this does not occur in the passages), but a flow of mucus from the urethra, which is contagious, and may be produced by intercourse with unclean, menstruous, and leucorrhœous women, and by other causes, and which, if stopped, has evil consequences.—A diseased, irregular issue of blood is mentioned in Levit. 15 : 25, &c.; its long continuance may prove fatal (see SPRENGEL, Pathol. I. 706, &c.; PRUNER, l. c. 276). The Jews at the time of Christ could not cure it (Matt. 9 : 20, &c.), and even modern physicians find it difficult to manage. Rationalistic physicians and theologians (SCHKEGER, medic.-hermen. Unters. 361, &c.; PAULUS, exeg. Handb. I. 524), ascribe the cure in Matt. 9 : 20, to magnetic or to psychical influences! The nature of the diseased affection mentioned in Gen. 20 : 17, 18 (from which Abimelech as well as his wives suffered) cannot be determined. KURTZ, Gesch. d. alt. B. I. 142, supposes impotentia copulæ.—Among individual cases of chronic-vascular diseases, we find that of Jehoram, 2 Chron. 21 : 18. Some have thought it was fistula, others a falling of the rectum, others a suppuration of the liver, &c. It seems most natural to suppose it was a chronic diarrhœa, which ultimately carried off the mucous membrane of the intestines (PRUNER, 212, &c.); or it might be a loss of the lymph, which is often accompanied with singular after-formations, not parts of the intestines, but lumps of membranous matter.—

II. — 8.

Whether the disease in the feet of Asa (2 Chron. 16: 12), inflicted for putting Hanani in the stocks, was dropsy, elephantiasis, or podagra (see Asa), is uncertain.—In regard to Job's disease (2: 7; Deut. 28: 27, 35), opinions vary, some supposing it was elephantiasis, others a tubercular leprosy, others the black leprosy, λεῖψη ὀγκρῖος, ψωρα κνησμος, called morb. S. Marci in the middle ages, with the symptoms of which many of those in Job correspond (2: 8; 7: 5; 16: 16; 17: 7; 19: 17, 20; 23: 17; 30: 10, 17, 30). Only one case of dropsy occurs (Luke 14: 2, &c.). A canker or gangrenous ulcer is mentioned in a striking comparison, employed 2 Tim. 2: 17. Finally, worms destroyed human life (2 Macc. 9: 5, 9; comp. Targ. Jon, Numb. 14: 33; Sota, f. 35, l.). Herod Agrippa was devoured by them (Acts 12: 23). According to Jos. Ant. 17, 6, 5; B. J. 1, 33, 5, Herod M. also died of this disease. In this case they were probably ulcera verminosa (see Ecclesiasticus 19: 3). Galerius Max. also perished thus (LACTANT. de mort. persec. 33); not by φθούριαις, not by the dragon-worm (dracunculus), the symptoms of which are wholly different (see WEISCH, exerc. de vena medin. Aug. Vind. 1674, p. 316; PRUNER, 250, &c.).—The precise nature of the seven cutaneous, eruptive diseases mentioned in Levit. 13, four of them as distinct from leprosy, and yet resembling it, cannot be certainly ascertained, as neither the names given to the different forms, nor their symptoms, furnish a basis for definite conclusions, and as diseases change their character, or wholly disappear in the course of ages.

Among the diseases of the nervous system, apoplexies are named. They frequently occur in warm countries, especially at the beginning of summer, and during the prevalence of the simoom winds (PRUNER, 294, &c.). Nabal's death was caused by apoplexy (ap. sanguinea, sthenica, 1 Sam. 25: 37). The words, "his heart died within him," are not to be taken in a strict pathological sense. The similar case of Alcimus (1 Macc. 9: 55, 56) is more minutely described. In the cases of Uzza (2 Sam. 6: 7), and Ananias and Sapphira, the Lord may have used this disease as a means of punishment.—Syncope, as described in the Bible, differs from apoplexy, in there being no paralysis, but merely a suspension of the pulse and of breathing (1 Kings 17: 17; Dan. 8: 18; 10: 9; Ps. 76: 7).

תַּרְדֵּמָה designate an obstruction of self-consciousness, or a deep sleep (Gen. 2: 21, &c.), or a diseased tendency to drowsiness and sleep (cataphora, lethargus, Is. 29: 10; Prov. 19: 15). Its acme is asphyxia, in some livida, plethorica, in others pallida.—Partial apoplectic paralyzes also occurred. Paralytics and lame persons were often brought to Christ and the apostles (Matt. 4: 24; 9: 2; 11: 5; Acts 3: 2; 8: 7, &c. &c.). These lamenesses result either suddenly, as from apoplexy, or gradually from spinal diseases (paral. medullaris) or from palsies, depriving the muscles and nerves of their mobility and sensibility (or diminishing these), without stopping the circulation of the blood, secretion, &c. Sometimes atrophy supervenes (Matt. 12: 10; John 5: 3). As these lamenesses are mostly without pain, or accompanied with but a pricking, creeping sensation, the case in Matt. 8: 5; Luke 7: 2, was doubtless attended with tetanus; indeed, anciently παράλυσις was used in a wider sense, and two forms were distinguished: immobilitas musculi flaccidi ab extensione and rigidi a contractione (contractura articulorum), the latter being very painful. In torrid climes, tetanus is apt to be produced by the inflammation of wounds (caused by the chilly nights); such cases are often attended with fever (John 4: 52). Painful cramps and convulsions also appear as symptoms of other diseases (eruptive fevers, &c.). The woman in Luke 13: 11, &c., was rather afflicted with arthritis than tetanus emprosthotonus; for the latter does not continue for 18 years. Among women arthritis in the hips, and in consequence of long-continued paralysis, is still common in those regions. The withering of Jeroboam's hand, 1 Kings 13: 4, was either a sudden local paralysis, or a local tetanus, although the drying seems rather to refer to a paralysis combined with atrophy (comp. Zech. 11: 17).—In Matt. 4: 24; 17: 15 (comp. Mark 9: 17–27; Luke 9: 38–43) the symptoms pretty clearly indicate epilepsy. Epilepsy may be cerebral, medullary, gangliary, or abdominal. Abdominal ep. (Mark 9: 18) occurs mostly in boys, from their 9th year to manhood (in Syria especially it is caused by intestinal worms. PRUNER, 244), chiefly in daytime, and during the increase of the moon, hence lunatici. (See MEDICUS, Gesch. period. Krankh., I., 1, § 3; ROSENMÜLLER on Pa. 121; KRAZENSTEIN, Einfluss d. Mondes, &c.: Halle, 1747; KRETZSCHMAR, de astrorum in corp. hum. imperio: Jena, 1820). Muteness is not a characteristic symptom of epilepsy, but has its cause in the πνεῦμα (see Demoniacs). Epilepsy as connected with an obscuration of the intellect, forms the transition to psychical diseases.—At present psychical diseases rarely occur in the East (PRUNER, 305). Two highly interesting cases (Saul and Nebuchadnezzar) of melancholy and insanity, the two chief forms of psychical disease, are mentioned in the Bible. If it can in a general way be assumed that such diseases have their physical basis in a disorder of the nervous system, melancholy results from a diseased affection of the ganglionic system. It rises, where psychical excitements are co-operating causes, periodically from a passive, brooding sadness, to a raging mania (Prov. 26: 18; 1 Sam. 16: 14, 23; 18: 10, &c.). Insanity (chiefly combined with a disease of the brain) is an erratic state of the spirit, showing itself either as a foolish craziness (1 Sam. 21: 14) or a monomania, in an asthenic or hypersthenic form. Both are appropriately designated (Deut. 28: 28; 2 Kings 9: 20; Zech. 12: 4) by וַיִּשְׁרָשַׁע from שָׂרַשׁ, to rave like a maniac (1 Sam. 21: 15, &c.; Hos. 9: 7). The case of Nebuchadnezzar presents a remarkable example of total insanity (insania metamorphosis, zoanthropica), and hence was formerly a favorite theme of academic lectures (KEPNER, de metam. N. Viteb., 1654; PFEIFFER, exerc. acad. de N., &c., Regiom., 1674; REUTEL, de mira et stupenda N. metam. Marp., 1675; SCHWEIZER, de fur. N. Al., 1699; HENTSCHEL, de metam. N. Viteb., 1703 RECKENBERGER, de N. ab hom. Expulso: Jen., 1733; MÜLLER, de N. metam.: Lips., 1747). His insanity was a natural consequence, and a righteous punishment of his self-deifying pride. Various similar cases are reported (APOLL. II., 2; VIRG., Ecl. VI., 48; see SPRENGEL'S Beitr. zur Gesch. d. Medicin I., 2. ARNOLD, Obs. on the nature, &c. &c., of insanity. Leicester, 1782, I., 3). WIER (de præstig. demon., IV., 23) tells of a farmer who imagined himself a wolf, with the hairy side of the skin turned inward. ANDRAL (spec. path., III., 162) relates the case of a lycanthropic boy of 14 years, who clothed himself in a wolf-skin and roamed the woods, tearing children to pieces; WEINRICH (comm. de monstr. Vratisl., 1595) of a girl, who, to dispel epilepsy, drank cat's blood, and then was seized with the idea that she was a cat, &c. (For similar cases see CABANIS, rapp. du physique et du moral de l'homme.: Par., 1824, I., 57, &c. CASPAR, Vierteljahrsschr. für ger. Med. 1855, p. 163. BLECH, diss. de mutat. unguium morboris: Berol., 1826, p. 19). — Of idiocy no cases occur in the Bible.—The cases of Timothy and Paul (1 Tim. 5:23; 2 Cor. 12:7; Gal. 4:14) may have been nervous affections, gastric debility resulting from a diseased affection of the ganglionic nerves.

Literature:—For the later periods of Judaism, COHN, de medic. Talm. Vratisl., 1846. A thorough work upon this entire subject is still needed. PROF. GRUNER, of Jena, is said to have left behind a valuable Nosologia bibl. Earlier monographs upon Biblical diseases are mostly defective, as that of THOM. BARTHOLIN, de morbis bibl., miscell. med. ed. III., a Francof., 1692, which, among the rest, contains chaps., de somno Adami, an ecstasis vel lethargus; uxor Lothi in salem conversa; facies Moysis immutata; de pisce, in quo sepultus Jonas; de puerperio St. Mariæ; de annulis narium; de hypoch. Judæ proditoris morbo, &c. Two essays by Prof. WEDEL, of Jena: exercit. med. phil. sacræ et profanæ, 1686. and 1704. WARLITZ, diatr. de morb. bibl., &c.: Vit., 1714. J. J. SCHMIDT, bibl. Medicus, Züllichau, 1743; this is one of the best and most comprehensive works. Chr. T. E. REINHARD, B.-krankheiten, &c.: Frankf. and Lpz., 1767. ACKERMANN, Erläuter. d. N. T. Krankh. in Weise's Mater. für Gottesgel. II.–IV., 1784, &c. C. B. MICHAELIS, philologemata medica.: Halæ, 1758. MEAD, med. sacræ.: Amst., 1749. ESCHENBACH, scripta medico-bibl. Rost., 1779. TH. SHAPTER, Medica sacræ, or a short expos. of the more important diseases in the S. S., Lond., 1834. GOLDMANN, diss. de rel. med. vet. Test. Vratisl., 1845. TRUBEN, Darstellung, &c., Posen, 1843, is unsatisfactory. DR. F. PRUNER, already cited. DELITZSCH., Syst. d. bibl. Psychol.: Lpz., 1855. LEYRER.*

Dispensation, in general, is exemption in special cases from established rules, allowed by the proper authority. The necessity of such occasional exemptions arises from the peculiarity of human relations, in which abstract rules cannot always be enforced without perverting their real design. In such cases the executive officers must fully ascertain the applicability of the rule, before enforcing it. If it is found inapplicable, the fact is determined by interpretation, and the matter is dropped, unless there be special directions for doubtful cases. But if the case is found really to come under the rule, and yet that its enforcement would cause unforeseen injuries to persons or institutions, the law-giver must proceed to order an exemption from the rule. The granting of this exemption is a dispensation. It is disp. in a proper sense, when it refers to the future; it is absolution (indulgentia, remissio, relaxatio) when it refers to the past. Absolution proper is the remission of a pœna fori interni, whilst pardon (adgratiatio) is the remission of a pœna fori externi. — Church-regulations have rested from the first upon custom and law. The latter was derived from the O. T., evangelically modified, from the rules prescribed by Christ and his Apostles, from synodical canons, &c. Offenders against these laws, could only be reconciled to the Church by showing proper repentance. The penalties incurred were then remitted, through fraternal clemency (συγγνώμη, συμπαθεία, φιλανθρωπία, οίκονομία, remissio, venia, clementia, &c. See SUICER, thes. eccl. s. v. οίκονομία). Hence arose the disp. post factum, granted in early times by Bishops (JNO. JUNG, facta disp. episcop. hist., &c., Mogunt., 1787, 4to.), or by Provincial Synods (c. 2, sq., Conc. Ancyran. a. 358, in c. 32, dist. L.; c. 12 Conc. Nic. a. 325, in c. 9, Can. XXVI., qu. VI.). But no antecedent privilege to violate a rule could be granted (c. 41, Can. I., qu. I.; c. 7, 14, Can. I., qu. VII., Innoc. I., a. 411, &c.). But after canon law came to include, in the manner of the O. T., many and severe regulations, the necessity of interpretations and relaxations arose. For these appeal was made to Rome, and thus originated the Papal right of dispensation. Thus Innoc. III.: Nos sec. plenitud. potestatis de jure possumus supra jus dispensare (c. 4, X., de concess. præbendæ [III., 8]). This assumption led some Bishops and Synods to claim the right for themselves (THOMASSIN, vet. ac nova eccl. disciplina, P. I., l. III., c. 24–29); but its moral aspect was scarcely noticed. The practice gained ground. — Luther took earnest hold of the matter (WALCH, X., 361), and the complaints of Germany against Romish abuses of this assumed right, forced a change of practice, which the Papal court could the less avoid, as a commission of Cardinals appointed by Paul III., 1538, denounced the evil.¹ This led to greater care, but the principle itself was left untouched.²

¹ Their language is: "Alius abusus magnus et minime tolerandus, quo universus populus Christianus scandalizatur, est ex impedimentis quæ inferuntur episcopis in gubernatione suarum ovium, maxime in puniendis sceleratis et corrigendis. Nam primo multis viis eximunt se mali homines, præsertim clerici, a jurisdictione sui ordinarii: deinde, si non sunt exempti, confugiunt statim ad penitentiarium, vel ad datariam, ubi confestim inveniunt viam impunitati et, quod pejus est, ob pecuniam præstitam; hoc scandalum, beatissime pater, tantopere conturbat Christianum populum, ut non queat verbis explicari." (LE PLAT, monumenta ad hist. conc. Trid. amplissima, T. II. p. 601).

² See SARPI, hist. Cmo. Trid. (ed. Amstelod. 1622, 4to.) lib. VIII. p. 788, 789, 872; Trid. Conc. s. XXV. c. 18, de ref.; s. XXII. c. 5, de ref.; s. XXIV. c. 4, 5, de ref. matr.; s. VII. c. 11, 12, de ref.; s. VI. c. 2, de ref.; s. XXII. c. 1, de ref. But, despite these restrictions, some of the evils still continued.

The right of granting dispensations belongs to the Pope in all cases not fixed by the jus divinum, in which he can only interpret (FERRARIS, bibl. canon. s. v. disp., Nro. 19, 30). In the gloss upon c. 2, Can. XV. qu. VI., it is even said: "Dico, quod contra jus naturale Papa potest dispensare, dum tamen non contra Evang., vel c. artic. fidei, tamen c. Apostolum dispensat." Romish dispensations are granted by the Dataria for public, by the Poenitentiaria for private cases, and those in foro conscientiae. Bishops may dispense in cases expressly designated by the canons (FERRARIS, l. c., 25), including dispensations from their own injunctions (BENED., XIV., de syn. dioces., lib. XIII., c. 5, § 7 seq. FERRAR., l. c., 91), and in cases referred to them by the papal quinquennial-faculties (see Art.), and casus papales superveniente impedimento adeundi Papam fiunt episcopales; also in extreme cases, when peril threatens, in which custom gives such right to them, and when it may be questionable whether a dispensation is required (FERRAR., 27-29). The episcopal Vicar-general must obtain special authority to dispense (c. 4, de procurat. in VI. [l., 19] Conc. Trid. s., XXIV., c. 6, de ref.) Chapters, or the Vicar-capitulary may dispense, sede vacante, only in cases absolutely belonging to the Bishop.—The operation of the disp. is determined by circumstances and the terms of the license or absolution granted (FERRAR., 31, &c.). — The disp. are based either upon legal forms (disp. legis), or upon the judgment of the dispenser (disp. hominis), or upon the fact that the law allows it to be granted by a duly authorized person (disp. mixta). A disp. may be disp. justitiæ or gratiæ (in forma gratiosa); but even in the latter case, the Bishop must guard against subreption.—(See also KLÜBER's contin. of PÜTTER's Literat. d. Staatsr. B., IV., 557, &c.) — The Evang. Church from the first attached a more strict and limited sense to the idea of dispensation. As freedom of legal requirements was greatly extended, there was but little room left to apply dispensations. Still it was retained in some form, since it was impossible to frame the government in so normal a way, as to render disp. wholly unnecessary. But the Reformers did not fail to distinguish between divine and human ordinances, and to declare disp. inadmissible in regard to the former. When granted, they recommended it to be done by the clergy and civil rulers conjointly. (See LUTHER, l. c., X., 361; MELANCHTHON, de conjugio; J. H. BÖHMER, jus eccl. Prot. lib., IV., tit. XIV., § XLIV., seq.). In Prussia most disp. are now granted by the consistories, with the consent of the civil rulers. They have reference chiefly to laws concerning marriage, and minor religious customs (EICHORN, K.-recht; G. L. BÖHMER, principia jur. canon. Upon the entire subject: J. H. Böhmer, diss. de sublimi principum ac statuum evang. dispensandi jure, &c., Halæ, 1722, 4to.; also found in his Exercit. ad Pandectas, I., Exerc. XIII., p. 481, &c. See also: Anglican C. and BURN'S Eccl. Law, II., 158-165). H. F. JACOBSON.*

Dissenters, from dissentire, a term of English origin, and applied to those who have separated from the Anglican C. See England, and special articles upon the various religious dissenting bodies. In Scotland Episcopalians are considered dissenters, the State-church being Presbyterian. HERZOG.*

Długossus, the oldest Polish historian, born 1415, at Coczyn (others say, Brzenica). After completing his studies, B. Sbigneo de Olessnica consecrated him a priest, and promoted him to various eccl. benefices. He was skillful in business matters. B. Sbigneo appointed him executor of his will,—he improved the opportunity by restoring many neglected revenues, and is said to have distributed about 12 millions Polish guilders among various benevolent and religious institutions. Ladislaus II. called him to a canonry in Cracow, where he distinguished himself by the improvement of poor-houses, and assisting indigent students.—A charge of simony and of corrupting records, preferred against him by the Vice-chancellor of the kingdom, was retracted with tears. Subsequently the king had him imprisoned for three years in the castle of Mesztyn, because he preferred a Bishop appointed by the Pope to one whom the King appointed. To make amends for this, the King afterwards sent him to Vienna, to solicit the hand of the daughter of Albrecht II. Cassimir IV. appointed him tutor of the royal children. He twice visited Rome; first to obtain the Cardinal's hat for B. Sbigneo; again during the jubilee. From Rome he went to Palestine, whence he returned sick. At last he was chosen B. of Reusch-Lemberg, but died, 1480, before his consecration. His chief work: Hist. Poloniae usque ad a., 1480, was published in 13 books, Leipsic, 1711-1712. He also wrote the lives of many Polish Bishops; also published. Other writings (a hist. of St. Cunigunda; a Geogr. of Poland, &c.) exist in MSS. (See ISSELIN, hist. L.; Ersch and Gruber). HERZOG.*

Doctrinarians, a product of the new life and zeal awakened in Romish churches by the Reformation. There are two classes, differing from each other in immaterial points. 1. In FRANCE, doctrinaires, pères de la doctrine Chrétienne, founded, 1592, by CÉSAR DE BUS, of Cavaillon, a distinguished pastor and preacher. He became impressed with the importance of founding a society for instructing the people in the Romish Catechism. He arranged the contents of the Catechism into three parts, beginning with the simplest doctrines; and, having gathered around him a number of young priests, he prepared them to give instruction in the first part, and sent them out to catechise everybody they might meet. He himself taught the second and third parts in churches and private houses. More assistants having offered themselves, he collected them all in l'Isle, in the county of Venaissin, 1592. It was resolved to use the same measures there, especially in Avignon, and to solicit the approval of Clem. VIII.; this being readily obtained, the society was duly constituted in 1597. The Doctrinarians met with general favor, and spread over France, though not without some internal discords. The union formed, 1616, with the Somaski, ceased in 1651, after many collisions, at which time Innoc. X. annulled a bull of 1651, which, he said, had been fraudulently extorted from him.—2. In ITALY, Padri della dottrina Christiana, founded by a Milan nobleman, Marcus de Sadis Cusani, in Rome, 1562, also to instruct the people and children in the catechism. The society, actively supported by Cæsar Baronius, the historian, rapidly spread, especially after Pius V. had recommended it. That these fathers did not carry the matter of religious education too far, is evident from the regulation in HELYOT, IV. 251, directing that, if the laity could not read the breviary, it would suffice for them to pray the rosary. Most Doctrinarians are found in Rome; a few in other Italian towns.—(See HELYOT, IV. 232–252.) HERZOG.*

Doctrines, History of. — The character, nature, and method of the science. Its literature. — Doctrine-History, as a separate theological discipline, is scarcely a hundred years old. The earliest contributions to it (by Walch, 1756, Semler, 1762, and Rössler) made during a period of the most wakeful scientific reflection, were preceded by a careful consideration of its form and contents, and yet may be regarded as merely initiatory steps towards the science. Even Lange's (1796) arrangement of the systems of the fathers to Irenæus, is very imperfect. He was followed in quick succession by Münscher, Augusti, and Münter, who apprehended and treated the object of the science more definitely, and these by the more recent and important works of Baumgarten-Crusius, Hagenbach, Meier and Baur. And yet the necessity and propriety of making the history of doctrines a distinct department of theological science, have been questioned, even by such men as Schleiermacher and Hase. It has seemed objectionable thus to dismember the connected branches of Church History, and unnecessarily to multiply the departments of theological science; especially as so much of the material not incorporated in Church History (as in Neander's), would be properly embraced in introductions (prolegomena) to Dogmatics, in the historical illustrations of Dogmatics proper, in the history of Christian Philosophy, or in Symbolism. Where, then, the necessity for a Doctrine-History? — But are these seemingly plausible objections valid? The simplicity, and therefore the truth and beauty of the organism of theological science, do not depend merely upon its including the smallest possible number of departments, but rather upon excluding all foreign material from each, and upon presenting each in a distinct, perspicuous form. Thus, if Church History does not limit itself (as in Niedner's) to the mere fundamental outlines of theology and its essential contents, so far as its progress is associated with the other sides of Church life; if, on the contrary, it attempts to take up all the theological material at hand, it becomes too massive, and loses its proper summary character. But if all this doctrinal material were embraced in Dogmatics, this department would forfeit its systematic character, and more would be lost than gained by the method. As for symbolism, the narrow limit of its design prevents its embracing a doctrine-history; whilst the History of Christian Philosophy could not do this, unless it were extended in a manner contradictory to its true conception, or the idea of Doctrine-History were unduly contracted.

But what is the correct idea of Doctrine-History? A proper conception of its nature must furnish the best vindication of its claims to be an independent department of theological science. We may assume that a Christian dogma (see Dogmatics) or doctrine, is that form of religious truth which has been definitely apprehended and adopted as such by the great communion of Catholic Christians, either by a formal public decision, or through personal influence, and informal common consent, and as opposed to conflicting, sectarian opinions. A definite apprehension of each truth thus adopted, as the result of a scientific process of inquiry and discussion, is requisite to its becoming a dogma, even in the case of those truths which seem to preclude all such scientific inquiry (as, Jesus is the Christ, the Trinity, &c.). The doctrinal results, therefore, reached by means of the progressive dialectic activity and collision of various minds, form the substance of the History of Doctrines; their proper presentation is the office of this particular science.

From this gradual development and scientific apprehension of Christian doctrines we must distinguish the original testimony of Revelation, the apostolic and prophetic Word, which is the basis of those doctrines, and which is presupposed by them. That testimony also has its history, its progressive complementary development; but it involves no scientific process of apprehension, as in the case of dogmas. Its history constitutes the sphere of Biblical Theology. It may, however, be altogether proper to preface a history of doctrines with a concise review of the general results of Bibl. Theol., by way of transition from the one to the other, and in order to make the formation-process of the former more intelligible by a lively representation of the germ out of which dogmas have been developed. — The History of Dogmatics differs from that of Doctrines, in that the former is concerned with the gradual formation of doctrines into a systematic whole — proposes to show the various steps by which, in the course of scientific efforts, Dogmatics has acquired its present form. There are, indeed, points of contact between them, so far as both have to characterize certain tendencies of thought, theological and philosophical theories, and their influence upon the subject in hand: but this influence will vary accordingly as in the one case it affects particular dogmas, in the other the system of dogmas. And even if, in the History of Doctrines, the sum of the doctrines of influential men is presented, this is done, not to show the formative process of their system, but to shed light upon the formation of certain doctrines, and to ascertain the influence of those men upon them. Nor is the distinction between these two branches of history abolished by the fact that Doctrine-History portrays the progressive recognition of the organic unity of doctrines; for this is only incidental to its general object, and is treated accordingly; whereas it is the proper business of the History of Dogmatics to set forth the growth of doctrines into a united systematic exposition. — The History of Doctrines is distinguished from Symbolism, because the latter, though including a considerable amount of material belonging to Doctrine-History, does so only so far as it is requisite to a right apprehension of the confessions of Christianity in general, and its various branches, and not for the purpose of portraying the progressive apprehension of the doctrines involved in those confessions.—Between the History of Christian Philosophy (as in Ritter's and Branniss') and that of Doctrines, there are also important points of contact. But the more sharply we define the true character of both, the less will the former be found to absorb the latter. The Hist. of Chr. Phil. introduces Doctrine-History only as it serves to exhibit the plastic influence of Christian thought, in its freedom and independence of eccl. decisions, or other settlements of doctrine, upon the highest problems of the human spirit; whereas, reversely, the Hist. of Doctr. refers to the movements and results of Christian thought, as the form of eccl. doctrines is thereby determined. Of course the matter will wear another aspect, if we consider theological dogmas as but an imperfect grade of philosophical speculation, in which case the Hist. of Doctr. would become a sort of phenomenology. But this pantheistic or panlogistic view of the subject may be considered as exploded and dying out.

In thus defining the character of our science, we have also gained a view of the grounds of its nature. Upon this point, therefore, we shall only add such remarks as will aid our consideration of the method of the science.—As already stated it is the office of the Hist. of Doctr. to present the dialectic process of Christian doctrines, or of the articles of the Chr. faith (as distinguished from the principles of ethics), their development to a definite apprehension. But Chr. truth comprehends the divine gospel in Christ; the theological, anthropological, and christological doctrines form its basis; the doctrines of the objective means and proffer of salvation its centre; and those of the subjective appropriation, of the communion and consummation of grace, its end. Its dialectic process, however, is the onward movement of the idea of the dogma, through antithesis and conflict, to scientific definiteness—to an apprehension of its points, in their unity, by which, along with the progressive determination of all the parts, a distinct perception of their organic union is gained. The idea of the dogma, however, is nothing else than the actualization by individual self-consciousness of the fact of salvation, which, as such, is the unity of the word and the fact—the word moulded into a fact, the fact which receives its designation and significance from the word. This fact, brought to man by oral and written announcements and representations, and apprehended by inward contemplation, takes possession, primarily, of the mind, of the immediate life of the soul in its unity and indivisibility; and, being embraced by the will as the bearer of salvation, its saving power renews the inmost personal life of man, so that he now becomes conscious of his condition as determined by the energy of this fact of salvation, and can say: Christ is my Saviour. From the immediate intuition of this objective fact, as it has penetrated the mind of the subject results the idea which forms the substance of immediate religious knowledge. But this personal knowledge of the truly enlightened and living Christian, must according to the ordinary laws of the human spirit, pass through a process in which the various points included in this idea are brought out, perceived and defined in their diversity and relative antithesis, as well as in the unity in which all these diversities hold together. Nor is it a matter of personal choice to pass through this process or not; its necessity follows from the nature of the human spirit, as well as from the design of Christianity, which, as a renewal of man's entire being, of his nature in all its activities, of his self-consciousness in all its functions, also seeks to gain the ascendancy in the sphere of science, to pervade it, to incorporate the idea of itself with science, and thus to sanctify it.—But the dialectic process moves, as already intimated, in the three acts of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis. Starting then from the assumption that the Christian principle is the unity of the Divine and the human, and that this principle pervades all dogmas, its development, as doctrine also, and therefore the entire process of constructing dogmas, would consist in the thesis, antithesis, and synthesis, of the divine and human; and thus we would obtain a very simple construction and division of the Hist. of Doctr.: the period of the thesis, or of the immediate settlement of those points, the period of antithesis, and that of the synthesis of both, of the reconciliation of contradictions (Dörtenbach). But plausible as this method may at first seem, it is refuted by the fact that the different points of the various dogmas cannot be traced back to such an antithesis of the Divine and human. This is obvious in regard to the doctrine of the Trinity; but it will be found to be the case also with others.—If, however, we proceed from the fundamental conception of the salvation of sinful man in Christ, the historical personal God-man, three circles of dogmas will be obtained, by which, together with the formal side of development, and its national sphere, the chief periods of Doctrine-History will be determined. For we hold that the concurrence of these three points:—1) the material, those circles of dogmas in which, principally, the contents of the development are formed; 2) the formal, or the way and manner of that development; 3) the national, or the sphere in which it becomes prominent—and that, a concurrence in which a harmony of these points can be perceived—will lead to a correct division of the periods of our science, which is a chief problem of its method.—These spheres of doctrine may be briefly designated as the sphere of the commencement, that of the centre, and that of the completion. The first is that of the principal or fundamental dogmas, in which the antecedents and causes of redemption are scientifically set forth. These are the dogmas 1) of God, 2) of man, ideal and fallen, 3) of the God-man. Other doctrines will, of course, come up with these, but in a secondary way, partly as involved in or resulting from these, partly as belonging to the substantiation of these, and partly in such form that the transition to the second period will appear, which, if the development is an organic one, must have its preparatory existence in the first. Thus the doctrines of grace and election, of redemption, and of the Church and sacraments, of the conditions of salvation, and of the final negative and positive completion of redemption, in the individual and the race, will be considered. This circle will include the patristic period, in which the foundation of dogmatics was laid, in which the dogmas, one after another, were analytically expounded out of the fundamental dogmas, and in such manner that these appear as the primary ones. But the field on which this was done, comprehended the most intimately connected ancient nationalities, the Oriental-Hellenic-Roman Christianized world, which theoretically released itself, in this production of dogmas, from its past Jewish-heathen bonds, made itself thoroughly familiar, step by step with Christian truth, by substituting the Christian mode of contemplating all religious doctrines, for the Jewish and heathen mode. Thus, in the general dogma of God, the theistic Christian idea was established over against deistic, pantheistic, dualistic, polytheistic views; in the doctrine of the Trinity, the divine Trinity against abstract monotheism and the notion of subordinate national sub-gods; in anthropology, the biblical idea of man over against heathen and Gnostic fables and conceits concerning his origin and nature; in the dogma of the God-man, the personal unity of the Divine and human natures in Christ, either against the Gentile or Jewish denial of the real humanity or real divinity — against Ebionism and Nestorianism, or Gnosticism and Monophysitism. — The middle circle includes those dogmas which set forth the objective mediation and proffering of salvation: those of election and the sacraments, of the Church and the atonement. The dogma of the Church was, indeed, not specially discussed; but on the one hand the C. with her tradition is the antecedent and basis of the entire dogmatic life of this period, and is definitely recognised as the holder of the truth, through her orthodox fathers, general councils, and legal head; and on the other she stands forth, with her sacraments, as the exclusive bearer and profferer of salvation, and as dispensing reconciliation, sanctification, and redemption, as, through her priesthood, opening or shutting the door of the kingdom. Thus election, objective redemption, and the sacrament of the Lord's Supper form the dogmas of this middle circle, and which form the chief matter of the dogmatic development of the mediæval Church; to which must be added the dogma of the Holy Ghost, viz., his procession, whether from the Father alone, or from the Father and the Son. That at the same time other dogmas were more or less developed, followed from the formal character of this period, which, answering to the material character, occupied the centre between the old period in which the basis was laid and doctrines were produced, and the new in which they came to be subjectively appropriated. This mediæval form and mode of treatment is the scholastic, characterized as fides querens intellectum, by which the faith of the Church, as explained by the fathers, is dialectically elaborated; the sentences of the fathers, whose collection was the work of the commencement of the middle ages, were brought together and subjected to acute philosophical investigation. Thus the single dogmas were more sharply defined and more clearly apprehended. — The national field of this work was also a middle sphere between the ancient and modern, the Romanic-German, in which piety was combined with great energy of the understanding, and exerted itself as fides querens intellectum. — But these two still connected elements could not always endure each other. In the Roman nationality appeared the tendency to oppression of the individuality, to despotic rule; in the German, on the contrary, a struggle after independence, personal self-determination. This was invigorated by scholastic exercises, so that within the scholastic period tradition was shaken, especially as to the proof of its necessity and reasonableness, the external authority of the Church alone remained. But when, at length, arbitrariness came to prevail, at the pleasure of the predominant power, as the only basis, this externality easily swung over to its opposite, the abolition and negation of tradition, and the ascendancy of subjectivity. Such arbitrariness obtained in one part of mediæval scholasticism, whilst a positive independence was establishing itself in the deepest life of the mind and its immediate intuitions, a mystical independence and freedom, which, even when not hostile to tradition, used it in a free way, fixed its import and assimilated its mode of contemplating things. Along with this there was a falling back upon the primitive revelation, the Holy Scriptures, as the true source and norm of faith and practice. — In this way, and by means of revived humanistic cultivation, a third period was inaugurated, that of the subjective conditioning of the dogma, especially of those doctrines which concern the subjective appropriation of redemption, and in those in which this attains to its full realization. The chief field of the development of doctrines is the German in its attempts to rid itself of Romish influence and freely construct its own system. The first and obvious principle of these attempts is conscience as bound by the Word of God. This affirms freedom of hierarchical assumptions and arbitrary laws and ordinances, and the rights of self-consciousness, yet as ethically restrained (by conscience); these rights not in the form of a Pelagian denial of the bondage of the natural man (in his reason and volition) to error and sin, nor of pantheistical identification of the Spirit of God and man; but in a union with the acknowledgment of the authority of the written Word of God over the conscience, which excludes the fanatical errors of a false mysticism. Thus the mystical and Bible principles are combined; and at the same time a critical principle is fixed, which finds its limits in actual religious experience, and which, with all its perils in consequence of a defective partial surrender of self to God in Christ, finds its corrective in the common experience of all Christians, of all ages, as in a truly catholic tradition and in a candid impartial historical investigation of the truth. This great principle of the Reformation is both formal and material, the former in a consciousness of justification before God, through Christ, the latter in a consciousness of a corresponding holy obligation to a progressive harmony of the human mind with the mind of God; both being conditioned by faith, as involving an unqualified confidence in and surrender to God in Christ.—But this principle must work its way through various points which may readily degenerate into negation and conflict. Especially does an antithesis of word and spirit show itself. a) The spirit seeks to predominate at the expense of the word. The word is set aside as a mere letter, and the spirit asserts its dominant authority to decide upon the sense of the letter; hence a revival of the mystic, sectarian tendencies of the earlier periods. b) In opposition to this the word asserts its supremacy over the spirit, and thus there arises a dominion of the latter, either of the literal mechanically inspired Word of God, or of eccl. confessions. Both, in a sense, are right. The spirit, as a truly evangelical one, pervaded by a living experience of salvation, really possesses the essence of the Word, and thus has the key to its proper sense and the rule of its interpretation; but these living contents of the spirit are extended, enriched, and purified by a growing acquaintance with the SS., and by participation with the knowledge and experience of contemporaneous and antecedent generations of Christians, whilst isolation leads to fanaticism and sectarianism. So, on the other hand, the SS. form the Word of the Holy Spirit, as revealed and established by divine illumination and guidance; but if their mere letter, upon the assumption of entire literal inspiration, is made the unconditional norm, and exclusive source of the knowledge of the truth, no clear perception of the seeming diversities and antitheses which occur will be gained, and many untrue or half-true attempts at reconciliation will intrude themselves, and thus detriment be done to the honor of the SS. But if the letter of confessions of faith predominates, there must ensue a temporary check to free development, even though it constitute an epoch in the general process. This will produce and justify reaction in the form of criticism. This began, though not historically or scientifically, but as proceeding somewhat arbitrarily from the instinct of a religious self-consciousness, with Luther, and showed itself in a separation of the primary and secondary, the proto and deutero-canonical books, the apostolical and non-apostolical. Its ground-thought is a canon in the canon, expressing itself in giving prominence to the principal books of the SS., according to their seemingly more evangelical character. But the more fully this critical principle was surrendered, and everything found in the SS. was put on an equality, in order to gain a firmer footing against the Romish doctrine of tradition, and the more confessions came to be respected, under the pressure of internal controversies, the more violent became the contradiction. The spirit, ultimately, determined everything, and gradually more in the form of the natural human reason, so that nothing was to be thought true but as it harmonized with it, or was deduced from its principles. And as the formal authority of the SS. was thus overthrown, the contents of the confessions were gradually negated, and an anthropology and doctrine of justification, approximating Romish-Pelagianism, prevailed. It was the period of the tyranny of subjectivism in matters of truth and salvation.—The school of Schleiermacher (see Art.) corrected this divergence, by leading self-consciousness to yield itself to the common consciousness, and its source, the personal Christ, the substance of the SS. Here again we meet with oscillations, and with conflicts between negative and positive, destructive and conservative criticism. But all leads to the freedom of the spirit through the word, and the vivifying of the word through the spirit; there will be no longer a dead letter, and no longer a spirit cut loose from the facts of Revelation. This is the struggle of our age. In reference to this, however, we can only distinguish four stadia: 1) Spirit and word in lively immediate union with particular vacillations of opinion; 2) a predominance of the word with a one-sided ruling of the letter; 3) a predominance of the spirit with a one-sided sway of subjectivity; 4) the tendency to a reconciliation of the antithesis, to a living union of the several points involved.

The entire movement of this period proceeds from the soteriological class of dogmas; the doctrines of the subjective appropriation of salvation, and of the method of grace; of justification and sanctification, &c. The fundamental or central idea is: the free personal certainty of salvation, as independent of hierarchical guardianship, or objective eccl. mediation, and as resting in the relation of the inmost personality of the believer to God in Christ; a relation rooted in God's grace and its operation, by means of the Word and sacraments, upon the heart of sinful man; or, if it be regarded as man's own act, still as an act originated and made effectual through that grace. Everything done aims at the free and firm certainty of salvation on the part of the subject of grace. Partly foreign matters of dispute and contradictions (as in the doctrine of the Lord's Supper), partly the free investigation of the SS.; partly the resuscitation of older views; and partly the rise of rationalism, also led to dogmas acknowledged as transmitted by earlier periods (the Trinity, the Person and works of Christ). But the doctrines peculiar to this period had to maintain their ground amid great struggles, especially those concerning the difference or unity of justification or sanctification, the value of good works, the unconditional or conditional character of predestination, the irresistibility or resistibility of grace, the relation of the Word and sacraments, of the Word and Spirit, and of faith and the sacraments. One-sided extremes, in reference to each of these points, were gradually overcome and corrected, and the way of truly reconciling contradictions was more and more fully opened.

The Reformation overthrew the existing Church authority, so that communion and unity seemed to be sacrificed to individual freedom, or, at least, that a mere ideal unity was substituted for a real one, and that the dogma of the Church was substantially surrendered. But it was now, in fact, to be first fairly developed. Instead of an empirical, secularized conception, there arose the true idea of the Church; instead of a mere objective apprehension of it, one which included both the objective and subjective apprehensions. The Church no longer stood forth as a queen or a mistress, nor merely as the mother of the faithful and the mediatrix of salvation, but as the communion of saints, the comprehension of those who had appropriated salvation. And this is the Church, κατ' ἑσθιν, Christ in redeemed and believing humanity, called the invisible C., because its unity rests upon a fact of the inner life not patent to the senses, and is not bound to this or that empirical Church-society. But this also includes all who have come under the operation of the Spirit of Christ, all the baptized and regenerate (1 Cor. 7 : 14) or the visible C., which, in its present state of imperfection, liability to sin and error in other things, has also fallen under the influence of schisms and divisions. The visible and invisible C. are, however, not parallel or separate, but essentially in each other; for even believers are not yet wholly pervaded by the Spirit, but still entangled with the flesh and the world; and many of those who have not yet attained salvation, give evidence of being wrought upon by the grace of God, and under the operations of his Spirit. It is in the establishment of this doctrine of the Church, that our period is engaged. Its completion will be presented in the settlement of the eschatological dogmas, which have been recently receiving earnest attention. — Moving within the spheres of these three periods, the History of Doctrines must endeavor fairly to exhibit all that pertains to the gradual development of the several chief dogmas.

In noticing, finally, the literature of this science, we must pass by all monographic contributions, which will be the subjects of separate articles, and confine our remarks to methodological labors, and to works embracing them all, or superadded to them. — The former began with WALCH: Gedanken v. d. Gesch. d. Glaubenslehre, &c., 1756, which he defines as the history of the changes of Christian dogmas. In this the Hist. of Doctr. and of Dogmatics is combined. — SEMLER (Baumgarten's Unters. theol. Streit. herausg. v. Semler) exhibits a consideration of the method; he aims at selecting from the great mass of material. — He was followed by ZIEGLER (Ideen über d. Begriff u. d. Behandlungsart d. Dogm. Gesch. in Gabler's Neuestem Journal, Bd. 2) and AUGUSTI (über d. Methode d. D.-Gesch. in d. Neuen theol. Blättern, II. 2). Of more account is the critical-anthropological exposition of DE WETTE, in his "Religion u. Theol." (pp. 196–222). DAUB contemplated the form of Christian Doctrine and Church History from a speculative standpoint (in Br. Bauer's Ztschr. für Speculat. Theol. I. 1, pp. 1–61; 2, pp. 63–133; II. 1, pp. 88–161). He adopts five periods, corresponding to the different principles predominant in each: the primitive Christian, the apostolic Christian, the eccl.-patristic, the papal, and the eccl.-reformatory. The principle on which the form of the last rests can only be fairly discovered at the end of the period. If we regard the first two as the periods of biblical theology which form the basis of Doctrine-History, we have our own division. — This division of DAUB was adopted, among his disciples, by ROSENKRANZ (Encyclopädie), whose construction is defective, BR. BAUER, and SCHNITZER (see Recens. d. dogm.-gesch. Werke v. Neudecker u. Engelhardt). This methodology, in which theology is resolved into speculation, finds its completion in DR. BAUR (Vorr. zur chr. Lehre v. d. Versöhnung, &c. (V.–VII.), and Einl. p. 8, &c., 12, &c.) who exhibits all changes as the essential points through which the idea moves, in order to comprehend itself ultimately, in its inmost being. The periods are determined by the preponderance of objectivity or subjectivity, or the comprehension of both in the higher unity of the idea. The first reaches to the Reformation; the second to Kant; the third to the most recent times; all are consummated in the self-consciousness of the absolute spirit, in which the Hegelian religion-philosophy moves and exists. — As the theological standpoint is thus surrendered, this system cannot, with all its assumed formal perfection, solve the problem of a methodology of Doctrine-History. — Let us then turn to the school of SCHLEIERMACHER. Here we first meet with the work of HAGENBACH (see Abh. in the Theol. Stud. u. Krit. I. 4, and the Theol. Encycl.). The basis of his division is the doctrinal spirit predominating, not the epochs of Ch. History. Hence, he makes 5 periods; the apologetic, to Origen; the polemic, to John of Damascus; the systematic, to the Reformation; the symbolic, to the 18th cent.; the philosophico-critical. This division, otherwise untenable, evidently embarrasses the author in his work. — A valuable article upon the subject, proceeding from essentially the same standpoint, may be found in Rheinwald's Repert. Recension d. Lentz'schen Dogmengesch. (by DR. ELWERT?). The writer lays chief stress upon the spiritual principle, which, indeed, involves the law of the various developments; then upon the influences under which it has developed itself. The material is grouped into three principal periods: I., the ancient period, to 730, the first production of the doctrines of faith in a reflective form, subdivided into three parts; II., the middle ages, the systematizing of those doctrines, two subdivisions; III., the modern period, that of the protestation of the new life of faith against all human ordinances, and of the struggle to confirm and comprehend the contents of faith by internal proof; two subdivisions, the second from the middle of the 18th cent., the commencement of the victory of the formal over the material principle of Protestantism. This otherwise correct division errs in assigning undue influence to the formal side. — The material side, however, receives full justice in the able work of KLIEFOTH, Einl. in d. D.-gesch. 1839, who, 1) makes the dogma originate in the onward co-operation of the Christian faith and life — the genetic idea of the dogma; 2) deduces the development of doctrines and its laws, from the nature of the dogma; 3) shows thence the proper method of doctrine-history. He adopts three classes of dogmas: theology, anthropology, soteriology, which develop themselves in three corresponding periods: the theological through Greek nationality; the anthropological through the Roman Occident; the soteriological through German Protestantism. And each has its scientific form: the analytic, the synthetic, and the systematic. Each, also, runs out into three stadia, the productive, the symbolical-constructive, and the consummative; that of the completion and solution of the dogma. — The last methodological treatise, that of DÖRTENBACH, has been already noticed.

We conclude with mentioning some of the principal works upon the History of Doctrines. — MÜNSCHER'S Handb., 4 vols., 1797–1809, (not completed) and Lehrb., 1812. It is characterized by external pragmatism. — AUGUSTI, Lehrb., 1805 (4th ed., 1835). This surpasses the work of Münscher by its juster appreciation of the eccl. development of doctrines, and by keeping the dogmas of Religion, Revelation, and Christianity, as such, distinct from each other—also by keeping general separate from special doctrine-history. — Similar, in this respect, is the Lehrb. of BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS, 1832, 2 vols., and his Compendium, 1840–46; but otherwise it far excels the work of Augusti. He adopts the following periods: 1) that of the formation of eccl. dogmas, a) by private thought and opinions, b) by the Church; 2) that of their confirmation, a) by the hierarchy, b) by eccl. philosophy; 3) that of their purification, a) by parties, b) by science. But with all its excellencies, this work fails in carrying out strictly the distinction between what is general and special, and in showing clearly the inward connection of the various points of development. — The same holds of the otherwise excellent work of HAGENBACH, (transl. in Clark's series, Edinburgh, &c.) distinguished alike for its lucid style, moderation, and selection of sources. — The division adopted by Dr. F. K. MEIER (1849) is that of the compendium of Baumgarten-Crusius, although he, like Hagenbach, does not follow B.'s separation of the general from the special. — In Dr. ENGELHARDT'S Dogmengesch. (2 Th., 1839–40) we have the work of a man who had already acquired reputation by his researches in historical theology. It is thorough, but deficient in scientific development and artistic execution. It occupies a sound, Protestant, biblical, churchly, standpoint; the dialectic speculative yields to the exegetical historical element. He adopts three periods: 1) to Duns Scotus Er.; 2) to the Reformation; 3) to 1680. The first two periods are most ably treated. The most important work is, undoubtedly, that of Dr. F. CHR. BAUR, of Tübingen (Stuttgart, 1847). It is based upon a succession of independent monographic investigations. His standpoint is that of a critical-speculative procedure from what is external and incidental in the phenomena, to the idea of things themselves, and an exhibition of the historical progress of the dogma, as this is grounded in the nature of man's spirit. This progress covers two periods: the exhibition of consciousness as appropriating the dogma, 1) in its unity with the dogma, 2) in its rupture and reconciliation with it; this latter from the Reformation onward. But as the absolute significance of the Reformation is also merely relative, and as scholasticism, although standing upon the same ground of faith, possesses an essentially different character from patristicism, we get three great periods: 1) that in which the dogma produced itself, or in which Christian consciousness became objective in and realizingly one with the dogma (the ancient Church to the close of the 6th cent.); 2) that in which this consciousness receded from the objectivity of the dogma into its own subjectivity, and combining with rational reflexion opposed itself to the dogma (the middle ages, Scholasticism); 3) that in which absolute consciousness renounced and set itself above the dogma. This masterly construction depends so entirely upon the peculiar theological position of the author, that they stand or fall together; although in any event it must exert a lasting influence upon the further development of the science. — Among manuals and text-books upon this subject, which are however of but secondary importance, we name that of LENTZ, 2 vols., 1834, which is moderately rationalistic, and averse to dogmatic definitions; that of BECK, 1848, on the plan of Baumgarten-Crusius; and that of NOACK. — In the Romish C. but little attention has been given to this science. — (See Stud. u. Krit., 1840, 4; 1841, 3; 1843, 1; 1852, 4). KLING.*

Dodanim, a son of Javan (Gen. 10:4), from whom a Greek race sprang. Older expositors, from the resemblance of the name to that of Dodona, have supposed the Oracle of Jupiter in Epirus, was alluded to (CLERICUS, Comm.; MICHAEL, Spicil. Geogr., ext. I., 120; Suppl. ad Lex. hebr., II., 414; ROSENMÜLLER, Bibl. Alterth., I., 1, p. 225; III., 375, n. 7). — But this conflicts with the fact that all the other Japhite names are taken not from single cities, but from tribes or districts of country. Gesenius, and then Knobel, following older Jewish interpreters, refer the name to the entire Illyrian or North Greek race, called Trojans or Dardani, after the best known tribe. But instead of the common reading דָּוָנִים the Cod. Sam. has דָּוָנִים, which is the true reading in 1 Chron. 1:7 (though some MSS. and edit. have changed it to suit Gen. 10:4). According to this reading BOCHART (Phaleg., III., 6) assumes an allusion to those living along the Rhone (Rhodanus). But it seems more natural to suppose the island Rhodes to be meant (see Art.). And yet, if Kittim refers not to the Cyprians only, but to the entire Karian race, the Rhodians are too small a branch to be designated by Dodanim. (See KNOBEL, Völkertafel, &c., and Com. zu Gen.). ARNOLD.*

Doddridge, Philip, D. D., born in London, June 26, 1702, was the son of Daniel Doddridge, an oilman, and grandson of John Doddridge, rector of Shepperton, in Middlesex (ejected in 1662, by the Act of Uniformity); his mother was the only daughter of Rev. John Bauman, of Prague, who suffered from the Romish persecutions which followed the expulsion of the Elector Palatine Frederic, left his native country in consequence of them, and after spending some time at Saxe-Gotha, and in other parts of Germany, went to England, where he became master of a free school at Kingston. Philip was the last of twenty children, all of whom, excepting one sister, had died before his birth. At his own birth he gave so little evidence of life, that he was actually about to be laid aside for dead, and was resuscitated only with great difficulty. His physical debility clung to him through life. He was reared by parents whose piety had been chastened in the school of affliction; but he was deprived of their care by the death of both in his 13th year. After attending a private school in London until his 10th year, he was placed at that in Kingston over which his mother's father had presided. In 1715, after his father's death, he was removed to the school at St. Alban's, then under the care of Nathaniel Wood, where he became acquainted with Dr. Samuel Clarke, then minister of the Dissenting congregation at St. Alban's, by whom he was received into full communion with the Church. He remained at St. Alban's school about three years, when he went to reside with his sister, then the wife of John Nettleton, a Dissenting minister. Here he resolved to devote himself to the ministry, but was embarrassed for want of means. The kind offer of assistance made by the Duchess of Bedford, to whose notice he had been brought through the influence of his uncle, Philip Doddridge, steward to the Duke of Bedford, he was compelled to decline, because he could not conscientiously subscribe the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Established Church. He then applied to Dr. Calamy for counsel, who advised him to adopt some other profession. In the midst of his perplexity he received a letter from Dr. Clarke, who offered to take him under his care, and assisted him in preparing for the profession he had adopted. He accepted the offer and was placed in a Dissenting school at Kibworth, Leicestershire, then under the Rev. John Jennings. In 1722 Doddridge removed, with this small theological school to Hinckley, where he was admitted to the ministry on July 22, of the same year. In June, 1723, he accepted a call to Kibworth, and another to Coventry; he modestly accepted the former, on account of his youth, and to have more leisure to pursue his studies. In 1725 he removed to Market-Harborough, still retaining the charge of the small congregation at Kibworth; in 1729 he was chosen assistant of the Rev. Mr. Some, of Harborough. In the summer of 1729, by the advice of many friends, and with the sanction of a number of Dissenting ministers, D. founded a theol. seminary at Harborough, that at Kibworth having been suspended at the death of Mr. Jennings (1723). In December, 1729, he was invited to take charge of the congregation at Castle Hill, Northampton, and removed thither, with his school. He continued here for twenty years. In 1730 he married Miss Mercy Maris, of Worcester; the fruit of this happy union was nine children, the first-born of which, and the last four, died in infancy. As principal of the new seminary, he greatly improved upon the system of Jennings, by insisting upon a more general course of study. Morning and evening prayers were strictly observed; at the former the O. T., at the latter the N. T., were read in the original languages. To the more advanced classes he delivered lectures upon didactic and practical theology, the history of Non-conformity, and mythology. Exercises in speaking and preaching were also had. — He had hardly founded his seminary, when he was arraigned before the ecol. court; but through the King's intervention the indictment was quashed. The seminary now rapidly acquired importance, and became the chief school of the Independents. It usually had from 20 to 30 students. — Doddridge was untiring in his labors, notwithstanding his bodily infirmities. Besides attending to the duties of his school and pastoral office, he was a fertile writer, especially of practical religious works. The chief of these, which have been often republished, and still enjoy great popularity in England and America, are: "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," first published 1745, and suggested to him by Dr. Watts; "A Course of Lectures on the Principal subjects of Pneumatology, Ethics, and Divinity, with references to the most considerable authors," 1763; "The Family Expositor," Vol. I., 1739; Vol. II., 1740; Vol. III. and IV., 1748; Vol. V. and VI., ed. by Job Orton, 1756. — Correspondence from 1729–31, ed. by J. D. Humphreys, Esq. In 1748 he revised and ed. the works of Archb. Leighton, publ. in Edinburgh, 2 vols. Some of the above works were early translated into the Dutch, and afterwards into the German languages. Doddridge was a man of great amiability of character, and of sincere and consistent piety. Though not distinguished for depth of thought, and too much under the influence of Independency to attach proper value to the Church and its grace-bearing ordinances, his practical writings, especially, must long minister, as they have hitherto done to many, spiritual edification to all earnest and devout Christians. — Doddridge also exhibited fine talents for religious poetry, and contributed some of the best compositions found in English hymnology. — His arduous labors, however, soon proved too severe for his feeble constitution. His health having quite failed, he made a journey to Bristol, then to Lisbon, to recruit it; but he died soon after reaching the latter city, Oct. 26, 1751. — (See Biogr. by ORTON; BOGUE and BENNET, Hist. of the Dissenters; Memoir by Prof. FISKE, in the ed. of the Fam. Exp.: Amherst, U. S., 1836; Memoir in the Comprehens. Comm. Vol. VI.).

Dodwell, Henry, born at Dublin, 1641, being early left a destitute orphan, was supported by Sir Henry Slingsby, his mother's brother, and thus enabled to acquire an education. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, in 1656, and remained there for 10 years; during part of which time he held a fellowship. He obtained various academical honors, and published some smaller works, but declined, from scruples of conscience, entering the ministry. At the same time he proved a zealous friend and champion of the Establishment. In 1674 went to England, and visited Holland; then he published several works in defence of the Anglican Church, which raised his reputation as a scholar. Hereupon he was chosen Professor of History of Literature at Oxford, but, declining the oath of allegiance to William III., lost the post again in 1691. Dodwell wrote several times in defence of the non-juring Bishops, declared those schismatics who submitted, and quit the Anglican communion. But his zeal for Episcopacy soon overcame his other objections, so that he changed his views and recognised the authority of those whom he had branded as schismatics, but did not return to the Anglican Church. Meanwhile he had gone to Cookham, between London and Oxford, and from thence returned to Shotterbrooke. He married in his 52d year, and begat ten children. In this retired village he composed numerous writings upon various subjects. He died in 1711, having shortly before re-entered the Anglican communion.—D. contributed largely to classical literature, including works on philology, antiquities, the history of literature, chronology, geography. These were his best productions. But his theological writings are also numerous. They include: A preface to a transl. of Fr. of Sales' Introduction à la vie dévote; two "Letters of Advice, 1, for the suscepcion of Holy Orders, 2, for studies Theological," to the 2d ed. of which he added a discourse upon the Phoen. Hist. of Sanchoniathon, which he thought spurious. From 1674 to 1688 he was chiefly occupied with patristic studies, connected with a contemplated vindication of the Anglican C., and produced: 1) Dissertationes Cypriunicæ, Lond., 1684, which display learned acuteness, but also an inclination to strange opinions; the theme of the 11th diss. is de paucitate martyrum, its aim to prove that the number of martyrs was small (refuted by RUINART: Præfat. gener. in acta Mart., and recently by Wiseman: Connect. between science and revealed Religion). 2) Diss. de jure laicorum sacerdotali ex sententia Tertull., &c., Lond., 1685. 3) An ed. of the opp. posthuma of B. PEARSON with a treatise de success. primorrm Romæ episcop.: Oxford, 1687. His diss. in Irenæum, were written during his professorate at Oxford. In diss. I. he disagrees with the then prevalent views of inspiration, in diss. II. pronounces the N. T. demoniacs epileptics;—both gave offence. After resigning his professorship he wrote a treatise upon the use of musical instruments in churches (1698), a letter against Toland's views of the N. T. canon (1701), a treatise against mixed marriages (1702), against occasional communion with Dissenters (1705), and a letter against the use of incense in churches (1711). His "Epistolary discourse," &c., Lond., 1706, advocating "the mortality of the human soul, and that it is rendered immortal only by the pleasure of God," &c., excited much opposition. As he connected the conferring of this immortality with baptism, the work was composed in the interest of the episcopacy. He also contends, here, for sacerdotal absolution. By opponents D. was charged with impiety, Popish tendencies, &c. But in his private life he was strictly religious, and even ascetic; he fasted thrice a week, and during all Lent. In his later visits to London and Oxford, he always took his Hebr. O. T., Greek N. T., and Thom. a Kempis, &c., along. Of his sons we mention: Henry, a lawyer (see Deism), and William, Archd. in Berkshire.—(See FRANCIS BROOKESBY, Life of Dr. H. Dodwell, &c.: Lond., 1715, 2 vols.—Ersch and Gruber).

HERZOG.*

Döderlein.—There are several German theologians of this name. But John Christopher D. exerted most influence upon the development of later Protestant theology, and forms a transition from strict orthodoxy to the more liberal views of moderatism. He was born at Windeheim, Jan. 20, 1745, educated at the University of Altorf, and in his 22d year became dean in his native town. Having won reputation by his Curæ critica et exegetica, he was appointed theol. prof. and dean of Altorf University. In 1782 he accepted a call to the 2d theol. chair at Jena, and died there Dec. 2, 1792. His Comm. on Isaiah and Proverbs were highly prized; and his Instit. theol. Christ. created an epoch in that department. The standpoint of his system appears from a remark in the preface, saying, that the theologian of our day must not invent doctrines, or go beyond the Bible; neither must he adhere to the old simply; but more fully define older views, use new expositions of particular doctrines, and have special reference to the demands of the times.—(See HÄNLEINS u. ARMONS, Journal I.; SCHLICHTEGROLL'S Nekrology, 1792; DÖRING, d. deutsche Kanzelredn., p. 36. ERSCH u. GRUBER). HAGENBACH.*

Doeg, an Idumean (1 Sam. 22: 9, 18; Ps. 52: 2), was the overseer of the shepherds and flocks of Saul (the LXX says, on 1 Sam. 22: 9, ὁ Ξυρὸς, νῆμω τὰς ἡμετέρας Σαοῦα, cf. Jos., Ant., 6, 12, 1). It was an important office at Eastern courts. Having been confined at Nob (1 Sam. 21: 8), on account, probably, of some Levitical impurity, contracted after his conversion to Judaism, Doeg witnessed the assistance which Abimelech afforded David, but also how innocently the Highpriest had acted. But he had the boldness to report the case to Saul in a false light, and the cruelty to execute the King's bloody vengeance, even after Saul's body-guard had shrunk from the deed. David had previously (1 Sam. 22: 22) discovered the bad character of this man, but hardly thought him capable of such villanious cruelty. A subsequent delineation of him is given in Ps. 52. (See Vaihinger's Comm. zum Psalter, I., 280–84).

VAIHINGER.*

Dog.—This animal, which is now a general favorite, was regarded with contempt (Eccles. 9: 4) by the Hebrews—as it still is in the East, being an unclean animal; it was classed with swine (Is. 66: 3; Matt. 7: 6. Cf. HORACE Epp., I., 2, 26; II., 2, 75) and rarely used except for watching herds (Job 30: 1; Is. 56: 10) and houses. Still, large numbers of dogs ran at large in the cities (see Luke 16: 21), and were often savage, ravenous, and dangerous (Ps. 22: 17, 21; Is. 56: 1. Cf. BURCKHADT'S Travels in Syria). Even buried human corpses were not secure against them (comp. 1 Kings 14: 11; 16: 4, &c.). Allusions are made to their filthy habits (Prov. 26: 11; 2 Pet. 2: 22).—Some ancient tribes offered dogs in sacrifice (PAUSAN., 3, 14, 9; PLUTARCH, Romul., c. 21, quæst. rom., c. 52), and even ate their flesh (PLUT., de sol. anim., c. 2; JUSTIN., 19, 1); but the Israelites were to abhor such sacrifices (Is. 66: 3), and to regard the dog as the emblem of what was unclean, profane, vile, and impudent

(1 Sam. 17 : 43, &c. &c.). To call a person a dog was considered most insulting (2 Sam. 16 : 9). In later times it was the contemptuous title applied to the heathen (Matt. 15 : 26. See LIGHTFOOT, hor. hebr.) ; a reproach since retorted upon Christians by Mohammedans. — (See BOCHART, Hierozoic. I., 769, &c., ed., Lips. ; EDMANN, verm. Samml. a. d. Naturk., V., 20, &c.).

RÜETSCHL.*

Dogmatics.—When, in the 1st cent., Christian doctrine, or a part of it, is called dogma (δόγματα τοῦ κυρίου καὶ τῶν ἀποστόλων. ep. Ign. ad Mag. c. 13 ; δόγματα θεοῦ, ORIG. in Matth. tom. 12, § 23 ; τὸ δόγμα, simply, for the whole of doctrine, ORIG. c. Cels. 3, c. 39, where the apostles are styled διδάσκαλοι τοῦ δόγματος ; ἱερὸν δόγμα, in the Pseudo-Clementines, 15, c. 1), it contains the idea of something determined, settled, unconditionally true. In the Church fathers of the 2d and 3d cent., Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Clement, Origin, as well as in the Clementines, and the newly-discovered books of the Philosophumena, many passages occur in which the tenets of the Greek schools of philosophy, and the heresies of the Christian Church are called δόγματα. Passages of this kind seem to lead to the supposition that Christian doctrine first assumed the character of dogma, or the essence of dogmas, through theology, since this gave it scientific form, or through the Church, in that she has made it the substance of her confession. But this second use of the word is borrowed from a heathen sphere. Yet it is very probable that the tenets of the philosophical schools and sects were styled δόγματα, not because the product of the human intellect, but in contrast with what was doubtful or disputed. At all events, in the first sense of the term, doctrine resting upon the authority of a divine revelation, was designated as infallibly true, as δόγμα. The use of the word in the N. T. we pass by, since our science evidently does not borrow the title from it.

The ancient Church leads us to the real point, the perception of the possibility and right of a science of dogmatics, as a member of the organism of theology. The aim of dogmatics is to represent the Christian religion as a system of knowledge, doctrine. In the performance of this task, we do not expect to be told what has been regarded as truth in a particular age or circle, what others have believed ; but to be taught what is unconditionally true in matters of religion. And here very important thoughts are suggested by a fundamental distinction in all human knowledge. We have to do not with the sphere of nature, but of the spirit. In this sphere, the most complete division springs from the difference, whether the object of knowledge, as such, is temporary and exposed to change, or independent of time, a portion of the absolute truth, which never has become, and cannot perish ; which the mind cannot discern without being conscious of a necessity which compels it to acknowledge as true to-day what was so regarded thousands of years before. In the first case, the mind derives its knowledge from experience ; in the second, from a principle of reason immanent in itself. In the former the tendency is toward separation and diversity ; in the latter, toward universality and unity. The one kind of knowledge may be designated as historical, in the broadest sense of the word ; the other as rational. The question arises, to which of these two spheres does the science of Christian doctrine belong ? The answer is, to the former only in a relative degree. Its great mission is to teach the unconditionally true. — This distinction avails only so far as it embraces those objects of human knowledge, which rise out of the nature and development of the mind of man itself. But the science of Christian doctrine derives its material from the saving revelation of God in Christ, the God-man. In this revelation, which is the sum of all others, that antagonism between what reason seeks — the absolutely true — and that which history gives — the relatively true — is abolished. Here, that which is particular, actual, limited by time and space, is also absolutely and unconditionally true, the norm and measure of all other knowledge in the sphere of religion. — Thus, the scientific representation of Christian doctrines can preserve its historical character, without detriment to its higher aim ; for the religion of Christ is itself a historical fact — the absolute fact in history. On this depends the peculiar and unique position of the science of dogmatics among the other sciences. The limitation which affects the solution of this problem, is the limitation of the appropriating and reproducing personality, and does not lie in the object. — A science of Christian doctrine is possible, because its object, the revelation of God in Christ, possesses an internal unity, which so embraces all its manifold parts, that it develops itself in them, and becomes the key to their true understanding. This unity is the redemption of man, fact and idea in one. The incarnation of the Logos, the indissoluble union of the divine and human in the person of Jesus Christ, is the proper centre of Christianity ; but as this does not belong to the natural order of this world, the whole course of things must be brought into harmony with it. To have led the way in this work of reconciliation is the imperishable merit of Anselm's work, cur Deus homo.

A system of Christian doctrine, which does not limit itself to telling us what certain men or communities of men have believed, or still believe, but deals with eternal, unchangeable truth, can only proceed upon the ground that the Christian religion is a divine revelation and the completion of all the revelations of God in history. — From those only who have faith in it as such can the science spring. Fides præcedit intellectum. Credo ut intelligam. Not Cartesian doubt of everything beyond the existence of the thinking, doubting Ego, but active faith is the pre-requisite of Christian γνῶσις. They who lack this faith either confound their variable opinions with the truth, and utter them unconsciously, whilst they dream they are giving scientific expression to Christian doctrine ; or they are perfectly conscious of the difference, and the interest which they take in the Christian religion as doctrine, is only historical. — As long as the Christian revelation meets the human spirit as mere external authority, a kind of faith is indeed possible, but not such as to give rise to a scientific knowledge of its object in a systematic form, for in such a form, doctrine is not contained in the records of this revelation. Lacking the central idea which binds all together in one harmonious whole, it only gives an aggregate of particulars, not a system.—It is the great merit of justifying faith, that it does away with this relation of mere external authority. In it knowledge has a starting-point, an organizing principle. It includes the certainty of the forgiveness of sins in the appropriation of the atoning work of Jesus Christ, and the most intimate union with the person of the Redeemer himself. This certainly rests upon the witness of the Spirit, the testimonium Spiritus Sancti. Thus it is justifying faith, as the real deliverance of man from the bonds of the natural life, and his elevation to a new world of communion with God in Christ, by which the objective centre of Christianity, the redemption of man, enters first truly into the subjective life and consciousness. And then only, when the essence of the Christian religion dwells in the spirit of man, does the knowledge of its doctrines, in the development of their particular parts, become no mere external copy, but a living picture derived from within.

Our older theologians, Lutherans as well as Reformed, teach, along with many of the schoolmen, that theology is a practical science. For reasons, which will soon appear, we cannot endorse the expression; they confounded it with religion, and this arose from an insight into the fact, that a true theology presupposes a life of true piety. By this acknowledgement, however, the question concerning the theologia irregeneratorum, as agitated between pietism and the orthodoxy of the time, is not decided; for such a decision would certainly require a more thorough investigation than has yet been given to the subject. Suffice it to say, that according to the true order of things, the rise of theology can only be conceived on the basis of the new birth by the divine power of salvation.—As now the science of Christian doctrine springs from faith and regeneration, it naturally requires also in those who teach it such regenerating faith. The truth of Christianity cannot be demonstrated to the unbeliever; that which rests upon the new creation in Christ Jesus cannot be proven upon the principles of natural reason. Renouncing all such vain attempts, the science confines itself to the endeavor to raise believers to a consciousness of the true glory and wealth of their inheritance.

From the conditions of the science of Christian doctrine, we pass to the consideration of the motives or reasons which give rise to it.—The want of such a scientific organism of doctrine is not felt by simple piety. Not, however, because piety is only the immediate closing in of the soul with God. Apprehended exclusively as such, it lacks the determinative elements of knowledge; the scientific tendency is not only wanting, but all the germs of it. Whatever value this conception of piety may possess under some aspects, it is evidently a mere abstraction. Such a position of the mind in relation to a religion embracing definite facts and positive doctrines is a sheer impossibility. The scientific tendency is wanting to simple piety, only because the knowledge it possesses is received in implicit confidence as taught in the communion of the Church.—But as the spirit of scientific culture in general acquires more importance within the communion of the Church, pious men of scientific attainments come to occupy a different relation to received doctrines. They are met by contradictions, not only between different departments of Christian knowledge, but also in the same department and in the teachings of the same persons. Some of them do not escape the attention even of unreflecting piety; though it leaps over the difficulty with ease without making any attempt to remove it. But whatever limit we may assign to scientific knowledge, the possibility of it rests absolutely upon acknowledging the axiom, that two contradictory doctrinal propositions cannot both be true. Any one who rejects this axiom must at the same time turn his back upon all theology. From the perception, therefore, of the contradictions which attach to the manner in which Christian doctrines are exhibited, arises the conviction that errors must have been introduced. And this conviction is inseparable from an effort to determine by a valid process what the true doctrines are.

From what has thus far been said it is evident that we have had in view the first beginning of the science of Christian doctrine. The occasion of this has undoubtedly been the development of heretical opinions; an occasion, however, which is essentially the same at every subsequent stage of the science. The first fruits of the scientific spirit of the Church, apart from the simple baptismal formula of most ancient times, were the oecumenical creeds and the theological treatises of the Fathers; and to ignore or oppose these results would certainly betray a false tendency of scientific culture. Yet we must neither assume that the doctrinal teaching of the primitive period, though it exclude the heresies of the age, has actually surmounted all confusion and contradiction; nor that it possesses normative force for subsequent scientific labors. The same motives exist now as then for the effort, by means of scientific helps, to work out a true and complete exhibition of Christian doctrine.—The scientific spirit, when truly awakened, puts forth its demands as unconditionally as divine revelation itself; for it is nothing else but the disposition of the reason to subject itself to the absolute truth of that which is received by faith. Any desire to accommodate the truth to any practical interest must therefore be denied. This entire subjection of the reason to revelation is the proper beginning of the science of Christian doctrine. It is a theoretical want accordingly in which dogmatics takes its rise—a necessity of the reason to know the grounds and the internal connection of all that faith holds to be true. Scientific knowledge is at the same time the condition of thorough religious instruction; though this practical purpose is not the ground of the science.—There is still another aspect of the theoretic nature of this want. Could we conceive of Christian instruction being free from error and perpetuating itself thus, the same impulse would, nevertheless, assert its demands; for it is of the nature of the reason to possess knowledge under a scientific form. A religion, therefore, that lays hold of the whole being of man and calls it into activity must of necessity awaken the tendency to possess a scientific knowledge of its doctrines. But more on this point in another place. Historically considered, the practical needs of the Church are the first occasion of the science.

As all the elements of Christian doctrine grow forth from the idea of redemption as from a gem, there is the best reason for unfolding these elements as one whole, as has been recently done very scientifically by Nitzsch (System der Christ. Lehre, 6th ed., 1852), notwithstanding the contrary practice of resolving them into two separate sciences. It is true, indeed, that these doctrines fall into two distinct classes. On the one hand, redemption is represented as proceeding from God, as entering into and developing itself in the history of fallen humanity, and completing itself in eternity. On the other, certain obligations are laid upon man, which, in the exercise of the power imparted by God, he is required to meet. Yet as it is redemption itself from which these peculiar duties spring, there is no necessity for developing them as a separate science. — Nevertheless there is a propriety in treating each side of redemption as a particular science. The end of redemption is not simply the revelation of the divine being, but the salvation of man. The restoration of mankind to living communion with God, is the focus of the whole system. Hence, two views of Christian doctrine arise. The one is objective, the other, subjective; the one is the constitution and completion of the truth, including its essential conditions, those in God and those in man, which are united in the incarnation and work of Christ; the other is the transformation of the life of the individual and of society by the power of redemption, and constitutes the great duty of the regenerated man. Thus originate Dogmatics and Ethics. Both are a stone of stumbling; the former to the one-sided practical spirit of modern times that would sunder moral activity from faith; the latter to the quietism that resolves faith into mere theory, and, from fear of interfering with divine sovereignty, restrains the tendency to moral activity. — It cannot be urged against this distinction that many doctrines (Sanctification, the Church, &c.) belong to both spheres; for they are viewed, in each, from different sides. Dogmatics presents doctrines as realities, facts; ethics, assuming them as facts, treats of them as duties, or as facts to be actualized in life.

The peculiar position of Dogmatics in the community of sciences, makes it important to determine how it must establish its theses, and conduct its demonstrations of truth. Redemption, as contemplating the regeneration of man, is the essential subject of Dogmatics. This redemption is entirely the work of the redeeming personality of the God-man, Jesus Christ. His sayings and doings, in the revelation of his personality and the execution of his mission, must form the original and chief foundation of dogmatic proof. Each thesis must be established by proof of its agreement with his acts and sayings. It is upon Christ, therefore, that the truth of dogmatic theses must rest; or at least upon something immediately derived from Christ. Among other things his holy life, with its supernatural commencement must be taken; especially his death, resurrection, ascension, which, however, belong to the close of his life. But upon these Christ gave no full instruction; for this we are directed to the teachings of his Apostles, as complementary to his own (John 16: 12, 13; 14: 25, 26). Hence as a further basis of proof, we have the additional teachings of the Apostles upon the above points. — Were these sayings and doings of Christ orally handed down, in a reliable way, dogmatic demonstration would appeal to that. But we have no such oral tradition; and it is impossible to conceive how such tradition should have purely propagated itself even to the 4th or 5th cent. For although to pledge the authority of the C. for its purity and reliability, is indispensable to Romanism, yet by making the episcopate, as the eccl. representativa, the depository of an infallible judgment for deciding upon true tradition, it virtually robs that tradition of its assumed reliability, and practical significance. Christ, moreover, deposited no such authority in the Church, but provided that by his guidance of the C., those sayings and facts, pertaining to himself, should be committed to writing (Scripture), and in this form be securely transmitted. This Scripture, therefore, of the N. T., must furnish Dogmatics with the true basis for its theses concerning Christ, and no tradition can in this sense be co-ordinate with it. But the facts of the revelation of redemption, and their effects upon the inner history of mankind, form an organic whole, gradually developed, according to the necessity and susceptibility of those to whom they are revealed. They are all concluded in Christ, who prepared the way for his advent by those revelations which are found in the forms of history, prophecy, and doctrine in the O. T. Hence, the importance of the O. T. for Christian Dogm., is conditioned by the N. T. According to the normal process of religious development, the dogmatic theologian, as every Christian, reaches the O. T. through the N. T., and recognizes the former as a divine revelation, not merely because Christ and his apostles refer to it as such, but also because the N. T. leads to and illumines the O. T. — But it may seem more difficult to perceive how the Testament of promise and preparation should still serve to establish dogmas, since the T. of fulfilment and completion has appeared. Of course, no Christian dogma has its sole basis in the O. T.; the latter can furnish corroborative or co-ordinate proof of such as are taught in both; and it does this by virtue of its organic relation to the N. T. Novum Test. in Vetere latet, Vet. in Novo patet. Thus, then, the SS. form the only basis of proof for Dogmatics. But, as seen above, the formation of dogm. theol. presupposes a living personal faith in the redemptive revelation of God in Christ, wrought by the Holy Ghost, so that the mind of man may get into a position for understanding the contents of Scripture. It is the witnessing of the Spirit which qualifie expound the SS. This witnessing, which is essentially associated with the Word, produces an unconditional certainty in the consciousness of the Christian, which no opposing conclusions of the reason, and even no seeming contradictions of the SS. themselves, can mislead. This is the real significance of religious subjectivity in Dogmatics. It does not form a second special ground of demonstration, but a rich source of theological views and conceptions, and an indispensable condition for the right use of the Scripture basis. It is also an obvious error to conceive of religious subjectivity as a right and prerogative of the human spirit, set over against the authority of revelation; for religious subjectivity is the work of the divine Spirit, and will therefore be subordinate to the revelation of the Spirit. From this it may be seen with what limitations Schleiermacher's idea of the Christian consciousness must be applied to the case. Until, therefore, revealed truth takes such possession of the mind, the theologian's work must be confined to the collection and arrangement of Bible passages under their proper doctrinal heads; he might prepare a Bibl. Theology, but he could not produce a Dogmatics. — This religious independence, however, which each one acquires through justifying faith is not religious isolation. For each Christian finds that he is not alone in the possession of redeeming truth; rather that he has, with rare exceptions, acquired it through the instrumentality of the Church, planted by the Apostles, and inwardly united by its common possession. The testimony of all experience proves it obviously false, indeed, to bind this instrumentality exclusively to an eccl. office, forms of worship, or eccl. ordinances; the channels are various, and are found not only in the spheres of oral communications or official functions, but in those of literature and art, those definitely constituted ones being merely the most prominent. And even when a single Christian becomes participant in this life of faith in an independent way, his own experience must soon convince him of the existence of a Church of God on earth, a communion of redeemed and regenerated men; and he will feel constrained to seek their testimony, to listen to their voice, and willingly to learn from them their deeper insight into the Word of God. To such an one, the Church will, in the main, be the expounder of that Word, and he will gladly use the helps thus furnished, to solve the numerous questions which will continually arise. — But, in all this, he will not — with Calixtus — allow the Church of the first five centuries to bind his conscience, and set limits to his inquiries. He is, unconsciously and consciously, under the living influence of the Church, cherishes for her love, reverence, and confidently believes that the Holy Spirit has kept her mainly in the way of truth. But he knows, as a Christian who has come to the knowledge of sin, that sin and error, though broken in principle, are not annihilated, but still remain in the actual life of the Church. He knows that it is an aim of the Church to present a pure system of doctrine, towards which she is ever approximating in her earthly course, and that hence she is his helper and guide to the knowledge of divine truth, but without ignoring his right and duty to consult for himself the highest norm of truth. If the Church claimed power to determine doctrine for him by her unconditional teaching, he must be convinced that such authority was exercised by a direct revelation, which would not only externally bind him, but with which he would find himself, as a Christian, in full unison. As this is impossible for the evangelical Christian, for whom the quasi divine authority claimed for the Church by the Romish system is manifestly unfounded—such a normal character of eccl. decisions would be a mere external law for Dogmatics, and thus deprive it of its scientific character. The eccl. determinations of doctrine which resulted from the controversies of the 4th and 5th cent., and of the Reformation, possess their high value for the evang. theologian, because he sees their substantial truth ever confirmed anew by the Bible.

In view of the continued presence of sin and error in the Church, a purifying and correcting power is required, which shall be superior to this evil. This cannot be lodged in the Christian consciousness of the single theologian; for, first, this is only a transient element in the consciousness of the Church, and then each theologian is himself subject to this evil, and needs the influence of that purifier and corrector; yea, he needs it more than the Church, which, as a whole, is more likely to be right in conclusions reached by common effort, and mutual comparisons and corrections, than the single theologian. If, with all repudiations of Pelagianism, it is Pelagian to make the decisions of the Church an infallible, binding authority for the conscience, it is doubly Pelagian to transfer the authority of correcting errors, of which no results of the general Church are wholly free, to individual theologians. The true corrective can be found only in the SS., as the true Revelation of God. But, besides exercising these regulative and critical functions, the Bible is also a fertilizing source of new thoughts and views for the dogmatic theologian; in which respect, however, it does not stand alone, but in connection with the entire course of eccl. development and doctrine, as these have originally sprung from the SS. as the head-fountain.

In regard to the method of using Scripture proofs in Dogmatics, an enlarged spirit is to be commended. For Dogm., the old distinction of proofs, κατὰ ἡγρόν and κατὰ διάνοιαν, is of no account, because, as a science, it must rely upon a strict and necessary connection of its conceptions. For the same reason we must affirm that dogmatic conceptions and theses, which have no immediate Scripture basis, but necessarily follow from others which rest on such basis, may be considered as being essentially as well founded in the SS. as those which may be substantiated by express passages. The Bible is not a collection of aphorisms, designed to serve as proof-texts for Dogmatics, nor a magazine of dicta probantia, but a collection of writings which sprang immediately from the religious life of God's people, and is intimately joined to their circumstances and wants; and every expression in it belongs to its proper connection, and has its true meaning fixed by that. The anxiety of Dogm. to quote biblical proofs, may easily betray theologians into an atomistic mode of procedure, which tears passages out of their connection, and makes them isolated proofs for equally isolated dogmatic theses. — But if the use of the SS. in an enlarged spirit shall not be abused into an excuse for silently disregarding Scripture proof, the best plan would be to introduce each dogma with a biblical-theological exhibition of the Scripture grounds on which it rests, and by which its positions are substantiated, and then, in the scientific development of the dogma, to refer to the Scripture results thus obtained. If the agreement of the chief points of the dogma with the SS. is thus established, the minor points may be safely admitted from their internal connection with the rest.

Schleiermacher classifies Dogmatics under historical theology. But whatever may have prompted this arrangement, it involves an entire displacement of the idea of D. Its prominence among other theological disciplines, and even the arrangement of S.'s "Glaubenslehre," as well as the influence which it has ever exerted, are incomprehensible, if this science, made parallel with eccl. statistics, is merely to state what is believed and taught, for the time being, in this or that branch of the Church, and not to settle or teach anything itself. Were this Dogmatics, another theological discipline would be required, which should present absolute truth in a scientific form. — Upon the proper place and office of Dogmatics in the theological organism, the following outlines are offered. Practical theol., as the second chief part, should be preceded by a first part, which might properly be termed theoretical theol., because it would include departments springing from a purely theoretical desire to determine their contents in a scientific way. Theoretical theol. would be divided into historical and thetic theology. The former section would describe the historical origin and development of Christianity in Revelation, and man's gradual apprehension and appropriation of it. Thetic (thesis) theology would present absolute Christian truth in a scientific form, and this again 1) as dogmatic; 2) as theol. ethics. — If, now, it is the proper business of Dogmatics to set forth absolute truth in the purest scientific form; and if, in doing this according to Protestant principles, it makes the SS. its only norm and highest source, it is undeniably a misnomer to speak of Lutheran, Reformed, &c., Dogmatics. Each Church, of course, has its confessions, its symbolical theology, and dogmatic theologians; but, among Protestants, Dogmatics can only be Christian, and denominational theology is not to be identified with it, as is done by the Romish Church.

The History of Prot. Dogmatics has been recently enriched by the more thorough and comprehensive work of W. Gass, 1st. vol. 1854. — It must suffice, in presenting the recent literature of this science, to mention only the more important works. — The personality of Jesus Christ (see above) being the central point of Dogmatics, the latter science will not be supplanted by Philosophy, even when Philos., its pantheistic period having wholly passed away, shall have settled upon the true basis of the theistic principle. —

Hence, it was only a remarkable episode in the history of German theology, that, for a time, Dogm. was chiefly treated as a handmaid of systems of truth erected upon natural or rational grounds. Of this character were, not only the works of the school of popular eclectic rationalism, as the compendiums of Eckermann, Henke, Stäudlin (with closer attachment to the critical philosophy), Ammon, Wegscheider, the last ed. of Bretschneider, but those also who followed a definite philosophical system, as Daub, and Marheineke, at first based upon Schelling's system, and in later ed. upon Hegel's. In opposition to these, arose those of the historical supernaturalistic school, as the works of Storr, Reinhard, Schott, Knapp, Hahn, Steudel. The work of Schleiermacher (see Art.): "Der chr. Glaube nach d. Grundsätzen d. ev. Kirche, &c.," created an epoch by its lofty independence and religious depth, combined with masterly systematic and dialectic qualities. The modification which this last system most needed, concerning the Biblical idea of Revelation, was made by Nitzsch (Syst. d. chr. Lehre, 1st ed. 1829, 6th ed. 1851) and Twisten, Vorlesungen über d. Dogm. d. ev. luther. Kirche, 1st. vol. 1st ed. 1826, 3d ed. 1834; 2d vol. 1837 (not completed). Of the like spirit, and largely following S. and newer philosophical systems, but pervaded by the supernatural principle of Christianity, are Th. A. Liebner's chr. Dogm. aus d. christolog. Princip &c. (not completed); J. P. Lange's chr. Dogm., erster Th., philos. Dogm. 1849, zweiter Th., positive Dogm. 1851; H. Martensen, d. chr. Dogm. (Danish); J. H. A. Ebrard, chr. Dogm. 1851, 1852. — The subject is treated in the rationalistic spirit, but in an improved form, by K. Hase, ev. Dogm. 1st ed. 1826, 4th ed. 1850. — W. M. L. de Wette (Dogm. d. ev.-luther. Kirche, &c. 1st ed. 1816, 3d, 1840), K. Hase (Hutterus redivivus, &c. 1st ed. 1828, 8th, 1855), and H. Schmid (d. Dogm. d. ev.-luther. K. 1st ed. 1843, 3d, 1854) have gone upon the view that dogmatics should simply set forth the doctrines held by a particular Church, without regard to the actual convictions of the author. Upon the same principle, but of a more apologetic character, is the still unfinished work of G. Thomasius, Christi Person u. Werke; Darstellung d. ev.-luther. Dogm. &c., erster Th. 1853, and that of Alex. Schweizer, d. Glaubenslehre d. ev.-reform. K., 1844, 1847. — An able, independent effort to derive a system of Christian theology, in a strictly genetic way, from the Bible, has been begun by J. C. K. Hoffmann, d. Schriftbeweis, erste Hälfte, 1852; erste Abth. der zweiten Hälfte, 1853. The method adopted, however, makes the work more of a Bibl. Theol. than a Dogmatics. Related to this in spirit and tendency, if not in dogmatic results, is J. T. Beck's chr. Lehrwissenschaft nach d. bibl. Urkunden, 1841, and his Einl. in d. System d. chr. Lehre, 1838. — Finally, we name, Fr. Strauss, d. chr. Glaubensl. in ihrer geschichtl. Entwicklung u. im Kampfe mit der modernen Wissensch. 1840, 1841.

J. MÜLLER.*

Dolcino, a leader of the Apostolic Brethren (see Art.). His peculiar views are set forth in three prophetic works, the third of which is lost, whilst only abstracts of the others are preserved in the Additamentum ad hist. D. The first was written, 1300, in Dalmatia, whither he had retired with most of his followers; it is addressed, like those prepared three years later, to scattered members of the sect, and to Christians in general. After declaring his orthodoxy, he announced 1303 as the year of his enemies' destruction, and the complete victory of his party and cause, appointed by God for the renovation of the world. The prophecy having failed, he postponed the time to 1304, affirming that God had revealed to him the true import of the prophecies of the Bible. — He distinguished four status in the history of the divine life on earth; each good at the start, but, having degenerated, supplanted by the next. The first was that of the O. T. patriarchs. In the second, Christ appeared, with his Apostles, to establish new virtues; these were celibacy, in opposition to marriage, and poverty, in opposition to earthly possessions. The third period began with Pope Sylvester and the Emperor Constantine, when the Church was compelled to use wealth in the training of the newly-converted heathen, to show them how it can be used for God's glory. But the love of the world becoming predominant, a reaction appeared in the rule of St. Benedict. This, however, also failed to restore poverty as a virtue, especially among ecclesiastics and monks. The Dominicans and Franciscans succeeded no better. The fourth status began with Segarelli and Dolcino, who aimed to restore the apostolic manner of life; this period shall reach to the end of the world. They required the renunciation of all worldly possessions, and the unity of the brethren in the love of the Spirit, without imposing forms, customs, or any external rules. Dolcino was evidently influenced by the doctrines of the Abbot Joachim. — D. prophesied, also, that Frederic of Sicily, then under a ban, would become Emperor, set up new kings, and cast Boniface from his throne; that then a new head of the Church, sent of God, would reign in peace, and the Holy Ghost be poured out as of old. Apart from his prophecies, D.'s views betray that mysticism which would renounce everything outward as the cause of evil, in order that the spirit might rule in its ideal freedom; perfect love, as the bond of souls, should be realized in its exaltation over all law; all human relationships should rest upon a purely spiritual communion, &c. D. himself carried out this theory; he had no property; he lived with a former nun, Margaret, whom he called his dilectissima soror. — That D. saw the errors of the Church, and was animated by a religious sentiment, must be admitted; but his misapprehensions of Christian doctrine, and sensual fancies, rendered his attempts futile. But his memory lived in the hearts of the people, who thought him a hero and martyr, whilst, his foes denounced him as a false prophet, whom the hand of God punished. Dante compares him to Mohammed (Hell, XXVIII., 55, &c.). — (See Hist. D., and the Additam. by MURATORI, Script. rer. Ital. IX. 425, &c.; MOSHEIM, Ketzergesch. &c.; HELMST. 1748, p. 193, &c.; SCHLOSSER, Abtillard u. Dulcin. &c.; GUTHA, 1807, 8vo.; BAGGIOLINI, Dolcino e i Patareni: Novara, 1838, 12mo.; KRONE, Fra Dulc. &c.: Lpz. 1844, 8vo.

C. SCHMIDT.*

Dolet, a native of Orleans, a humanist and philologist, the author of many works, was imprisoned for being inclined to the Reformation, but set free upon a promise of fidelity to the Romish religion. Subsequently he caused dissatisfaction, and was strangled and burnt, 1546. It is said, but not proven, that before his death he abjured his errors, and invoked the Virgin. Protestants never counted him among their martyrs, for the reason assigned by Calvin, in his de scandalis: Agrippam, Villanovanum, Doletum et similes vulgo notum est tanquam Cyclopes quospiam Evangelium semper fastuose spreverunt. Tandem eo prolapsi sunt amentia et furoris, ut non modo in filium Dei execrabiles blasphemias evomerent, sed quantum ad animæ vitam attinet, nihil a canibus et porcis putarent se differre. In a word, he was considered an atheist. — (See Bayle, Iseli.)

HERZOG.*

Dominic and the Dominicans. At Calaruega, or Calervoga, in the bishopric of Osma, Old Castile, lived, at the end of the 12th cent., Felix, of a good family, though not of the Guzmans—with his wife, Joanna of Aza. The latter was of an extraordinary piety; and when, in view of her approaching delivery, she redoubled her zeal at the grave of St. Dominic, Ab. of Silos, the St. revealed to her the grand future of her child. In 1170, she gave birth to a son, and called him Dominic. The boy grew up wholly to the mind of his mother, and, in his earliest years, took delight in visiting the church, in prayer, and voluntary mortifications. When six years old, he was sent for his education to his uncle, Archpresb. at Gumyel de Ycan. Here he studied the sciences, and practised with increasing pleasure exercises of devotion. In his 14th year, he visited the univ. of Palencia, prosecuted for several years general scientific studies with the utmost ardor; and then applied himself with the same eagerness and perseverance to theology. His learning soon distinguished him among his fellows. But much more was he esteemed and praised for his piety. He had a tender heart, and was ever ready for the greatest sacrifices, which he felt bound to render to God and to his fellowmen. During a famine, he gave away all that he had, even his books. At another time, he offered his own person as ransom for a captive. He was deeply concerned for the salvation of his fellows, spent tears and prayers to God for it, and felt himself called at last to do his part in the conversion of sinners and heretics. And since his expostulations, counsels, and admonitions proceeded from an undoubting faith and a glowing love to God, they could not otherwise than melt and convince. At this time the Præmonstratensians and Carthusians, but especially the Cistercians, stood high in favor; and Dom. would probably have entered one of them and vanished in it, if, in his 24th year, Diego of Azevedo, B. of Osma, had not called him to himself. Diego, wishing to reform his chapter according to the rule of St. Augustine, appointed Dominic, who was born in his diocese, perhaps related to him, and celebrated for his learning, piety, and pastoral fidelity, as canon of his cathedral, that he might be a support to himself, and an example and ornament to his clergy. Under the direction of his Bishop, D. redoubled his zeal, preached throughout the diocese, was ordained priest, and made subprior of the cathedral chapter, and again sent out for the conversion of Mohammedans and heretics. In 1204, Diego was sent by Alphonsus of Castile, to seek a wife beyond the Pyrenees for Prince Ferdinand. He chose the renowned Dominic, his model preacher, as his companion. His mission having been successful, Diego was again sent, at the head of a numerous and splendid cortege, to convey the Princess across the Pyrenees. He found her dead. Deeply moved by this sad occurrence, Diego resolved, renouncing for a time his episcopal duties and honors, to give himself up to works and exercises of piety. The brilliant embassy returned to Spain without their leader. The latter, with his private attendants and Dominic, to whom the resolution of the Bishop is, perhaps, mainly due, went to Rome, whence they returned home not until they had satisfied their pious desires, and, perhaps, also paid their respects to Innocent III. They for a fifth time entered S. France; this time to remain there. In this country, the extreme degeneracy of the clergy was used by old heretical and heathen elements, to the ruin of the Church; and, in a short time, an unruly spirit of disorder had taken possession of all classes of society. Pantheism and Antinomianism, Atheism and Libertinism were spreading. Science and art had become thoroughly irreligious. City and country had thrown off all authority, both of Church and State. The movement found a supporter in Raimond, Count of Toulouse, whose interests were involved in its success. The clergy having utterly neglected their duty, it seemed likely that total ignorance and contempt of all true doctrine, as ignorance and contempt of Christianity and the Church, would soon be universal. It was, at least, universally doubted whether the Church knew, and was willing and able to fulfil, its mission, to lead every one, even the poorest and most despised layman to salvation, and to sanctify all departments of life and labor. The Waldenses, the poor men of Lyons, had made a beginning towards removing these evils. Tied to no place or office, addressing all classes of society, despising all gain, discarding all outward pomp and power, their apostolical preaching of the gospel was a labor in the service of Christ, and by no means begun in conscious opposition to the Church. And yet it had sprung up upon the soil of subjectivism, from despair in the will and power of the Church and clergy. Hence it had much in common with the decided opponents of the Church; and, in the case of some, every difference vanished. Nor did the Pope, seeing the great danger which S. France was preparing for the Church, after his unsuccessful effort to regain the poor of Lyons, as poor Catholics, make the proper distinction. He did not use the Waldenses as Gregory VII. the Patariens, against the enemies of the Church; but demanded an unconditional obedience to the Church and its hated hierarchy. The Pope, in order to execute his will, had sent legates to these regions; but they, coming in the pomp and power of their commission, estranged the minds only the more. The task of converting the heretics had been assigned to the Cistercians; Bernardine abbots preached among them; but the Romish doctrines and commands found no ears. Coming as great lords, they did not reach the hearts of the people, but were despised as the representatives of the formal, heartless, rich, and proud clergy and monks. They held a meeting at Montpellier; and, discouraged by their want of success, were about to give up their mission, when the B. of Osma with his suite arrived at M. Diego and Dom. were consulted, and they brought about a resumption of the work with greater success. Dominic was, more than all others, qualified to understand and manage the matter. As itinerant preacher, he had early learned the views of the people and of the heretics, their likes and dislikes. In S. France he had observed what kind of preaching and preachers alone enjoyed the confidence of the people. He had seen the right of Christendom to demand this kind and no other. He saw that time and place demanded a re-institution of the Apostles' office, and that the successors of Peter should send forth true successors of Paul, who, by preaching and suffering, might show that the Church had still a heart for the poor, estranged, and deluded laity. To the latter belonged his entire heart, and he felt himself called to devote to them his whole life. He advised the assembled legates to lay aside all pomp, pleasure, and wealth; to go forth in pairs, and in the simplest attire; zealously to preach the Gospel and the epistles of Paul to all the people; and to commit themselves confidently to them. The enthusiasm of D. carried away the legates, and they determined to make the effort. Diego sent his horses and retinue to Osma, and took the lead in the new mission. But, except Dominic, none of those engaged in it were called to the work. The work was difficult; there was little success, and that among the humble; there were no conversions of masses. D. was soon forsaken by all his associates. Diego had to return to his diocese, the Cistercian abbots to their monasteries; nor did they send others to take their place. Dominic was not, indeed, without assistants—his own brother was one of them; but they were few in number, and often changed. He also received some aid from the Church authorities, from Fulco, B. of Toulouse, among others; but still all traces of his labors were constantly vanishing. He now founded an asylum for females at Prouille, in the diocese of Toulouse. Of the first 11, 9 were converts from the Albigensian heresy. He prescribed absolute claustration, strict silence, and labor. The enterprise was a labor of love well suited to impoverished noble families of the land; for, an asylum being thus opened for their unmarried daughters, there was no necessity for them to seek alliances with the heretics, whilst also their cloistered daughters bound them closely to the Catholic Church. Thus, also, the women, perhaps the chief agents in spreading the heresy, were gained for the Church, or, at least, made harmless. With this institution the first band of his companions were connected; D. himself gladly lingered there. But, soon after, the brothers Cellini, of Toulouse, who had become his followers, presented to him their house in the city for monastic purposes. This became the headquarters of his company, whence itinerant preachers were sent out. It soon received liberal grants from the B. of Toulouse, and from wealthy laymen. Among the latter was Simon, Count of Monfort, who otherwise also sustained the labors of Dominic. The Cath. party gave testimony of their obligations to D., by offering to him the bishoprics of Beziers, Convenans, and Conferans; but it also showed thus that it did not feel the necessity of a standing itineracy, nor estimate duly the importance of D.'s mendicant mission. It is certain that this conviction was wanting to the C. Church as a whole, and also to the Pope. After the murder of the legate, Peter of Castelnau, Innocent III., despairing of a peaceful conversion of S. France, called the hostile N. France to arms, published a crusade instead of the Gospel, and placed into the hands of S. of Montfort the sword for the extirpation of the heretics. This laid upon D. the alternative either of giving up his apostolical labors, or, to rescue his orthodoxy, of prosecuting them, like Arnold of Citeaux, in the destructive train of Montfort. He chose the latter, and was now used as a tool in convicting the suspected and prisoners of heresy, that they might be delivered to the stake. So far, of course, he was implicated in the inquisition, which, however, was not until afterwards separated from the duties of the Bishops, and committed to special officers, chiefly to the followers of Dominic. At this price, he bought the favor of the Legates, and thus he disgraced his own work, and brought it to the verge of destruction. Its condition at the close of the Albigensian war was such that we wonder that it was not wholly destroyed, or absorbed in the Cistercian order. Perhaps the oppressive influence of the latter stirred up D. to maintain his independence against them. Perhaps Fulco of Toulouse was ambitious that his diocese should give rise to a new order, designed for the extirpation of heretics. But it is also probable, and very pardonable, that D., in return for his protracted labors and sacrifices, coveted the honor of being the founder of an order; and wished to pave the way to his successors of resuming the apostolical office of preaching in better times, with the sanction of the Church, and with more hopes of success. However this may have been, in 1215 he accompanied Fulco to Rome, to the Lateran Council, assembled by Innocent III., with the design of obtaining the confirmation of his company as an order. The Council resolved that no new order should be established. The Pope, with the assembled fathers, did not dream that their age was about to produce the fullest development of western monasticism. The repeated requests of D. and his friends were refused. Innocent is said to have consented to give to the order a verbal confirmation; but the demand, to adopt a rule already sanctioned by the Church, betrays the desire of the Pope to connect the disciples of D. as closely as possible with an already existing order, or to make them colleagues of the canons. To the latter, D., who was himself a canon, assented. On his return, he consulted with his 16 companions, chose the rule of St. Augustine, and formed a new society of canons. In completing his rule, however, he accepted a number of statutes from the Præmonstratensians. Constant silence, except on express permission of the superior, almost incessant fasting, total abstinence from meat, disuse of all linen garments, poverty, etc., were agreed upon. Their dress was a long black cassock, reaching to the feet, and a short white surplice, with sleeves. In the mean time, Innocent had died, and Honorius III. had become Pope. The latter had a juster apprehension of the value of monasticism to the Church, and, D. having hastened to Rome for the purpose, confirmed the new order, approved their statutes, and furnished, before Christmas of 1216, the bull of confirmation. The preaching brothers were required by their sermons to defend the Church against heresy, and to explain the true faith. In reference to the former, the clergy were often compared with shepherds' dogs, who were expected to bark when danger was near. Hence it was, perhaps, that Dom. and his associates had to endure the same comparison. In reference to the latter, they were represented as torchbearers. The two were afterwards melted together into the wretched symbol of a dog bearing a lighted torch. It was afterwards told that the mother of D., during her pregnancy with him, had dreamt that she had given birth to such a dog. Such a dog, also, was adopted into the coat of arms of the order. D. obtained, in three successive bulls, numerous privileges for his order, made his profession to the Pope, and was named superior et magister generalis of the preaching monks. In 1217 he returned to Toulouse, received the profession of his disciples, and bound them to the observance of the rule. He now strove to make his order useful; or rather, at first, to enlarge it. He therefore sent some to Spain, others to Paris. He himself once more went to Rome, in order to secure for his order a place in the government of the Church. Mathew of Paris, the provisional leader of the order, founded a monastery in the house of St. James in Paris, whence the Dominicans were called Jacobites throughout France. On his journey, D. met with much acceptance, and founded monasteries at Metz and Venice. Honorius again received him with honor, and gave to him and his monks the church of St. Sixtus. He charged him also with the Reformation of the Roman nunneries. D. succeeded in uniting all the nuns under strict retirement in his monastery of St. Sixtus, instead of which the church of St. Sabina and a part of the papal palace were vacated to him. Pitying the servants of the Pope, who were either idle and neglected, or were prevented by their labors from attending upon divine worship, he delivered special sermons to them. In return for this the Pope created him magister sacri palatii, or chief chaplain; an office which has ever since been filled by a Dominican, and has been of great importance, since it has determined the theology of the R. court, and held the supreme censure of literature. After this, D. is said to have journeyed to Spain; this, however, seems to be a mere fiction, designed to make him appear independent of St. Francis. It seems, indeed, that D. himself wished to prevent all relationship with the Minorites; for, in 1219, he adopted for his order the dress of the Carthu-ians, and thus connected himself decidedly with the older monasticism. But in the same year yet he probably attended the Chapter-General of the Minorites at Assisi, and allowed himself to be drawn into an entirely new course. Their almost insane love for the rags, filth, and noisome diseases of the lowest populace, carried him away also. The extreme poverty which the religious paraded, made them popular, made them one of the leading powers of the 13th cent., and insured to them a great future. Without it no new order of monks could even exist; with it a large field of operation and an easy growth awaited them. Hence, D. quickly followed in the steps of St. Francis, and secured with him the favor of his age. At the first Chapter-General, held in 1220, in the monastery of St. Nicholas, at Bologna, he renounced all property and regular income, and commanded poverty and the begging of the immediate necessities of life. Thus his order became a mendicant order. He forbade the reception of lay-brothers, that his monks might not, like those of former orders, become indolent and lordly. As to organization, it was resolved that there should be Priors, Provincials, Definitors, and one General, all to be freely elected by the order. A Chapter-General was to be held every year. The second C.-G. was held at Bologna, in 1221, where 60 monasteries were represented. After D. had visited the cities of Upper Italy, he returned to Bologna, and soon felt the approach of death. He yet cursed those who should introduce property and a fixed income into his order, and died Aug. 6, 1221. In 1233 he was canonized by Gregory IX. — D. was deficient neither in the discernment of an educated mind, nor in enthusiasm, or the gentleness of a pious heart; but he lacked comprehensiveness in his view of the Church of his age, originality, independence, and firmness to maintain his own views and measures. Not until he had passed from the scene of his ardent labors to Rome, could he come in contact with Francis. His enthusiasm for the latter enabled him to elevate his work to the stars. As the imitators and rivals of the Minorites, the Dominicans became greater than any former order. They, nevertheless, maintained their original peculiarities, their predilection for the doctrine of the Church. To apprehend this scientifically, to proclaim it from the pulpit and desk, to defend it by writing and speaking, to avenge it by censure and the inquisition, was claimed by the Dom. as their peculiar work. The Franciscans claiming to be followers of the Apostle of love, the Dom. set up a like claim with regard to Paul, and founded everywhere cloisters and churches in honor of this Apostle of faith. But this faith, whose champion they were, the successors of Peter had reduced to a set of formulas, the first article of which was the Pope. The best weapon against evil which they distributed among the people was the rosary—completed, though not perhaps invented, by D.—and the psalter of Mary. This method of pastoral labor and their paraded poverty rapidly elevated them everywhere in the favor of the people. The story, however, of a cloister in Ethiopia numbering 9000 monks and 3000 servants, and of another of four miles in circumference, is a mere fable. But in cities, monasteries arose in great numbers. Begging friars could not live in a desert; preaching monks needed populous centres. Other orders were also beginning to enter the cities; but the begging orders outstripped them all. The meanest hovel sufficed for a beginning; to the Dominicans, indeed, only for a beginning; for they soon renounced begging, and by donations and bequests became rich, and built stately cloisters and churches. Hence, we owe to them many of the most splendid Gothic churches, which style of architecture they assisted in developing. Their labors in the sphere of science are still more important. When, in 1228, the doctors of the Univ. of Paris had been dismissed, the Dominicans were permitted to establish there a professorial chair, to which, in 1230, they added a second. The Franciscans also crowded into it. The Univ. of Paris thus became the model of all subsequent universities; but thus, also, all free movement in science came speedily to an end. Theology, instead of ennobling and sanctifying the other sciences, impoverished them; its only mission was to dissect the R. Church doctrines into subtle formulas; to unfold and define them to their furthest consequences; and, by a compact with philosophy, to substantiate them in this form to the understanding. Scholasticism is the fruit of the learned labors of the Dominicans. If they did not have full sway in the last third of the middle ages, it was because the Franciscans entered into competition with the rival order on its own ground. In the sphere of science, we accordingly soon hear of none but the Dominicans and Franciscans, in whose disputes consisted the entire theology and science of two centuries. They were marshalled in hostile array, as Thomists or Scotists, as Nominalists or Realists; and, besides the priority, excellence, etc., of the two orders, they made the immaculate conception of the Virgin a subject of bitter controversy. But the Minorites retired from the literary arena; the Dominicans became the sole guardians of theology, a capacity which they fulfilled, true to their chosen symbol, a dog carrying off the torch of truth like a stolen bone. Thus, when the 16th century began, they had perverted their original calling of preaching the Gospel; thenceforth, also, they despised their mission, as confessors to the poor, when they allowed themselves to be used in the sale of indulgences. Thus they brought on the rupture with the entire Church and school of the middle ages. All individual, national, and even episcopal elements in the Church having been crushed in favor of a papal monocratic absolutism, the people in the 16th cent. were wholly averse to a return to the older form of the Western Church. The Dominicans were unable to prop up or defend the R. Church. They could not even reform themselves, much less breathe a new life into the Church, as was done by the Jesuits. They became a burden to the Pope himself; and their losses by the Reformation and revolution no one has deplored. Their greatest blow was the sanction of the doctrine of their rivals, the immaculate conception, as a doctrine of the R. Church, as was done by Pius IX., Dec. 8, 1854. The order has given to the Church above 800 Bishops, 150 Archbishops, 60 Cardinals, and 4 Popes. Many learned and pious men, such as Albert the Gr., Thomas Aquinas, Master Eccard, John Tauler, Henry Suso, Savonarola, Las Casas, have adorned it. There were also Dominican muns. (See Biogr. of Dom. by JORDANUS, first General of the Order, in the BOLLANDISTS, Acta SS. Aug. I. 545, seq.; HELYOT's Gesch. d. geistl. Klost.-u. Ritter-Ord. III. 235-317; Annal. ord. Prædicat.: Rom. 1746; Hurter's Gesch. P. Innoc. III., IV. 282-312; LACORDAIRE, Vie d. st. Dom.: Bruz. 1848; CARO, St. Dom. et les Dominic.: Par. 1853.

A. VOGEL. — Reinecke.

Dominicum, 1) i. q. κυριακον διπνον, among the Latin fathers, the Lord's Supper. CYPR., ep. ad Cæcil.: numquid ergo Domin. post cœnam celebrare debemus?—2) The possession of a dominus, or what serves for his support. 3) The fisc of a prince, Capitul. 3, a. 813, c. 3, . . . in Dominico tertiam partem componat. 4) The church edifice, the estate of the Church, as belonging to the Lord (DU CANGE, s. v.). HERZOG.*

Domitian, Emperor of Rome from 81 to 96. The persecution which occurred under the reign of this despotic, suspicious, but by no means fanatical ruler, took place as follows. Under Vespasian and Titus, a tax was imposed upon the Jews, in favor of Jupiter Capitol. SUTTON., in Domit. c. 12, reports that under Domitian, this tax was levied upon all who, without professing to be Jews, lived according to their laws, or, by concealing their nationality, had evaded the levy. Among these there were, doubtless, Jewish Christians. They were also accused, under Domitian, of impiety (αθεοτης, αθεος, h. e., μη σεβόμενος τους θεους). Some examples are cited, without its being expressly said that the persons were Christians; but it is added that all who let themselves be seduced into Judaism were charged with αθεοτης, and this must include Christians (DIO CASS. Hist. 67, 14). Eusebius (Chron.) expressly states that many Christians suffered martyrdom under D. This will explain Tertullian's statement (Apolog. c. 5), that D. commenced persecuting the Christians, but soon desisted, and recalled the exiles. The investigation instituted by D., in imitation of Vespasian, into the genealogy of David, was a purely political movement, and accomplished nothing (EUSEB. III. 12). As D. was told that Christians were politically dangerous, he summoned two of them before him, and questioned them concerning Christ and his kingdom. They replied that it was not of this world, but a heavenly and angelic kingdom, and one that would not fully come until the end of the world, when Christ would appear in his glory, to give to every man according to his deeds. D. ridiculed them, and ordered the persecution to cease (Καταπαύσαι δε δια προσταγματος τον κατα της εκκλησιας διωγμον). Hegesippus (EUSEB. III. 20) says those summoned were leaders of the Church, and relatives of Christ. HERZOG.*

Donatists.—Among the heretical sects to which the persecutions and the dissensions in the Church, occasioned by the growing influence and arrogance of the confessors, gave rise during 250-350 (fuller accounts of which will be found in other Articles), the Donatist schism was remarkable for its spread, duration, and controversial zeal. This has been attributed to the strong passions of the Africans; but the treatment of the Donatists by the State must also have served to excite them, and confirm them in their opposition. They must likewise have been influenced by the insurrections and intestine wars, of which the province of Africa was then the scene. These prepared the way for all sorts of socialistic theories and political schemes against the existing authorities and customs. The Donatists could not keep clear of these agitations, being themselves arrayed on other grounds against the State. For just when they separated themselves from the Catholic C., this became the Church of the State. After some hesitation, they felt compelled to urge a strict sundering of Church and State, and insist that the latter should keep within its own limits. Their doctrine of the Church must be commended; in other doctrines they adhered to the ante-Nicene standpoint. There were, consequently, enough points of discord, besides the original causes of their separation, to give a constantly new impulse and a new turn to the strife. And the Church cannot boast of having terminated the schism, or subdued the schismatics. We shall briefly sketch the course of events and their results.¹

The Diocletian persecution kindled a fanatical spirit of martyrdom. And, in proportion as martyrs and confessors were honored, traditors were despised and hated. Even those Christians who evaded the imperial edict, requiring the surrender of all their sacred books, by giving up some other writings instead, excited the indignation of more zealous brethren. Mensurius, B. of Carthage, fell under the censure of this rigoristic party, whom he still more offended by opposing the fanaticism of voluntary martyrdom, and the undue reverence paid to confessors. He caused those congregated in the prisons to disperse. They, of course, resolved upon vengeance. Among the Numidian clergy, however, many agreed with Mensurius. The matter was brought before the Synod of Cirta, 305. The primate of the Numidian Church, B. Secundus, of Tigris, desired to ascertain before opening the Synod, that no traditor was among them. The inquiry brought out all sorts of accusations, implicating nearly all the Bishops present in the above-named evasion. Even Secundus was suspected. The investigation was dropped, but Secundus maintained the position of leader of those zealous for discipline. He heard of the dissension in Carthage, and wrote to M. in disapproval of his course. Accusers went to Rome, and M. was summoned thither to answer their charges. He obeyed, vindicated his course, and started homeward. He died on the road, 311.

¹ Comp. OPTAT. MILEVITANUS, de schism. Donat. libri VII. &c.: Par. 1700. AUGUSTINUS, contra epist. Parmen. libri III., de baptismo, libri VII., contra litteras Petilianæ libri III., contra Cresconium libri IV., brevic. collat. contra Donat. libri III.; Benedict. ed. vol. IX. NORISII, hist. Donat., in the 4th v. of his works, publ. by the Bullerini: Verona, 1729, &c. WALCH, Hist. der Ketzereien, &c. 4. Th.; NEANDER, Eocl. Hist.; GRÜNER, K.-Gesch.; KURTZ, Handb. d. K.-Gesch.

His Archd. Cæcilian would, according to the rule, have been his successor; and the moderate party desired he should be. But as he had actively sided with M., the rigorists unanimously opposed him. They were headed by a distinguished woman, Lucilla, whom Cæcilian had once reproved for publicly kissing the bone of a reputed martyr. It was feared that at a general Synod the rigorists would prevail. The other party tried to forestall this, and too precipitately elected C. They had designedly not awaited the arrival of the Numidian Bishops, nor asked the Numidian Primate to consecrate C., but obtained the service of Felix, of Aptunga. As Felix was considered a traditor, the election gave superfluous offence. Soon after, Secundus, with 70 Bishops, among whom Donatus, of Casa Nigra, was most prominent, arrived at Carthage and claimed his prerogative. A Synod was called, and Cæcilian required to answer the charges of allowing himself to be irregularly elected and consecrated. He declined to appear, and was deprived of his dignity and excommunicated;—the chief reason for this assigned by his enemies was, that he had accepted consecration from a traditor. The lector Majorinus was, at Lucilla's recommendation, chosen in C.'s place; and after his death, 313, Donatus became B. of Carthage. Thus there were two Bishops for the one See, each with his party. But as this schism was caused by a prevailing diversity of views, it soon spread over the whole of N. Africa. Beyond Africa Cæcilian was almost generally considered the regular Bishop, and the opposite party as schismatic, at first designated pars Majorini, then pars Donati, hence called Donatists, or as the party itself suggested, Donatiani. Most of those who resided in the country districts, and a large number of Bishops joined the party of Donatus, so that it was widely spread, and hated, when Constantine, 313, testified his regard for the African C. in an edict; but the Donatists were expressly excluded from the imperial favor. They immediately solicited an investigation of their charges against Cæcilian. Constantine, accordingly, appointed a commission of five Gallic Bishops, with Melchiades, B. of Rome, at their head. This commission invited C., and ten African Bishops of each party, before them. Donatus was the leader of his party, but all his skill could not prevent a decision in favor of Cæcilian. D. was deposed. His adherents were allowed to retain their offices and dignities, if they would return to the Church. Those condemned complained to Constantine of the partiality of the decision, and begged a more thorough investigation. Their request was granted; commissaries were again sent to Carthage; but they found no reasons for considering Felix, of Aptunga, a traditor. A Synod convened, 314, in Arles, also decided in favor of Cæcilian, and further decreed that the validity of a sacramental act did not depend upon the worthiness of the official who performed it. The Donatists could not, of course, rest with this decree, and rashly appealed to the Emperor. Constantine was amazed and offended at the presumption of such an appeal to him, a heathen. But he soon resolved to admit the appeal, cited

Cæcilian and his accusers to meet him at Milan, 316, and there, after a brief process, condemned the latter for slander. Further resistance would now be an offence against the Imperial Majesty. But what would assuage the embittered feelings of the Donatists? D. found it easy to excite his followers against their temporal ruler. It was speedily resolved that the Emperor had no eccl. authority; and though they had sought his interference, the question was raised, which has not yet been fully settled: quid imperatori est cum ecclesia? Constantine replied with severe penalties. The Donatist Bishops were banished; their churches were taken from them. This only increased opposition and fanaticism. Thereupon Constantine wisely resolved, 321, to inform them once more of his displeasure, but then leave them to the judgment of God, stop persecution, and admonish the Catholics to exercise patience and forbearance. This measure at first, of course neither shamed, won, nor weakened the Donatists. At a Synod of 330 no less than 270 of their Bishops were assembled. But the continued ignoring of them on the part of the State would soon have put an end to the schism. Unfortunately the sons of Constantine did not inherit his wisdom. Constans revived, it seems, severer measures against the Donatists, and immediately dangerous manifestations appeared. Africa was then infected by a species of asceticism, of whom coenobitism subsequently freed the Church. Having no fixed abode, and no regular mode of life, they went begging through the land. They called themselves milites Christi and Agonistici; others styled them, Circumcelliones. Their numbers were greatly swollen by farmers, who had lost their possessions through taxation, or political agitations, and slaves who had cast off their yokes. The movement thus acquired a socialistic character. Much was said of freedom and fraternization; masters were compelled to do menial service; murder, arson, and robberies were frequent. With all this the Circumcelliones maintained their asceticism, became insane fanatics, and often sought the martyr's crown. But their fanaticism had points of agreement with the zeal of the Donatists, many of whom joined the Circumcelliones in their revolutionary movements. Such were called Montenses, Campitæ, Rupitæ. In 345 Taurinus was sent out to exterminate these fanatics. He succeeded in restoring order. During the same year Cæcilian died, and an opportunity seemed to offer for healing the schism. But the Donatists, despite their numerical strength, were too much despised by Church and State to allow of the recognition of their Bishop of Carthage, or any compromise with him and his party. Gratus was chosen as C.'s successor, and thus the episcopal duality continued in Carthage, and in nearly all the towns of N. Africa. The Donatists, being mostly composed of the poorer portion of the congregations, found themselves straitened. Constans took advantage of their circumstances, and sent (348) Paulus and Macarius to Africa to win them by bribes and promises. Donatus, of Casa Nigra, denounced the scheme, whilst Donatus, B. of Bajai, led a body of armed Circumcelliones against those who executed it. This was the signal of new disturbances, which, however, were soon quelled by force. Donatus, of B., and others were condemned to death, whilst D., of Casa N., was banished, and the Donatist churches were locked or taken from them. Matters did not change until Julian's time. It was Julian's policy against Christianity to revive old Church feuds and bind the hands of the Catholic C. against heretics and schismatics. He restored to the Donatists their churches, and reinstated the exiled Bishops. Meanwhile Donatus died, but to perpetuate the schism Julian had Parmenianus elected successor, and escorted into Carthage by imperial soldiers. The liberated Donatists naturally ran into extremes, and perpetrated various acts of violence against the Catholics. But they were soon again vanquished, intellectually by the Church, politically by the State. The work of Optatus, of Mileve, upon the Donatist schism, was written about 368, and directed against a partizan account issued by Parmenianus. In 373, 375, Valent. I. and Gratian issued severe edicts against the Donatists, and allowed violent measures to be used against the Circumcelliones. Until the close of the 4th cent. the schismatics had maintained a regular, though not very harmonious, life. They produced some poets who prepared metrical versions of the Psalms, for public devotions, and wrote hymns in which Donatist doctrines were set forth and praised. It was, indeed, usual for heretics to popularize their views in this way. But as the Church also soon composed and introduced hymns, the Donatists may have adopted this measure from a proper sense of the wants of the people, and desire to use their talents in a worthy way. Augustine subsequently composed a hymn, contra partem Donati. The Donatists also cultivated science. The grammarian Tychonius distinguished himself by his learning. He wrote: Regulas septem ad investigandum intelligentiam SS. (GALLANDI, T. VIII.), and a history of the doctrine of the Church, which he represented as a corpus Domini bipartitum. He also rejected the Novatian views of the Donatists, and opposed the rebaptism of those whom the Catholic clergy had baptized. Many shared his sentiments. This gave rise to violently hostile sects among them. The Claudians were, probably, one of them; certainly the Rogatians, so-called after Rogatus, B. of Carthage (370). Parmenian was succeeded by Primianus, a moderate man. He had conflicts with the rigoristic party, headed by the deacon Maximianus, whom he even ventured to excommunicate. This incited a Synod of Rigorists to elect M. in place of Primianus, so that there were three Bishops in Carthage, despite the recognition of P., and reiteration of M.'s excommunication by a Donatist Synod at Bajai. This was their distracted state in 400, when the most energetic attacks were made upon them. But these assaults served once more to unite, purify, and strengthen them, so that they passed through the struggle with credit, although not without severe losses, and deadly wounds. Augustine, B. of Hippo, finding himself cramped and annoyed by a respectable Donatist congregation, began, about the time just named, to preach and write against the heresy, and resolved to secure the credit of their reunion with the Church. But as the Donatists shunned debate with him, to avoid the shame of a defeat, A. roused the entire African Church against them. Several Synods tried to effect a reconciliation. But few were won over. Others became more violent than ever, and the Circumcelliones revived. Earlier fanatical scenes were re-enacted, and it is not surprising that the Catholics desired to retort, and called for the extermination of the heresy. Whilst Augustine hoped to succeed by other means, he discarded the interference of temporal power, but at length he gave form to the wishes of his more violent colleagues in the command: coge intrare in ecclesiam (Luke 14: 23). In 405 a Synod of Carthage requested the Emperor Honorius to issue penal laws against the Donatists. Severe measures were adopted. Laymen were fined, the clergy banished, the churches alienated. Honorius soon repented having multiplied the enemies of the sinking empire, and issued, 409, an edict of toleration. But this exasperated the more numerous Catholics of Africa, and he was constrained to annul the edict. The Donatists were now compelled to hold a disputation with the Catholics, which should decide their fate. The Collatio cum Donatistis, held in Carthage, 411, was attended by 286 Catholic and 279 Donatist Bishops; Augustine and Aurelius were the leaders of the former, Primianus and Petilianus of the latter. For three days they debated whether Felix was a traditor, and whether the Church ceased to be the true Church by tolerating mortal sins. Marcellianus, the imperial commissioner, declared the Catholics victors. An appeal was made to the Emperor, who confirmed the previous decision, and threatened the refractory with banishment and confiscation. In 414, the Donatists were deprived of all civil privileges; in 415 they were forbid holding assemblies on pain of death. Still they survived, until they, with the Catholics, were decimated by the Vandals, and perished, in the 7th cent., by the swords of the Saracens.

A. VOGEL.*

Donus I., or Domnus, a Roman by birth, chosen Bishop in 676, died 678. He beautified some of the churches of Rome, and reduced the Archbishopric of Ravenna to submission to Rome. — II., a Roman of the Tuscan party, a peaceable man, chosen B. of Rome in 974, and died the same year.

Dor, a royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. 11: 2; 12: 23) lying within the borders of Asher, but assigned to Manasseh (Josh 17: 11; 1 Chron. 7: 29). It was not immediately taken (Judges 1: 17), and first occurs as an Israelitish town in 1 Kings 4: 11. From 1 Mac. 15: 11-14, 25 (see Jos. Ant. XIII., 7, 2, and Antiochus VII), we learn that it was then besieged by Antiochus Sidetes; it was subsequently stormed by Pompey (Jos. Ant., XIV., 4, 4), restored by the Roman general Gabinus, and furnished with a harbor (Jos. Ant., 5, 3). It early became an episcopal See, but at the time of Jerome was lying waste, about nine Roman miles from Cæsarea, on the road to Ptolemais (HIERON., Onom.), with extensive ruins (HIERON., in Epitaph. Paulæ. Opp., IV., 673: mirata ruinas Dor urbis quondam potentissimæ). It must have been afterwards rebuilt, for during the Crusades it was the seat of a Bishop under the Archb. of Cæsarea. When ancient writers call the place a small town, they allude to the small Phœnician settlement of the seaport Dor or Dora, which Stephan Byzant., following Claudius Julius, describes (s. v. Δωρος p. 113, ed. Westerm.) Pliny (Hist. Nat., V., 17) calls it Dorum, and places it in Phœnicia. Upon the Tab. Peut. Segm., IX., F., it is called Thora, and located 56 miles from Cæsarea. The present Tantûra, (Tartûra, Dandôra), is about 8 miles N. of C., with a harbor for large ships, and a miserable Khan, a short distance N. of which some ancient and mediæval ruins are found—no doubt the remains of Dor.—(See D'ARVIEUX, Nachrichten, II., 11, 12; POCOCKE, II., 85; BUCKINGHAM'S Travels, I., 102; RELAND, Palest., 738–41; BACHIENE, Pal., II., 3, p. 261, &c.; RAUMER, Pal.; ROSEN-MÜLLER, Alterthumsk., II., 2, p. 323; RITTER, Geogr., XVI., 1, p. 608, &c). ARNOLD.*

Dorothea, the Calender St., was a native of Cappadocia, whose martyrdom is adorned by SURIUS, de probatis SS. vitis, with all sorts of fabulous incidents.—Her namesake was a Prussian peasant girl, who, after having lived in matrimony, in Danzig, until her 44th year, and borne nine children, devoted herself to a solitary ascetic life, and, after 1394, occupied a cell in the cathedral at Marienwerder, where she lived according to a rule professedly received from the Lord.—The common people regarded her as the Patron St. of Prussia. ANON.*

Dort, the Synod of.—After the various ecclesiastical, national, and political parties of the Netherlands had been reduced, in the beginning of the 17th cent., to two parties, the Armenians, (see Art.) or Remonstrants and Contraremonstrants, defined their opposition in such a manner that the latter represented predestinarian, deterministic Calvinism and the idea of eccl. autonomy and vigor, whilst the former represented the idea of a national Church, and acknowledged no creed but one which set forth doctrines in Biblical simplicity, or had an immediate bearing upon religious experience and practice (see DR. EBRARD in the Ref. K.-Zeitung, 1853, Nr. 21).—At the head of the Armenian party stood Simon Episcopius (see Art.), John v. Oldenbarneveld, and the learned statesman and syndic of Rotterdam, Hugo de Groot. The chief of the other party was Prince Moritz, of Orange. The political contest of the parties began when Oldenbarneveld and Groot effected, 1609, a 12 years' armistice with Spain, against the wishes of Moritz. Forthwith the cry was raised that the country had been betrayed, and the Armenians were accused of having brought about the armistice. Soon the conviction spread through Zeeland, Friesland, Gröningen, and Guelderland, that the Armenian party, as dangerous to the State, should be rendered harmless by a common act of the confederacy, and that to this end a national Synod should be called. In almost all the towns of the country both parties got up menacing gatherings, and wild excitement, and the safety of the State required that the strife should be speedily quelled. But Holland, Utrecht, and Overissel, where the Armenians predominated, so decidedly opposed the demands of the Orange party, that the States-General could secure a national synod only by the apprehension of Oldenbarneveld, Grotius, and Hogerbeets. At length, Nov. 11, 1617, they resolved to call a synod for the adjustment of the dissensions agitating the Netherland Church. This was not to be a Reformed General Synod, or a council of all the Reformed Churches of the country, but a National Synod, i. e. an assembly of all who represented the Netherland Church, to confer upon the interests of that Church, and only incidentally a representation of the collective Reformed C. The States-General did not contemplate to secure by this synod an action which should fix and regulate the unity and connection of the Netherland Reformed Churches. Hence, all the Reformed C. of Germany (Anhalt excepted, which was not thought sufficiently orthodox), Switzerland, Scotland, and England, were invited to attend the Synod, in order that, by their associated counsel, they might assist in restoring peace. Many of the foreign Churches sent no delegates; none were present from Brandenburg or France; Louis XIII. had forbid the French clergy to attend. And yet the Synod of Dort was one of the largest Ref. synods ever held. There were 28 theologians, or other deputies, present from the Palatinate, Hesse, Switzerland, Nassau, East Friesland, Bremen, England, and Scotland; from the Netherlands, of course, there were many more, including 5 professors, 36 clergymen, and 20 elders. The members of the Synod were all Contra-remonstrants; the Armenians were admitted only as an accused party, to answer to charges pending against them.

The Synod was opened on Nov. 13 (3), 1618, at 8 A. M., by public worship in the great church of Dort; pastor Lydius preached. The Synod was then constituted with prayer. At the second session, John Bogermann, minister of Leuwarden, was elected president. Two other clergymen were chosen as his counsellors, and two others as secretaries. At the third session, the deputies presented their credentials, and at the fourth, it was resolved that Episcopius of Leyden, and twelve other Remonstrants from different parts of the country, should be invited to state and defend their views before the Synod within 14 days after receiving the citation; meanwhile, the theologians of the Synod were requested to prepare themselves to refute the Armenian errors. At the fifth session, a form of citation was adopted, and, during the next 17 sessions, various matters were acted upon. A new Holland version of the Bible was determined upon, and a committee appointed for the purpose. Rules were adopted regarding regular catechization and sermons upon the catechism, and instructions for Holland missionaries in the E. Indies, touching the baptism of the children of heathen parents; rules for restraining the press were also discussed.

At length, at the 22d session, Episcopius and the others cited appeared. E. handed over to the foreign theologians an extended apology of his doctrine, and defended the same so frankly and decidedly, that the Synod, which saw in this course only the audacity of a heretic, reminded him that it would become one cited as an offender to show more modesty. It was especially offensive that he boldly called the Synod a schismatic assembly. The Remonstrants were also urged to present fuller expositions of their five articles. Thus began a discussion, continued through many sessions, which resulted in the exclusion from the Synod of the Remonstrants, as proven liars and deceivers (at the 57th s., Jan. 14, 1619). But the discussions also showed less agreement among the orthodox in their positive views, than in their opposition to Armenianism. The question, num secundum Eph. 1 : 4, Christus fundamentum electionis sit, called forth violent debates, the German Reformed and Anglican members affirming it, whilst others, insisting upon absolute predestination, denied it; so that when several commissions, appointed at the 73d s., convened to draw up general results, they found it almost impossible to harmonize the various views upon election into one formula. The Canones Synodici, however, adopted and signed at the 136th s., April 23, though not endorsing supralapsarianism, decidedly laud predestinarianism. — Apart from various special matters, it now remained for the Synod to fix penalties upon the convicted Remonstrants. Here again the Hessians and Anglicans interfered, declaring they would not assent to personal penalties. All the other members approved of the censure proposed by the President, viz., that the Remonstrants, as disturbers of the Church and blasphemers, should be excluded from all eccl. offices, and that the provincial synods, classes, and presbyteries, should execute this sentence. The Heidelberg Catechism and Belgic Conf. were then unanimously declared orthodox, and in full harmony with the Word of God. During the 144th s. the Synod went into the great church, where the Canons touching the five articles and the censure against the Remonstrants were read in Latin, before a vast assemblage. The Synod closed with the 154th s., May 9 (April 29), after which the magistracy of Dort gave a brilliant entertainment.

Whether contemplated prospectively or retrospectively, the canons of Dort possess the same significance for the Calvinistic Reformed C. which the Form of Concord possesses for the German Protestant C. In both cases, the back was turned upon union compromises; the former did this, especially, by adopting extreme determinism and predestinarianism. Hence, the Ger. Ref. theologians, particularly those of Bremen and Hessa, not only expressed their dissent from the Dort doctrine of election, but subsequently impugned the authority of the Synod. Dr. Martinius, of Bremen, long afterwards, exclaimed "O Dort, O Dort, would God I had never seen thee!" — Of course Armenianism in the Calvinistic C. must not be identified with Melancthonianism, which was the true and complete exponent of the Augustana, 1540, and its various repetitions, 1551, whilst Armenianism was but a perverse exhibition of the Reformed faith, as set forth in the Conf. Helvetica, II., and soon declined into semi-Pelagianism, and other anti-churchly errors. It cannot be shown that the Synod really foresaw, and hence condemned, the perilous errors concealed in Armenianism. The adoption of those Canones, therefore, must be considered as that act by which the Church of Holland renounced the evangelical unionism and Philipism of the Conf. Helvet., and fixed its high and rigid predestinarianism. For they do not contain the clear and sharply defined supralapsarianism of Calvin's Institutes, or the Cons. Genevensis, but rather, amid all the formulas sounding like supralaps., a badly-concealed infralapsarianism, which does not venture to utter the inmost and deepest thoughts of Calvin's system. — A cheering act among the decisions of the Synod, was the recognition of the Heidelberg Catechism as the symbol of the entire Reformed C. This formed a conservative offset to the otherwise one-sided position taken by the Synod. The acts of the Synod were publ. officially at Dort, and also by the Remonstrants at Harderwick, in 1620, 4to. — (See J. HALESI hist. Cons. Dord.; J. L. MOSHEMUS verit., variis observ. et vita Halesii auxil.: Hamb. 1724; the reports of the Scotch theologian, Balcanquhallas; H. HEPPE, hist. syn. nation. Dord. in NIEDNER's Ztschr. für d. hist. Theol. 1853, p. 227-37.) H. HEPPE.*

Dositheus, a Samaritan false Messiah, and founder of a sect, of whom less is known with certainty than of Simon Magus and Menander. His history is obscured by his being often confounded with an earlier person of that name. The priest mentioned in 2 K. 17 : 27, 28, is also said to have been called Dosthai (cf. DRUSIUS, de tribus sectis Jud. III. 4), the teacher of Sadock, the founder of the Sadducees. The fathers wrongly represent him, as they do Simon, as the founder of a Christian sect. He is rather a Samaritan false Christ. The opinion that he apostatized from Judaism to the Samaritans is probably based upon the confounding of him with the older D. (cf. EPIPH. Hær. XIII.). ORIGEN calls him a Samaritan (c. Cels. I. p. 44; VI. p. 282, ed. Spencer). He probably appeared contemporaneously with Christ, or soon after him, as about that time the Samaritans were earnestly expecting the promised prophet (Deut. 18 : 18), whom D. pretended to be; he also proclaimed himself the son of God (c. Cels. VI. 282; I. 44: καὶ μετὰ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ δὲ χρόνους ἠδέλησε καὶ ὁ Σαμαρεὺς Δοσίθεος πείσαι Σαμαρείτας ὅτι αὐτὸς εἴη ὁ προφητευόμενος ὑπὸ Μωσέως Χριστός). His doctrines hardly differed much from those common among the Samaritans, but cannot be precisely ascertained. But from EPIPH. Hær. XIII. we learn that he pressed the literal observance of the law of the Sabbath (comp. ORIG. de princip. VI. 17; Philocal. c. 1). He died of hunger whilst fasting in a cave (EPIPH. Hær. XIII.). His adherents, few in number, at Origen's time not more than 30, continued until the 6th cent. In 588, Dositheans and Samaritans disputed about Deut. 18 : 18 (cf. PUOTIUS, Biblioth. cod. 230). The statements of the pseudo-Clementines (cf. Homil. I. 24; Recogn. II. 8, &c.) are either traditions or inventions. — (WALCH, Hist. d. Ketzer. I. 182-5; MOSHEIM, Instit. Hist. Chr. maj. Sæc. I. 376-389; De rebus Chr. ante Constant. M. 188, &c.; GIESLER, Eccl. Hist.) G. UHLHORN.*

Doxology (δοξολογία, glorificatio). 1. The Major doxology, or Gloria in excelsis, also Angelic hymn, consisted originally of the few words found in Luke 2 : 14. The form in the Western

C. was "Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis." These original 'imple forms were early amplified, it is not certainly known when, or by whom, though there is great probability that Hilary of Poitiers († 368) was the author. As early as the 5th cent. it had acquired its present form.¹ At the same time, there were many who opposed these additions, even as late as the 7th cent. But the 4th Council of Toledo (633) sanctioned the amplifications (can. 13). Indeed, all kinds of additions were allowed, especially on festival days.²—As a rule, the Gloria was sung, 1) On all Sundays, excepting during Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter; 2) on all festivals, excepting on the Holy Innocents, unless this falls on a Sunday; 3) at all votive masses to Mary, the saints, and angels; 4) at the Epiphany, Ascension, and Whitsuntide vigils. Of course, it is never used on mournful occasions. The Lutheran C. retained the Romish use of the Gloria, even in Latin, until towards the close of the 16th cent. a German translation was introduced. — The position of the Gloria, between the Confession and Kyrie El., and the Scripture lesson, was determined by its liturgical significance. In the ancient, especially the Oriental, Church, public worship assumed the form of a symbolical, liturgical drama, designed to represent the work of redemption, from the birth to the ascension of Christ; the confession of sin and Kyrie El., therefore, were intended to set forth the ante-Christian age, and its longings after the promised Redeemer. Hence, the Gloria celebrated his birth, and after it followed the lessons, as an exhibition of his prophetic office. The Romish, and then the Lutheran, C. followed this example, whilst the Reformed C. purposely departed from it, omitting the Gloria in the regular liturgical service. Even the Anglican C., though frequently using it, gives it no place in the regular morning and evening prayer, but only in the post-communion service, where it answers to a second thanksgiving prayer.

2. The Minor Doxology consisted originally of the simple formula: "Gloria Patri et Filio et Spiritui sancto in sæcula sæculorum. Amen." (Greek: δόξα πατρὶ καὶ υἱῷ καὶ ἁγίῳ πνεύματι καὶ νῦν καὶ ἀεὶ καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας (ATHANAS. de virgin. II. 218, Paris.) During the Arian controversies, it was left optional to use "in the Son and the H. G.," or "through the Son, in the H. G.," for the usual formula; but subsequently these variations were declared heretical, and, to preclude all Arian evasions, there was added, "sicut erat in principio et nunc et semper et in sæcula sæculorum," (see Conc. Varense, II. c. 5). — Another amplification, recommended by the 4th Council of Toledo: "Gloria et honor Patri" (comp. Ps. 28 : 2; Rev. 5 : 13), was adopted only by the Spanish churches. Anciently the Minor Dox. was sung at the conclusion of a psalm, said or sung. The priest pronounced Gloria Patri, &c., and the congregation responded, Sicut erat, &c. The expressions of praise, &c., at the conclusion of prayers, &c., as often found in the N. T. (Rom. 16 : 27, &c.), are called doxologies, especially the closing words of the Lord's prayer (Matt. 6 : 13). H. A.*

Dragon. The apocryphal account of Bel and the Dragon (LXX. Dan. 14) relates that, under the reign of Cyrus, a living serpent (δράκων) was kept and worshipped in the great temple of Bel, in Babylon. Modern critics question the entire narrative, because, 1) the Babylonians did not worship animals, but stars; 2) what Diod. Sic. (II. 9) relates of silver serpents in the temple of Belus refers to symbols, not to the worship of living animals. Hence the inference that Alexandrian Jews erroneously transferred, in the legend underlying the above account, the Egyptian animal worship to the Babylonians (thus EICHORN, WINER, &c.). — But that such a serpent worship existed in Babylon is less improbable than the assumed ignorance of the Alexandrian Jews. We believe that the tradition or myth is linked with actual facts. Among all ancient nations, not excepting Greece and Italy, not only animals, but especially serpents, were worshipped (see J. G. MÜLLER, Monogr. über d. Mexican. Nationalgott, &c., p. 12, 41, &c.). Thus of the two near the temple of Apollo, in Epirus, from which tradition derives the Delphic Python (see ÆLIANI, Hist. Anim. XI. 2). A soothsaying serpent was also worshipped in Lavinium (Lanuvium? Cf. ÆLIANI, l. c.; PROPERT. IV. 18; PLUTARCH'S Parall. minora, § 14). Roman vestals also had their chastity tested by an oracle of living serpents (TERTULL. ad uxor. I. 6; PAUL. NOLAN in Murat. anecd. I. 133). Sacred serpents were kept in the temple of Jupiter, Thebes (HEROD. II. 74), and were worshipped as household gods (ÆLIAN. l. c. 17, 22) If Greeks and Romans, who, more than others, converted the ancient animal worship into mere symbols, retained so many living instances of it, why should the tradition of Bel and the Dragon be incredible? It is well known that fish worship was common among all the Shemites (see Atargetis, Dagon). Indeed, Philo of Biblos (44, 46, 48) derives the serpent worship of other nations from the Phœnician Taut, who introduced it to them. Moreover, the worship of stars and that of animals are so far from excluding each other, that they are usually found side by side, or even combined. This parallelism is found everywhere, in representations of the transmigration of souls through animals and stars, and in astronomical myths, in which animals and animal metamorphoses play a part. As to Babylon, we conclude, not only from the statement of Diodorus, but from many others, that a serpent cultus existed there, of which the living dragon in Dan. 14 (LXX.) was a relic. Thus Alexander M. found a serapeum in Babylon (ARRIANI, exped. VII. 26; MOVERS, I. 535). It is also obvious, from Philo of Biblos, 48, that the Persians adopted this cultus in Babylon, worshipping serpents as gods, and the creators of all things. The use of animal symbols among the Hebrews does not disprove our theory; for even the Hebrew symbols point to a primitive animal cultus, if not among the Hebrews, still among their heathen neighbors. The Hebrews, in the outward exhibition of their cultus, borrowed many things from heathen which did not grow naturally out of their monotheism. The peril attending this is illustrated by the worship of the golden calf and brazen serpent.

¹ "Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis. Laudamus te: benedicimus te: adoramus te: glorificamus te: gratias agimus tibi propter magnam gloriam tuam. Domine Deus, rex cælestis, Deus Pater omnipotens: Domine, Fili unigenite, Jesu Christe, Domine Deus, agnus Dei, Filius Patris, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis: Qui tollis peccata mundi, suscipe deprecationem nostram: Qui sedes ad dexteram Patris, miserere nobis: Quoniam tu solus sanctus, tu solus Dominus, tu solus altissimus, Jesu Christe, cum Sancto Spiritu in gloria Dei Patris. Amen." The following, with some variations, is the Greek text (Constit. VII. 47): Δόξα ἐν ὑψίστοις θεῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς ἐιρήνῃ, ἐν ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκία. Αἰνοῦμέν σε, ἡμνοῦμέν σε, προσκυνοῦμέν σε διὰ τοῦ μεγάλου ἀρχιερέως, σε, τὸν ὄντα θεόν, ἀγέννητον ἕνα, ἀπόστολον μένον διὰ τὴν μεγάλην σου δόξαν· κύριε βασιλεῦ ἱεραρχεῖς, δεῖ πάτερ παντοκράτωρ· κύριε, ὁ θεὸς ὁ πατὴρ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, τοῦ ἀμώμου ἀμνοῦ, ὃς αἴρει τὴν ἁμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου· πρόσδεξιαι τὴν δέησιν ἡμῶν. ὁ καθήμενος ἐπὶ τῶν Χερουβὶμ· ὅτι σὺ μόνος ἅγιος, σὺ μόνος κύριος. Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς, τοῦ θεοῦ πάσης γεννητὴς φύσεως, τοῦ βασιλέως ἡμῶν· δι' οὗ σοὶ δόξα, τιμὴ καὶ σέβας. Ἀμήν.

² Thus one for the festival of the consecr. of a Church was, according to BONA (rer. liturg. I. 2, 4), GLORIA IN EXCELSIS DEO, quem cires cælestes sunctum clamantes laude frequentant, ET IN TERRA PAX, quam ministri Domini verbo incarnati terrenis promiserunt HOMINIBUS BONÆ VOLUNTATIS, &c. And, at the festivals of Mary, after "Quoniam tu solus sanctus," they inserted "Mariam sanctificans;" after "tu solus Dominus"—" Mariam gubernans;" and after "tu solus altissimus"—" Mariam coronans."

J. G. MÜLLER.*

Dräseke, John H., Bishop, was born, Jan. 18, 1774, at Brunswick. His father, a subaltern, could give little attention to his training: but his pious mother he cherished in grateful remembrance. In 1792 he went to the university of Helmstädt, at which the strictly rationalistic but highly gifted Hencke was at that time the ruling spirit. D., however, was less attracted by the positive doctrines of rationalism than by the humanistic atmosphere which it helped to create. It was the period of an enthusiastic cultivation of dramatic literature. Humanistic studies were pursued with fondness, by theologians even, and D. gave himself up to the new tendency of literature, viz. the drama, with an enthusiastic eagerness. At this time he wrote a play, which was performed at Brunswick. After 1817 appeared his work, "das Heilige auf der Bühne," in which he defends the use of religious subjects upon the stage. In his 21st year he was called as deacon to the town of Mölln; became the chief pastor three years after; and, in 1804, became pastor at Ratzeburg. Here he published his "Predigt. für denkende Verehr. Jes.," 1804-12, 5 vols., and his Glaube, Liebe u. Hoffnung. Here also his patriotic sermons made such a stir among his French enemies, that a detachment was sent to seize him. He escaped by flight, but his house was plundered. — In 1814 he was called to a larger sphere, to Bremen. The leading families of this city were accustomed in every manner to patronize a clergyman who pleased them, and to pay court to any one of marked superiority. This his present position may have fostered in him his peculiar weakness, vanity. His best works belong to this period: "Predigt. über Deutschl. Wiedergeb." 3 vols. 1814; "Predigt.-Entw. über freie Texte," 2 vols. 1815; "über d. letzt. Schicks. uns. Herrn," 2 vols. 1816; "über frei gewähl. Abschn. d. heil. Schr." 4 vols. 1817-18; "Christ. a. d. Geschl.

dies. Zeit," 1819; "Gemäld. aus d. h. Schrift," 4 Samml. 1821-28; "Vom Reich Gottes. Betracht. nach d. h. Schr." 3 vols. 1830. Filled with the grand patriotic hopes of his age, D.'s sermons, from his entrance upon his new sphere, were largely devoted to the reformation of the state; his "Predigt. üb. Deutschl. Wiedergeb." are given entirely to this theme. His views and principles, with his bold language, could not long escape notice. The Bundestag ordered the senate either to prevent such political sermons, or to remove the preacher. D. was silenced. — After the death of Westermeyer (†1832), Bish. of the province of Saxony, D. was appointed to that post by Fr. William III. In his new sphere he gained that importance which will hand down his name in the history of the Prussian Church to posterity. In the present century, and perhaps for centuries past, no church prince has arisen to whom so large a measure of admiration has been awarded — an admiration extending from the King to the lowest subject. Though his eloquence was the chief cause of this, yet his freedom from party preferences, his humane disposition, and his imposing outward appearance, also lent their weight. Rationalism was on the decline, and a longing was springing up for Christ and Christianity. Few, however, were yet willing to bear the reproach attached to the name of pietist. But a Bishop now arose who gave an enthusiastic testimony in favor of the Gospel, and yet stood in the most friendly relations to those against whom pietism was contending, as enemies of Christ. The demands of the Gospel, also, from his lips were so mild and liberal, so far from pietistic rigorism. No wonder that on these conditions so many attached themselves to the new brilliant meteor. Amid this general applause, this blaze of glory, the Bishop passed through the cities and villages of the Saxon provinces, preaching at one time to rural congregations, at another time in the royal chapel at Berlin, up to 1840, in which year he was forced into a party position, by which the hidden foe was called to light. Sintenis, a rationalist pastor, had, in a newspaper article, pronounced prayer unto Christ to be a superstition. The heart of D. spoke out against him. But the Bishop also could not be silent, and, in the name of the Consistory, laid a retraction before the offender. The latter refusing, D. pronounced upon him the episcopal sentence of deposition. But the supreme shepherd was not sustained by the authorities, and hence the prosecution, commenced so energetically, ended in a tame warning. This only increased the boldness and rage of the enemy. The long-restrained spite of Rationalism found a vent in the pseudonyme work of König, pastor at Anderbeck: "Der Bish. Dräs. u. sein achtjähr. Wirk. im preuss. Staat," 1840. The labors of D. are here reviewed with the envenomed criticism peculiar to the rationalism of those times, and from a mere business point of view: the spirit of these labors was wholly forgotten, whilst his personal weaknesses and derelictions in official routine were visited with the most biting sarcasm. Against an attack of this kind, D., who had long been accustomed to admiration, had no weapons. He was wounded to the quick. From this time he desired a discharge from his office, which, though several times refused by the king, was obtained in 1843. He was dismissed with his full salary, and directed to live at Potsdam, in the immediate vicinity of the King. Here he applied himself to study, and at times preached also before the monarch. He died Dec. 8, 1849.—As a theologian, D. held, up to the third decade of his life, the position of the humanism of Herder, with a Pelagian basis. He regards Christianity as the manifestation of the truly human. Having no apprehension of sin, his sermons are silent on repentance. He speaks often of the abstract ideals of "light, power, truth." Christ, however, appears with him more distinctly personal than with Herder, though it is only as the "adored master," the "divine sufferer." In his "Predigt. üb. d. Reich G." his views of Christianity become deeper and more positive, and he even teaches the personality of Satan. His positive confessions become still more energetic in his Magdeburg sermons. But, measured by the orthodoxy of the Church, he falls short, even in his latest productions. He knows no other bond for the unity of Christians than the Scriptures, and, hence, declares himself against human creeds and confessions. This became afterwards a point of attack by his enemies.—Of D. as an orator, there can be but one opinion—that he belongs to the first pulpit orators of Germany. His earliest sermons lack a popular vein, for he wishes to address "thinking admirers of Jesus," and has always the higher classes in view. His subsequent sermons became more and more plain and adapted to the people. They are full of imagination, though there is no redundancy of it. He acquired that language which at once charms the educated, and speaks to the heart of the illiterate. In the division of his theme he was systematic. But in his later sermons there are also some things wholly out of taste, such as dwelling on the etymology of the names of distinguished persons, or of places where he preached. In this the great orator allowed himself to be misled by a desire for piquancy.—(See "Dräseke als geistl. Redner," Hallische, Jahrb. 1838; "Blätter für liter. Unterh." 1851, No. 133, etc.

THOLUCK. — Reinecke.

Drogo, B. of Metz, b. 807, the fifth son of Charlemagne, was at first devoted to the priesthood against his will by Louis the Pious, but subsequently freely chose the profession. After filling several inferior offices, he was invested with the archiepiscopal title, and the dignity of a papal Legate. He was drowned on a fishing excursion, in 835.

HERZOG.*

Drost of Vischering, Clem. Aug., Baron, Archb. of Cologne, b. at Vorhelm, Jan. 22, 1773, and educated for the priesthood, at Münster, where he was consecrated a priest in 1797. He was active in the discharge of his duties, and exhibited special interest in the benevolent institutions of the diocese. He belonged, furthermore, to the circle of which the Princess Galitzin was the centre. In 1806 the Chapter, sede vacante, elected him General-Vicar in Fürstenberg's place, but he retired again in 1813, owing to political agitation. The Pope, however, not approving of this step, he resumed the post in 1815.—After the Rhinish-Westphalian provinces were acquired by the crown of Prussia, that government sought to extend its educational system over those provinces. This brought Drost into opposition to the State, and also to Hermes, who favored the measures, and accepted a call to the university of Bonn, recently established by the government. Another occasion of conflict arose in the new laws enacted, concerning mixed marriages, which placed the Evangelical C. on an equal footing with the Romish C. Drost zealously strove for what he believed to be the rights and interests of his Church, and maintained the conflict to the last. He was a man of high integrity and distinguished for the ability with which he labored to defend the principles of the Romish C. in reference to the points involved in his controversy with the Prussian government. His zeal and services were also appreciated at Rome. The Pope thrice offered him a cardinal's hat, but he always declined the honor. He died Oct. 19, 1845.—(See "Ueber d. kölnische Angelegenheit, von IRENÄUS (Gieseler), Lpz. 1838; cf. articles Hermes and Marriage (mixed m.) ANON.*

Druses (also Druzes) a brave people, who with the so-called Maronites inhabit Mt. Lebanon. Their religion is a bastard offshoot of Islam. Concerning their origin opinions vary, but the most probable one is, that like their neighbors, the Maronites, they are mostly descended from the ancient Syrians, with an occasional intermixture of foreigners, especially Arabs. Although some of the Crusaders settled in this region, the assertion, that they are the descendants of the French colony of a Count Dreux, is a sheer fancy. The territory of the Druses, which belongs to the Ottoman Pashalik of 'Akka, embraces the extreme western slope of Lebanon, with nearly the whole of Anti-Lebanon, and extends N. and S. from Beirût to Sûr (Tyre) and W. and E. from the Mediterranean to Damascus. The residence of the political chief, the Grand Emîr, is at Deir el-Kamar (convent of the moon) in the province of Schuf, whilst the spiritual head, the Sheikh of the Initiated (Sheikh el-Okkâl or el-Okul), has his palace elsewhere, but comes frequently hither. In Haurân (Gr. Auranitis), east of Palestine, the Druses have greatly increased in modern times; a few also are found around Safed, in Palestine proper. It is said too that some yet exist in Egypt, where their faith took its rise, e. g., in the environs of Cairo, but they are obliged, through fear of the civil power, to maintain the most profound secrecy. On Lebanon even, they are not tolerated as a religious sect, but because they are able by their energy and valor to keep their enemies at bay, for they are only sham-Moslems. Hence in one of their books of doctrine, to the question: "What do we say of Mohammed?" the answer is given: "He is a devil and the son of a whore," whilst to this: "What do we say of the Gospel of the Christians?" the reply is: "The Gospel is true."

Here we have only to do with their religion. Although by external profession Moslems, and esteemed such by those who do not know their real belief, they are at heart less hostile to Christianity than Islam, of which they are an abnormal growth. This circumstance has secured them the attention of European Christians. But with all the effort which has been made to penetrate the shroud of mystery, it is very difficult to discover what their true faith is. Ph. Wolff, in an excellent monograph (Die Dr. u. ihre Vorläufer: Leipz., 1845. 8vo.) speaks thus: "Concerning the religion of the Druses I have neither in Häsbeiya, one of their seats, nor elsewhere in Lebanon, been able to discover anything new; in this respect they are exceedingly uncommunicative; and if Christians or Mohammedans are asked what they know, the only answer is, that the Druses have no religion." Up to this time no change has taken place in their policy. Hence the accounts of most travellers are to be received with the greatest caution. The latest and best are: "Churchill, Mt. Leb.; a Ten Years' Residence, from 1842-52: Lond., 1853, 3 vols. 8vo.," and "G. W. Chasseaud, The Druses of Lebanon, their Manners, Customs, and History: Lond., 1854." Of the reports of earlier travellers the most reliable are: Carsten Niebuhr (Reisebeschr. 2, p. 428, sq.), (Volney, Voyage en Syrie, etc., 2, p. 37, sq.), J. L. Burckhardt (Travels in Syria and the Holy Land, p. 193, sq.—and a translation by Gesenius with Notes, p. 523, sq.), Robinson (Palestine, 3, p. 752, sq.), and the anonymous work: Die heutigen Syrier od. gesellige u. pol. Zustände d. Eingeb. in Damaskus, Aleppo u. im Drusen-gebirge (Stuttg. u. Tüb., 1845). In recent times there are some who cherish the hope that the Druses and the Maronites may yet form a nucleus for the spiritual regeneration of the East. But if it ever be fulfilled, which is not very probable, it will not be through the faith of the Druses, but in spite of it.

About the origin of the name there has been much dispute. It comes, however, from Mohammed ben Ismael Darasi, who first ventured to assert openly that the divinity was incarnate in the person of the Fatimid caliph, Hakim Biamrillahi. Some of their own writers derive it from the Arabic verb darisa (with Se), interpreting it "placed in possession" (of the faith), or they ascribe to this word meanings, which it has not elsewhere (to go out, to submit): "because they have gone out from all nations and have submitted to the laws of our Lord" (Hamsa, or Hakim), or they deduce it from darisa (with Sin), so that a Druse is one, "who reads the books of Hamsa, as he is bound to do." Usually they style themselves Confessors of Unity, Unitarians (Muhwahhidun), and their doctrine, the Confession of Unity (Tauhid), which certainly points to the fundamental idea of their system.

The sect of the Druses first came into notice in the year 407 or 8 of the Hegira (A. D. 1016-17). Its ultimate source lies in the doctrine of the Batiniyeh (the Esoterics), a branch of the Isma'iliyeh, one of the many divisions of the Shfites (Shi'ah, opposed to Sunna, Sunnites). The Batinites asserted, "that every outward has an inward, and every passage of the Koran an internal allegorical meaning." Of course by the aid of this principle they could find anything they pleased in the Koran. Like all the Shfites, the Isma'ilites especially adhered to Ali, whose issue could not be deprived of the Imamat (the first and highest position of Mohammedanism), and distinguished themselves from the other Shfites in this, as their name indicates, that they regarded Isma'il as rightful Imam after his father Dschafar Zadik. If the Karmathians be considered as that sect, from which the Druses have directly sprung, the view is correct, for these were a later offshoot of the Batinites. They not only carried allegorizing to excess, but made use also of philosophy and speculation to undermine and overthrow justice and order as well as every kind of divine revelation and authority; they taught the most absolute atheism and materialism, but kept these things as secret doctrines from the majority of their members.

But the Druses went beyond the Karmathians, in believing that the Deity had appeared in the person of a capricious, cruel, insane tyrant, the sixth caliph of the Fatimids (the third of them in Egypt). This caliph, on ascending the throne, assumed the honorable title, Hakim Biamrillahi (He who judges by the command of God), reigned from 386 to 411 a. Heg., had many internal troubles to contend with, and at last perished by assassination. At the death of his father, the caliph Asin Billah, he was still very young (not quite 11½ years old); but he very soon rid himself of the men under whose care his father had placed him. A continual change of officers and measures characterized his whole reign. The Shfites' tendency showed itself in many of his acts. Thus, in 391 a. Heg., he caused a man from Syria to be beheaded, because he refused to acknowledge Ali. In 393 his zeal for Islam and Ali in particular increased, and he began to persecute the Christians and Jews. Up to 405 it is said that more than 30,000 churches and monasteries (among them the Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem), as well as many Jewish synagogues, were destroyed by his orders, in Egypt and Syria. Meanwhile (a. Heg., 400) Hakim again solemnly renounced the usages of the Shfites and appeared to incline to the Sunnite party. This seeming change, however, was of short duration, for he suddenly returned in 403 to his old position, and from 404 to the day of his death showed himself hostile to the Sunnites. The licentious manners of the Egyptian women he used as a pretext, to forbid them from going abroad by day or night, and even from looking out of doors or windows, so that many, for whom no one cared, perished in their houses, through lack of food and raiment. But this act produced universal indignation, and led to a conspiracy, on the part of his sister and a high dignitary of State, which resulted in his death.

The year 408 (according to another account, 407) of the Hegira is fixed by the Druses as that in which Hakim's godhead was revealed; hence we find in one of their catechisms (v. Eichhorn's Repert. 12, p. 156, sq.): Quest. "How and when was our Lord, Hakim, visible? Ans. In the year 400 of the Flight of Mohammed. 2. And how was he visible? A. He was visible, and said he was of the lineage of Mohammed, in order to conceal his godhead. Q. And why did he conceal his godhead? A. Because his sojourn was only brief, and they who loved him were not many. Q. And when did he appear and manifest his godhead? A. In the year 408. Q. And how many years did his godhead remain visible? A. Eight years altogether, and he concealed himself in the ninth year, because it was the year of tribulation and recompense."—A missionary (dai) of the Batinite sect, Muhammed ben Ismael Darasi, called Neschtekin by Druse writers, said to be a Persian by birth, came to Egypt and entered the service of Hakim, by whom he was loaded with the highest honors, in return for which he called upon the people to acknowledge the caliph as God, the Creator of the world, and wrote a book to prove the claim. But when he read aloud from this book in a mosque at Cairo, the people became so enraged at him, that he escaped with difficulty; a riot of three days ensued, and many of his party perished. The caliph did not venture to support him publicly, and hence advised him to withdraw to Syria, where, among the rude and simple inhabitants of the mountains, he might propagate his doctrine. This Darasi did in the valley of Tel'm Allah, west of Damascus, in the district of Paneas. He succeeded by a liberal distribution of gold and promises of sensual indulgence. The dogma of the transmigration of souls was a chief point in his theology; for the soul of Adam was said to have reappeared in Ali ben Abu Taleb, then in the ancestors of Hakim and now in Hakim himself. Druse writers say that D. with many of his adherents perished in 410 of the Heg.; other accounts speak of him as fighting in 411 against the Turks, by whom he was probably slain in battle.

After a second unsuccessful attempt, by a certain Hasan ben Halidara Fergani, surnamed Akhrum, to secure divine honors to Hakim, the scheme was taken up by a skilful man, who had probably been the secret spring of the whole movement, and hence is justly regarded by the Druses to this day as the founder of their religious communion—the turban-maker, Hamsa ben Ali ben Ahmed, surnamed Hadi (the Leader). Of Persian descent, he came to Egypt, took up his abode outside of Cairo in the mosque Bir, and gradually and prudently won followers, several of whom he sent out as missionaries into Syria and Egypt. He first began to preach publicly in the year of the H. 408. Young Neschtekin Darasi was one of his proselytes; through him he may have wished to test public opinion, but it is more probable that the scholar attempted to steal a march upon his master. At least Hamsa accuses him of pride and presumption, and even of aspiring to the Imamatus. There existed, of course, a mutual understanding between H. and the caliph, and the real designs of the latter became more and more apparent. He discontinued his customary prayers in the mosque on festival days, discouraged the pilgrimage to Mecca, and sent no more presents for the adornment of the Caaba. As the sect of the Darasites (Druses) grew under his protection and favor, the wrath of the genuine Moslem also increased, and a hostile collision could not be avoided. When, therefore, in 411, a band of Hamsa's associates, crowded into the mosque and summoned the cadi to acknowledge Hakim's godhead, the speaker was slain and many with him. The caliph caused the murderers to be seized and put to death, whilst Hamsa's dwelling was attacked by the opposite party, plundered, and destroyed with all his servants. He himself escaped to the castle of the caliph, by whom he was concealed. From the year 408 Hakim aspired to divine honors, and to ascertain the temper of the people by means of a widely extended system of espionage, gave out, that he stood in special communication with God, and desired every one to rise at the mention of his name in public prayer. The blind multitude began first to believe and then to act; indeed, they surpassed his wishes and even beyond the walls of the mosque did him reverence by shouting: "O Thou sole One! O Thou, who bestowest life and death!" These impious words were not displeasing to him, for he responded in the same spirit: "The Nile is mine, and I am He who created it." His feeling toward the Jews and Christians now underwent a change; he ceased to persecute them, and even allowed Christians who had been forced to become Mohammedans to profess their former faith openly (6000 availed themselves of the privilege). The churches which had been closed were again opened; those that were destroyed, rebuilt; confiscated estates were restored, and oppressive laws repealed.

Hakim is said to have learned from his horoscope that on the night when he perished, and on the following day, great danger threatened him; hence his mother begged him to pass the critical time in his palace, which he promised to do; but prompted by old habits, after the best part of the night was gone, rode to Karafa on his ass. On Mt. Mokattam, usually visited by him, he looked toward the eastern sky, saw Mars ascending the horizon, and murmured to himself: "So thou hast risen, cursed one, shedder of blood! My hour is come." The assassins, whom his sister had hired and concealed here, now fell upon him, killed him and a young slave, his only companion, maimed his ass, and carried the corpse to the palace, where it was buried. His sudden disappearance, at the age of 36 years and 7 months, his sister explained, when questioned, as a voluntary concealment, in order to escape the danger, which threatened him for 7 days. This week she used, by the liberal distribution of money and other means, to secure the succession for Hakim's son, who was yet a child. Then she put all out of the way, who were privy to the affair. A portion of the Egyptians firmly believed that H. was not dead. His worshippers, the Druses, still look for his return. Others asserted, that he had gone into the desert and became a monk. Impostors were not wanting, who claimed to be the true Hakim; Scherut, a Christian apostate, who had a similar voice and form, under the name of Abularab, played this part for 20 years. In consequence of a work of Hamsa, the Druses believed that Hakim had disappeared, because of the sins of men; hence their teacher forbade them to make any search after him (Silv. de Sacy, Chrestom. Arab. I. pp. 275, 277, 279). The god of the Druses had large dark blue, sparkling eyes, and a strong, terrible voice; instability and cruelty, unbounded vanity, an inclination to folly, singularity and superstition, a lack of all moral principle, along with a certain prudence and sagacity, joined with occasional, though rare, traces of a feeling for justice, equity and nobleness, are the prominent traits of his character. His enemies may have exaggerated his faults; but even if it be so, enough remains (18,000 men were the victims of his cruelty) to render his name accursed. The historical proof of his divinity, in the very classic writings of the Druses themselves, gives clear evidence of the moral corruption, savage caprice, and madness of their deified hero.

From the pretended revelation of Hamsa, the D. reckoned their era (called the year of Hamsa). It corresponds with 408 of the Hegira. Hamsa's first disciples, up to this time, were Abi ben Ahmed Habbal, who in turn converted Darasi, and Mobarek ben Ali. The year 409 is excluded from Hamsa's era, and is regarded as the year of trial and sorrow. In it H. had to remain hidden; but employed his leisure in writing those books, which form the groundwork of the Druse system. Important extracts from this source are given by Silv. de Sacy, in his Chrestom. Arab., accompanied by a French translation; much also is incorporated in his famous work, Exposé de la religion des Druses, T. I. and II., and Ph. Wolff, from the same source, has embodied much in his German elaboration of Sacy's Exposé. From these authentic records it appears that Hamsa was no common man, and least of all a blind fanatic, who knew not at what he aimed. They give us, however, no direct knowledge of his secret convictions, and since his narrative of events, in which he himself was an actor, is far from truthful, there is room to suspect that he did not believe in his own colossal system of error. But when we look at the wild, allegorical mode of interpreting the Koran, long in vogue among the Mohammedans, he may have been self-deceived. And yet it is hard to think so, when we read in his work, "The Cause of Causes," declarations like these: "I am the root of creatures; I am the right way; I am he who knows his will; — I am — the lord of the resurrection and the last day. — I am the lord of the last judgment, and by me all rewards will be distributed. I am he who abolishes all former laws, and exterminates the adherents of polytheism and lies." Be that as it may, he was truly a blind leader of the blind, whether his fall into the ditch was so deep as his enemies assert, as that he permitted carnal intercourse with sisters, daughters and mothers, we cannot decide; his writings, as far as known, contain nothing of the kind. He rather enjoins purity of morals and conjugal fidelity. If the modern Druses do not contract marriages within the forbidden degrees, it is a necessary result of their external confession of Islam, which does not allow it. That they, however, like other secret sects of Syria, have an ill name in this matter, is not to be disputed.

Next after H. among the Druse leaders stood Ismael ben Muhammed Temimi, the so-called second mediator, likewise a skilful writer, from whose works Sacy and Wolff borrowed largely. Concerning the third and fourth mediators little is known, but the fifth, Moktana or Behaëddin, exerted a wide and permanent influence. He was a very fruitful author, and the period of his activity extends from 411 to 430 a. Heg. After Hamsa's withdrawal he took the lead, and left no means untried for the propagation of the sect. His letters went in the East as far as Multan and the borders of India; in the West as far as Constantinople. Two of them are addressed to the emperors Constantine VIII. and Michael the Paphlagonian. He endeavored to prove in them, that in Hamsa the Messiah had reappeared. Hamsa could not have a better representative of his views — one who could defend them with more zeal and power. After him the D. were not lacking in men of literary activity, but none of them acquired the consideration of the earlier leaders. Of later date is the catechism, which J. G. Ch. Adler, in the Museum Cusicum Borgianum, p. 116, sq., and J. G. Eichhorn, in the Repert. für bibl. u. morgenl. Lit. 12, p. 155, sq., have given in the original with Latin and Germ. translations. When Behaëddin retired the progress of the sect appeared to cease, and up to the present time its history is involved in darkness.

The creed of the D., as drawn from their scriptures, may be briefly summed up as follows: There is only one God, but the nature of his being and attributes cannot be fathomed, the senses cannot comprehend him, nor words define him. Yet he revealed himself to men at various times in human form, without sharing in human imperfection and weakness. Last he appeared in the person of Hakim Biamrillahi, and a further revelation is not to be looked for. In order to try the faith of his followers, and separate hypocrites from the true worshippers, Hakim concealed himself, but will soon return again in majesty, to extend his kingdom over the whole earth, and bestow eternal salvation on his faithful people. The first of the creatures of God, his only direct offspring, the first emanation of the beaming light of the Godhead is the universal intelligence; it has appeared in every revelation of God, and last under the form of Hamsa ben Ahmed. By this first mediator all other creatures were brought into existence; he alone has the knowledge of all truth, and out of the treasures of grace and knowledge bestowed exclusively on him by God, imparts it directly or indirectly to all other mediators, as well as to the body of believers, in proportion to their power of understanding and their merit. He alone has direct access to God; all others need him as a mediator; he will receive the sword of God for victory over his enemies, the triumph of the true religion and the distribution of rewards and punishments. Under him stand mediators of lower rank, who likewise have a claim to implicit obedience on the part of the faithful. The number of men, whose souls were created by the universal intelligence, remains ever the same; but their souls pass gradually over into various bodies. In this way they attain to a higher grade, if they do homage to the truth and ponder it well, and the contrary, if they neglect it. Earlier religions are only types of the true, and their rites only allegories; hence, after the revelation of the true religion, they must be abolished. The renunciation of all other creeds, veracity, brotherly love and submission to the will of God are the chief duties of a confessor of unity. [Comp. the summary in Sacy's Exp. T. I., p. 76, sq., repeated by Ph. Wolff, die D. p. 435, sq., and in his Reise in das gelob. Land, p. 232, sq., also K. Graul, Reise nach Ostind. über Palästina, T. I., p. 76, sq.]. To ascertain the key-note of the Druse system requires a close attention to details. Like Islam it lays great stress on the divine essence, but differs from it in making the doctrine of its mediation a cardinal point.

Considering the difficult metaphysico-theological language of the Druse writers, and the abstruseness of their speculations, it is not to be wondered at that so distinguished a scholar as Silv. de Sacy, even after 40 years study, should fall into some errors. Still, his book is the best we have upon the subject. The authors before him worthy of mention are Adler (Museum Cuf. Borg. Rom., 1782), J. G. Eichhorn (Repert. d. bibl. u. morgenl. Lit. 12, p. 108), Venture (hist. Mem. on the D. in the Appendix to the Memoirs of Baron de Tott, Lond. 1786), J. G. Words (Gesch. u. Beschreib. des L. d. D. in Syrien, Goerl. 1799), and J. Hammer-Purgstall (Journ. Asiat. 1837, Nov., 3d Ser. T. 4, p. 483, sq.). Regnault's Recherch. sur les D. etc., in the Bullet. de la Soc. de géog., and Gius. Bakti's Notizie etc., in the Fundgrub. d. Orients, T. I., p. 27, are of little value. A critical compilation of the accounts of Oriental writers and European travellers is a desideratum, but the main thing is, to put the most important Druse works into print. A list of these is given by Sacy in his Exp. T. I., p. 454. The MSS. are to be found at Rome (in the Vatican), at Paris, Vienna, Oxford and Leyden. Since then, whole collections have reached Upsala (s. Journ. Asiat. Dec. 1841) and Munich. The latter were obtained by Clotbey, chief of the Egyptian medical staff in Syria, and presented to the King of Bavaria.

In regard to the rites of worship used by the D., there is little known. Their sacred day is Friday. Their temples are without ornament and built in secluded places. The male portion of the congregation is separated from the female by a screen. Before the service begins matters of public and private interest are discussed and settled. A passage from their holy books is read, and hymns sung; then figs, raisins, etc., are eaten at public expense, and the assembly disperses. At the temple of the Sheikh, the chief men remain behind to sit in council. The D. are said to pay divine honors to a golden calf, which they keep hidden in a chest. It is generally thought to be an image of Hakim. Adler has given a picture of it, after a copy in the Museum Borgianum at Rome. It is covered with secret characters, more or less resembling Arabic. Venture already declared the supposition that it was an idol incorrect, because their religious books expressly forbid the worship of images, and Silv. de Sacy (Exp. T. I., p. 231) sustains his view. This calf, according to Venture, is nothing but a symbol of other religions, which in their books are represented by the figure of a calf or ox; or perhaps, as de Sacy thinks, it symbolizes the enemy of Hakim. It is very probable that the whole thing was unknown among the earlier Druses.

A. G. HOFFMANN. — Porter.

Drusilla, the daughter of Herod Agrippa I. (Acts 12 : 23) and Cypra, and sister of Agrippa II., Bernice, and Mariamne, lost her father in her sixth year, but was previously betrothed to Epiphanes, the son of Antiochus, King of Comagene, on condition of his submitting to circumcision. E. afterward repented of the promise, and she married Azizas, K. of Emesa (Jos. Ant. XIX., 9, 1; XX., 7, 1). But Felix, Procurator of Palestine, having been smitten with her beauty, induced her, through Simon the sorcerer, to abandon Azizas, and marry him. By this adulterous act she hoped to escape from unpleasant relations with her sister Berenice, who was envious of Drusilla's beauty. Agrippa, her son to Felix, perished in an eruption of Vesuvius (Jos. Ant. XX., 7, 2). It was under Felix that Paul was brought bound from Jerusalem to Cæsarea, whither Felix himself had gone, probably at Drusilla's instance, who as a Jewess may have been curious to hear something concerning the Messiah. Paul improved the occasion by rebuking their sins; but they did not heed his rebuke. HERZOG.*

Drusius, John, born in Oudenaarde, E. Flanders, June 28, 1550; † Feb. 12, 1616 (old style), was a distinguished Orientalist and Exegete. He was one of those scholars who shed renown upon the Universities and schools of Holland, and whose learning was acknowledged by the theologians of Germany, Denmark, and Sweden. In his 10th year his father (whose family name was van d. Driesche) sent him to Ghent, where he learned Latin and Greek, and three years later to Louvain, where Corn. Valerius and John Stadius were his teachers. Through the religious strifes of 1567 his father lost most of his large estate, and was compelled to flee to England (CURIANDER, vita Drusii, p. 34). His mother, a strict Romanist, would not allow her son to follow, but sent him to Tournai. But near the close of 1567 he escaped to London, and joined his father. There A. R. le Chevalier taught him Hebrew, and on his becoming Prof. of Hebrew in Cambridge took young Drusius with him into his own house. In 1571 he returned to London, and soon received calls to desirable posts in Oxford and Cambridge. He chose Oxford, and there, in his 22d year, became Prof. of the Oriental languages, and taught for four years with great success. Then he went to Louvain to study jurisprudence. Religious wars again breaking out, he once more repaired to his father in London. After the Peace of Ghent he returned with his father, 1576, to Belgium. He declined the offer of a civil office, but in 1577 became Prof. of the Oriental languages in Leyden. In Leyden he married, 1580, Maria van d. Varent (Varentia), a Romanist; she, soon afterwards, became a Protestant. As, notwithstanding the desires of the Prince of Orange, the Board in Leyden made no effort to retain D. in the University, and he wished to be more free of pecuniary anxieties, he accepted a call to Franeker, as Prof. of Hebrew, and remained there until his death. That he could not pursue his labors in perfect quietness is clear from his description of himself: Non sum theologus; an Grammatici nomen, quod aliquando probose mihi objectum, tueri possem, nescio. Amici, quos nosti, negant: ego non contradico. Quid igitur es, inquit? Christianus sum, φιλαλῆς sum, qui scribendo proficio et proficiendo scribo (Drusii tetragrammaton, Franeker, 1604, p. 81). But his learning and ability were acknowledged by all whose judgment was not obscured by theological prejudices. In 1596 the authorities of Friesland appointed a commission to prepare a new version of the Dutch Bible, and D. was recommended for this work by Arminius and Uytenbogard. The movement, however, failed. In 1600 the States General employed him to write annotations upon difficult passages in the Q. T. The work proceeded slowly. He suffered annoying interruptions from the enemies of Arminius, whose errors he was suspected of favoring. During his lifetime only a small portion of these Annotations was published. Those upon the Pentateuch were published posthumously by Amama and others, Franeker, 1617, 4to.; those on Joshua, Judges, and Samuel, Fran., 1618, 4to.; on the 12 Prophets, Fran., 1627, 4to.; on Job, Fran., 1636. In the Criticis Sacris they follow those of Seb. Münster, Paul Fagius, Vatablus, Castalio, and Clarius; they are among the best in this great collection (Cf. RICHARD SIMON, hist. critique du V. T.: Paris, 1680, p. 499).—For a list of D.'s writings, mostly exegetical, see MEURSIUS, Athenæ Bat., p. 254; VRIEMOET, Athen. Frisiac. libri. II., p. 59, &c.; NICERON, Mémoires, &c., XXII., p. 67.—Upon his life, besides the works named: Vit. operumque J. Dr. edit. et nondum editorum delineatio, &c., per ABELUM CURIANDRUM: Fran., 1616; BAYLE; THOLUCK d. akad. Leben d. 17. Jahrh., II., 377, Note 11. BERTHEAU.*

Druthmar, Christian, surnamed Grammaticus, for his learning, lived in the ninth century; was first a monk of Corvey; about 860 he went to Liege, expounded the S.S. to the monks there, and wrote for them a commentary upon Matthew, remarkable for clearness, and the prominence given to the historical sense, as the fundamentum omnis intelligentie, to which the mystical must be subordinate. The first ed., by Wimpheling, 1514, Strassburg, is lost; a second was issued by Seeger, Hagenua, 1530; this was adopted in the Bibl. patrum (T. IX.), and the Lyons M. Bibl. patr. (T. XV.). It has the expression: hoc est corpus meum, i. e., in sacramento, and transferens spiritualiter corpus in panem, et sanguinem in vinum. But Sixtus, of Sienna, found it in a cod. of the Franciscan library in Lyons, thus: h. e. c. m., i. e., vere in sacramento subsistens, and transferens corpus in panem et vinum in sanguinem. Protestants and Romanists each claim him for their peculiar view. HERZOG.*

Dubosc, Peter, born at Bayeux, 1623, a clergyman of the Reformed C., distinguished for his pulpit talents. From 1646 to 1685 he preached in Caen. The parliament of Rouen then forbade him to exercise his office longer in France. He went to Holland, was honorably received by the Prince of Orange, and preached in Rotterdam. He died Jan. 2, 1692.—2 vols. of his sermons were publ. in Rotterdam, 1692, 8vo., and

4 vols. in do., 1701, 8vo. His stepson, Legendre, publ. his life, with a selection of Discourses, &c., Rotterdam, 1694, 8vo.; enlarged 1716, 8vo.—See Bayle. C. SCHMIDT.*

Du Fresne (du Cange), the father of the French history of the Middle-ages, born Dec. 18, 1610, at Amiens, gave early signs of remarkable talents, which were carefully cultivated by his father, in the Jesuit College at Amiens, and further developed at the University of Orleans, where he studied Jurisprudence. In 1631 already he became an advocate, but never plead. Mediæval history absorbed his attention. Through modesty, however, he long refused to publish any of his writings. The solicitations of friends were answered with: Mihi cano, et Musis. His first work appeared in 1657: Hist. de l'empire de Constantinople sous les empereurs françois. Though well received eight years passed before he issued a second work; but thenceforth he often appeared in print. His literary labors were a source of pleasure to him. He freely allowed others to use the results of his researches. The value of his labors can only be estimated by considering that to this day little had been done in this department of study. There was, as yet, no Chronology, Numismatics, Archæology, Paleography, and Geography of the mediæval period.—The published and unpublished works of Du F. embrace not only the general history of Europe during the Middle Ages, but refer to the history of France, and especially of the Byzantine empire. Of his unpublished writings upon these subjects recent scholars have made use as though they were the fruits of their own researches. His chief works are the Glossaries mediæ et infimæ latinitatis, and mediæ et infimæ græcitalis. They are real Encyclopedias of the Byzant. empire. The Latin Gloss. appeared 1) in Paris, 1678, 3 vols. fol.; 2) in Franf. on the M., 1681 and 1710, 3 vols. fol.; 3) in Venice, 1733–36, 6 vols. fol. Opera et studio Monach. O. S. Bened.; 4) taken from this last is the ed. of 1762. The Bened. Carpentier added a suppl. in 4 vols. in 1766; 5) an abstract from Du F. and Carpentier's works, Halle, 1772–84, 6 vols., by Adelung; 6) the latest ed. by HENSCHEL, cum suppl. integris Carpent. et additam. Adelungii et al., 7 Thm. Par., 1840–50, Firmin Didot.—The Greek Gloss. appeared, Par., 1688, 2 vols. fol.—His last work, completed after his death, was the editing of Chron. Puschale, Par., 1688; Venice, 1729.—(See PERRAULT in the Journal d. savants; Du PIN, bibl. d. auteurs eccles.; NICERON, CHAUFFÉ, and especially LEON FAUGÈRE, essai sur la vie et les ouvr. de Du Cange, Par., 1852).

HERZOG.*

Du Moulin, Peter (Molinaeus), a distinguished controversialist of the French Reformed Church, was born in 1568. As a youth he narrowly escaped the massacre of St. Bartholomew. After pursuing his studies at Sedan and in Paris, he fled to England in 1588, and in 1592 went to Leyden, where he became a teacher of the ancient languages, and in a short time Professor of Philosophy. But feeling under obligation to serve the church of his native country, he returned to Paris in 1599, obtained ordination, and accepted a chaplaincy at Charenton, from Catharine, the wife of Duke Henry of Bar, and sister of Henry IV. He had numerous disputations with Romanists, and many of his works upon the points of controversy between Protestantism and Romanism were published.¹ Catharine soon died, and Du M. returned to Paris. He was urged to accept a call to Leyden, but preferred to remain in Paris. Subsequently Tilenus, Prof. of Theology at Sedan, charged him with ubiquitarianism. A long and angry controversy arose, which was not settled until 1617. Meanwhile Du M. prosecuted his polemics against Romanism with untiring zeal, as the dates of his works, in the annexed list, will show. In 1617 the National Synod of Vitré appointed him, with several other theologians, to draw a plan of union for the Reformed Churches, and to propose it to the Synod of Dort. But they did not obtain the king's permission to visit the Synod. Du M., therefore, sent in a memorial against Arminianism (Anatomie de l'Armin.: Leyden, 1619, and often), for which the Synod voted thanks. At the Synod of Alais, 1620, he likewise denounced Arminianism. This course involved him in disputes with the Remonstrants. About the same time he was accused of interference in politics, for which Louis XIII. deprived him of his place. He went to Sedan, and obtained an appointment from the Duke of Bouillon. In Sedan he wrote several religious tracts. From Sedan he went to London, but returned to S. in 1626, became Prof. of Theology, and there spent the rest of his life. He died March 10, 1658. The only biography of him is the small work of ARMAND, Essai sur la vie de D., &c.: Strassb., 1846, 8vo. He had several sons. The oldest, Peter, was also a theological writer. He lived in England, where he became a Royal Chaplain and Canon of Canterbury. He died in 1684, aged 84. His principal works are: Vindication of the Sin- cerity of the Prot. Religion, and De la paix de l'âme et du contentement de l'esprit, new ed.: Amsterd., 1675, 18mo., Paris, 1840, 8vo.

C. SCHMIDT.*

Dungal. — In the Art. upon Claudius of Turin, the Scot Dungal is referred to. Of his life little is known. Some notices of a Dungal, recluse of the Abbey of St. Denis, are found in the Hist. littéraire de la France, IV., 493, which ascribe to him the Responsa contra perversas Claudii sententias, of 828 (printed in the Bibl. PP. Max. XIV.). But this Dungal was probably the author only of some Latin poems (in MARTENE ET DURAND, ampliss. collectio, &c., VI., 811, &c.), and an Epist. ad Carolum M. de duplici eclipsi solari (in D'ACHERY, Spicilegium, III., 324, new ed.). The Responsa were more probably written by the Dungal mentioned in a decree of Lothaire, 823, as teacher in Pavia. The Responsa, addressed to Louis the Pious, and Lothaire, his son, oppose the views of Claudius, and defend the adoration of saints, the cross, relics, &c.; but warn against its degenerating into superstitious worship.

C. SCHMIDT.*

Dunin, (Martin of,) Archbishop of Gnesen, Poland, was born Nov. 11, 1774, in Val, near Xava, and finished his studies at Rome, and became a priest, 1793–97, and having been appointed Canon, first in Wislica, then in Cujavien, 1808 in Gnesen, 1824 in Posen, and, after the death of the Archbishop of Wolicki (1829), administrator of the diocese, and, in 1831, Archbishop, died Dec. 26, 1842. The controversy touching mixed marriages invested the episcopal reign of D. with special importance. To ignore the canonical laws of Rome on this subject (see Art.), which obtained in the Polish dioceses and had been strenuously enforced by Benedict XIV., in decrees of June 29, and Aug. 8, 1748 (Bullarium Magnum ed. Luxemburg., tom. XVII., fol. 230, 272), Russia, Prussia, Denmark, England and Sweden entered into a treaty with Poland at Warsaw, Feb. 13 (24), 1768, which ordained that no one should prohibit mixed marriages, that, in the event of issue by such, the sons should be educated in the religion of the fathers, the daughters in that of the mothers, and that the pastor of the bride should perform the marriage ceremony. See the testimony of Dunin in "Jacobson on mixed marriages in Germany and Prussia," Leips., 1838, p. 45. Though the Papal chair never formally approved them, necessity compelled it for the time being to connive at them, whilst it laid hold on every favorable opportunity for the carrying out of its principles. With 1815 began a reaction, and the Romish Church strove to regain its lost ground. In obedience to a brief from Pius VII., Oct. 31, 1819, the clergy of the Rhine province, Prussia, made arrangements for the enforcement of the canonical laws; and to bring about a proper understanding between conflicting parties, Pius issued another brief, March 25, 1830. Having been refused the liberty of acting according to the principles of his church, Dunin determined to abolish the regulations above-mentioned, touching mixed marriages, and addressed two circulars to his clergy, one in the Polish, Jan. 30, 1838, the other in the Latin language, Feb. 27. Now ensued a conflict between him and the government, and a legal investigation was the result, June 25, 1838. Imprisonment for half a year, and deposition from office was the punishment imposed by the Court of Posen, Feb. 23, 1839. Having quit his confinement to attend to the duties of his office, he was captured and taken to Colberg, where he lived till the King's death. Promising to modify his earlier circulars, he was restored to his post by Fred. William IV., Aug., 1840. The circulars of 1837 had ordained that, unless the non-Romish party would promise that the children should be educated in the Romish faith, no priest could assist at the wedding, under penalty of suspension. On Aug. 27, 1840, was issued an archiepiscopal decree, according to which priests were not to exact a promise, but to refuse their presence and aid. In 1841 the Archbishop had ordained that a Romanist contracting a mixed marriage should be excluded from the use of the sacraments; but, in a pastoral of 1842, left this matter to the discretion of the priest. Thus did the Romish principle finally triumph. For a statement of the views of Church and State touching the point in dispute, viz., the right of the civil power to meddle with things spiritual, see the Papal allocution, Sept. 13, 1838, and the Publicandum of the government, Dec. 30. See Rintel, Vindic. of M. v. Dunin, Arch., Würzburg, 1839, p. 154, 210; also Biogr., by Pohl, M. v. Dunin, Marienb., 1843.

¹ NARRÉ de la conférence verbale et par écrit, tenue entre Mess. P. Du M. et Cuyet (sic) par Archib. Adaire, &c.: Geneva, 1533, 8vo. Cartel, de deffy du sieur de Dunin, &c., &c.: Gen. 1636, 8vo. — Eaux de Siloë pour éteindre le purgatoire, 1602, and Accroissement des eaux de Siloë, &c., &c.: Laroche, 1604, 8vo. — Trente-deux demandes proposées par le P. Cotton, &c., &c.: Laroche, 1607, 8vo.: Gen., 1635, 8vo. — Véritable narré de la conf. entre les sieurs Du M. et Gontier, 1609: Gen., 1635, 8vo. — Anatomie du livre du sieur Cuvetteau, &c.: Gen., 1625, 8vo. — Accomplissem. des prophéties: Laroche, 1612, 8vo., Sedan, 1624, 8vo. — De monarchia temporalis papae: London, 8vo. — Défense de la confession de l'Eglise réformée de France: Charenton, 1617, 8vo. — Bouclier de la foy: Char., 1617, 8vo., 3d ed., 1619, Gen., 1624, 8vo.; in German: Bremen, 1643, 8vo. — Fuites et evasions du sieur Arnoux, jésuite: Char., 1619, 8vo. — Nouveauté du papiisme opposée à l'antiquité du vray christianisme: Sedan, 1627, 4to., 3d ed., Gen., 1633, 4to., rich in historical material. — De tradit. et de la perfection de l'Ecriture sainte: Sedan, 1631, 8vo., and Gen., 1632, 8vo. — Theses de imaginibus et idolis, &c., in the Thesaurus disput. theol.: Sedan., I., 262, &c. — Strigil adv. Comment. Grotii ad loca de Antichristo, under the assumed name: Hippol. Fronto Caracolla, Amst., 1640, 8vo. — Against Amyraut: Examen de la doctrine de Mess. Amyraut et Testard, &c.: Amst., 1638, 8vo. — Eclaircissement des controverses Salmuriennes, &c.: Leyden, 1648, 8vo. — Dix décades de sermons: Gen., 1643, &c., 8vo. — For other works, of which the titles are imperfectly given, see Aymon, Synodes nationaux de France, II., 273, &c.

H. F. JACOBSON.—Ermentrout.

Duns, John Scotus, born, according to some, at Duns, on the southern boundary of Scotland, according to others, in Dunston, Northumberland; the time of his birth as well as of his entrance into the Franciscan order are unknown. Having first taught in Oxford, he went, probably in 1301, to Paris, where he was made Doctor of Theology, and vindicated the immaculate conception of the Virgin against the Dominicans. He died at Cologne, 1308, whither he had been sent to combat the Beghards, 1308. Making use of Aristotle's writings, and his Arabic commentators, and of the traditions of the Church, Duns, who was endowed with special philosophic talents, elaborated his own theological system, which stood opposed to that of Anselm and Richard St. Victor, of Thomas Aquinas, and his disciples. Adopting the faith of the Church, he believed the Scriptures only on her authority, and that only in union with her could man fulfil his mission, and receive the proper forgiveness of sin. As the knowledge of things natural could only be deduced from God, in whom everything had its being, he regarded theology as the highest science. Though man could not attain to his last end without a supernatural revelation and grace, D. also maintained that his salvation could not be accomplished without his co-operation. God imparts in a supernatural way theological knowledge which is satisfactorily recorded in Holy Writ, and, as man cannot unaided attain to the idea of the vision of God, a revelation becomes an indispensable necessity. The idea held by the Church in his time that, besides the conviction on the part of individuals of the objects of faith, God wrought with absolute necessity in the soul of each man the saving faith, he denied.

In opposition to Anselm's ontological argument for the existence of God, he laid main stress on the teleological, and held that neither the Almightiness of God—but simply his Eternity—nor the Trinity, could be demonstrated by any natural proof. To comprehend God is impossible for mortals whilst on earth, the words used to describe Him being accidents and not substances. Whilst acknowledging the simplicity of God, he also confessed to a certain manifoldness which he discovered in the development of the Divine attributes, of the Persons, and in His creative energy. Touching the world and its creation, D. taught a conditioned necessity, and so also a beginning. The eternity of the Divine will, which refers to God alone, does not condition the eternity of His operations which relate to creation. Only the will of God regarded as a Trinity, can be predicated of Him as such, and it alone is essential when referred to His being. The knowledge of the good, not the reason of God, determining the operation of His will. God did not create the world on account of the good, but the world is good because He made it. Still, as God cannot change, His will touching creation is eternal. As He imparts His essence to others, Thomas is wrong in asserting that He knows all things in His being. Duns distinguishes between a primary reason of God, as His knowledge of Himself, and a secondary one, as the knowledge of contingent things.

Touching redemption D. regards God as the end of man, to be reached by Divine love; the means for its attainment being accidental, as God might have selected others different from those really employed. Morality is almost entirely dependent on the Divine commands, nor is the love of one's neighbor necessarily connected with the love of God. As the unchangeable object of the human will God has determined Himself, the means for reaching this being dependent on our choice. There is in us a natural craving after perfection—God—and a free craving, both of which, however, must be made to co-operate. Man being destined for the highest good, he must possess a capacity for the infinite. In opposition to Thomas, Duns taught that, in order to be happy, the understanding, which, according to the former, cannot comprehend anything beyond itself, must be able to know everything. To the full, complete knowledge of God, man can only attain by degrees. The soul being simply the subject of knowledge, in order to know requires an object. Individuals are something real; rational souls are pure forms, joined to matter capable of perfection. If it were necessary to understand general principles, God would always have to enlighten man in a supernatural way. According to D. freedom and necessity are by no means irreconcilable, since God, though free, yet necessarily desires the good, and created nature does not destroy liberty! He held to predestination in the strictest sense, which, however, was not to be regarded as a temporary, or transient thing. As the Divine decree is independent of man, he declared himself unable to explain the reprobation of the bad. In common with all the Scholastics, D. distinguished moral and theological virtues and three classes of works, viz., good works in general, such as sprung from love to the Divine commands and moral feelings, and such as proceeded from grace—which last alone deserve to be rewarded. Whilst acknowledging original sin, he disconnects it from the supernatural gift of grace. To effect our salvation, there must exist between the desire and the will a perfect harmony which can be brought to pass only by a supernatural power. Sin is a turning away of the will from God and to the creature. In the sacraments D. saw a supernatural power. Whilst in the body, man can aspire after eternal life, but cannot really possess it. The certainty of immortality is rooted in the Divine decree; and as different persons are differently prepared for happiness, their salvation must also be different.

The most complete edition of his works—containing, however, some writings falsely ascribed to him is by the Franciscan Wadding (Lugd., 1639, T. I.—XII., fol.) Most important of these in T. V.—X., in tres primos libros et in quartum Sententiarum Commentaria (so-called opus Oxoniense) and in the T., XI. opus Parisiense s. quæstiones reportatæ in IV., liber. sententiarum, and Quæstiones quodlibetales, XXI.—A Summa theol. ex Scoti operibus, by the Franciscan Jerome de Fortino, in six fol. A valuable work is—F. El. Albergoni, resolutio doctrinæ Scoticæ: Lugd., 1643, 8vo. Also, Controversiæ theologicæ inter S. Thomam et Scotum, in quibus pugnantēs sententiæ referuntur, potiores difficultates elucidantur et responsiones ad argumenta Scoti rejiciuntur, auct. Joanne de Rada: Venet. 1599, 4to.

On the Theology of Duns, Baumgarten-Crusius has written de theol. Scotæ: Jen., 1826, 4to., whilst his philosophical system has been discussed by Ritter. De Rada has compressed into fifty questions the points of difference between the Thomists and the Scotists, the following being especially important: I. 28, Utrum Deus sit in omnibus rebus? I. 29, Utrum Deus intelligat distincte omnia alia a se? I. 30, An Deus cognoscat futura contingentia? II. 3, An principium individuationis substantiæ materialis sit materia? II. 15, An homo in statu innocentie fuisset simpliciter incorruptibilis?

ENGELHARDT.—Ermentrout.

Dunstan, Archbishop of Canterbury, son of Heorstan and Cynedrid, born of a noble family in the reign of King Athelstan, according to Bridfert, more accurately, accord. to Osbern, in 925, in the neighborhood of Glastenbury, where he received the rudiments of his education at the hands of Irish monks, who taught in the cloister of this town. His talents attracted the notice of the King, who invited him to his court. The jealousy of the other sons of noblemen, who accused him "avilæ gentilitatis vanissima dediciisse carmina et historiarum frivolas colere incantationum nœnias," procured his expulsion from the royal presence.¹—Having entered the cloister as a monk, he applied himself to the Holy Scriptures and the Fathers, and divers arts, such as painting, writing, playing on the harp, and, perhaps, also working in metals. The fame of his piety drew to Glastenb. the widow Ethelfleda—a relative of his and of the royal family—who made him her confessor and the heir of her estates. Jealousy drove him from the court of King Edmund (940–46), who, influenced by his blameless life and eloquence, had given him an honorable place in the royal house. Repenting of the injustice done D., the king made him abbot of Glastenbury, and placed him with his own hands on the "sacerdotalis cathedra," about 942 or 943, or, as is most probable, 946.—With a view to the reformation of the monasteries, D. introduced in Glastenb. the rule of St. Benedict, and wrote an Expositio Regulæ Benedicti—to be found in the British Museum (Bibl. Reg., 10, A, XIII.; 4, and 212 pages).—with etymological and grammatical explanations, which prove him to have been for his age a remarkable scholar. He established a cloister-school, in which were educated men like Ethelwold, who himself modelled the cloister Abingdon after the pattern of Glastenb., and, as Bishop of Winchester, taught the young and composed books in the Saxon language. The wealth D. inherited from Ethelfleda, he applied to the poor and the enlargement of his cloister. The death of Edred, whose counsellor he was, was unfortunate for D. no amicable relations subsisting between him and the new king, Edwy; he took refuge in Flanders with Count Arnulf, and in the cloister Blandinium, near Ghent. The Benedictines were also expelled and their monasteries plundered. The avarice of Edwy knew no bounds. He robbed his mother and grandmother, and rendered himself so detestable that the country, north of the Thames, revolted, and made his younger brother, Edgar, king (957), who recalled D. from banishment. The Synod of Bradford elected him Bishop, and put the bishopric of Worcester and London under his care, 958. On the death of Edwy, 959, Edgar became sole sovereign. In 959 D. became Archbishop of Canterbury, in which capacity he acted for thirty years. That amid the many vicissitudes, and the dangers that beset the kingdom during the reign of Edgar, Dunstan guided its affairs to a successful issue, shows that the confidence placed in him by the King was not misplaced. In order to effect his Church-reforms, he filled up vacancies with men of like mind with himself. Aided by men like Oswald, Bishop of Worcester (960–72), and afterward Archbishop of York (972–992), and Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester (962–84), D. enforced the Benedictine rule. As immorality of every kind abounded among the clergy, it was no easy matter to suppress it. In the place of priests who misbehaved, he put monks who were willing to do what was right and proper. With the death of Edgar, 975, however, began new troubles. To prevent the succession of Edward, his oldest son, the enemies of Dunstan urged the claims of the younger son, Ethelred, and, though overcome, flew to arms in Mercia, and banished the Benedictines. Edward at last fell a victim to the sword of an assassin (978), and Ethelred became king. D., however, continued to hold the reins of government till his death, May 19, 988. His remains lie in the cathedral church of Canterbury.

¹ A specimen of his skill is in the Bodleian Lib. Oxford (D. 11, 19, cf. Hick. Thesaur. I., 144)—a picture of Christ—who has in his left hand a book with the words: Venite filii, audite me, timorem Dei docebo vos, and a staff in the right with the inscription: Virga recta est—virga regnabitur. At the feet of Jesus, clothed in a gown, kneels Dunstan.

Endowed by nature with a rich genius and an inflexible will, a learned and accomplished man, D. was well qualified for the conspicuous position he was called upon to occupy. He led a blameless, ascetical life. Deficient in mildness and humility, he pursued his purposes regardless of consequences. And yet it may be said, that his character, made up as it was of good and bad elements, fitted him for his mission, which was to reform the Church and elevate the State. His idea of a reformation was, perhaps, too contracted, as he seemed to be satisfied with the mere enforcement of the Benedictine rule. It must not be forgotten, however, that he labored successfully for the promotion of sound learning. The rapid degradation of the country, consequent upon his death, proves that its glory was owing to the wisdom of his government.—Whilst some consider him a saint and the greatest man of his age, others—particularly writers since the Reformation—look upon him as an ambitious prelate, whose only object was to subject the State to the Church, and this to Rome. They who charge him with having introduced celibacy forget that the monks who converted the Saxons practised it; and that it was enforced in the 8th cent. under pain of the severest punishments. It is a mistake to regard Edwy as the champion of religious and political freedom—the struggles that agitated his reign having sprung from the opposition of the clergy to the Benedictine rule, and the conflict of parties. Bating his ambition and passionateness, it must be confessed that, in his time, he was the benefactor both of the Church and State.

Sources:—Of biographies (see Papenbrock, Acta SS. 19 Mai; Wharton, Anglia S., II., 88, 211), the most important by the monk Bridferth, of Ransey, also by Osbern, a monk of Canterbury. Comp. the chronicles of the time, particularly the Saxon, and Florence, of Worcester. Of modern authors, Lappenberg (Hist. of England, I., 397), and Lingard (Hist. of the Anglo-S. Church, II., 266). C. SCHÖLL.—Ermentrout.

Duperron, Jacques D., born 1556, in Switzerland, of Reformed parents, apostatized from the evangelical faith, became a Romish priest, and was zealous in making proselytes, and in opposing the Reformed Church. He was especially active in persuading Henry IV. to abjure his faith, and secured his absolution in Rome, 1595. Upon this the Pope made him Bishop of Evroux. In this capacity he labored indofatigably to advance Romanism (see Duplessis-Mornay). In 1604 he became Cardinal; in 1606 Almoner of France and Archb. of Sens. He acquired predominant influence in Rome. He died in 1618. His works appeared, 1620–22, in 3 vols. fol., Paris. The first contains his traité sur l'Eucharistie, mainly against Duplessis-M. The second, his controversy with James I., of England. The third, miscellanies.—See DUPIN, nouvelle bibl. d. auteurs ecclés. XVII., p. 25, &c.

HERZOG.*

Duplessis-Mornay (more accurately, Philip Mornay, Seign. du Plessis-Marly) occupies in one respect perhaps the most important position among the Reformed of France. Though he may be inferior to Admiral Coligny as a warrior and statesman, and to Agrippa d'Aubigné in general historical and dramatic interest, and may possess less attraction than the chaste, iron-armed, Francis de la Noue.—still in point of universality, his noble qualities made him pre-eminent among the heroes of French Calvinism. He combined harmoniously the warrior, courtier, diplomatist, publicist, financier, and administrator, with the Christian and theologian. Even his Romish antagonists pronounced him “an upright man.”—He was born in 1549 at his ancestral castle Buhi, in the French Vexin, of parents who traced relationship even to the Bourbons. His mother, already, was inclined to the “new views,” and this naturally influenced her son. As the youth was of a studious and investigating disposition, this influence became daily more deeply rooted. He especially delighted in theology, and improved all opportunities, particularly during his travels, to extend his knowledge of it. Had not birth, and the circumstances of his family and the times, therefore, led him into a different sphere, he would have acquired reputation as a theologian.—With evangelical impressions, with doubts regarding the old faith, and yet undecided as to the new, thirsting after knowledge and the truth, he was taken, in his 18th year, by his father, who still clung to the Romish C., to Paris, and committed to the tuition of the College de Lisieux. There he found teachers who held the new faith, but had not yet ventured to avow it, the edict of Jan., 1562, granting liberty of conscience, not having been yet published. This threw him the more upon his own independent inquiries after truth. Two years were thus passed, when the death of his father called him home again. A priest who accompanied him was amazed to hear the young man declare his evangelical sentiments. His full decision in favor of the Reformed faith was not made until after the conversion of his mother. This occurred about the time of the Religious Conference of Poissy, 1561, by which his purpose was confirmed. His new faith was now no longer a subject of speculative inquiry, but a quickening power. It also became his banner, which he lowered before no peril or temptation. His maternal uncle, Philip du Bac, B. of Nantes, and afterwards Archb. of Rheims, had previously essayed in vain to influence him by the promise of eccl. preferment. And yet his determination was free of all fanaticism, and joined with a firm, calm earnestness. From 1561 to 1567 he pursued his studies in Paris. His zeal for his religion then constrained him to take arms with the Reformed under Prince Condé. His martial course, however, was soon interrupted by the fracture of a limb in falling from his horse. The peace of Longjumeau, 1568, put an end to hostilities. Mornay, after his recovery, resolved to travel and pursue his studies. He visited Switzerland, Italy, Hungary, Austria, Germany twice, studying jurisprudence at Heidelberg, and finally the Netherlands, in whose controversies with Spain he took the liveliest interest. He had returned to Paris before the massacre of St. Bartholomew, 1572, and miraculously escaped it. — Passing over other incidents in his history we find him in 1576 with the King of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. From this time his peculiar talents were more eminently displayed. It would be psychologically interesting to trace the contrast between Henry and Mornay. But our limits forbid this. M. was Henry's counsellor and agent in every important act of diplomacy and administration; he wrote the most important State papers.

The Calvinism of M. was the strict moral Calvinism of the so-called "Consistorial" party, designated by later writers "puritanic;" he held the correct mean between the harsh, repulsive, republican tendency of d'Aubigné, and the political religion of Sully. Without conniving at Henry's moral delinquencies, he did not rebuke them with bitterness. Hence his influence with the King. He was a sort of moral, religious, and ecclesiastical conscience enveloping the King; and it is to the latter's praise, that he so long retained so faithful and upright a counsellor. But after Henry abjured the Reformed faith, a separation between them became unavoidable. — In 1598 M., who had retired from the atmosphere of the court to Saurmur, issued an extensive work upon the Eucharist, addressed to the "Magnates of the Romish C.," and full of citations from the Greek and Latin Fathers, scholastics, and other Church teachers. A glance at the book proves that the author's design was to disprove transubstantiation by the authorities usually quoted in its support. The plan of the argument and the fine style of the author, made the work peculiarly dangerous and obnoxious. It naturally, therefore, caused great excitement among the advocates of Romanism, and even at Rome itself. How should it be refuted? A public discussion might only increase the evil, by calling out a longer array of patristic proofs. The best that could be done would be to convict M. of having falsified his quotations. Duperron was charged with this duty. He pointed out 500 such misquotations. Henry, whose sincerity in abjuring Protestantism was still suspected, gladly seized this opportunity of gaining the confidence of the Romish party, and subjected M. to a public humiliation. M. requested an investigation. A commission of laymen, of both religions, was appointed. But the King's partiality appeared in their selection; for those on the Reformed side were not trustworthy. M. sadly foresaw the issue. A list of the misquotations was not handed to him until 1 A. M. of the day of the conference, known as that of Fontainebleau, May 4, 1600. Duperron opened it. M., weary with the toils of the night in searching out and comparing the errors of quotation charged upon him, seemed poorly qualified to reply. And yet De Thou, a Romish member of the commission, reports, that the 500 misquotations were reduced to sixty-one, and that altogether but a slight victory was gained by M.'s opponents.

Instead of being driven from the field by the result of this conference, M. engaged in the theological conflicts with increased energy. He published a "History of Popery"¹ with allegorical illustrations. It was a masterpiece of polemics. But his exaggerations and prognostications put a weapon of ridicule into his opponent's hands, of which they made effectual use. — Notwithstanding the polemical spirit exhibited in these works, M. advocated peace and union among the Reformed churches themselves. During the Synod of Dort he addressed letters to members attending it, in which he deprecated the theological strifes which then agitated Holland. — The reputation of the Oracle, or "the Pope of the Huguenots," as M. was called, rests, therefore, upon a better basis than merely his polemical activity. He participated most actively in all the important plans and operations of the Reformed, and not only effected a living union between the native and foreign churches, but often succeeded in restraining the stormy zeal of his French brethren. But he could not keep them from ultimately vindicating their rights by an appeal to arms. Indeed he cannot be wholly defended from the charge of inconsistency, in having expressed, in a letter to Louis XIII., of April 24, 1617, his approbation of the murder of Marshall d'Ancre.

The last years of M. were overcast with manifold trials, to which, however, his faith proved superior. In 1605 his promising son fell in the siege of Guelders. The condition of his country and Church waxed daily worse. In 1621, by an act of revolting perfidy, he was driven from Saurmur. The indemnification offered to him in 1623 he declined. This was the year of his death, the circumstances of which, his dying words, &c., are full of instruction. His will is an interesting document. It can be said without exaggeration that with Duplessis-Mornay was buried the counselling guardian, and warning genius of the French Reformed Church.

In addition to the works already named he wrote: 1) Traité de vie et de la mort: Genève, 1575, written at the request of his bride. 2) Traité de l'Eglise, auquel sont disputées les principales questions qui ont esté meues sur ce point en notre temps: Gen., 1579. 3) Méditation Chret. sur quatre Psaumes du Prophete David, 1591. 4) Mémoires, with the "Suite," and "Supplement," ed. by Elzevir, 4 vols., 4to. This ed. is imperfect. So is that of 1824, by Anguis (see Bulletin de la Soc. de l'Hist. du Prot. Français: Deuxième Année., p. 100–107, &c., and p. 630, 640, 649, also 1 Année, p. 292, 239). — Literature: 1) "Hist. de la vie de M. Philip. de Mornay, A. Leyde, 1647." "Les dernières heures," &c., at the end are by Dailé. 2) "Dupl.-M., ou Etudes historiques et politiques sur la situation de la France de 1549 à 1623, par Joachim Aubert, Officier supérieur. Deuxième Ed.: Paris, 1848," with a Portrait and fac-simile. More popular than critical. 3) Dupl.-M. et son époque. In the Semeur of 1848; very good. 4) Bibl. universelle. Besides these there are: a biogr. by his wife, an "Éloge, &c., par Henri Duval, couronné par l'Athénée de Niort" in the "Recueil" of this society, and specially in 1809, and in the "Vies de plusieurs anciens seigneurs de la maison de M., par R. de Mornay de la Villet., 1689." V. POLENZ.*

¹ "Le mystère d'iniquité, c'est-à-dire l'Histoire de la Papauté." A Latin ed. without illustrations, entitled: "Mysterium Iniquitatis, seu Historia Papatus. Quibus gradibus ad id fastigii enisus sit, quamque acriter omni tempore ubique a piis contra intercessum. Asseruntur etiam jura Imperatorum, Regum et Principum Christianorum adversus Bellarminum et Baronium Cardinales. Auct. Phil. Mornayo ; 2d ed., locupletior, ab ipso Auct. recognita: Salmurii, 1612. This work, according to M.'s biogr., was the result of less than nine months' labor, and, to save his eyes, was dictated. The Latin transl. was the work of five months, also dictated; and so rapidly that his amanuensis could hardly keep pace with him. This explains the inaccuracy of the citations and dates charged upon him.

Duræus, John (properly Durie or Dury), born 1595 or 1596, in Edinburgh, died Sept. 28, 1680, in Cassel (according to Strieder, hess. Gelehrten-gesch., II., 418), was a Presbyterian clergyman, who devoted his long life to the cause of union among Protestants. His father, banished for opposing James VI., and his introduction of Scotch bishops, went to Leyden, and became the pastor of English and Scotch refugees there. After young D. had finished his studies at Oxford, he also went to the continent, and took charge of some English settlers in Elbing, just when Gustavus Adolphus took that city from the Poles. There, about 1628, a plan of union of the Lutherans and Reformed, was submitted to his consideration, by the Swedish jurist, Caspar Godemann. Thus began his peculiar career. About the same time Sir Thomas Roe reached Elbing as ambassador, and became interested in D.'s union schemes. The fair prospects opened by the union religious conference in Leipsic, 1631, seemed full of promise for the success of these schemes. D., therefore, began what he considered the mission of his life with great confidence. He made several journeys to England and back again, in the zealous prosecution of the object. But though he persuaded many to examine his plans, and succeeded in enlisting the sympathy and co-operation of influential members of the various conflicting parties, he had at last to look back with grief upon a long life spent in fruitless efforts. (See Diss. de Jo. Duræo, pacificatore celebr., maxime de actis ejus Seucanis: Helmst., 1744, 4to., mainly by MOSHEIM (cf. Institt. H. E., p. 929, and PFAFF, hist. lit. theol., II., 184); Bibl. Brit., Edinb., 1824, I., 324. f. — k.) HENKE.*

Durand de St. Pourçain entered the Dominican order in Clermont, Auvergne, taught for a time in Paris, then at Avignon, in 1318 was made B. of Annecy, by John XXII., and in 1326 B. of Meaux, where he died in 1333. He wrote a comm. upon Lombard's sentences, a treatise de orig. jurisdict. quibus populus regitur, and one de statu animarum post separationem a corpore, occasioned by a declaration of John XXII., in a sermon, that the souls of saints cannot clearly see the nature of God before the day of judgment, and that their present views of it will then cease. D. was summoned before the Pope for opposing this opinion, but escaped a verdict through the mediation of the King of France.—Durand was the first Thomist nominalist, and fully exhibits the nominalism of the 14th cent. Earlier scholastics had assumed, as nominalists, that human knowledge served as a preparative for revelation, and that the reason might comprehend the will of God as set forth in nature. The nominalists of the 14th cent., D. included, pronounced this a presumptuous claim. This caused a total separation of theology from philosophy. Nominalism maintained that all knowledge of God's will must be derived from the sacred Scriptures, as interpreted by Rome. Thus rationalism, philosophy, pietism, and practical as well as speculative mysticism were at once excluded, and the exegetical, and doctrinal authority of the Romish court fully asserted. Faith in the Bible was faith in Rome, and this faith transcended all demonstration. D. denied the opinion of Thomas Aquinas, that the reasonableness of the doctrines might be proven, or that inspiration might supersede faith, and that the system of faith could not contain impossibilities. D. referred to the doctrine of the Trinity, and held that faith was meritorious in proportion to its difficulties. He did not regard even theology as the loftiest science, because the knowledge of believers surpassed it; nay, he could not consistently consider it a science, because it rested ultimately upon the articles of faith, not upon scientific principles. It is chiefly valuable as a practical discipline. God cannot be the subject of theology, because then predicates, of which God would be the subject, would have to be pronounced by theology, and thus the infinite be taken into our finite spirits. Its only office is to point out, from the SS., the way of life; it has to do therefore with man's will as a practical science. God is, indeed, the chief object of its teaching, but not God per se, but God in his relation to creatures, so far as the knowledge of this relation promotes man's salvation. Man's highest end is to enjoy God; this presupposes knowledge, but is an act of the will, not of the reason. D. wholly denies an abstract knowledge of God; sensuous objects never exhibit the essence of God; the supernatural can never manifest itself through the natural. D. seems to contradict himself, by proving the existence of God from our experimental knowledge of created things; but the contradiction is solved by his declaration, that it is not God's nature, but only his relation to external things, which can thus be shown.—The difficulties of D.'s system continue to this day to perplex the minds of theologians.

His Comm. on Lombard was publ.: Paris, 1508, fol.; Venice, 1571, fol. An abstract of his tract against John XXII., was publ. by Raynaldus, 1333, § 48–69, with the inscription: libellus episcopi Meldensis. According to Oudin Durand wrote two Comm. upon Lombard; one whilst a Dominican, the other whilst he was Bishop; the second is the one printed, and the first to be found, with his other writings, in MS., in Paris. ENGELHARDT.*

Du Vergier (or du Verger), called St. Cyr after the monastery in Brenne, Poitou, of which he became abbot, studied theology at Louvain, where special attention was paid to the Church Fathers, particularly Augustine. He formed an intimate and lasting friendship, in 1605, in Paris, with C. Jansen, a pupil of Louvain. Their dislike of the dominant scholasticism of the Paris University constrained them to seek pure and sound doctrine in the Fathers. From 1611-1616 they lived together at a country-place near Bayonne. In 1617 Jansen returned to Louvain.—Cardinal Richelieu characterized St. Cyran as a man full of fire. St. Beuve said he had more fire than flame. The two friends maintained constant correspondence with each other. In his letters St. C. declares emphatically that he feels no less "esprit de principauté" than one who aimed at universal empire (Richelieu?). He sought, also, to inflame Vincent de Paula with his ideas of reform, to whom he once said: "I confess to you God has greatly enlightened me, and given me to understand that there is no Church—has been none for five or six hundred years. Formerly the C. was a great stream of pure water; now it is all filth. The channel is the same, but the waters have changed." To others he said: "The Council of Trent was mainly a political assembly;" and "the first scholastics, and St. Thomas himself, caused the greatest disorders."—At the same time he enveloped himself in mystery, and did not despise political arts. After 1621 Jansen and he corresponded in a secret language.—He was invited to become Court-preacher to Henrietta, the wife of Charles I. The position may have led him to assert Gallic principles for the Catholic C. in England, in opposition to the infringement of the Jesuits upon the jurisdiction of the Bishops, in his chief work upon Eccl. Law, under the name of Peter Aurelius. The assemblée générale du clergé thankfully adopted the book, and had it published twice, 1641, 1646, at their own expense. (Petri Aurelii theologi opera, jussu et impensis cleri gallicani denuo in lucem edita, Parisiis, 1646, excudebat Ant. Vitré, &c.).—The two friends were long persuaded that they needed an order as a bearer of their views. They partly succeeded in gaining over the congregation of the Oratorium. But it proved of greater value to their purpose, that St. Cyran became, 1635, spiritual director of the Abbey of Port-Royal (see A. Arnauld; Port-Royal). Richelieu who was as much provoked by St. Cyran's resolute contempt of flattery and bribes, as by his religious rigor, had him thrown into the prison of Vincennes, on May 14, 1638, eight days after Jansen's death, where he was confined for five years. But during his imprisonment he "begat more sons of repentance."—On Feb. 6, 1643, two months after Richelieu's death, he was liberated. He immediately resumed his labors. He died Oct. 11, 1643. Port-Royal obtained his heart, intestines, and hands, as relics.—Concerning his other writings see Reuchlin's Gesch. von Port-Royal, pp. 636-7. REUCHLIN.*

E.

Eadmer, Edmer, Ediner, a monk of Canterbury, whom Anselm of C. esteemed so highly that he requested Urban II. to associate E. with him, that he might live under his direction. Anselm obeyed E. in the smallest matters—even to turning himself in bed. In 1120 Eadmer was B. of St. Andrews, but disagreeing with the Scotch King, Alexander, he soon again returned to his monastery. E. is among the principal English writers of that age. His works are: 1) Hist. novorum, in 6 books, being the history of Lanfrank, Anselm, and Radulf, Archb. of Canterbury, publ. by Selden: London, 1623.—2) The life of Anselm, in Surius and the Bollandists, for April 21.—3) Two letters to the monks of Glastenhury upon the body of St. Dunstan, to those of Winchester upon the election of bishops.—4) The life of St. Bregwin, Archb. of Canterb., of St. Oswald, Archb. of York, of St. Odo, Archb. of Canterb.—all in Warton's Anglia sacra.—5) The life of St. Wilfrid, of York, in the Bollandists, April 24.—6) Some writings formerly, by mistake, ascribed to Anselm: de excellentia b. Mariæ V.; de Quatuor virtutibus, quæ fuerunt in b. Mariæ V.; de beatitudine cælestis patriæ; de similitudinibus S. Anselmi. Warton and Cave mention others.

HERZOG.*

Ebbo, Archb. of Rheims, notorious for his conduct towards his benefactor, Louis the Pious, the son of peasants, and born on one of the estates of Charlemagne, was reared and educated with Louis; though a bondman he was set free, and then became an ecclesiastic. Louis, who loved him much, made him his archivist, and on his ascending the throne, Archb. of Rheims. By Louis' advice he undertook a papal mission to Denmark, of which, however, Ansgar soon relieved him. He assisted at Ansgar's consecration as Archb. of Hamburg. After this he disgraced himself by participating in Lothaire's intrigues against his father, which ended in the Emperor's humiliation. Ebbo was at the head of the clerical assembly which condemned the Emperor, 833. When the Emperor regained his rights, Ebbo was confined in the monastery of Fulda, 834. E. was present at the restoration of Louis in Metz, and declared that Louis had been wronged. Louis then accused Ebbo at Diedenhofen; E. escaped deposition by a voluntary renunciation of office, 835. He was confined at Fulda until Louis's death, 840. Having then heard that Lothaire was hastening from Italy with an army, to seize the empire, E. joined him, and thus recovered his archbishopric, 840. But he was soon, again, compelled to leave it. Even Lothaire abandoned him, and he had to be content with the See of Hildesheim. He intended to write a penitential, but circumstances preventing, he induced his friend, Halitgar, afterwards B. of Cambrai, to undertake it. He wrote nothing of importance.—(See HARDUIN, Collectio conc., T. IV., V. Hist. littér. de la France, T. V. Gallia christiana, T. IX.) HERZOG.*

Ebed Jesus (Syriac: "Servant of God," Arabic; 'Abd Jeschû'a), surnamed Bar Brika ("Son of the Blessed"), a Nestorian theologian of varied acquirements, was b. about 1250, on the island of Gozarta, in the Tigris. Where he studied is not known; but his writings display familiarity with philosophy and dialectics, also with the works of the Jacobites Barhebræus. He was at home in Arabic, and could read Greek. He was early appointed B. of Sindschar and Arabia; in 1285 he still held this See. Whilst there he wrote a harmony of the Gospels; it is mentioned in a copy prepared after it in the Vatican. About 1287, not later, the Nestorian Patriarch Jaballaha appointed him Metropolitan of Nisibis, or Zoba, for which preferment he dedicated a collection of poems: "The paradise Eden," to J., 1291. After a useful career he died in Nov., 1318, soon after attending the Synod of Timothy II., which specially commended his two ed. of Canons. He wrote 20 works, chiefly theological; among them an exegetical work upon the O. and N. T. (not allegorizing); three upon the incarnation of the Logos, upon the sacraments of the Church, and one of great philosophical skill: "The book of the precious stone, upon the truth of faith" (publ. in Syriac and Latin by A. Mai, Scriptt. vetl., X., 317-366), transl. by E. into the Arabic also. His letters are likewise occupied with theological inquiries. His works on eccl. law, as the homiletical and polemical, are practical. The poems above named (50, in two parts: Enoch and Elijah) are wholly theological, beginning with the Trinity and ending with the Resurrection (see ASSEMANI, Bibl. or. 3, 1, p. 325, &c.). Besides these he wrote 12 poetical tracts upon all the sciences (a sort of encyclopedia), a "Book of the Philosophy of the Greeks," and an Exposition of Aristotle's letter to Alexander. Of literary value is his catalogue of about 200 Syriac authors (ASSEMANI, l. c.).—See also BERTHOLDT's krit. Journal, XIV, 288, &c., and the superficial article of St. MARTIN, Biogr. univers., XII., 438. R. GOSCHÉ.*

Eber, Paul, a theologian of the 16th cent., noted for his association with the leaders of the Reformation, and for his personal efforts to promote it. His father, John Eber, was a citizen and tailor of Kitzingen. Paul was born Nov. 8, 1511. In 1523 he was placed at the school in Ansbach. During this year his mother died, and he returned to his father. On his way home he had his back broken by a fall from a horse, and he was confined to the house a whole year. In 1526 he entered the new gymnasium at Nuremberg, where Joachim Camerarius, John Kezmann, E. Hess, and M. Roting were his teachers. He progressed so rapidly in his studies that in 1532 he entered the University of Wittenberg; the council, and a patrician family of Nuremberg supported him. In W., Luther, Melanchthon, Jonas, &c., were his teachers. He became specially attached to Melanchthon. In 1536 already he obtained the Master's degree, and in 1537 entered the philosophical faculty. Thenceforth Mel. and he formed so close a bond of friendship that M. rarely attempted anything without first consulting Eber, so that E. was called, in jest, Repertorium Philippi. M.'s letters to Eber (see Corpus Reform.) bear witness to their intimacy. Luther also placed great confidence in him (see the MS. hist. of Ratzberger, über L. u. s. Zeit, v. Neudecker: Jena, 1850, p. 131, &c.). Eber was then chiefly engaged in giving private instructions in philosophical branches, with revisals and exercises in debating; he also began his exposition of Paul's Epistles. In 1541 he married, through M.'s mediation, Helena Küffner, of Leipsic. They had 9 sons and 2 daughters, of whom only 2 sons and 2 daughters survived him. In 1544 he became Prof. of Latin grammar; he also lectured on natural philosophy. He was chosen Dean of the philosophical faculty in 1550; from 1551-52 he was Rector, and then until 1553 Vice-Rector of the University. After the death of J. Förster (1556) he was appointed preacher of the Castle church, Wittenberg, and (1557) Prof. of Hebrew in the University. But in 1559 he resigned the former post, having been appointed the city preacher of W., and general superintendent of the Electorate. In 1559 he was promoted to the theol. Doctorate, and in March, 1560, entered the theol. faculty. From this time he applied his academical labors chiefly to theology. During 1561-62 he continued the Latin sermons of Mel., lectured upon the Gospels, &c. He prosecuted his general superintendency, also, with happy results. His merits as a preacher appear in the sermons on the Catechism, 1562 (Nuremb., 1577). He took part in the great questions, and public controversies of the day. To the Augsburg interim he was decidedly opposed. In 1548 he participated in the convention at Pegau; in 1557 in the colloquy at Worms; in 1564 he went to Jena on business concerning the University; in 1568 Margrave George Frederick of Brandenburg called him to aid in settling the Church strifes at Ansbach; then he attended the colloquy at Altenburg, where he remained until March, 1569. Meanwhile he was deeply involved in the adiaphoristic and Crypto-Calvinistic controversies, and wrote largely. Before he entered the theol. faculty his works were chiefly historical and philosophical,¹ afterwards they were upon theol. subjects.² He also composed some favorite hymns (see Raumer, Sammlung, &c.: Basel, 1831). From 1563 he was in bad health, and he had sore domestic afflictions. He died Dec. 10, 1569.—(See Oratio de vita rev. et clarissimi viri, D. Pauli Eberi—habita a M. Balth. MENCIO: Witeb., 1581. MELCH. ADAMI, Vitæ theolog.

¹ We may mention: Hist. populi judæici a reditu ex Bab. exilio usque ad ultimum excidium Jerusol.: Witeb., 1548; new ed. 1562; German, Nuremb., 1667, from which a French, and from the French a Dutch transl. were made. Calendarium historicum: Witeb., 1550; in German by E.'s sons, Wittenb., 1582; in French, Geneva, 1639. Scripta publice propusita a Prof. in Acad. Witeb.: Witeb., 1553. Apellat. Quadrupedum, Insectorum, Volucrum, Piscium, Frugum, &c.: Witeb., 1556. De vita et scriptis C. Plinii: Witeb., 1556.

² "Unterricht, &c., v. heil. Sacram. d. Leibes," &c.: Witt., 1562; Latin, Witeb., 1563 (see STRONK., Beitr. zur Lit. I., 2, p. 500.—"Geschlechtsregister Christi.")—Biblia latina, quibus exhibetur quidem versio vulgata, ita autem correctæ, &c.: Witeb., 1565.—Psalterium cum Argumentis: Posthum. publ. (by Cellarius): Expos. Evangel. Dominicalium: Francf., 1576.

german.: Heidelb., 1620. P. FREHER, Theatrum vir. eruditione clarorum: Nuremb., 1688. PLANCK, Gesch. d. prot. Theol., II., 1 Th.: Lpz., 1798, p. 448–525. JOH. VOIGT, Briefwechsel d. berühmten Gelehrten d. Zeitalters d. Ref., &c.: Königsb., 1841. Especially: Dr. Paul Eber, &c., mit 49 Original-Urk. v. Chr. H. Sixt.: Heidelb., 1843.

NEUDECKER.*

Eberlin (Eberlein), Anton, an important advocate of the Reformation, born at Günzburg, then in Austrian Suabia, near the close of the 15th cent., joined the Franciscans, and soon so distinguished himself by his eloquence that he was appointed preacher of the monastery in Tübingen. In 1519 he was transferred to Ulm. There he read Luther's writings, and learned the way of salvation. He began to preach evangelical sermons. This enraged the monks so much that he resolved to escape their persecutions by leaving Ulm. The people deplored this, and tried to retain him. He went (1521) to Basel, then to Rheinfelden. His sermons attracted the people, but the authorities of Ensisheim, combining with the Bishop, effected his expulsion. This brought him into fellowship with Ulrich v. Hütten and Fr. v. Sickingen, with whom he took refuge. Here he wrote, in a rather passionate and self-sufficient spirit, against the sins and errors of the times. In 1522 he went to Wittenberg and met Luther and Melancthon. The latter convinced him that his way of defending the Gospel was likely to do more harm than good. E. then adopted a milder course, and at once wrote a work upon "The Abuses of Christian liberty." From this time he exercised himself in such moderation, in his controversy with Rome especially, that many charged him with lukewarmness. He had great influence with the masses; and when the peasants succeeded in getting into Erfurt, he restrained them from great excesses. E. now gained such reputation that his interference was sought in other cities. The Council of Erfurt elected him preacher at the cathedral, but he declined, and went to Wertheim on the M., 1526, from which time we have no account of him. He must have died soon after. — His writings, 34 in number, all in German, are mentioned by ERHARD, in Ersch and Gruber. One of the best, upon the duties of an ev. minister, is given in an append. to A. H. FRANKE, monita pastoralia. See also: DÖLLINGER, die Reform., &c., I., 205; STROBEL's liter. Museum I., 365.

HERZOG.*

Ebionites, Ebionitism, a sect-name variously used by the Church Fathers; it has also been differently employed and applied by modern writers. Some use it of a single sect; others erroneously extend its application, until at length it becomes identified, not only with Jewish, but with the entire primitive Christianity. It can hardly be questioned that this name, like "Nazareans" (EPIPHAN. adv. Hær., XXIX., 1), designated all Christians; not because they believed in so poor a Christ (GIESELER in Staudlin and Tzschirner, Archiv. IV., 307), but because they themselves were poor, especially those of the Church at Jerusalem, around which the name had its origin, and because poverty had so deep a significance under the Gospel. Both Jewish and Gentile Christians were reproached by the surrounding heathen as "poor" (Minuc. Felix: Octav. 36: "Ceterum quod plerique PAUPERES dicimur non est infamia nostra sed gloria"). The name, also, being of Hebrew derivation, came to be the special designation of Jewish Christians (ORIG., c. Cels. II., 1, "Ἑβραῖοι χρηματίζουσιν αἱ ἀπὸ Ἰουδαίων τὸν Ἰησοῦν ὡς Χριστὸν παραδεξάμενοι"). And when Jewish Christianity, outstripped by the Gentile Church, separated itself heretically, whilst Christians of Jewish origin who fell in with the Gentile development became fully identified with this, the name Ebionites came to be the general designation of heretical Judaizing Christianity. Origen mentions them thus, and speaks of several parties of them, differing slightly from each other. Irenæus names but one party; so EUSEB., and HIPPOLYTUS (Pseud. Orig. Philosophum. ed. Müller, p. 257) who mainly follows Irenæus. Later Fathers (Epiphanius, Jerome, and, in a secondary way, Theodoret) first mention the Ebionites as a sect distinct from the Nazareans. — This history of the name refutes the assertions of those fathers who trace the name to a certain Ebion, as founder of the sect (TERTULL., de præscr. hæc. c. 33. Lightfoot even traces the name to the Talmud. Cf. GIESELER Eccl. H.), or, one hardly knows whether in jest or seriously, to the contracted views of Judaizing Chr. (ORIG., Philoc. I.), or to their beggarly notions of the law and of Christ (ORIG., c. Cels., II., 1, 1. EUSEB., H. E., III., 27). In a certain sense the name is older than the party, as the common name of Jewish Christians, even of Christians in general; in another sense we may say the party is older than the name, since an extensive party of this kind existed among Jewish Christians before the name, previously in general use, (but which Justin M. does not mention, and which Iren. and Orig. use as a common name), was employed as that of a specific sect.

The nature of Ebionitism and its history, which can be understood only in its connection with Jewish Christianity in general, are so obscure, and have led to so many and such conflicting theories, because the sources of information are scanty and confused. Even though later Fathers, as Epiphanius, report what they themselves saw, their accounts refer to a period too remote from its origin to throw satisfactory light upon its earlier history. Two errors must be especially avoided: 1) that of combining all the accounts into one picture, and thus, in conflicting statements, giving one the preference. Each of the Fathers may furnish a description of the Judaizing Christians of his time, so far as known to him, and the diversity of these descriptions may serve to exhibit the history of Jewish Christianity. 2) That of regarding the various parties of Judaizing Chr. as forming such distinct sects, as the Fathers (especially Epiphanius) represent them to be. Subordinate diversities of sentiments among themselves did not constitute them into separate sects. — In the N. T. we may discover party differences among Jewish Chr., but no sects, in a proper sense, or heretical organizations. These first appear at the downfall of the Jewish State, especially the founding of Ælia Capitolina. During the Apoctolie period the legalistic party, which opposed Paul in Galatia and elsewhere, was in the minority, and was kept down (Acts 15, &c.). The judgment then executed upon Israel must have exerted a mighty influence. The people had rejected Christ, and Jewish Chr. lost its inner precedence. By the founding of Ælia Cap. it was externally driven from its metropolis, sundered from the current of development. Then it became heretical, and fell into different sects. Epiph. shows a consciousness that this disruption dates from the period named, by saying (Hær. XXX., 2) that Ebion first spread his errors in Pella, and Euseb. by stating that Thebutis (EUSEB. H. E., IV., 22) was the originator of the divisions among the Judaizing Chr. after the death of Symeon; though we cannot say with GIESELER (Stäudlin and Tzschirner, l. c., 320) that this mysterious personage was the founder of a sect. — Apart from the fact that during this period many Jewish Chr. relapsed into Judaism, or fell entirely over to heathenism, the judgments which befell Israel must have exerted a different influence upon those who remained Christians. One portion still maintained the prevailing moderate views, another became more rigidly legalistic. This forms the radical distinction between the parties subsequently called Nazareans and Ebionites. Stability characterized the former; the Ebionites had more life, and hence more variety of development, embraced the Gnostic element, universalism (the Clement. Hom.), and thus Gnosticism, into which they finally dissolved.

The treatment of Gentile Christians, and the requirements to be made of them in reference to the law, led to the more strict separation of the Jewish parties. The moderate party were satisfied with observing the law themselves; the other party insisted the more upon its observance by others, and thus excluded themselves from the Catholic Church (for they must have separated from the Catholics, not the reverse) whilst the moderate party were not yet considered heretical. This is the position of Jewish Christianity which Justin M. had in view. (Dial. c. Tr. c. 47, p. 265–6). But before Irenæus wrote adv. Hær. this party, left behind by the rapid progress of the Catholic C., must also have separated. Hence Iren. names only one heretical form of Jewish Chr. (I., 26. Comp. III., 11, CREDNER, Beitr. zur Einl. in's. N. T., Vol. I., upon the Gospels of the Judaizing Chr.). But now they embraced and taught the heresy of Cerinthus and Carpocrates in regard to Christ (consimiliter ut Cer. et Carpocr., cf ORIG., Philosoph. ed. Miller, VII., 34, p. 257: τὰ δὲ περὶ Χριστὸν ὁμοίως τῷ Κηρ. καὶ Καρπ. μὲνενονεν); denied that Christ was born of a virgin, and regarded him as a mere man (IV., 59; V., 11). These errors acquired growing ascendancy among them, in proportion as the Catholic C. laid greater stress upon the Christological doctrines. Thus ORIG. calls all Judaizing Chr. Ebionites, but distinguishes two parties (c. Cels., V., 61–65), the one holding, the other denying Christ's miraculous birth. These two cannot be the Gnostic and common Eb., but the Nazareans, and the Eb. in the narrower sense (GIESELER, H. E.), with the same difference, essentially, which Justin M.

mentions (cf. EUSEB. H. E., III., 27). — The fullest accounts of the Eb. are found in Epiph., Jerome, and Augustine. Theodoret (Hær. fabb. comp. II., 2, 3) errs in making the Nazareans a third party. But apart from the Gnostic errors thus embraced (see Elzautes) we shall hardly discover any other marks of Ebionitism. Like the Nazareans they were Chiliasts (JEROME, ad. Es., 35, i. f.; 11, 15, &c.). They rejected Paul (EPIPH., XXX., 16; JEROME, ad. Matth. 12, 2); imposed the law upon all Christians (JEROME, ad. Es., 1: 12; TERTULL., de præscr. hæc. c. 33); considered Christ a mere man, the son of Joseph and Mary (l. c. and EPIPH., XXX., 2, 34; JEROME, Ep. 89 ad August.; TERTULL., aut. de carne Chr., 14; de virg. vel., c. 6; ORIG., Hom. XVII. in Luc., &c.). Hence similar views were subsequently called Ebionitism; thus Alexander, B. of Alex., calls the doctrine of Arius (THEODOR., H. E., I., 3).

At the time of Epiphanius the Eb. lived chiefly in the country along the Dead Sea, in Nabathea, Paneas, Moabitis, Cochaba — but were also found in Rome and Cyprus (see Elzautes, Clementines). — (See GIESELER, l. c., CREDNER in Winer's Ztschr. für wissenschaft. Theol., I., 2, p. 211, &c. (Sulzbach, 1829). BAUR: De Ebionit. origine, &c. (Tübinger Osterprogr. of 1831). SCHLIEMANN, "Die Clement.," &c.: Hamb., 1841. HILGENFELD, Die Clement. Recogn. u. Hom., &c.: Jena, 1848. RITSCHL, Die Entstehung d. altkath. Kirche, 247, &c. UHLHORN, Die Hom. u. Recogn. d. Clem. Rom.: Göttingen, 1854, p. 383, &c.). UHLHORN.*

Eck, John, properly Jno. Maier, the most noted, but also most notorious of the opponents of Luther and the Reformation, was born Nov. 13, 1486, at Eck, county of Mindelheim, Suabia. From his 9th to his 12th year he resided with his uncle, Martin Maier, pastor of Rothenburg, where, as he tells us, he had read nearly the whole of the Bible before the end of his 12th year. In his 12th year (1499) he visited Heidelberg, where he studied the ancient languages and philosophy. From H. he went to Tübingen, and studied the ancient languages under Reuchlin and J. Agricola. In his 14th year he was made A. M., and commenced theology. He names nine theologians, among them J. Lemp and P. Scriptoris, whose instructions he attended. In 1501 the plague drove him from Tübingen to Cologne, where he read Aquinas. At Freiburg, whither he was again driven by the plague, he studied jurisprudence, mathematics, and cosmography, and also began to teach philosophy. In 1506 he commenced his literary career with his Logices Exercitamenta. He seems after this to have applied himself more exclusively to theology, in which he soon obtained the degrees of Bachelor and Licentiate, and read lectures in the spirit and manner of Occam. In his studies thus far his aim had been learned pomp, more than thorough erudition; and he sought especially to gain fame in controversy, his skill in which drew to him the attention of men like C. Peutingen, of Augsburg. On the recommendation of P. he obtained a place at Ingolstadt, where he became so noted for his dialectic gladiatorship, that William, Duke of Bavaria, gave him a professorship of theology, on which post he entered in Nov., 1510, after he had previously obtained the degree of D. D. (at Ingolstadt, and not at Freiburg). All his efforts aimed at renown, honors, and emoluments. He succeeded in obtaining a canonicate in the cathedral of the B. of Eichstätt, and the office of pro-chancellor of the Univ. of Ingolstadt (1512). He also spread his fame by the most diverse literary labors. He tried his hand at theology on the difficult subject of predestination (he published, Augsb., 1514, centuriæ VI., de prædestinatione, written in the semi-Pelagian spirit of the school to which he belonged), and at ethics; in philosophy he commented on the logic and physics of Aristotle, and gave also, at intervals, (thus, in 1515 at Bologna, 1516, at Vienna,) the pageant of a public discussion to his admiring contemporaries. He dabbled in mystics also, and wrote a commentary on Dionysius the Areopagite. In these labors, however, he was wanting in originality and thoroughness, and only used the investigations of others for his own purposes. Totally ignorant of the wants of the age, he followed the prevailing effects of philosophy: of an earnest conscientiousness and love of truth he shows not the least trace.—Of course, the earliest movements of the Reformation found such a man unprepared for it. He boasts of himself, that, at the very moment when Carlstadt and Luther had commenced to steer the ship of Peter towards ruin, he was deeply engaged in the "philosophia tresmagistica, orphica, platonica, ægyptiaca et Arabum," and the "theologia dionysiaca." Before the publication of the theses, Eck had already become acquainted with Luther; the latter had written to him a friendly letter, and Eck, in a letter to Carlstadt, May, 28, 1518 (LÖSCHER, Vollständ. Ref. Act., II., 64), calls L. the "common friend." This, however, had not prevented him, after Luther's theses against indulgences had been widely circulated and very favorably received, from publishing his obelisci; in manuscript, indeed, but with the evident design of stirring up the opposition. The tone of the obelisks (given in LÖSCHER, II., 333) is designedly such as to bring upon Luther the odium of heresy; for at that time already, Eck was inquisitor of heresy for Bavaria and Franconia. Their chief purpose is to represent Luther as the destroyer of ecclesiastical order, busy in spreading the Bohemian poison (obel. 18), and in undermining the legitimate authorities of the Church. Eck charges L. with want of reverence toward the Holy Father; calls him a new prophet (obel. 24), who would be wiser than the fathers. The insolence with which he ventured against an opponent like Luther, was, however, fearfully punished. L. at first gave his defence into the hands of Carlstadt, who, in an academical disputation, May 9, 1518, proposed 380 theses, with 26 others concerning the freedom of the will. Their object is to defend the biblical, not papal, orthodoxy of the Wittenberg professors. C. attacks the scholasticism of Eck as merely "opiniones novorum theologorum," and declares his purpose of testing the controverted question by the "decreta Christi Paulique." In thus advancing against his opponent the authority of the Scriptures, C. also proves from them that the true justification of man comes from God only, that our own good works have no value before God, but must come from God; that, hence our salvation depends upon the election of God, and not upon our own works; that the will is enslaved by sin; and that heresy does not consist in sinning against the Church of the Pope, but against the Word of God as interpreted by the Spirit (Th. 349). With the latter thesis C. designed not only to invalidate the charge of heresy maliciously advanced against the Wittenbergers, but also to brand the prevailing scholasticism of the R. Church as unscriptural, and therefore heretical. The closing theses show what measures Wittenberg looked for from the inquisitor and his party. Eck, informed of the campaign thus opened against him, would gladly have avoided its dreaded consequences. With this purpose he wrote, May 28, 1518, a rather humble letter to Carlstadt. He excuses the publication of his theses by saying, that they had found publicity without his knowledge and against his will, since they had been written privately for the B. of Eichstätt; but that expressing views confidentially differed widely from publishing them. He guards himself also against the charge that flattery had drawn him to the enemies of Wittenberg, and hopes that former friendship will prevent Carlstadt from opening a battle against the "innocent Eck." In the latter case, however, he also threatens to defend himself (LÖSCHER, II., 64). These concessions of Eck were made too late. The theses of C. had been published in Wittenberg, and C. even assailed Eck and scholasticism with satire, which so offended Dr. Eck, that he complained to the Elector of Saxony on account of it. Meantime a correspondence was carried on, not wholly without bitterness, between C. and Eck. The latter denied the necessity of daily repentance for all Christians, and defended the freedom of the will in an apology of his obelisks. C. replied in a "defensio adv. Eckii monomachiam" (Aug., 1518), in the introduction of which he defends with all his strength the sole authority of the Scriptures, and attacks on Scripture grounds, and with complete success, the pelagianism of Eck.—In the above work C. had expressed himself willing to meet Eck in a public disputation. Eck having more confidence in the force of his tongue than of his pen, gladly accepted the proposal. Whilst Luther was at Augsburg in the autumn of 1518, it was agreed between him and Eck to hold the disputation during the coming year at Leipsic. From a letter to Eck of Nov. 15, 1518, Luther seems to have entertained hopes of an amicable settlement. But Eck, only the more emboldened by this, published in Feb., 1519, a programme of the approaching disputation, in which he tries once more to bring the odium of heresy upon Luther and Carlstadt, and the University of Wittenberg in general. The attack was the more dishonorable and malicious, as L. had pledged himself to Miltitz to maintain silence. But L. held himself now as absolved from his promise, and in a public letter to Carlstadt gave Eck such a thorough castigation, that E. could no longer be in doubt as to what awaited him at Leipsic.—Eck was doubtless more anxious to win laurels in a contest with Luther than Carlstadt. He therefore published, February, 1519, 13 theses, which he declared himself ready to defend against L., and which treated mostly of penitence and indulgences. The 13th was designed as a trap for L., and read: "Romanam Ecclesiam non fuisse superiorem aliis Ecclesiis ante tempora Sylvestri, negamus. Sed cum, qui sedem beatissimi Petri habuit et fidem, successorem Petri et Vicarium Christi generalem semper agnovimus." Eck really gained his end; for L. took up the glove, and opposed the 13 theses with the following: Rom. Eccl. esse omnibus aliis superiorem, probatur ex frigidissimis R. pontificum decretis, intra quadringentos annos natis. CONTRA quæ sunt historiæ approbatæ mille et centum annorum, textus scripturæ divinæ et decretum Niceni Concilii omnium sacratissimi." In order to make the presence of L. on the arena the more sure, Eck charged him, in a publication of March 14, 1519, with cowardice, and that he used Carlstadt only to cover his own retreat. L. published a rejoinder, declaring that he "feared neither the Pope nor the name of the Pope, neither popekins nor puppets." L. found it necessary, however, to encourage his friends, who had been intimidated by Eck. He was also resolved no longer to spare the papal chair. The R. Church was to him already "Babylon" (De Wette, Luth. Brief., I., 260); the power of the papal seat he regards a secular one (Ibid. I., 264). The promised disputation had in the meantime excited opposition in other quarters. The University and theologians of Leipsic, and the B. of Merseburg, tried to prevent it; but the personal interference of Duke George overcame all opposition. It commenced, therefore, on June 27, 1519. From June 27th to July 3d Eck discussed with Carlstadt the freedom of the will. The conviction of the Reformers that there was no rule of doctrine except the Scriptures, had already been so widely accepted, that Eck had to accede to it. He appealed, though hesitatingly, to the apocryphal passage, Sirach 15, 14, etc., and conceded also that the free will could do nothing without divine grace. C., on the other hand, maintained that the free will was by nature impotent, and became active only by grace. Eck advanced a synergism of divine grace and the human free will in order to the production of good works, whilst Carlstadt maintained that God alone was the source of good works. Eck replied sophistically, that God did the whole (totum) of good works, but not entirely (totaliter): that he gave the power to do good, though not the good work itself. The discussions themselves led to no conclusion, especially since Eck was more concerned about his own reputation as debater, than about the truth. He twisted and turned like an eel, and always escaped his opponents by turns of sophistry. On the 4th of June, Eck discussed with Luther the 13 theses, concerning the papal power. He defended the divine authority of the papacy; and this in such a manner as to bring all who denied it into repute of heresy. L. asserted that Christ was the sole head of the Church, and at once brought Eck into a difficulty by demanding of him the passage of Scripture in which Peter had appointed a successor. The primacy of the Pope was derived from Matt.

16:16, and the Fathers, especially Cyprian. But as these grounds are very weak, denunciations were resorted to, and L. decried as an enemy of the Church and friend of the heretical Bohemians. The discussion grew constantly more violent and bitter. July 8, the doctrine of purgatory was discussed: from the 11th onward the doctrine of indulgences and penitence. On the 14th the discussion on free will was resumed between Eck and Carlstadt, but without leading to any material result.—The general impression made by the discussion was rather favorable to Eck. His assurance, his skill in discussion, and his bold reference to tradition and the papal power, was imposing to the masses. He had also done everything in order to intimidate his opponents, and demanded that the matter should be referred to the Pope, or to some Universities favorable to him. Having the truth little at heart, he also made constant concessions, in order to be able to boast that he had drawn his opponents to his side. His chief aim at Leipsic was to appear as defender of the papal power; and he is said to have expressed himself willing to concede everything else to L., if the latter would only have withdrawn his 13th thesis. He boasted that he had defeated L.; and he had really succeeded in impressing upon L. the stamp of heresy: for whilst Eck was feted, L. and Carlstadt were treated coldly and uncourtously. Eck preached also during the Leipsic discussion, and used every effort to inflame the crowd against Luther: the latter was forbidden to preach. Eck, being the special favorite of the authorities, had always the last word. Having no perception of the reformatory movement of the mind, which no art could restrain, he regarded the entire matter as a monkish or scholastic quarrel, and declared openly that if the indulgence mongers had praised their wares more moderately, L.'s name would never have been heard. How impartial participants in the discussion thought of Eck, may be seen from a letter of P. Mosellanus to J. v. Pflug. Eck is described as tall and broad, of a coarse voice, thick and strong loins, suited well for an actor or auctioneer: his face such as would indicate a butcher or soldier, rather than a theologian: of strong memory, but weak judgment: bringing forward a "pile of stuff" to captivate his hearers: of boundless impudence; often by a sophistic turn representing the views of his opponents as his own, and then claiming the victory. L., perhaps, judged him not too harshly when he said that "Eck was suited for theology as an ass to the harp."—After the close of the discussion Eck, of course, tried all means to reap the fruit of his pretended victory, and to trumpet it to the world. Of Luther and Carlstadt he spoke most disparagingly. In a letter of July 23, to the Elector of Saxony, he tried to excite L.'s patron against him, by stigmatizing him as a heretic, who denied the authority of the Pope. An odious and embittered controversy followed, in which Melanchthon also, who, in a letter to Æcolampadius (July 19), had ranged himself upon the side of L., was involved. Eck attacked M. with the utmost insolence, but he was soon forced to forsake the offensive for the defensive. Luther, in the preface to his "Resolutionen," had reminded Eck that he had admitted concerning free will, that, without grace, it could do only evil; Eck, in his "expurgati," had recourse again to defamation. The more impotent he felt himself compared with Luther, the more the number of his opponents increased, who excited his anger by their ridicule, the more he became determined to ruin his antagonist. His anger broke forth already in his "responsio pro H. Emser contra MALESANAM Luth. VENATIONEM ad J. de Schleinitz," etc. After having in vain requested the Elector of Saxony to burn L.'s works, he prepared to burn them publicly at Ingolstadt, but was prevented by J. Reuchlin. He succeeded, however, in obtaining the condemnation of L. by the theol. faculties of Cologne and Louvain, and especially in exciting the aged Hochstranten against him. After having, in 1520, finished a work "de primatu Petri," it seemed to him that the time had arrived for a decisive blow. He went to Rome in order to present his book to the Pope, and to obtain weapons against the Wittenberg "heretic." — Rome being much displeased with L., Eck's insinuations were readily accepted by the papal court. Luther's condemnation was determined upon, and on the 15th of June, the notorious "bull of Eck" (see Sattler's Gesch. des Herzogth. Würtemb., II., Beil. Nr., 92, p. 216) was issued, in which 41 articles from the works of L. were designated as "heretical, erroneous, seductive, and offensive." On the 3d of May Eck had written vauntingly, that the publication and execution of the bull in Germany had been entrusted to him. This fatal mistake of the Pope, which made the bitter enemy of L. the executor of the bull, turned the course of affairs in L.'s favor. On his return to Germany, in Aug., 1520, Eck met with a very cool reception. Although he had the bull posted in public in Meissen, Merseburg, and Brandenburg, yet the Bishops hesitated to publish it. Even Duke George, Eck's great patron, prohibited the publication, except by special permission of the B. of Merseburg. At Erfurt the students burned the bull before the eyes of Eck, and he found himself compelled to flee to Freiburg for safety. But although the bull had thus proved a failure, Eck had nevertheless succeeded in bringing about the breach between L. and the Pope, and thus permanently establishing the schism in the western Church.¹ — From this time on, Eck spent all his energy in combating the Reformation; and it is a characteristic sign of the times that he succeeded in acquiring the distinction of being one of the chief pillars and champions of the Rom. Church, though his character was not such as to inspire with respect even his co-religionists. After several other journeys to Rome in the employ of the Duke of Bavaria, he took part, in 1524, in the Convention of Ratisbon, the result of which, however, only excited the ridicule of the people. His journey through England, also, added little to his fame. To recover his waning reputation, and also to support the tottering Church of Switzerland, he offered his services at the colloquy of Baden, to be held in May 1526. Here, too, his defence of the Romish doctrines was very unskilful, although outwardly the colloquy ended favorably to him. — A similar disputation he held in 1527, at Augsburg, with Urb. Rhegius. At the Diet of Augsburg, in 1530, he was particularly active, being one of the authors of the refutation of the Augsb. Conf. — Somewhat later he attended the colloquies of Worms and Ratisbon, and died in 1553. — He was a prolific author, and showed extensive erudition: he published no work, however, which gained for him a permanent place in literature, or really advanced the cause which he treated. His knowledge of Hebrew and Greek was limited, his Latinity defective, his theology the scholasticism of the 16th cent., without, however, the subtle distinctions and spirit of the former scholastics. His works, written before his controversies with the Reformers, have already been mentioned. Very numerous are those written against the Reformation. His German translation of the Scriptures (1537), published to supplant that of Luther, was a total failure (see Art. Bibelübersetzungen). In a special work he defended the burning of Huss and Jerome, of Prague, by the Council of Constance. Other works are: De non tollend. Christ. et SS. imaginib., 1522. — De pœnit. et confess., 1523. De init. pœnitentiae seu contritione, 1523. De satisfactione, 1523. Enchirid. locorum comm. Adv. Lutheranos, 1525. One of his most celebrated works is his "de sacrificio missæ," 1526. A Defence of Purgatory, 1530. Explanations of the Gospels, and other collections of sermons. A collection of his works was undertaken by himself, 1530–35.

DR. SCHENKEL. — Reinecke.

Eckart, a deeply speculative Dominican, and one of the most remarkable thinkers of the middle ages, perhaps of any age. He is claimed by speculative philosophers and orthodox theologians, by Protestants and Romanists. Of his works, only several sermons, appended to Tauler's sermons, Basle, 1521, are generally accessible. A collection of them is soon to be published by Prof. Fr. Pfeiffer. It will contain 110 sermons, 18 treatises, 70 theses, and the Liber positionum mentioned by Trithemius. — He lived in the 14th century. The exact time and place of his birth are unknown. He appears for the first time at Paris, as Dominican and teacher in the Collego of St. James. Having been made D. D. at Rome, he was elected as provincial of Saxony. In 1304 a chapter of his order held at Toulouse renewed this election. Three years later a chapter held at Strasburg appointed him Vicar-general of Bohemia, with power to reform the monasteries of this country. Soon after we meet him at Strasburg, where he probably became acquainted with the Brethren of the free spirit. He was next called to Frankfort on the M. as prior of his order. Here the first accusation was made against him, viz.: that of standing in suspicious connections. He was, however, acquitted. At this time, however, the attention of the Church was directed more and more to the Br. of the free spirit; and as E. preached shortly after at Cologne, where Archb. Henry had, at a provincial Synod, in 1322, condemned the doctrines of the Beghards, he could no longer escape ecclesiastical censure. At a chapter held at Venice, in 1325, serious charges were brought against brethren, who, in Germany, were preaching things in the vernacular, which could only mislead the ignorant. In the following year a chapter held at Paris deposed the provincial prior of Germany, who, perhaps, was none other than Eckart. His doctrines having gained many adherents among the Dominicans of Cologne, the whole order was accused, in 1326, by the Archb., as suspected of heresy, whereupon the Pope, John XXII., commissioned a brother, Nicholas, of Strasburg, to visit the monasteries of Germany. Nicholas, meantime, appealed to the Pope against the Archbishop, who, Jan., 1327, had summoned E. before the inquisition. Eckart, convinced that he taught nothing which conflicted with the doctrines of the Church, declared himself willing to submit to the tribunal, and also to retract whatever was proven to be heretical in his doctrine. The inquisitors demanded an unconditional recantation; and as E. was unwilling to make this, he was condemned as a heretic. Having appealed to the Pope, he was summoned to Avignon, where 28 doctrinal points were laid before him, which he admitted to be his own, and which are also found in his printed sermons; 17 of them are condemned as heretical, the rest as suspicious; E. himself was censured, and his works prohibited. The bull of condemnation was published March 27, 1329. Eckart had in the meantime died. The bull says that E. had recanted everything; this means, perhaps, only that he had rejected the heretical interpretation which might be given to doctrines which he regarded as agreeing with orthodoxy. Notwithstanding the condemnation of his doctrines, his disciples continued to hold him in high honor. Henry Suso, in his autobiography, calls him the holy master Eckart, and commends his sweet doctrine. His sermons were copied in numerous monasteries of Germany, Switzerland, the Tyrol, and Bohemia. Card. Nicholas de Cusa mentions Eckart's works as the chief fountain of his philosophy.—The doctrine of E. is the pantheism which we find among the Brethren of the free spirit, but we do not find in his works the practical aberrations of this sect; nor those views conflicting with the rites of the Church and with the moral law, which were objected to the Beghards. Though his own exalted mind saved him from these consequences, they may nevertheless be deduced from the spirit of his system. This system corresponds entirely with Hegel's philosophy of religion. Indeed, we must regard E. as the father of modern pantheism.

¹ Thus far the labor of Dr. Schenkel, whom sickness prevented from finishing it. The remainder is by Dr. Herzog.

See the article on E. in the "theol. Stud. u. Kritik., 1839, No. 3; also Etud. sur le mysticisme allem. au XIV., Siecle in the Memoir. de l'Acad. des Sciences mor. et polit.: Par., 1847. MARTENSEN, Meister Eckart, eine theol. Studie: Hamb., 1842. C. SCHMIDT.—Reinecke.

Eden (עֵדֶן, pleasure, delight, according to the Masorets; not גֶּן, garden in general) or "the garden of Eden," is the Scripture name of the abode of Adam and Eve before the fall (Gen. 2: 8, 15, &c.). The LXX., following the

Chaldee, calls it "Paradise," a park, pleasure-garden (Neh. 2: 8; Cant. 4: 13; Eccles. 2: 5; XEN., Cyrop. 1, 3, 12). Moses, describing its locality from his position, says it lay in the East, and mentions its geographical boundaries; but his account is so indefinite for modern inquiries, that its actual locality is still undetermined, though numerous hypotheses have been advocated. Some have attributed the difficulties besetting this matter to the effects of the flood upon the physical conformation of the earth; others to the presumption that the account of Moses does not pretend to strict historical accuracy.—According to Gen. 2: 10–14 the place was watered by a river which issued from Eden, and then parted into four streams. Of these one, Pison, flowed around (or through, as the original may mean; see Is. 23: 16; Cant. 3: 3; 1 Sam. 7: 16) the land of Havilah, where the best gold, bdellium, and the onyx stone, were found. The second, Gihon, (the forth-rushing), ran around the land of Cush; the third, Hiddekel, was east of Assyria; the fourth, was the Euphrates. Of these the two last alone (Hiddekel being unquestionably the Tigris—see PLINY, II. N., 6, 27; CURT., 4, 9, 16; RITTER'S Erdk. II., 128; PAULY'S Realencl. VI., 2, 1923, &c.), can now be certainly identified, which though not exactly flowing from one head, take their rise near enough together, in the Armenian mountains, to allow Latin poets, also, to ascribe to them one source. Concerning the first two divers opinions exist. If we cling to the district traversed by the last two, Pison might be taken to be the same as the Phasis, which has its head in the Moschican mts.; in this case Havilah (Chavilah) would be Colchis (RELAND, diss. miscell., and CALMET). The Gihon would then be the Araxes, which takes its rise near the head of the Euphrates (PLUT., Pompej., 33), and is called its "brother" (STEPH. BYZ., s. v. Εἰσπαρίς), and Cush would be the land of the Cossæi in northern Susiana (Khusistan, see STRABO, XI., 524; XVI., p. 744; PAULY'S Realencl., II., 729; KNOBEL, Völkertafel, &c., 250). But in the Bible Havilah always designates a southern country (Gen. 10: 7, 29; 1 Sam. 15: 7) as South Arabia, Abyssinia, India (KNOBEL, l. c., 186, &c., 260, &c.), whither the products here named refer; and Cush is constantly used of Ethiopia, S. Arabia, and the S. countries inhabited by people of dark color (KNOBEL, l. c., 247, &c.). But to suppose, for this reason, that the Nile is meant (Jos. Antt., I., 1, 3, and other ancients), the sources of which are sometimes associated with the Euphrates (PAUSAN., 2, 5, 2), sometimes with India (ARRIAN., Anab., 6, 1; PAULY, l. c., V., 643 n.) will not do, for the Hebrews were too well acquainted with the Nile to connect it with two Asiatic rivers.—EWALD (Gesch. Isr., I., 331, 1st ed.) supposes that in the course of tradition the names of the rivers changed their forms, and that the author of Genesis mentioned such known streams as bore names most resembling those current in tradition. In like manner LASSEN ("Indische Alterth." I., 528, &c.), and KNOBEL (Gen. 27, &c.) suppose that Gihon is the Oxus, which really is called Gihon by ancient and modern Oriental scholars (thus J. D. Michaelis), Pison the Indus, which also means "streams" (Gesenius); then Cush would designate the dark colored people W. of the Indus (Knobel, Völkert., 248, 270, &c.), and Havila, its products corresponding, India, or the land of the Darada called Kampila in Ælian., nat. anim., III., 4. — But whatever these hints and hypotheses may be worth, it must be admitted that no certain locality can be fixed by the boundaries of Moses, with our present means of ascertaining their import. — Traditions agreeing more or less with the Mosaic account, are found among all Asiatic nations (see Bähr, mos. Cult., I., 168, &c.; Gesen. on Is., II., 316, &c.; Bohlen, d. alte Indien, I., 12; II., 210; Kleuker, Zend avesta, I., 82; II., 222, 277, 299, &c.; III., 91, 96; Duncker, Gesch. d. Alterth., II., 371, &c. Comp. Vendid., VII., 37–40; Burnouf, comment., 239, 395, &c., 441). — For the literature of the whole subject see the Comm. on Genesis by Tuch, and that by Knobel; Lenzgerke, Ken. I., 20; Winer's Lex. The garden of Eden is referred to in Ezek. 28 : 13; (31 : 9, 16); 36 : 35; Joel 2 : 3. See also Adam and Sin.

Another Eden, mentioned in Amos 1 : 5, was near Damascus. It is either the village Ehden on Lebanon (Burke, Reisen I., 66; Pauly, l. c., 1159), or the modern Beit el Dschanne (house of paradise). — A third Eden, taken from the Assyrians (2 Kings 19 : 12; Is. 37 : 12), is mentioned in Ezek. 27 : 23 in connection with Haran and Kalneh; situated, therefore, in N. Mesopotamia, towards the Tigris; it may be the Maadon named by Assemann, bibl. or., II., 224.

RÜTERSCH.*

Edessa (called Edesia by the Armenians, Urhoi by the Syrians, er-Rohā by the Arabs, Orfa by Christians and Turks), a city of N. W. Mesopotamia, in lat. 37° 9', long. 56° 40', on the borders of the arable land, and the stony desert, having in the N. W. back-ground steep rocky cliffs, about 60 miles E. of the Euphrates. Tradition refers its origin to the remotest antiquity. The targums of Pseudo-Jonathan, of Jeruschalmi, of Jerome, and Ephraem S., make it the Erech of Gen. 10 : 10, a chief city of Nimrod's empire (see Chaldea). Michaelis (Spicil., I., 220–25), Buttmann (Mythologus, I., 235, &c.) and v. Bohlen (Die Genesis, 129) still adopted this tradition. But as the land of Shinar hardly extended so far N., others (Salmas., ad. Solin., 841; A. Bochart., Phaleg., IV., 16; Gesen., Thes., 151) identify Erech with 'Apezza (Ptolem., VI., 3, 4; Amian. Marcell., XXIII., 6, 26) on the Tigris, on the borders of Babyl. and Susiana, or with 'Opxon (Ptolem., V., 20, 7) S. of Bab., near the lakes formed by branches of the Euphrates (Rosenmüller, bibl. Alterthumsk., I., 2, 25, &c.; Tuch, Komm. über d. Gen., 235; Knobel, Völkert., &c., 341. Winer, R. W. B.) Another tradition of the resident Arabs and Jews makes Edessa the Ur of Gen. 11 : 28 (see Ritter, Geogr., XI., 295, 333). Historically we know nothing of Edessa as a city before the age of the Macedonians and the Seleucids. According to Cedrenus, Hist. Comp. ed. Imm. Bekker, I., 293; and Joann. Malalas, Chronogr. XVII., ed. Dindorf., p. 418, Sel. Nicator founded it, and called it Antiochia Mirobarbara. Pliny, H. N., V., 21, and Steph. Byzant., under

'Αρτιόχεια (p. 45, 2 ed. Westerm.; Comp. Ritter, l. c., 335) agree with this view. Another name of it was Kalirrhoe (hence Urhoi, Roha, Orfa), derived from its many streams (Goli., ad. Alfergan., p. 244; Michael., l. c., p. 221; Buttmann, l. c., 235, &c.). The name Edessa speedily supplanted that of Antiochia, and soon after the Seleucids established their rule, the city became the centre of an independent government, called Osrhoenic, after the native name of the city (Urhoi, Orhoi, Osrhoë. See Assem., Biblioth. Orient., I., 470), whose first King was Orhoi (or Osrhoë) Bar Chevyo, c. 136, B. C. It consisted of a Greek-Macedonian colony, and formed an aristocratic elective monarchy, the King being selected from the adjacent nations. The eighth of these rulers, Abgar Bar Abgar served in the army of Tigranes against Lucullus, but after the victory of the Romans he joined them. The fifteenth is said to be the Abgar Uchomo, (A. D. 8–45) concerning whom tradition reports an exchange of epistles with Christ (see Abgarus; Ritter, l. c., 341–343). The twenty-second king, Ma'nu Bar Aizat (Dio Cass., Hist. Rom., LXVIII, 17–21), also Abgar, was dethroned by Trajan, and Edessa was overthrown. The last of the independent Osrhoenic princes was Abgar Bar Ma'nu (A. D. 200–217) whom Caracalla took captive by treachery in 217. The kingdom was then converted into a Roman Province. Edessa was then called Colonia, was made a metropolis by Macrinus, and thenceforth shared the fortunes of the Romans in Mesopotamia until the Arabs took it, c. 637, 641. The Mohammedans held it (excepting from 1097–1144, when the Crusaders under Baldwin ruled there) until Nureddin, 1146, destroyed it. (See Ersch and Gruber, Encycl., XXXI., 70, &c.: Wilken, Gesch. d. Kreuzz.)

Edessa possesses importance for the history of the Oriental Chr. Church, as an Episcopal See, and the chief seat of Syrian learning. Though the account of Abgar Uchomo may be legendary, it is certain that Christianity was early spread in that region. The 26th Osrhoenic King (152–187), if not himself a Christian, was not averse to Christianity, and is said to have thought much of the Gnostic Bardanes. (Epiph., Hær. LVI.; Assem., l. c., 389, 423). In 202 there was a Chr. Church there, which was destroyed by a flood in the Daizan (the Ξειρος of the Greeks, a winter-stream on the N. side of the city. See Assem., l. c., 391). In 313 B. Cono laid the corner-stone of a church edifice which his successor Saades finished. It was afterwards enlarged on the S. side by B. Aitallaha, and a grave-yard added. About 350 B. Abraham built the Church of the Confessors, and in 371 the great baptistery was erected. The Emperor Julian, upon the insulting pretence of making their way to heaven easier by impoverishing the Christians of E., ordered them to divide their Church treasures among his soldiers, threatening their city with fire and the sword if they refused. His death (363) frustrated his malice. — E. could not escape the internal strifes of the Eastern Church during that period. As early as Julian's reign the Arian party had used sanguinary measures against the Valentinians, and expelled their opponents from Edessa in 373. But in 378 the orthodox party returned again to E., and for the next hundred years displayed great zeal in building churches, monasteries, and hospitals (ASSEM. l. c., 424; II., Dissert. de Monophys.). Edessa had also the first schools of the country, which developed Nestorianism and reared advocates of it, who served as teachers in the Persian schools which flourished there, c. 440. When the orthodox Emperors expelled Nestorian teachers and their pupils from the empire, the Persians welcomed them, among whom, thenceforth, Nestorianism rapidly spread, and the Syrian language and literature were diligently cultivated (ASSEM. l. c., I., 203, 351, 353; II., 402; IV., 70, &c., 428, &c., 744, 924, &c. LINGERKE, de Ephraem S. arte hermen., 85, &c.).

The modern Roha or Orfa, Urfa, became better known through NIEBUHR (1766, Reisebeschr., II., 406, &c.): OLIVIER (1804, Voyage dans l'empire Ottoman, &c.: Paris an XII., Vol. II., 331, &c.); AINSWORTH (Researches in Assyria, &c.: London, 1836, p. 261, &c.; Travels, &c., in Asia Minor, &c.: Lond., 1842, II., 106, &c.); BUCKINGHAM (Travels in Mesopot., p. 51, &c.) have furnished much additional information. It is situated upon two hills, and the intervening valley, in the S. W. corner of a broad plain, Edne, at the foot of mountains which there inclose the plain. Its form is that of an irregular isocles triangle, having its base towards the S. and its rounded cone towards the N. A white limestone wall surrounds it. On a summit in the S. W. corner is a castle which, a large hall excepted, occupied by the sentinel soldiers, was in ruins when Olivier visited the place. Back of this lay other ruins, called Nimrod's tower or palace. The castle, surrounded by a trench cut in the rocks, is said by PROCOP., de edific. Justin., II., 7, p. 228, ed. Dind., to have been built by Justinian. Several fountains issue from the base of the castle hill, which richly supply the town with water. Below two of these, large reservoirs are formed, full of carp and barbel, held to be sacred to Abraham. Mohammedan tradition says Orfa was the place where Nimrod intended to kill Abraham, and that these two fountains sprang forth from the spot where Abraham knelt, and prayed God to deliver him. The great mosque in the northern part of the city also takes its name, Chalil er-rachmân or Makâm Ibrâhîm, from this tradition. The inhabitants of Orfa (according to Olivier, 20-24,000; Buckingham, 50,000) are chiefly Kurds, Arabs, Armenians (Niebuhr says 500 families) who have a few churches, and some Jews. Niebuhr found the congregation of Jacobite Christians with 150 houses and one church. The principal language is Turkish; the Arabic, Kurdish, and Armenian are also spoken. Edessa is famed in the East for its manufactures of fine cotton goods and yellow morocco leather. — (See besides the works named: TH. L. BAYERI, Hist. Osrh. et Edess. ex nummis illustr.: Petropol., 1734, 4to. ISSACHRI, Buch d. Länder, transl. by Mordtmann, p. 47. ABULFEDA, Geogr. ed. Reinaud., Text., p. 276. EDRISI, trad. p. Jaubert, II., 136. Lex. Geogr. ed. Juynboll., I., 293). ARNOLD.*

Edmund, 1) King and martyr. In 855 Offa, desirous of ending his days in Rome, resigned the kingdom of East Angles to his son Edmund, then in his 15th year. E. ruled in meekness, a protector of the weak, of widows and orphans. He committed the Psalter to memory. His whole life was a preparation for martyrdom. About 870 hosts of heathen Danes arrived, slew the clergy, violated the nuns, and burned churches and dwellings. E. at first resisted, rejected the conditions of peace proposed by the Danes, as injurious to his subjects and to religion, and was taken captive. He still refused the terms of his liberation, being unwilling to offend his God. He was then flayed with rods, and, whilst patiently engaged in prayer, made the target of their arrows. Finally on Nov. 20 (his anniversary) he was beheaded. His relics were deposited at his estate, Edmundsbury, and became the reputed source of miracles. A rude sanctuary of logs was put up over the place, for which Canute substituted (1020) a splendid church and abbey. A National Council at Oxford, 1122, placed his anniversary among the English holidays. The Kings of England specially honored him as their patron saint, but Henry VIII. destroyed the abbey, although his sister Catharine, widow of Louis XII., of France, was buried there.—(See his Life, by ABBO, then a monk in Canterbury, according to Dunstan's account; and do. by JOHN LYDGATE. These authors collected the accounts of his miracles). —2) Edmund, King and Confessor.—3) Edmund, canonized, 1247, consecrated as Archb. of Canterbury, 1234, but driven off for his vindication of the claims of the Romish Church. He died in France, Nov. 12, 1242. REUCHLIN.*

Edom, Edomites (עֲדוֹם, עֲדוֹמִי). I. The Progenitor of the Edomites was Esau (עֵשָׂו, 'Hœv), the first-born son of Isaac and Rebecca, the twin-brother of Jacob. Before their birth it had been divinely revealed that the struggling of the twins in the womb was a sign of the future enmity of their descendants, and that the elder should serve the younger (Gen. 25 : 23). Esau developed a powerful, unbridled, and wild disposition, which found pleasure only in the rough roaming life of a hunter. Not being accustomed to rule or deny himself in the least, he sold his claims on the privileges and rights of primogeniture to Jacob for a pottage of lentils to satisfy his hunger. From the violent manner in which he then cried out: "Feed me, I pray thee, with that red, with that red," is derived the surname Edom (Gen. 25 : 30). Whilst Rebecca loved most the quiet, retired, thoughtful and crafty Jacob, Isaac preferred the bold, firm, and powerful Esau; and when Isaac, being blind and old, made arrangements to transfer to his favorite as the first-born, all the rights, hopes, and promises of his family, the cunning and watchful Rebecca substituted the younger son, and he in reality received the blessing designed for his brother. Esau raved and wept, but Isaac, though he discovered the mistake, could and would not change what had been done. Jacob fled from the murderous anger of Esau to Mesopotamia, and Esau also left his father's house and settled on the mountains of Seir. When Jacob returned home, after an absence of 20 years, Esau, reconciled and peaceful, went forth to meet him with 400 men. We do not read of hostile collisions between them after this; Esau had, indeed, as much as he could desire, and needed not to envy his brother. We find them both at last at the death-bed and grave of their father as reconciled brothers. — Esau's character has been misapprehended from opposite sides. Whilst Jewish enmity of race has made him to be the perfection of impiety and depravity, rationalistic critics extol him as an amiable, noble, open, upright person, and exalt him above Jacob as regards moral character. It is true, a certain attractive openness, rectitude, and kindness appears in his life, but the leading traits of his character are unbridledness, frivolity, violence, and rudeness; especially does he lack any appreciation of the calling and religious position of his family. In the Epistle to the Hebrews he is designated directly as καρπός and βέβηλος. Comp. Kurtz Gesch. des alt. Bundes. Bd., I., 2 Aufl. § 69, sq.

II. The Land of the Edomites constitutes the southern continuation of the East-Jordan table-land, and extends from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea to the north of the Alanitic gulf. In the O. T. it appears as the land or mountain range Seir (שֵׁיר) and it is still called es-

Schera; in the time of the Romans it was called after the Edomites (Idumæi) Idumæa. It is divided in the north from the land of the Moabites by the ravine el-Ahsa. On the west it is cut off from the barren table-land el-Tih by the wide and sandy valley of Arabah (now el-Ghor), out of which it elevates itself almost perpendicularly, while on the east it slopes gradually with a width of three and four miles to the Syrian steppe. Its highest mountain tops rise scarcely to a height of 3000 feet; the best known of these is Hor, in the vicinity of Petra, upon which Aaron died. Between the rocky clefts lie valleys with fruitful meadows, fields and vineyards, and forests are not wanting. Generally, however, the mountain range is bare, especially the western portion. The air is pure, and the heat is moderated by the cool wind, and the whole region is therefore very healthy (Palästina salutaris). The most important town of the Edomites was Sela (שֵׁלָא), called by the Romans

Petra (from which the whole country including the great western desert received the name of Arabia Petraea). The ruins of this ancient city were discovered by Burckhardt (II., 703, sq.) east of Mount Hor, in the so-called Wady Musa, comp. Voyage de l'Arabie Pétrée, Robinson, Paläs., III., 128, sq., and Ritter, Erdk., XIV., 1103–41. A second city of Edom often mentioned in the O. T., was Bozra (בֹּזְרָא, LXX., Βοσόρ), probably the same with the present Besseyra, an old castle on a mountain north of Petra, with a village of 50 houses, and many ruins in the vicinity. The description in Jer. 49 : 7–22 is very appropriate to this place. It cannot be identical with Bostra, often mentioned in the Roman period, because this was not in Edom, but in Auranitis. That the Edomite conquest extended so far to the north, is very improbable. In no case, however, can the Auranitian Bostra be called the representative of Edom, as it is in Isaiah 63, and Jer. 49. Comp. K. v. Raumer in Berghaus, Ann. d. Erdk., I., 564, sq. A third ancient town of Edom was Theman. Mention is already made in Gen. 36 : 34 of a land of Temani. According to Jerome this town was distant from Petra five miles; according to Eusebius 10. Burckhardt identifies it with the present Mann, south of Petra. The Temani had the reputation of possessing special wisdom, Jer. 49 : 7; Obadiah 8; Bar. 3 : 22, sq. The two important seaports of the Alanitic gulf, Elath (Aila) and Ezeongeber (see the Art.) also belong to the province of Edom.

III. The History of the Edomites.—The original inhabitants of Edom were the Chorites. They were partly expelled and partly subjugated by Esau. The remainder of the vanquished were blended with the descendants of the conqueror, and already in the time of Moses the province of Edom is a mighty, flourishing kingdom. The original form of government was a union of tribes under 13 (14) dukes (אֲלֹפִים)

(Gen. 36 : 15, sq.), which must early have centralized into a kingdom, since in Gen. 36 : 31 already 8 succeeding kings are mentioned. As none of these kings was the son of his predecessor, and each of them came from a different city, the kingdom of Edom could not have been hereditary, but elective. The warlike power of the Edomites had a mighty bulwark in their naturally fortified mountain home. Their occupations were hunting, farming, raising cattle, cultivation of vineyards, and trade. The situation of the country was especially adapted to the latter, for this made them to be the transports of the very important trade between the harbors of the Persian and Alanitic gulfs on the one side, and the Phœnician and Philistian seaports on the other.—We know nothing definite about the religion of the Edomites. In 2 Chron. 25 : 14 mention is made of worshipping many gods. The prophecies of Isaac (Gen. 27 : 29; 39 : 40) are remarkably fulfilled in the later history of the Edomites. Already in the time of Moses they conducted themselves very unbrotherly towards Israel, in that they denied to it a free passage through their country (Num. 20 : 15, sq.; 21 : 4; Deut. 2 : 4, sq.). The Israelites were most strictly forbidden to oppose the Edomites (Deut. 2 : 5; 23 : 7). But as their hostility against Israel became more decided, this prohibition was removed. Saul already conquered them (1 Sam. 14 : 47), David subdued them entirely (2 Sam. 8 : 14), and Solomon equipped a considerable fleet in the harbors of Edom (1 Kings 9 : 26). Under Solomon Hadad attempted, it is true, to liberate his fatherland, but without result (1 Kings 11 : 14, sq.). At the division of the kingdom Edom fell to Judah. When under Jehoshaphat of Judah a king of Edom is mentioned, who went with him and Joram, of Israel, to war against Moab (2 Kings 3 : 9, 12, 26), and still, on the other hand, we are told (1 Kings 22 : 47, comp. 2 Kings 8 : 20) that in the reign of Jehoshaphat, no king, but a deputy-ruled over Edom, the contradiction is reconciled by the supposition, that the title of king was allowed to the deputy as a vassal prince. Under Jehoshaphat's successor, Joram, the Edomites succeeded in throwing off the rule of Judah (2 Kings 8 : 20, sq.). Amaziah and Azariah attempted to reconquer them with some success: the former conquered the city of Petra, and called it Joktheel, the latter the seaport Elath (2 Kings 14 : 7, 22). But these conquests were not lasting. Under Ahaz the Edomites even made a destructive invasion into Judah (2 Chron. 28 : 17), and at the same time Rezin, King of Syria, conquered the seaport Elath. The hostility between Edom and Judah reached after that its highest point. The Edomites voluntarily attached themselves to the Chaldean conquerors, and thereby escaped the fate of violent conquest and devastation, although their country suffered much from war (Mal. 1 : 3, sq.). They rejoiced when they beheld their former oppressors succumb to Chaldean power (Lam. 4 : 21; Ezek. 35 : 15; 36 : 5; Obadiah 12), assisted it (Obad. 10), robbed and killed the fugitives, &c. During such hostilities the prophets raised their threatening voices with special emphasis against Edom (Joel 3 : 24; Amos 1 : 11; Isaiah 11 : 14; 34 : 5, sq.; Obad.; Jer. 9 : 25, sq.; 25 : 21; 27 : 2, sq.; 49 : 7, sq.; Ezek. 25 : 12, sq.; 32 : 29; 35 and 36 : 5; Mal. 1 : 2, sq.). When the Jews were carried away captive to Babylon, the Edomites took easy possession of the desolated country south of Palestine, including Hebron (Ezek. 35 : 10; 1 Macc. 5 : 65). Also, during the Syrian supremacy, they manifested their old hatred towards the Jews as much as possible (1 Macc. 5 : 3, 65; 2 Macc. 10 : 15; 12 : 32, sq.), until they were finally subjugated by John Hyrcanus, who compelled them to receive circumcision, and incorporated them into the Jewish State (Jos. Ant., 13, 9, 1; 15, 7, 9; bell. Jud., 4, 5, 5). But just these measures paved the way, in a remarkable manner, for a fresh triumph for the descendants of Edom. The crafty Idumean, Antipater, ingratiated himself so much with the weak Hyrcanus II., the last king of the Maccabees, that he obtained the reins of government; and when the Romans interfered with the family quarrels of the Maccabees, Cæsar made him procurator of Judea, and only gave Hyrcanus the high priesthood. In the year 40 Herod the Great, the son of Antipater, was even proclaimed King of Judea by the Roman Senate. After this, the Jewish kingdom, with a brief interregnum of Roman governors, was under the rule of Herodian princes. After the destruction of Jerusalem, under Titus, the names Idumæan and Idumæa disappear from history. The country, from this time, was included in the comprehensive name Arabia. Comp. B. Michaelis, de ant. Idumæor. hist.: Hal., 1733; J. van Iperen, hist. crit. Edomæor. et Amalek.: Leow., 1768; Hengstenberg, Beitr., III., 273, sq.; Hoffmann in Ersch, u. Gruber's Encyk., § II., Bd., XV., p. 146, sq.; Winer, Reallex., 3d ed. I., 292, sq.; K. v. Raumer, Paläst. 3, A., p. 240, sq.; K. Ritter, Erdk., XV., 1. p. 124, sq.; G. Baur, d. Proph. Amos, p. 97.

Kurtz. — Beck.

Edwards, Jonathan, was born Oct. 5, 1703, at East Windsor, in Connecticut, where his father was pastor for more than sixty years. From his childhood he was industrious and thoughtful, and while yet a youth he mastered Locke's metaphysical works, and graduated at Yale College in 1720. He studied theology at the same institution, and in 1722 took charge of a small Presbyterian congregation in New York. He was married in 1723, and begat 10 children. In 1724 he was appointed tutor in Yale College, which office he filled for two years. In February, 1727, he was ordained as colleague of his grandfather, Solomon Stoddard, in the Congregational Church at Northampton, Mass. Here he preached with extraordinary zeal, power, and success until 1750. The boldness and zeal with which he attempted to cause the strictest morality to prevail among his people, but especially the firmness with which he insisted that no one, who was not truly and spiritually born again, should be admitted to the Lord's Supper, gave rise to a warm controversy, which led to his resignation. At this time there was great difference of opinion on this subject existing in New England; and although Edwards lost his situation in this contest, his views prevailed, and since then they have prevailed, at least in theory, in the churches of New England. In 1751 he went as a missionary among the Housatonic Indians in Berkshire county, where some of his most celebrated metaphysical treatises were written. In this laborious field of labor, withdrawn from the eyes of men, he remained contented until 1758, and then with reluctance he accepted the Presidency of Princeton College, N. J., where he died in the same year from small-pox, aged 54 years.

We learn his Christian character from the account of his religious experience, which he himself wrote. "The first instance that I remember of that sort of inward, sweet delight in God and divine things that I have lived much in since, was in reading those words, 1 Tim. 1 : 17, Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory for ever and ever, Amen. As I read these words, there came into my soul, and was as it were diffused through it, a sense of the glory of the Divine Being; a new sense, quite different from anything I ever experienced before. Never any words of Scripture seemed to me as these words did. I thought with myself, how excellent a Being that was, and how happy I should be, if I might enjoy that God, and be rapt up to him in heaven, and be as it were swallowed up in him for ever! I kept saying, and as it were singing over these words of Scripture to myself; and went to pray to God that I might enjoy him, and prayed in a manner quite different from what I used to do; with a new sort of affection. But it never came into my thought, that there was anything spiritual, or of a saving nature, in this. From about that time, I began to have a new kind of apprehension and ideas of Christ, and the work of redemption, and the glorious way of salvation by him. An inward sweet sense of these things, at times, came into my heart; and my soul was led away in pleasant views and contemplations of them.

And my mind was greatly engaged to spend my time in reading and meditating on Christ, on the beauty and excellency of his person, and the lovely way of salvation by free grace in him. I found no books so delightful to me as those that treated of these subjects. Those words, Cant. 2 : 1, used to be abundantly with me, I am the Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the valleys. The words seemed to me sweetly to represent the loveliness and beauty of Jesus Christ. The whole book of Canticles used to be pleasant to me, and I used to be much in the habit of reading it, about that time; and found, from time to time, an inward sweetness, that would carry me away, in my contemplations. This I know not how to express otherwise, than by a calm, sweet abstraction of soul from all the concerns of this world; and sometimes a kind of vision, or fixed ideas and imaginations, of being alone in the mountains, or some solitary wilderness, far from all mankind, sweetly conversing with Christ, and rapt and swallowed up in God. The sense I had of divine things, would often of a sudden kindle up, as it were, a sweet burning in my heart; an ardor of soul, that I know not how to express. — Not long after I first began to experience these things, I gave an account to my father of some things that had passed in my mind. I was pretty much affected by the discourse we had together; and when the discourse was ended, I walked abroad alone, in a solitary place in my father's pasture, for contemplation. And as I was walking there, and looking up on the sky and clouds, there came into my mind so sweet a sense of the glorious majesty and grace of God, that I knew not how to express. I seemed to see them both in a sweet conjunction; majesty and meekness joined together; it was a sweet, and gentle, and holy majesty; and also a majestic meekness; an awful sweetness; a high, and great, and holy gentleness. After this my sense of divine things gradually increased, and became more and more lively. The appearance of everything was altered; there seemed to be, as it were, a calm, sweet cast, or appearance of divine glory, in almost everything. God's excellency, his wisdom, his purity and love, seemed to appear in everything; in the sun, and moon, and stars; in the clouds, and blue sky; in the grass, flowers, and trees; in the water, and all nature; which used greatly to fix my mind. I had vehement longings of soul after God and Christ, and after more holiness, wherewith my heart seemed to be full, and ready to break; which often brought to my mind the words of the Psalmist, Ps. cxix. 20, 'My soul breaketh for the longing it hath.' I often felt a mourning and lamenting in my heart, that I had not turned to God sooner, that I might have had more time to grow in grace.—The soul of a true Christian, as I then wrote my meditations, appeared like such a little white flower as we see in the spring of the year; low and humble on the ground, opening its bosom to receive the pleasant beams of the sun's glory; rejoicing as it were in a calm rapture; diffusing around a sweet fragrance; standing peacefully and lovingly, in the midst of other flowers round about; all in like manner opening their bosoms, to drink in the light of the sun. There was no part of creature holiness, that I had so great a sense of its loveliness, as humility, brokenness of heart and poverty of spirit; and there was nothing that I so earnestly longed for. My heart panted after this, to lie low before God, as in the dust; that I might be nothing, and that God might be all, that I might become as a little child." (Edwards' Works, Worcester's edition, Vol. I., pp. 34, 35, 36–38).

The vigor with which he cultivated a holy life, may be inferred from the following of his seventy resolutions, which he formed early in life, and faithfully observed, reading them through every week, that he might never forget them. 1. "Resolved, That I will do whatsoever I think to be most to God's glory and my own good, profit, and pleasure on the whole; without any consideration of the time, whether now, or never so many myriads of ages hence; to do whatever I think to be my duty, and most for the good and advantage of mankind in general—whatever difficulties I may meet with, how many and how great soever. 11. Resolved, when I think of any theorem in divinity to be solved, immediately to do what I can towards solving it, if circumstances do not hinder. 13. Resolved, to be endeavoring to find out fit objects of charity and liberality. 17. Resolved, that I will live so as I shall wish I had done when I come to die. 18. Resolved, to live so at all times, as I think it best in my devout frames, and when I have clearest notions of the gospel and another world. 24. Resolved, whenever I do any evil action, to trace it back, till I come to the original cause; and then both carefully endeavor to do so no more, and to fight and pray with all my might against the original of it. 34. Resolved, never to speak in narratives anything but the pure and simple verity. 36. Resolved, never to speak evil of any person, except some particular good call for it." (Edwards' Works, &c., pp. 14, 15, 16, 17).

The fruits of his laborious studies, which generally occupied from 12 to 16 hours daily, are his posthumous manuscripts, written with his own hand, numbering more than 1400. They were written with great care and neatness, and arranged with the most careful exactness. Below we give a list of some of his principal works, with the date of their first publication.

1736, A Narrative of the work of God in the conversion of many hundred souls in Northampton—a modest account of the wonderful effect of his preaching and that of other ministers, at that time. 1742, Thoughts on the Revival of Religion in New England in 1740—a work called forth by the opposition made to the labors of the distinguished George Whitefield, whose warm friend and able defender Edwards was. 1746, A Treatise concerning Religious Affections—a very able and acute work, which was calculated to sift the errors, abuses, and excrescences of the revival of 1740 and the previous year. 1749, Life of Rev. David Brainerd—a very zealous missionary among the Indians, and a pupil of Edwards. 1749, Humble Inquiry concerning the Qualifications for membership in the visible Christian Church. 1752, A Reply to S. Williams' Answer. These last two treatises belong to the Northampton Controversy. 1754, A Treatise on the Freedom of the Will. 1758, A Treatise on Original Sin. These two able and celebrated treatises were written against the Armenian theology, which had commenced to spread in New England, and in them the author develops some of his peculiar views, which constitute the foundation of the so-called Edwards' theology. The last treatise was in print, when the author died. Both were written in the depths of the forest, during the time he was missionary among the Indians. — After his death was published: 1774, The History of Redemption—one of the most characteristic and interesting works—the introduction to the comprehensive theological system, which he had projected, but which he did not live to complete. 1788, On the Nature of Virtue. 1788, God's last end in Creation. From 1731 to 1796 there were published also several volumes of sermons and miscellaneous writings; and yet the manuscript treasures of this untiring author are not by a great deal exhausted. Within the last few years a large volume "On Charity," never before published, was issued from the press, from his manuscripts.

The following are the more or less complete editions of his collected works: Jonathan Edwards' Works—1) published by S. Austin, D. D., 6 vols. 8vo.: Worcester, Mass., 1808–09; 2) published by Williams and Parsons, 8 vols. 8vo.: London, 1817; 3) published by S. E. Dwight, D. D., 10 vols. 8vo.: New York, 1829–30; 4) with preface by Henry Rogers, 2 vols., large 8vo.: London, 1834; 5) published by Leavitt & Co., 4 vols. 8vo.: New York, 1852.

Fault has been found with all these editions, that they are not only incomplete by omitting many important treatises existing in MS., but that they depart considerably from the original text in many places. To remedy all these deficiencies, and to restore a complete and exact edition, a new one, to consist of about 14 vols., is to be published by Johnson and Hunter, in Edinburgh, Scotland, as the third contribution of their periodical edition of "Standard Divines."

Edwards was a thinker of power, boldness and originality, never satisfied with walking in the steps of his predecessors. The opinion exists, that the Calvinistic system of theology received several important modifications from him, and especially from him in connection with his immediate pupils. According to the statement of his son, Dr. Edwards, of Connecticut, the important improvements of the Calvinistic theology, made by his father, relate mainly to the following 10 points: 1) God's last end in Creation; 2) Freedom and necessity; 3) The nature of true virtue; 4) The origin of moral evil; 5) The doctrine of the atonement; 6) The imputation of Adam's sin and Christ's righteousness; 7) The state of the unregenerate and their use of the means of grace; 8) The nature of experimental religion; 9) The doctrine of disinterested willing to do good; 10) The doctrine of regeneration.

All these doctrines are largely discussed in his published works; and among his MSS. is a carefully prepared treatise on the doctrine of the Trinity, which is written with great independence of thought, boldness and power. What he really contributed towards advancing the theological science of his time, may be embraced in the following propositions: 1) All virtue proceeds from the will, taking this term in its widest sense, not from the pathological feelings, nor from the natural disposition of the body, or of the mind. 2) True virtue consist in voluntary love for beings in general, and can, therefore, be embraced in the preference given to God above all other beings, and to the interests of the collective Universe above individual interests. 3) All human inability to do good, is sin, i. e., there is no blameless inability, which lies back of all sin, and which is the cause of sin, but all our inability is our sinful not willing to do good. This is called moral inability, and is distinguished from natural inability, which, so far as it exists, absolves from all moral blame. 4) Man never lost anything of his freedom; he now possesses all the freedom, which he had before the fall, and all that he can have. (See Edwards' Works, Dwight's edition, Vol. 2, p. 293, sq.).

The Theological School of Edwards.—Samuel Hopkins belongs to the earliest and ablest pupils of Edwards. He was born in Waterbury, Connecticut, 1721, studied theology with Edwards, and received a call to a small colony of only 30 families, in the wilderness of Housatonic, Mass., where, during 26 years, he studied, investigated, preached and wrote, after which time he was dismissed for want of money. He then received a call to Newport, Rhode Island, to a small church, where he remained until 1803, and died aged 82 years. He was by no means inferior to Edwards, in true Christian simplicity and piety, in power and independence of thought. One of the most upright and fearless of men, he was among the first who boldly and decidedly opposed slavery and the slave trade, whose nature but few at that time understood. He possessed no graceful ornaments of style, and his delivery was almost as bad as it could be, so that he was never an acceptable preacher; but, notwithstanding these disadvantages, he exercised almost as much influence as Edwards himself, by the naked force of his thoughts. His principal work, besides his numerous miscellaneous writings and sermons, was a thoroughly prepared system of Divinity, in two large vols., 8vo., published in Boston, 1791, and again, 1811. The most complete edition of his works was issued in Boston, 1852, by the Publication Committee of the Congregationalists, in 3 vols., 8vo., with a very interesting memoir by Prof. Park, of Andover.

Some of his leading views are as follows: 1) God is the producing cause of all activities of the human will, be they good or bad. 2) Adam alone was burdened with the guilt of original sin, and total moral depravity consists in the opposition of the will or heart of man to do that which it is truly and fully able to do. This is called moral inability, in distinction from that which is disposition of temperament or natural disposition. 3) Holiness in a moral being consists exclusively in a disinterested will to do good. 4) Sin consists exclusively in a selfish moral exercise. 5) Atonement and redemption are in their nature and results different; the former opens the door of grace, the latter brings the blessing of salvation to the individual. 6) Effectual calling consists in this, that God produces a willingness in the hearts of sinners to be saved. 7) Although the righteousness of Christ is the only ground of the justification of sinners, still his righteousness is not transferred to them. Neither sin nor holiness can be transferred, whether from Adam to his posterity, or from Christ to his people. 8) Repentance precedes faith; love comprehends in its nature all the Christian virtues.

Jonathan Edwards, the younger, who died in 1801, aged 56 years, was an able expounder and defender of the theology of his father, and published much that was the result of his own thinking. The best and most complete edition of his works was published at Andover, in 1842, in 2 vols., 8vo.

Joseph Bellamy, of Connecticut, died 1790, aged 71 years, an eloquent preacher and zealous, influential theologian, was another of the most distinguished of Edwards' pupils. The best and most complete edition of his works was published in Boston, 1850, by the Congregational Board of Publication, in 6 vols., 8vo.

Nathaniel Emmons died at Franklin, Mass., aged 95 years, after being pastor almost 70 years of a small country church of Congregationalists, in that small retired village. He was an earnest, untiring thinker, faithful preacher, and fruitful author. His style is clear, direct, simple, and powerful. His publications consist chiefly of sermons, which were originally preached in his congregation, of which many volumes were printed during his life. After his death, his son-in-law, Dr. Ide, published at Boston, 1842, in 8 octavo vols., a complete uniform edition of his works, with a memoir, mainly an autobiography. The most important doctrinal points, which Emmons especially developed, are: 1) Moral attributes belong alone to "exercise." 2) Every moral exercise, be it good or bad, although perfectly free, is the result of direct divine influence. 3) Every exercise of a moral nature is either perfectly good or perfectly bad. —The first two propositions he held in common with Hopkins, the last was peculiar to him and his special school.

Timothy Dwight, the grandson of Edwards, was born in Northampton, Mass., 1752, and died as President of Yale College, 1817. He was pre-eminent among N. England theologians for extensive and varied learning, and fertility as a writer. He was chaplain in the army of the Revolution; he composed patriotic songs, which were very popular in their day; he composed music; wrote religious hymns, epic poems, and travels; he was a very successful preacher; an extraordinarily able and careful academical teacher; a farmer, politician, and theologian; and prominent in all these departments. His writings are very numerous, and are generally distinguished by good taste, a flowing and pure style, and vigorous common sense. He rejected Hopkins' and Emmons' idea of divine causality in the production of the evil deeds of men, also the so-called "exercise" theory; and contributed more than any other theologian to the development and systematization of the theology of the Edwards' school. His principal work in this department is: "Theology, explained and defended in a series of sermons," first published at Middletown, Conn., in 5 vols., 8vo., 1818, afterwards in New York, in 4 vols., 8vo., and often reprinted. Dwight was inferior to Edwards, or Hopkins, or Emmons, in originality and innate power of thinking, but excelled them in literary culture, in the extent and manifoldness of his knowledge, in taste, tact, and versatility as an author.

The most prominent among the living representatives of the theology of Edwards, are Leonard Woods, for almost 40 years professor of theology at Andover, and Lyman Beecher, formerly professor of theology at Cincinnati, the former belonging to the so-called Old School party, the latter to the New. Woods' works appeared, from 1849–50, at Andover, in 5 vols. 8vo., and Beecher's works are at present (1855) passing through the press at Boston, — three vols. have appeared, and the whole are to be completed in 5 or 6 vols.

Many other authors of this school might be mentioned, for it is still, as it ever was, active and fruitful; meanwhile, those we have named will furnish a complete and suitable insight into the theology of this school and its tendencies. To this theological school New England was largely indebted for the preservation of its characteristic intellectual power, and for that spirit of love and progress in the practico-religious sphere, by which it has been so honorably distinguished. DR. STOWE. — Beck.

Egbert, St., a Northumbrian of noble descent, was born in the 7th cent. He early joined the monastery of Rathmelsing, and distinguished himself in the mission among the Frieslanders. In 644 he was seized with the plague, and vowed, should he recover, to quit his country and go abroad to preach the gospel. He started for Germany, but a storm drove him back, and he went to the monks upon the island of Hii, but without abandoning his purpose to labor among the Germans. He, however, did not go among them himself, but sent the learned monk Wigbert, who, after two years' fruitless efforts among the Frieslanders, returned. Next he sent out twelve Anglo-Saxons, and thus roused that missionary spirit which eventually reaped such glorious fruits among the Germans. Egbert succeeded, by mild means, in introducing (716) the Roman Easter and tonsure into Hii. He died in 729.—(See BEDE, H. E. Angl., III., 27; V., 10, 11, 23). HERZOG.*

Egbert (Ecgbert), Archb. of York, the pupil and friend of Bede, noted for his efforts to build up the Anglo-Saxon Church, and as a teacher. Before he was chosen B. he taught at the cathedral school of York, and by his extensive learning (he was considered armarium omnium liberalium artium), his earnestness, and his hold upon the minds of his pupils, exerted a powerful influence. Alcuin and Ælbert were pupils of his school. After he took the episcopal chair of York (731) it was made an archbishopric. At his consecration as B., Bede, in an epistle to Egbert, suggested the propriety of dividing the see of York into several bishoprics, over which the B. of York should have metropolitan supervision. Approving of the suggestion, E., encouraged by King Ceolwulf, of Northumbria, went to Rome, 735, and obtained the pallium and metropolitan authority over all the English Sees N. of the Humber. Thenceforth he redoubled his zeal in the discharge of his duties. Alcuin, in his poem upon the Bishops and saints of York, highly lauds him. He partly continued his labors in the cathedral-school. At his death, 767, he appointed Alcuin the librarian of his rich and choice collection of books, and instructor at the church he rendered so renowned. E. wrote: 1) A collection of canonical decisions de jure sacerdotali, of which only fragments remain, in MANSI, XII., 411-431; 2) A small dialogue upon eccl. institutions, MANSI, XII., 482-488. The tract: de remediis peccatorum, MANSI, XIII., 489, &c., is probably an abstract from the first by another author. In reference to the penitentiaries ascribed to him see Art. Penitentiaries.

HERZOG.*

Egede, Hans, of Norway, born Jan. 31, 1686, was appointed preacher in Vangen, in the diocese of Nordland, in 1707. During the next year he read some old Norman Chronicles, and was seized with a desire to learn the condition of his countrymen in Greenland. From persons who had visited the country he learned that it was inhabited by wild heathen. The thought that those were degenerate Normans kindled in him an ardent longing to preach the Gospel to them. For a time his wife opposed him; but at length she yielded to what seemed the plain indications of Providence. E. had made known his desires to two Bishops, and requested them to lay the matter before the King. But they had not thought it advisable to press it then, as the King was engaged with the affairs of the war. E. then resolved to see the King himself, and as no one would take his post at Vangen, and allow him a portion of the revenues, he resigned it in 1717, without regard to support, and in 1718 went to Bergen. There he tried to persuade some merchants to employ him on a mission to Greenland, but having failed in that also, he was compelled to appeal to the King. Frederick IV. approved of his plan, and by promising assistance, induced several Bergen merchants to get up an expedition. He also appointed E. missionary to the heathen, with an annual salary of 300 thalers. On May 3, 1721, E., with his wife and children, set sail from Bergen with three ships. They landed in Baals Revier, on an island, on the W. coast of Greenland, on July 3d. Egede soon discovered that he had to do with a branch of the Esquimaux, the exterminators of his countrymen, not with Normans. This presented unexpected difficulties. A strange race of people, with a language totally different from all European dialects, had to be mastered. The work could, therefore, proceed but slowly, and it required all E.'s energy, patience, and faith in his mission, to persevere. But he bore his trials with heroic fortitude, feeling himself rewarded in the growing affections of the Esquimaux, and their increasing regard for the gospel, despite the opposition of their priests, although there were but few actual conversions. With the approbation of some fellow-laborers who had been sent to his help, however, he baptized the children of such as consented to the rite, and promised not to dissuade them from Christianity. The death of Frederick IV., Oct. 12, 1730, inflicted a blow upon the mission; for his successor, Christian VI., dissolved the settlement in Greenland, the expenses of which had for some time been borne by the King, and the European colonists there were commanded to return home, excepting that a year's provision might be retained for E., and any others that chose to remain with him, if they would then defray their own expenses home. E. with his wife and ten others resolved to stay. The following year he received orders to remain where he then was, as the work seemed to be prospering, and in 1732 the prospect of continuing traffic there revived. Meanwhile an Esquimaux, who had visited Copenhagen, brought back the small-pox to Greenland, and the disease proved fatal to large numbers. Unpleasant relations arose, also, with some Moravian missionaries who had arrived. E. now as ardently desired to quit the field, as he had longed to enter it. He was accordingly recalled in 1735; but before his departure his wife died. Physically and spiritually depressed, he preached his farewell-sermon, upon Isa. 49: 4, on July 29, 1734, and started for home with his children, and the body of his wife. On his return he was appointed principal of a seminary for missionaries to Greenland, and in 1740 superintendent of the Greenland mission. He filled this office until 1747, when he resigned it because the Greenland mission was made simply a stepping stone into the Danish State-Church. He spent the last 11 years of his life at Stubbekjøbing, where he died Nov. 5, 1758.—(See Diary of E.; J. H. BRAUER'S, Hans. E., in Brauer's contributions to the history of heathen missions. Dr. A. G. RUDELBACH'S, Christl. Biogr., 6. Lief.).

BRAUER.*

Eginhart (Agenhard, Ainhard), a member of the court of Charlemagne. His origin is unknown, but he was probably of noble descent, and born c. 765-75. Charlemagne always regarded him with favor, and he enjoyed the friendship of his sons. Louis made him tutor of Lothaire. But no nearer relationship to the imperial family can be shown. E.'s wife (though styled noblissima puella, hence of noble birth) was certainly not Charlemagne's daughter, for C. had no daughter Emma, and cotemporaneous authorities make no allusion to such a relationship. Neither is there any proof that E. had children. It is known he had none in 817. From c. 826, or 827, he and his wife seem to have lived separate quoad thorum, for in a letter to Abbot Lupus, of Ferrières, written 836, and full of lamentations over Emma's death, he says: Dolor, quem ex morte olim fidellissimæ conjugis, jam nunc carissimæ sororis ac sociæ, gravissimum cepi; though he may merely allude to her removal to another world, and in that case they would have maintained the connubial relation to her death, even whilst he was abbot, and even the spiritual abbot of Seligenstadt. In providing for E. Charlemagne departed (as he did in the case of Alcuin and other friends who followed his court) from his rule not to accumulate benefices, and bestowed several upon him. During C.'s life he also had the post of overseer of the royal buildings at Aix la Chapelle. Louis gave him an estate in Odenwald, of which Michelstadt was the chief place, where mainly he spent his last years. There, 826, he was consecrated presbyter, and in 827 became abbot of the monastery of Seligenstadt, which he founded on his estate. — Charlemagne often employed him in State matters. — He wrote a biography of C. which furnishes the basis of his history, and during the middle-ages became a model for other similar works. The best ed. is that of PERTZ, 1829, in the 2d vol. of the Monum. Germanicæ historicae. Following this is IDELER's "Leben u. Wandel K. d. Gr.," &c. &c.: Hamb. u. Gotha, 1839, 8vo. E.'s annals for 741–88 are based upon the older annals of Lorsch; but those for 788–829 were wholly composed by E., and are valuable sources of information for that period. (See PERTZ, l. c., Vol. I.). E. also wrote a hist. translationis St. Marcellini et Petri, relics of whom he brought from Rome to his abbey in Seligenstadt at its establishment. (See it in the Act. SS., for June 2). A number of his letters are still extant. His libellus de adoranda cruce is lost. LEO.*

Eglon.—1) The residence of one of the five Amorite Kings, taken by Joshua (Josh. 10 : 3, 34), and assigned to Judah (15 : 39). It is difficult to fix its location. Eusebius (in his Onomast.) says: Eglon, quæ et Odollam; but this conflicts with Josh. 12 : 12, 15, and 15 : 35, 39. And yet Eglon seems to have been near to Odollam, though a little further west (following the order of the names in Josh. 15). This would agree with Eusebius' calculation (10 or 12 miles W. of Eleutherop.), and Robinson's (II., 49) identification of the place with the modern 'Ajlân on the way from Gaza to Hebron.—2) A king of the Moabites (Judges 3 : 12–30), who tyrannized over Israel for 18 years, and was assassinated by Ehud. PRESSER.*

Egypt, ancient.—The name Αἴγυπτος is used in Homer, both of the river and the adjacent country. Some have derived the word from a Shemitic root עָנַן, clausit, (Sickler, Geogr., II., 586); others from a Sanscrit âgupta, for gupta, custoditus, tutus. But since it is found only among the Greeks and those nations who obtained it from them, its Greek origin seems to be certain. The Coptic name, both Theban and Memphitic, is Keme, and with the hieroglyphic designation, means black. The country was called black, not from the color of its inhabitants, which was red; but from that of its soil, which formed a strong contrast with the adjacent countries. Herodotus (2, 12) and Plutarch (de Is. c. 33) connects the name with this quality of the soil. The native name of Egypt has often been derived from the Hebrew name of Ham, the son of Noah, and ancestor of the Hamites. The Hebrew root of עָנַן, calidus, עָנַן, incaluit, which is undoubtedly the root of Ham (Αἴγυπτος, Αἴγυπτος, Αἴγυπτος), corresponds more closely with the Egyptian Ḫem (Memphitic) or Ḫem (Theban), calidus esse, which has no direct connection with Ḫem, niger. In Cham, the general idea of the warm south, as in the Greek

Αἴγυπτος, seems rather to have been retained. The proper name of Egypt was among the Hebrews מִצְרַיִם, Masor, (Is. 19, 6), more often in the dual מִצְרַיִם, Misraim, in Greek Μίσηρ or Μισραϊμ (Jos. Ant., 1, 6, 2). Perhaps it was originally used not of the country, but of the chief city, and afterwards spread as a proper name further northward. The Arabian name is masr, urbs, urbs magna; and Cairo, the present capital El Masr, and the country barr Masr, the land of Masr. The dual Misraim can only refer to its division into Upper and Lower Egypt, and not to the two shores of the river: for Egypt was in all times regarded by its inhabitants as a kingdom consisting of two parts, and it is thus described in hieroglyphics. Nor was this division a mere political one, but rested on an original difference of religion, language and customs of their population. That Masr was in Asia generally the name of Egypt, is now evident from the cuneiform inscriptions. In the Persian (Rawlinson, Jour. of the R. As. Soc., Vol. X., p. 130) it was Mudrâya, or Mudarâya; in the Median, Mutsariga; the Babylonian, Misir; the Assyrian, Musri (Vol. XIV., P. I, p. 18).—Egypt proper comprises the valley of the Nile from the first cataract to the Mediterranean, from 24° 6' to 31° 36' N. L., and from 27° 30' to 30° 40' E. L., from Paris. The course of the stream deviates but little from a northern direction. The valley is generally about 9 miles broad, only exceptionally about 24 miles. At 30° N. L., the sides of the valley bend towards the east and the west, and the Nile divides into several arms, forming the fruitful Delta, of a width of nearly 3 degrees. Bounded on the north by the sea, and on the other sides by extensive deserts, the narrow strip of inhabited land seems like a lengthened oasis, whose secluded and nearly inaccessible position has exerted the most decided influence upon the development of the Egyptian people and their relations to the neighboring nations. The two sides of the valley are not, as is generally supposed, two ridges of mountains; but the declivities of the rocky plateau of the desert, through which the Nile has drawn its deep furrow. Only at a distance of several days' journey the level of the desert is broken by a ridge, which rises at times into peaks above 6000 feet high, and follows the course of the Red Sea. This section, between the Nile and the Red Sea, has always been regarded as belonging to Egypt in its wider sense: so also those oases of the western desert which are accessible from the valley. The first cataract, between the islands of Elephantine and Philæ, was, in ancient times, already a boundary of nations and languages between the Æthiopians and Egyptians, as it is at present between the Nubians and Egyptians. The Lybian nations of N. Africa dwelt to the west of the Delta. The latter was from the earliest time the chief point of arrival from the sea. The principal connection between Egypt and the civilized nations of the North, was from Palestine along the coast of the sea towards Pelusium. Along this road, the "river of Egypt" (Numb. 34 : 5; Jos. 15 : 4, 47; Diod. 1 : 60) forms the boundary between Egypt and Palestine. For a long period, however, the Pharaohs also ruled over a large part of Æthiopia and the peninsula of Sinai. — The climate of the country varies. In the lower country rain is not at all unfrequent, whilst in the Thebais scarcely a cloud is to be seen during the entire year. At Alexandria the average temperature is 16° R., at Thebes, 23°. The productiveness of the country depends entirely upon the inundations of the Nile, which, from the earliest period, were carefully directed by canals. In the southern part of the country the inundation, from changes in the bed of the river, no longer reaches the height of the banks; hence the water is there raised by wheels. The annual rise of the river is caused by the rains in the tropical highlands. The floods reach E. about the middle of June; the Delta at the end of June. The waters continue to rise for three months. Between the 20th and 25th of Aug., the dams in U. Egypt are cut in order to lead the water over the fields; and about a month later in L. Egypt. Near the end of September the water retires. During October the country dries, the fields are sown, and soon covered with vegetation. The harvest takes place at the end of March. From the above peculiarities the Egyptian year was divided into three seasons of 4 months each. The first, or water season, lasted from the end of June to the end of September; 2, the garden season lasted to the end of January; 3, the harvest season to the beginning of the new year. — From the earliest period, E. has been celebrated for its great fertility. It was the granary (claustra annonæ, Tac. hist., 3, 8) of all neighboring states. It was this which led Abraham (Gen. 12: 10), and afterwards the sons of Jacob (Gen. 42: 1) to Egypt. But the country was also rich in other productions. The Israelites longed for the flesh-pots of Egypt (Ex. 16: 3); for its fish, cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic (Numb. 11: 5). The wealth of Egypt in cattle, sheep, goats, and hogs, in fish and game, also in wine, figs, melons, and a great variety of other fruits and vegetables, has become evident from its ancient monuments. In a grave near the pyramid of Memphis (Lepsius, Denkmäler aus Aeg. u. Æth., II., 9), 835 cattle, 220 calves, 760 asses, 974 sheep, and 2235 goats, are mentioned as the property of its occupant. Among plants the papyrus and lotus deserve mention, of which the former, however, is no longer found in Egypt. On the other hand, the date-palm, which at present is of so much importance, seems to have been of less importance anciently; though it was not entirely wanting, as appears from the monuments. Strabo says, that throughout E. the palm was of a poor quality; its fruits in the Delta could scarcely be eaten; in the Thebais it was somewhat better. It was remarkable, too, that the camel, which at present is among the most useful animals of the country, appears so seldom among the ancients, that it is never represented in hieroglyphics or otherwise. It cannot have been unknown, since it was much used among neighboring people (Gen. 24: 10; 30: 43; Job 1: 3), especially in their commercial journeys to E. (Gen. 37: 25). In Gen. 12: 16, Pharaoh even gives camels to Abraham. It seems, however, that in the interior the camel was wholly unused. Herodotus and Diodorus say nothing of Egyptian camels; Strabo (p. 815) says that the Egyptians travelled on camels through the desert of Coptos to Berenice. The horse, too, seems to have been introduced from Asia: at least its presence in the old kingdom, before the irruption of the Hyksos, has not yet been proven from the monuments, and at the beginning of the new it appears for the first time in a procession of Asiatic strangers, who brought them in the 16th cent., B. C., with other Asiatic animals as a present to Tuthmosis III. (Wilkinson, Mann. and Cust., Vol. 1, end). Under the kings of the succeeding 19th dynasty, horses were used in great numbers in battles, but only for drawing war-chariots, not for riding; though in Gen. 50: 9; Exod. 14: 9, 23, riders also are mentioned. As in the East generally, the ass was commonly used for riding, and for carrying burdens. The wild ass (ὄνυξ) is still found in large herds in Nubia. That under the Leviathan, Job 40: 25, the crocodile, and under Behemoth (40: 25), the hippopotamus was meant, is now admitted. Formerly the latter was found in the lower Nile; at present it is no longer found in Egypt. In the Eg. hades the female hippopotamus represents the adversary (Book of the Dead, c. 125), and is called Amām, the devourer of hades. In Thebes the goddess Ap, or, with the article, Tap, represented as having the head of a hippopotamus was highly honored. E. was rich in mineral also, especially in building-stones. In the greater part of the country the banks of the river consist of limestone, the fine and compact texture of which is still admired in the pyramids and extensive necropolises of Memphis, and the beautifully-sculptured grottoes of Thebes. Near El Kab the sandstone region begins, in which the quarries of Selseleh are celebrated. At the cataracts the primitive rocks appear in a rich variety of beautifully-colored granite and syenite. Still greater was the variety of minerals in the more remote regions of the Nile, and among the Arabian mountains. Here were found the celebrated honey-colored alabaster, porphyry, and breccia. Gold also was found in the mountains east of Syene, smaragd in the mines of Berenice, and copper in the peninsula of Sinai. The nature of the country thus described, added to a pure sky, a warm though eminently healthful climate, a loam well adapted for burned and unburned brick, as also an abundance of all kinds of material for architectural, sculptural, and written monuments, and a wonderfully conservative atmosphere, lending permanency to everything, guarded against violence; these were the circumstances which qualified the Egyptians to be the first historical people of the earth. They undoubtedly aided in unfolding that early tendency of constructing monuments, especially architectural ones; and of making them the more eloquent by ornamental and pictorial designs. No nation has followed this tendency so extensively. This their historical sense soon led them to describe events in the order of annals; by which, again, the want of a more accurate calculation and division of time was awakened, which required close astronomical observations. These latter were rendered easy by the unclouded sky of the country. In fact, we find upon the monuments of the first great historical period indisputable proofs of a knowledge of astronomical periods, from which a long and close observation of the stars must be inferred. — All conditions were thus present, by which the higher civilization, belonging to the three chief branches of the family of Noah, could be developed in Egypt earlier and more readily, than in any other country. It is now an admitted fact, that the old Egyptian kingdom had a historical existence in the fourth thousand of years, B. C., and had reached a national prosperity which needed a long antecedent period of development: but that the broad Lethe of Hyksos barbarism had prevented any knowledge of it from reaching the nations of the north, so that until recently the beginning of its history was placed at a period in which this kingdom had already reached its decline.

Our chronological data of the ancient Egyptian kingdom are derived wholly from the history of Manetho, written in Greek by command of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and compiled from the historical annals in the archives of the temples. The extracts from it in Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius, have become strictly historical only since the deciphering of the hieroglyphics has enabled us to test, correct and complete his statements.—Champollion already had succeeded in this way in going back to the beginning of the new kingdom, or 18th dynasty. At present the former part of the Manethonian dynasty is just as little doubted. The immense number of chronologically determinable monuments, offers us a nearly uninterrupted series of kings down to the 4th dynasty. The drawings of the Prussian expedition embrace no less than some hundreds of designs from the ancient kingdom (Denkmäl. aus Egypt. u. Æthiop. Abth., II., pp. 1–153).—Concerning the historical beginning of Eg. history, according to Manetho, there are two different opinions. The one, urged by Böckh (Maneth. u. d. Hundsternperiode: Berl., 1845) regards the 30 dynasties as consecutive, at least in the opinion of the Egyptians. According to him, the first year of the first king, Menes, was 5702, B. C. The other view, making the dynasties of Manetho to be, in part at least, contemporaneous, is advanced by Bunsen (Eg. Stelle in d. Welt-Gesch.: Hamb., 1845), and Lepsius (Chronol. d. Eg., Theil. I.: Berl., 1848). The former, preferring the numerical data of a fragment of Eratosthenes to those of Manetho's, places the beginning of the Eg. kingdom in 3643; whilst the latter, following a fixed Manethonian datum, comprehending the entire compass of Eg. history, with which the numbers of the separate dynasties correspond, gives the first year of Menes as 3892, A. C.—The Eg. accepted three dynasties of the gods ruling previous to their human dynasties. The first of them consisted of their seven supreme gods, viz.: the supreme national god, Ra or the sun-god, and the divine family of Osiris, the local god of the oldest royal residence. This, in Upper Egypt. Next followed a dynasty of 12 gods, headed by Thoth, the moon-god. The third consisted of 30 demigods (Lepsius, Ub. d. erst. egypt. Gött.-Kreis, 1849). The connecting link between these and their first historical king, was a dynasty of so-called Manes (μάνες) whose royal seat was This, the native city of Menes (Chronol., Vol. 1, p. 474, 482, 501).—Menes, the Thinite, went to L. Egypt, where he founded Memphis and the first historical dynasty. The Up. Eg. royal line continued, however, to reign as the second Thinite dynasty, but soon became extinct. The 1st dynasty was immediately followed by the 3d and 4th, which, however, are called Memphitic. During the latter the kingdom reached its first eminence. At this time the two largest pyramids, of Cheops and Chephren, and the smaller one of Mykerinos, were built; whilst under the 3d dynasty the two pyramids near the modern Daschur had been built. The sculptured graves around these pyramids give us a surprisingly complete view of the life of the Egyptians, of their arts and trades, their possessions and daily occupations, their offices and dignities, their relationships, worship of the gods and the dead, etc., at a time, the second half of the fourth thousand of years, B. C., when all the rest of mankind is still silent for us, and continues thus for ten centuries to come.—The 5th dynasty, also Memphitic, follows immediately the 4th. The names of its kings are found in the graves of Memphis. Contemporaneously with it reigned in Up. Eg. the six from Elephantine; hence, from the Ethiopian boundary. Here the Ethiopians first appear in Eg. history. Their kings, however, so far as they appear on their monuments, found only in Up. Egypt, differ in nothing from the Eg. kings. This seems to indicate their near relationship, unless we suppose that in Eg. they became Egyptians.—Under the succeeding dynasties, down to the 11th, the prosperity of the country diminished, as we can judge from the absence of monuments. The 11th was the 1st Theban. It made itself independent in Up. Eg., and founded the power and fame of Thebes, previously unknown, and of its god Ammon. The 12th, or 2d Theban dynasty became a general one, and raised the country to a second prosperity, which, like the former, is indicated by a series of the stately monuments, especially by its wonderful graves cut into the rock. The greatness of this period appears also from its gigantic enterprises to promote the general welfare. Such was the canal of Joseph, leading into the sea of Moeris, by which a hitherto desert country was converted into a most fertile one, and which, in the dry season, watered also the country around Memphis. This system of irrigation, which embraced the entire country, was executed during a reign of 42 years by Amenemha III. He also built near the sea his pyramid, as also the temple which subsequently became the centre of the celebrated labyrinth.—But five years after his death, however, the kingdom was suddenly hurled from the height of its prosperity. About 2100, B. C., the Hyksos, a warlike shepherd race, entered Eg. from the east, overpowered the country, occupied Memphis as their residence, laid a tribute on the upper and lower country, and fortified the N.-E. pass, which they had found open, in order to repel other races pressing on after them. Only after 511 years, the native kings, who had maintained their independence partly in Up. Eg. and partly in Ethiopia, succeeded in expelling the Hyksos from Avaris, the later Pelusium, their last stronghold. This was a powerful, and, perhaps, the first great resistance from the South to the vast streams of nations issuing from Asia; a resistance which modified materially all existing relations of the world. An entire people, numbering hundreds of thousands, who in the highly cultivated cities of Eg. had gained at least as much civilization as they had destroyed, were compelled to seek a new home in Palestine. This, no doubt, led to new expulsions and emigrations; perhaps also to a separation of the expelled Hyksos into different directions. Hence it is easy to understand how this world-event could produce a general movement among the nations, and leave a deep impression upon the future.—The time of this new era was the 16th to the 14th cent., B. C., and it is worthy of remark, that the roots of all the historical and historic-mythological traditions of all other nations of antiquity can be traced back to about this time, but not further back.—The expulsion of the Hyksos has from an early age been connected with the Exodus of the Israelites, and the two have been declared to be one and the same event. The view was advanced by Josephus, who wished in this way to vindicate for his people a higher antiquity and an early power. For this assertion he knew no authority but the history of Manethô, by whom, however, according to his own extracts, he is most decidedly contradicted. In fact an impartial examination of the account of Manethô can leave not the least doubt, that the Egyptians themselves regarded and reported the two events as wholly distinct. The expulsion of the Hyksos is placed under Thutmosis, i. e., Tuthmosis III. The Exodus of the Israelites, which is described as an expulsion of leprous and rebellious people, led on by a Heliopolitan priest named Osarsiph, who afterwards called himself Moses, took place, according to Manethô, during the reign of a king who, being the son of a Ramses and father of a Sethô, can only have been the Menaphtes or Menephtes of the Manethonian lists, son of Ramses II., and father of Sethos II. Both kings, Tuthmosis III. and Menephtes, forming the beginning and the end of the period of Egypt's highest prosperity, are thoroughly known to us from monuments, and are separated by about 250 years. So far, from Eg. accounts, the two events also were separated.—These things being now reduced to certainty, the only remaining question is, whether the O. Test. accounts contradict the Egyptian, and this in such a manner as to require us to consider the latter as false. It appears, however, that the Eg. accounts are confirmed most positively by those of the Hebrews, if we admit an error, a later addition, in the calculation of the period between the Exodus and the building of the temple; which, according to 1 Kings, 6: 1, amounted to 480 years; a number, however, which does not agree with the numbers in the Book of Judges, with the Septuagint, with Acts 13: 20, nor with Josephus (Ant. 8, 3, 1; c. Ap. 2, 2). Whilst these calculations would lead to a much higher number of years, an impartial examination of the genealogies, especially the Levitical ones, as being most reliable, gives us precisely the number which is required, if the Egyptian tradition concerning the epoch of the Exodus is correct. This is not the place to show that the numbers of the Book of Judges, or the Rabbinical chronology, do not contradict this view (Chron. d. Æg. I. p. 360, 377). The most weighty confirmation of it lies in the fact, that in the Mosaic account a circumstance is mentioned, which designates the time most decisively; we mean the building of Pithom and Ramses by the Jews under the predecessor of the Pharaoh of the Exodus, or Ramses II. We know from other evidence that this most powerful Pharaoh dug many canals and built new cities; and especially that he dug the canal through Goshen, and built Pithom (Patumos) at its western terminus and Ramses at the eastern. Among the ruins of the latter is still found a granite group of two deities, and of the deified Ramses II., sitting on a throne in the midst between them.—In consequence of this erroneous identification of the withdrawal of the Hyksos and the Israelites, the advent of Abraham and Jacob in Egypt was also placed too early, viz.: in the reign of the Hyksos. This is contradicted by every notice in the Hebrew narrative of the reigning family; and from this narrative alone no one would have formed the conclusion that an Arabian dynasty, cognate to the Hebrews, had at that time reigned in Egypt. That Jacob came to a purely Egyptian court, is manifest from the title of the king, of Joseph, and of the royal officers: also that Joseph spoke with his brethren through an interpreter, and that the Egyptians would not eat bread with them. The arrival of the Hebrews in Egypt, then, took place after the expulsion of the Hyksos. How could this greatest event of the age have remained unmentioned in the O. T., if it had taken place during the sojourn of the Israelites in Goshen, in the times of the father or grandfather of Moses? Add to this, that the institutions, so important to Egypt, which the O. T. (Gen. 47: 20–26) ascribes to Joseph, are found also in their essential features in Herodotus (2, 108, 37) and Diodorus; and are ascribed to Sesostris or Sesoosis, i. e., Sethos I., whose reign falls in the middle of the 15th century, B. C. With this epoch the data of the genealogies coincide precisely. We must, therefore, ascribe to these genealogies a more reliable historical character, than to the separate data, which conflict with them.—We know in Eg. history, therefore, the Pharaoh under whom Joseph came to Egypt, viz.: Sethos I.; also the one at whose court Moses was educated, Ramses II.; and the one of the Exodus, Menephtes. Of these three kings of the 19th dynasty, Ramses II., surnamed Miamun, was undoubtedly the greatest; and under him the Eg. kingdom reached its highest pinnacle of power and splendor. Under this king, Moses, the great man of God was born; and under his successor, whom Herodotus (2, 111) names Pherôs and describes as violent and wicked, and therefore punished with blindness, he led his people out of E., and founded at Mt. Sinai the first, the Jewish theocracy; as 1300 years later, under Augustus, the greatest emperor of the Greek-Roman world,

Christ was born, and by his death under Tiberius, the Roman Pherôs, founded the second, the Christian theocracy.—Under the later kings of the 19th dynasty, and under the following dynasties, the kingdom gradually declined. Only the first king of the 20th dynasty, Ramses III., the rich Rampsinitus of Herodotus, is described on the monuments as having undertaken several expeditions into Asia. The next memorable contact of Eg. with Israelite history falls in the 22d Manethonian dynasty, in which Sheshenk (Σέσωγχις), the Shishak of the Bible, advanced, about 970, against Rehoboam, and conquered Jerusalem (1 Kings 14:25). This event, also, seems to have left a memorial upon the monuments of Egypt.—It was about this time, or a little earlier, that the most important of documents concerning the ancient nations, the genealogy of nations in Genesis, seems to have been composed. Of late many learned and subtle investigations of that invaluable report have been made, and its importance and reliability brought more and more to light. We only mention here what refers to Eg. and its designated relation to other nations (see Movers, Phönizier, Vol. I., 1841. Especially Bertheau, zur Gesch. der Israel., 1842; also Knobel, die Völker-tafel, 1850; and Stark, Gaza, u. d. Philist. Küste., 1852). Ham had four sons, Cush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan. These corresponded in general with the nations which the Greeks called Ethiopians, Egyptians, Libyans, and Phœnicians. The term Ethiopia had a wider and a narrower sense. In the former it included all the dark colored inhabitants of the South; in the latter, the dwellers on the shores of the Nile south of Egypt, whose metropolis was Meroë. This people had no relationship to the negro. Phut denotes the tribes dwelling in N. Africa, west of Egypt. Mizraim, Egypt, is the third African member of the family of Ham. Its primitive language is now fully supplanted by the Arabian, just as its people also, by a long-continued intermixture, and by a subjection of nearly 1200 years under a second Arabian Hyksos dominion, has become almost entirely Semitic. We still know the Eg. language, however, through the Coptic, and the hieroglyphic literature. Thus we are now warranted in the assertion that there existed on African soil only three great people, which from their languages are proven to be Noachian.—The people of Canaan are found on Asiatic soil. Without the positive information of the genealogy, scarcely any one would have regarded the Canaanites as cognate to the Egyptians; and yet an oversight or hasty assertion of the author of the genealogy would here be utterly inconceivable, since he himself lived in Canaan. The view of Bertheau is no doubt in every material point the true one, when he finds the reason of this order in the southern origin of the Phœnicians, compared with that of the other Semitic nations, who came from the northeast. And yet the view which he rejects, that they were connected with the expelled Hyksos, may harmonize very well with his own. The Hyksos were by the Egyptians called Arabians or Phœnicians. When they overran Egypt, they had scarcely yet settled the coast of Palestine; it is very possible, however, that they did so at the time of their expulsion from Egypt. But what became of the large people, of expelled Phœnician shepherds, if it did not, as we are told, settle among their kindred in Syria? If this was the case, it is readily understood how the Egypticized Phœnicians could retain so many Hamite elements, traces of which are found in their worship and myths; so that a genealogical connection with Eg. and Ethiopia of these southerners, originating both from Arabia and Eg., seemed to be warranted.—The view lately advanced by Stark, that the Hyksos were from Lower Eg., and hence of genuine Hamite origin; that in the old kingdom they had already come forward as the Heracleopolitan dynasty; and that after their expulsion they had settled, chiefly under the name of Philistines, the coast adjacent to Egypt, we pass over as too little plausible.—After the 21st dynasty the Theban royal families were set aside by those of Tanis, Bubastis, and Sais; and near the end of the 8th cent. the country was subjugated by the Æthiopian conqueror, Shabak, the Sabakon, of Herodotus, and So of the Bible. Manethôs mentions him, with his successors, Shabatek and Tuharka, the Tirhakah of the O. T., as the 25th dynasty. The last of these kings afterwards voluntarily retired to Ethiopia. After the Ethiopians had withdrawn from Egypt, there followed a period of commotion and dissolution, called by Herodotus the dodecarchy, but not mentioned by Manethôs, who records only the legitimate kings: After a short time Psammetichus ascended the throne. Under him and his successors of the 26th dynasty, the country once more reached a high prosperity, owing to the fact that he opened the country to strangers. He had gained his power with the help of Ionian and Carian soldiers, and rewarded them with honors and lands. The Greek population of the country soon increased. Amasis granted them the entire city of Naukratis, which soon became one of the most important ports. Egypt was opened to foreign commerce; and even in the victorious times of the 18th and 19th dynasties, the wealth of the country was less than at this time. The number of cities under Amasis rose to 20,000.—But the defensive force of the country did not grow in an equal degree, and at the end of this dynasty it yielded to the Persians, and remained a province from 525 to 504. Under the 29th and 30th dynasties it again became for a short time independent, until in 340 it was conquered once more by the Persians, and in 332 by Alexander.—The Macedonian supremacy was continued in the Ptolemies, under whom Egypt, having now fulfilled its mission in history, rapidly declined. Of sole importance in this age is the fact that the Greeks commenced now, in this land of primeval philosophy and learning, to take possession of oriental literature and science, the heritage bequeathed to them by the expiring Orient. Alexandria became the centre of Greek researches. Soon large libraries of several hundred thousand scrolls were formed. The most celebrated and important works, both of the Egyptians and of other Eastern nations, were translated into Greek; others, as that of Manethôs, were written in the Greek by native scholars versed in Greek literature. Among translations, that of the Pentateuch, under Ptolemy Philadelphus, must be especially mentioned. — With Cleopatra VI. and her son, Ptolemy XVI., called Cæsar after his father, ended Egypt's last period of independence. Through the battle of Actium it became incorporated with the Roman empire. — In the 1st cent. after Christ Christianity was brought to Eg. and was rapidly spread. We find, however, hieroglyphic inscriptions on Egyptian temples belonging to the middle of the 3d century; and at Philæ the worship of Isis was forbidden by Justinian not before the middle of the 6th century.

Lepsius. — Reinecke.

Egypt, Modern. — The transition from ancient to modern Egypt is marked politically by its conversion into a Roman province by Octavianus Augustus, and spiritually by the introduction of Christianity. — The founding of the Church may be traced back to the earliest times (Acts 2: 10; 6: 9; 18: 24). According to a tradition preserved by Eusebius, of Cæsarea (Ch. Hist., 2, 16), Mark, the evangelist went, after the death of Peter at Rome, from the latter city to Egypt, preached the gospel there, and became the first Bishop of Alexandria, where he at once founded several congregations, as many, both men and women, were converted. Whether these really adopted forthwith a strict asceticism, as Eusebius asserts, remains very doubtful; since Eusebius adduces the authority of Philo, a contemporary, who portrayed this life in his works (Ch. II., 2, 17). But Philo does not speak of the Christians, but of the Jewish sect of Therapeutics (de vit. contempl., p. 889; comp. Neander K.-Gesch., I., 1, p. 78. Dähne jüd.-alex. Relig. Philos., I., 443. Gfrörer, Philo u. d. Alexandr. Theosoph., II., 280, where the literature is given), and states that they lived not in Alexandria, but at Lake Moeris. Eusebius gives also the succession of Alex. bishops (2, 24; 3, 21; 4, 1; 4, 10, 19; 5, 9; 22; 6, 26; 35; 8, 13), or specifies at least prominent ones (6, 46; 7, 21; 8, 9; 13); shows that Christianity had spread in Upper Egypt in the 2d century already (6, 1, comp. Blumhardt, Miss. Gesch. d. K. Chr., II., 194), and describes the sufferings and triumph of the Eg. Church during the Decian, Valerian, and Diocletian persecutions (6, 41; 7, 11; 8, 8). He also portrays the great teachers of the Alex. Catechetical school. Pantænus, Clemens, Origen, and Heracles, and shows that this school was important not only for the maintenance and development of the truth in the Church, but also for the spread of the gospel. — Just as before Christ Eg. had been the land of wonders, from which everything remarkable, deeply significant and primitive passed over the civilized nations; so also after Christ it became the home of all higher speculation, which sought to blend with revelation all views and ideas kindred to it, which were found in heathen religion and philosophy. Hence arose a Christian syncretism, similar to the Jewish-platonic one of Philo, which aided much in the development of the inward ideas of Christianity, but also to the corruption of doctrine. At Alexandria, therefore, there were two tendencies of this kind, a more genuine, and a heretical one. On the one side are found men like Origen and Clemens, as the good Gnostics. The former, also, with Bish. Dionysius, was the leader in biblical criticism. But of the greatest influence on subsequent times was Athanasius, the great patriarch of Alexandria and author of the Nicene Creed. In Cyrill we afterwards find again on the same soil the germ of an idealistic christology, undervaluing the human in Christ in favor of the divine, leading indeed to orthodoxy, but also in its excess to Eutychianism or Monophysitism. On the heretical side the false Gnosticism was so fully developed in Eg., that formerly the Eg. false gnosis was regarded as distinct from the Syrian (Neander, K. Gesch., I., 2, p. 642). The Gnostics, Basilides, Valentinus, Heracleon, Ptolomæus, and Carpocrates, were Egyptians: the phantastic Ophites, and many Gnostic variations, as also docetism, Sabellianism, and Arianism, were products of Egypt. Nor has the Eg. Church even lost its false idealism. — On practical ground also it took part in the one-sided asceticism (Pachonius, Anthony) of monasticism and its fondness for legendary wonders. Indeed, its influence upon the theory and practice of Christianity can scarcely be calculated. But just in this inward antagonism, in its doctrinal controversies and exaggerations, its forces were wasted; and the Monophysites, though condemned as heretics, gained the ascendancy and chose their own patriarch, whilst Alexandria remained the seat of the orthodox patriarch, who was appointed by the Byzantine court. The real (heretical) Church of Eg. now assumed the name of Coptic (from Αἰγύπτος, Gupotos), whilst the Greeks were derisively styled Melchites (from Melech, King) or emperor-Christians (Neander, C. Hist., III., 88, &c.). The court-church oppressed this heretical community as much as possible; and the original life of the Church was so entirely lost in this odious quarrel, that the Mohammedan conquest (641, p. 6) was facilitated by the Coptics, who preferred at any price to be rid of the ecclesiastical supervision of Constantinople. — The Arabian historian of the Coptic Church (Makrizi, hist. Copt. christ. ed. Wetzer: Sulzb., 1828), and the learned work of Renaudot (hist. patriarch. Alexandr., 2 vols. 4to.), show that at that time there were only 300,000 Greeks or Melchites, whilst the millions were Jacobites or Monophysites. Their hatred of each other was such, that they murdered each other on any occasion. The Mohammedans on the other hand, especially Amru ben Elâas their leader, had sufficient tact to declare themselves the protectors of the oppressed, and to impose upon them at first only a small tribute. — Soon, however, oppression commenced. Under the Fatimide Califs, as also under the Mameluke Sultans, the condition of the Copts was the same. The most odious cruelties were employed against them; and they sunk both in inward life and numbers so deeply, as to excite the pity of even their Mohammedan historian, Makrizi. The intercourse between Egypt and the West through the commerce of Venice and the crusaders was of no account to them, since the R. Church thought them heretics. The Osman turks, who, since 1517, were their masters, could not break the power of the Mameluke Beys, and were cer-mainly despotic to Christians; so that it may well be said that for 1200 years Egyptian Christendom has severely atoned for its sins. At present its insignificance alone protects it. The number of Coptic Christians in Eg. has sunk from about 2,000,000 to 200,000, of whom about 10,000 (according to others, 60,000) live in Cairo, but the greater number in Up. Egypt. They are most numerous in El Fajum. The Patriarch estimates the number of his congregations at 600; but others say there are only 150. The Patr. of Alexandria, who lives, however, at Cairo, stands at their head. His jurisdiction includes Nubia and Abyssinia, in which latter country he chooses and ordains the patriarch (Abuna). He himself is chosen from among the monks: the Bishops and Archpriests apply to the abbot of St. Anthony's, who selects 6 or 8 monks, from whom the Patriarch is chosen by lot. Next to him in rank is the Patriarch of Jerusalem, who also lives at Cairo, visiting the Holy Land annually at Easter only, but at other times acting as deputy of the Eg. Patriarch. — Next to these dignitaries are twelve actual or titular Bishops, under whom are the Archpriests and priests, whose duty is to read mass, not to preach; preaching is unknown among the Copts. Next follow archdeacons, deacons, sub-deacons, lectors, cantors, and exorcists; the latter, however, have no special duties. Ordination is administered by the Patriarch and Bishops; but with holy oil, which, by a permanent miracle of St. Mark, never fails. Apostolical succession by imposition of hands is almost wholly unknown. — The clergy belong to the lowest classes, and are poor, ignorant, and coarse. Their education embraces only the reading of the liturgy and the other ceremonial. Their beggarly living is derived from husbandry and the perquisites allowed for baptisms, marriages, and funerals. — The regular monasteries belong to the orders of St. Macarius, Anthony, and Paul; at Alexandria there is also a monastery of St. Marc. These institutions have a strict rule, some of them that of Pachonius. They are seven in number; two in the eastern desert, four in the Natron valley, and one at Dschebel Coscan. There are also some secular monasteries to which females are admitted. — In doctrine the Coptic Church accepts only the three œcumenical symbols of Nice, Constantinople, and Ephesus: the few sentences of the fathers, which are still known to them: the three liturgies ascribed to St. Basil, Gregory, and Cyrill: and also the apostolical constitutions. It has seven sacraments. Baptism is administered with trine immersion, holy oil, and sign of the cross; to boys 40, and to girls 80 days after birth. Circumcision, also, is a standing rite. Confirmation with holy oil is administered immediately after baptism. The Lord's Supper is merely the sacrifice of the mass; its doctrine is transubstantiation, confession and absolution, orders, marriage, and extreme unction, the latter administered to the healthy, also, after great sins, completes the number. Faith, fasting, and prayer, are also sometimes called sacraments. Fasts are very frequent and severe; the prayers so frequent, that the patriarch is awakened in the night every quarter of an hour for a short prayer.

Faith is merely the rehearsal of the creed. A description of the church and its worship is found in J. Wilson, The Lands of the Bible: Edinb., 1847, Vol. 2, p. 526. — There are also in Eg. several thousands of Armenians, and a larger number of orthodox Greeks. At Alexandria there is a Latin monastery. — The sad condition of the Coptic Church induced the English Church Missionary Society to send Rev. Lieder and Kruse to Cairo, in order to reawaken a more active Christian life in this ancient Church. They have succeeded in making the priests better acquainted with the Scriptures, in gathering several hundreds of Coptic children into Christian schools, and in founding a seminary for the education of priests, of which the present Abuna of Abyssinia was a pupil. The Patriarch favors their labors. The latest information concerning the Eg. Church is found in the travels of Jowett, J. Wilson, W. R. Wilson, Sir G. Wilkinson, Fisk, Bowring, Lane; in the reports of Lieder and Kruse (Ch. Miss. Rec., 1827–1852), and in the Rus. Miss. Magaz. of the same year. W. HOFFMANN. — Rcinecke.

Ehud (LXX.-'אֲחָז) was one of the earliest "Judges," or heroes of Israel, who flourished between the time of Joshua's death and the establishment of a monarchy. He was of the tribe of Benjamin, and the family of Gera (1 Chron. 7 : 10 ; 8 : 5, &c. ; Gen. 46 : 21), and, like others of that tribe, was left-handed (Judges 3 : 15). On one occasion, after paying over the tribute levied by Eglon upon a portion of Israel whom he had conquered, and held in bondage, Ehud went homeward with his companions as far as Gilgal, but then returned alone to Eglon's abode, and having obtained a private interview with the King, under pretence of communicating a matter of importance to him, assassinated him, and then made his escape to the desert of Jericho. There he summoned Ephraim to arms; took possession of the fords of the Jordan; 10,000 Moabites were slain. Then Israel had rest for eighty years (Judges 3 : 12, &c.).

RUEBSCHL.*

Eichhorn, John Godfrey, born Oct. 16, 1752, at Dörrenzimmern, Hohenlohe-Oehringen, where his father then preached, was among the most distinguished and popular German theologians of his day. After due preparation he entered the University of Göttingen in 1770, and attended the lectures of J. D. Michaelis, Walch, Miller, Schlötzer, and Heyne. In 1774 he was appointed rector of the Gymnasium at Ohrdruff, Gotha, and in 1775 Prof. of Oriental languages at Jena. In 1788 he was called to Göttingen, as the successor of J. D. Michaelis in the chair of Philosophy, where he remained until his death, June 27, 1827. He was a man of varied and extensive requirements, but chiefly excelled in the department of O. T. Biblical Criticism. His labors were immense, and his fertility as an author surprising. But his works were more remarkable for attractive fluency of style than for depth and research. Although exceedingly popular at the time, they possess comparatively little substantial value. As an exegetical writer he endeavored to defend the Bible against the assaults of skepticism, by conceding too much to the ruling ideas of the age, and solving critical difficulties by the principle of accommodation.—His chief works were: Progr. de Cuschæis verisimilia: Arnstadt, 1774, 4to. Monumenta antiq. hist. Arabum post Alb. Schultensium, &c.: Arnst., 1775, 8vo. De rei numariæ apud Arabis initiis: Jena, 1776, 4to. Poëseos Asiaticæ comm. libri VI., cum appendice, auct. Guil. Jones, recudi curavit: Lips., 1777, 8vo. Articles in his Repertorium for Bibl. and Orient. Literature, 18 vols., Lpz., 1777–1786. Einleitung in's A. T.: Lpz., 1781–83, 3 Theile; 4 Ausg., in 5 B., 1825–26. Bibliothek d. bibl. Literat., 10 Bände: Lpz., 1787–1803. Comm. in Apoc. Joannis 2 B., 1791. Einl. in's N. T., 1804–14. Die hebräischen Propheten, 3 B., 1816–19. Die metrische Uebers. d. Buchs Hiob, 2: Ausg., 1824. Die franz. Revolution, &c., 2 B., 1797. Die allg. Geschichte d. Kult. u. Literatur d. neueren Europa, 1796, &c. Gesch. d. Literatur v. ihrem Anfang, &c., 5 B., 1805, &c. — Sources: Gesch. d. Univers. Göttingen, von SAALFELD u. OESTERLEY. EICHSTAEDT, oratio de J. G. Eichhorn, &c.: Jena, 1827. THOM. CHR. TYCHSEN, Memoria J. G. Eichhorn (commentl. soc. scient. Götting.), Vol. VI. EWALD, Jahrb. d. bibl. Wissensch., I., 1849. BERTHEAU.*

Ekron, 'Azzáron, was the most north-eastern of the five chief cities of Philistia, and its frontier protection there against the Israelites (Josh. 13: 3). It was first assigned to the tribe of Judah (15: 45), and taken by that tribe (Judges 1: 18, &c.), then transferred to Dan (Josh. 19: 43); but the Philistines soon regained it (15: 11; 1 Sam. 5: 10; 6: 17; 7: 14). Hence the judgments pronounced against it (Amos 1: 8; Zeph. 2: 4; Zach. 9: 5, 7; Jer. 25: 20). It was the seat of a peculiar worship, and of the famous oracle of Baal-zebub (2 Kings 1: 2, &c., 16). Alexander Balas gave it to Jonathan Macc. (1 Macc. 10: 89). At the time of Eusebius, yet, it was a large place, inhabited by Jews. It is mentioned during the Crusaders, but afterwards was lost sight of, from the absence of ruins. Robinson again discovered it (II., 227–29) in the large village Akir, situated in a fertile plain, c. 3 miles W. of Jamnia, and 4½ miles S. of Ramlah. The Sheikh of Akir informed Robinson that cisterns, the stones of handmills, and other relics were often discovered in the adjacent fields. — (See RELAND, Palest., p. 745, &c.; RITTER, Erdk., XVI., 122, &c.).

RÜETSCHL.*

Elam (LXX. Αἶλαμ, Apoc. Ελυμαίς, Vulg. Ælam) occurs ten times in the canon, and twice in the Apocr. Scriptures. In Gen. 10: 22 it also occurs as the name of the first-mentioned, and perhaps the first-born descendant of Shem. The people thus designated may, therefore, have belonged to the Semitic family. Accordingly the tradition reported by Jos. Ant. 1, 6, 4, that the Persians were descended from the Elamites must be erroneous, as the language of the P. is not Semitic. (See Persians). Elam appears as an independent kingdom, with a King who is prominent in the war against Sodom (Gen. 14: 1, 9). In Is. 21: 2; Jer. 25: 25 (comp. Herodot., 1, 102) it is associated with Media; in Ezek. 32: 24, with Assyria; and in Is. 22: 6, it is represented as a part of the Assyrian empire.

These data enable us with certainty to fix its geographical position, which must have been along the E. side of the Tigris (so Strabo, 16, 1, 17). Pliny says, still more definitely, that the Ulai (Dan. 8: 2) separated it from Susiana. Strabo, 15, 3, 12, speaks of a war between the Elamites and Susiannites; whence we conclude that the two nations occupied originally distinct and independent countries. Yet from their proximity to each other, and the more intimate relations which arose between them, Greek writers often, in a general way, include both under the name Susiana, and Hebrew writers under that of Elam. But there is no sufficient ground for including Persia under Elam, as Vitranga, Gese-nius, Winer, and Hengstenberg do. For the summons of Elam and Media against Babylon (Is. 21: 2) only proves that this prophecy was earlier than any knowledge of the Persians, who were as unimportant, nationally, as they were unknown, until Cyrus brought them into notice; and Isaiah (like Jer. 27: 7) merely wishes to say, that destruction awaits the Babylonians from nations living in the E. and N.-E., of whom he names Elam and Media. Is. 22: 6 refers to an earlier union of Elam with tribes living along the river Kir. in the siege of Jerusalem under Hezekiel. — From Jer. 25: 25 (cf. 49: 34–39) it may be inferred that Elam formed, at times an independent state; and from Ezek. 32: 24, &c., that it possessed some importance during the ante-exile period. Both in the Bible (Is. 21: 2; Jer. 25: 25) and classic writers (Strabo, 11, 11, 4; 12, 6; 15, 3, 12; 16, 1, 17) the Elamites are represented as a warlike people skilled in archery. Strabo, 11, 12, 6, and Polyb., 5, 44, add that they were predatory and barbarous. According to Strabo, 16, 1, 18, their country was divided into smaller provinces, and productive, especially in rice, cotton, and sugar-cane. — Under the dominion of the Greeks, and the Romans, several Elamite tribes, of such as escaped from the overthrow of the Asiatic nations, and settled among the mountains of Media, and near the Caspian Sea, attracted notice as predatory hordes (Strabo, 11, 15, 16; Plut. Pomp., 36; Justin., 36; Tac. ann., 6, 44). Some Elamites forced, no doubt, to yield to the Assyrians, were transplanted to Palestine after the removal of the ten tribes (Ezra 4: 9; Is. 11: 11. Cf. Ewald, Isr. Gesch., III., 319, 375, &c.), and the Israelites banished to Elam. According to Judith 1: 6 the Elamite Kings maintained their independence even under Nebuchadnezzar (cf. Jer. 25: 25, &c.; 49: 34–39). First under Cyrus their country seems to have been reduced to a mere province, and united with Susiana (see Ezek. 32: 24; Dan. 8: 2). — In 1 Macc. 6: 1, a Persian city, Elymais, is mentioned, the temple of which Antiochus Epiph. attempted to plunder. But there was no such city; and whilst Polyn., 31, 11; Jos. Ant., 12, 9, 1 (who calls it the temple of Diana), APPIAN Syr. 66 (who says it was one of Venus's, probably Anubis, or the Nanea of 2 Macc. 1: 13), STRABO, 16, 1, and DIONOR., 19, attest the fact of such a plundering, none of them mentions the place where it was perpetrated. But as 1 Macc. was originally written in Aramaic-Hebrew (EUSEB., H. E., 6, 25; EROME, prol. gal.), the translator may have taken עִיר in the modern sense of city, not in the older (see Dan. 8 : 2) sense of province.

VAHINGER.*

Elath (Deut. 2 : 8 ; 2 Kings 14 : 22 ; 16 : 6, &c. ; LXX. Αἶλας, Αἶλας ; Jos. Ant., 8, 6, 4, Αἶλας ; STRABO, 16, 4, 4, Αἶλας ; VULG. Elath ; PLIN. I. N., 5, 12 ; 6, 32, Aelana ; Hieron. onom. lila ; PTOL., 5, 17, 1, 'Ελαάνα), the city of terebinthas, was a renowned seaport at the head of the eastern inlet of the Arabian gulf (sinus Maniticus), near Eziongeber. It terminates the valley, now called Elghor, which runs from the lake of Gennesareth past the Dead Sea across Palestine and Arabia Petrea. Its history is intimately associated with that of the Edomites and of the kingdom of Judah. The Israelites passed it on their way from Sinai through Edom (Deut. 2 : 8). When David subjugated Edom, Elath was assigned to Ephraim and Manasseh (2 Sam. 8 : 14). Solomon prepared a commercial fleet for Ophir, in Eziongeber ; 1 Kings 9 : 26 ; 2 Chron. 8 : 17 ; the Arabic translator renders the first of these passages : "he built ships in the forest Val, near Elath." From that time the Israelites seem to have settled there for the sake of trade (2 Kings 16 : 6). Jehoshaphat endeavored to revive this traffic with India (Jerome on Deut. 2 : 8. See 1 Kings 22 : 49). But under Jehoram Edom finally revolted from Judah (2 Kings 8 : 20, &c. Cf. Gen. 27 : 4). Amaziah sought to recover the lost province (2 Kings 14 : 7 ; 2 Chron. 25 : 11), but only succeeded in retaining control of the port, which Uzziah, his son, rebuilt (2 Kings 14 : 22), or strengthened. For during the war the Jews may have garrisoned Elath ; which is the more likely, if there was then already a citadel upon the island Jesirat Faron. But under Ahaz even Elath was lost, Pekah having contrived to put the Edomites into possession of it again (2 Kings 16 : 6). For although the common reading says the Syrians obtained that port, this is contradicted by the fact that Rezin could not even take Jerusalem (2 Kings 16 : 5 ; Is. 7 : 1), and that Tiglath-Pileser, at Ahaz' request, entered Syria six years afterwards (Is. 7 : 8), slew Rezin, and conquered Syria. It is incomprehensible, also, how Syria should still have retained Elath as long as the common reading implies, even if it had taken the city, especially as this is nowhere else affirmed. The usual reading therefore must be an error. Such an error might readily occur, as Resh and Daleth could easily be confounded in copying. — Subsequently Elath disappears from history, no doubt because it lost its commercial importance. But the Romans again fortified it with a strong garrison (EDRISI 1, 328, 332 ; Jerome Onom.), and reckoned it with Palest. tertia. During the first centuries after Christ it was the seat of a Bishop (THEOD. puest., 44 ad lib. 4 ; Regum. in Jerem., 49 ; PHILOST. 3, 6 ; PROCOPIUS de bello pers. 1, 19), and acquired new commercial importance. After Mohammed it declined ; Abulfeda mentions it only as a fortress. Only a castle now remains, called Alaba (see Robinson, I., 163, 169–71 ; Schüb. 2, 379). Rüppel (Reisen, 248, &c.) found some ruins of Elath, called Galena.

VAHINGER.*

VOL. II. — 12.

Elders among the Israelites.—Among all nations which are in that stage of political development in which the relation between the state and the family is still apparent, age is highly respected, and the youth defer to the ripper experience of years. Hence the reverence paid to the aged in eastern countries ; hence the fact that there elders are at the head of every corporate body. Thus in the Bible we read of the elders of the Egyptians (Gen. 50 : 7), of the Midianites (Numb. 22 : 4, 7), of the Gibeonites (Josh. 9 : 11). They are found among the Israelites in the earliest times, as the representatives of the congregation. Moses consulted them concerning the affairs of the nation (Exod. 3 : 16, &c.), and was attended by them to the King of Egypt (Exod. 3 : 18). They represented the people on public occasions, at festivals and sacrifices (Exod. 18 : 12 ; 24 : 1, 9 ; Levit. 4 : 15 ; 9 : 1), and as their witnesses (Exod. 17 : 5, 6 ; Deut. 31 : 28). Moses, by God's command, appointed seventy of them to assist him in his administration of the government (Numb. 11 : 16, 24 ; 16 : 25 ; Deut. 27 : 1). So Joshua (7 : 6 ; 8 : 10). After the settlement of Israel in Canaan we read of elders of single cities (Succoth, Josh. 8 : 14, 16 ; Gilead, 11 : 5–11), and of the entire nation, acting as judges, and sitting in the gates of cities to decide cases, both personal, municipal, and national (Deut. 19 : 22 ; Josh. 20 : 4 ; Ruth 4 : 11), and hence they are mentioned along with leaders, judges, chiefs, and Levites (Deut. 29 : 10 ; 31 : 9, 28, &c.). At the introduction of kings they plead with Samuel in the name of the people (1 Sam. 8 : 4, &c.), and afterwards they took an active part in the election and inauguration of kings (2 Sam. 3 : 17 ; 5 : 3, &c.). Under the kings they seem to have constituted a special college to counsel and aid the king (1 Sam. 15 : 30 ; 2 Sam. 19 : 11 ; 1 Kings 20 : 7, &c.). On festival occasions they were prominent (1 Kings 8 : 1 ; 1 Chron. 15 (16) : 25). The prophets seem to have sought their co-operation (2 Kings 6 : 32 ; Jer. 19 : 1 ; 26 : 17, &c. &c.). Their efficiency did not cease during the exile, or after it. In Jer. 29 : 1, "the residue of the elders that were carried away captive to Babylon" are named ; and under Ezra (10 : 8, 14) they again exercised judicial prerogatives. —In like manner the elders were the chief representatives of the people in the age of the Maccabees, acting with the rulers and priests for the best interests of the nation (1 Macc. 1 : 26 ; 7 : 33, &c.). And in 1 Macc. 12 : 6, a γερουσία, a counsel of the aged is mentioned ; the term here, as in 2 Macc. 1 : 10 ; 4 : 44, being evidently synonymous with πρεσβύτερος, although in 3 Macc. 1 : 8, ἡ γερουσία and πρεσβ. are both mentioned. How the sanhedrim grew out of the γερουσία will be shown in the article Sanhedrim.

ARNOLD.*

Eleazer (LXX. Ἐλεάζαρος, abbrev. Ἀζαρος). 1) The third son of Aaron (Exod. 6 : 23, &c. ; Numb. 3 : 2) who had charge of the officiating Levites (Numb. 3 : 32) and succeeded his father as High-priest (20 : 25, &c. ; Deut. 10 : 6). The dignity entailed upon his family, with a brief interruption from the time of Eli to Solomon, until the time of Onias and Simon Macc. (1 Macc. 14 : 35, 41. EWALD, Gesch. Isr., II.,

417, &c.; v. Lengerke, Ken., 572, 654). According to Josh. 24 : 33 Eleazar died about the same time with Joshua, and was buried at Gibeah on Mt. Ephraim (1 Chron. 5 : 29, &c.; 18 : 16; 24 : 1, &c.—2) Eleazar ben Abinadab, keeper of the ark when it was brought back from the Philistines and placed in the house of his father at Kirjath-jearim (1 Sam. 7 : 1).—3) Eleazar ben Dodai, the Shehite, (and probably a Benjamite, 1 Chron. 8 : 4) was one of David's "three mighties," and distinguished himself in the barley-field at Pasdammim, by successfully resisting the Philistines when the Israelites had fled (2 Sam. 23 : 9, &c.; 1 Chron. 11 : 12, &c.; 27 : 4). Whether the feat recorded in 2 Sam. 23 : 14–16, was performed by the same trio is uncertain, as the article is wanting before the numeral.—4) Eleazar the fourth, son of MATHATHIAS, surnamed ὁ Αἰνάρης (1 Macc. 2 : 5) or Αἰνάρης, Jos. Ant. 12, 6, 1, (from a Syrian word meaning confodit feram, or from one signifying elephant-skin) because he forced his way through the ranks of the Syrians, in the campaign against Antiochus Eupator, and stabbed the elephant on which he supposed the King rode, so that it fell upon and crushed him. The Jews lost the battle (B. C. 163; 1 Macc. 6 : 43, &c.).—5) Eleazar, a scribe who was put to death in his 90th year, during the persecution of Antiochus Epiph., for fidelity to his religion in refusing to eat swine's flesh, and spurning an evasion which was offered to him (2 Macc. 6 : 18, &c.).—Others of this name are mentioned by Jos. B. J., 5, 1, 2, &c.; 7, 8. —(See EWALD, l. c., 545, 601, &c.; III., 2, p. 364, 341). RÜRSCHL.*

Elephant, the, was early used in war in India and Persia, but was not thus employed in western Asia or Europe until under Alexander M. (Pausan. 1, 12, 4). The Hebrews first became better acquainted with it in their wars with the Seleucidæ (1 Macc. 1 : 17; 3 : 34, &c.). In battle elephants bore a small tower fastened to their backs, containing from three to five soldiers (ÆLIAN. hist. anim., 13 : 9. PLINY, H. N., 8, 7; LIVY, 37, 40. The number 32, given in 1 Macc. 6 : 3, must be an error of a copyist or translator). Before battle they were excited by intoxicating drinks either given, or shown to them, to provoke them (ÆLIAN. l. c., 13, 8; 1 Macc. 6 : 34; 3 Macc. 5 : 2). In the assault they were scattered along the whole line, and served to break the ranks of the enemy, and especially to frighten the horses. The commander of the war-elephants was called ἐλεφαντοπόρος, but the driver of each one ὁ ἰνδός, from their native country (1 Macc. 6 : 35, 37. DIOD. 2, 16; ÆLIAN. l. c., 16, 15, &c.). They are often simply called τὰ θηρία; by the Romans bellua. The Seleucidæ continued to keep them, though forbidden to do so by the Romans; but the number, 80, given in 2 Macc. 11 : 4, is probably an exaggeration (cf. LIVY, 37, 39; POLYB., 5, 53, 4).—Ivory was known in Palestine and Europe much earlier than elephants. The Hebrew name for it betrays an Indian derivation. In the time of Solomon it was brought by sea from Ophir (India), or it was obtained from Tyrians, who bought it of Arabian merchants (1 Kings 10 : 22; Ezek. 27 : 15). It was used, ornamentally, upon furniture, buildings, sacred vessels, &c. (Am. 6 : 4; 1 Kings 10 : 18; 22 : 39; Ps. 45 : 9; Ezek. 27 : 6. See also: BOCHART, hierozoic., I., 233, &c.; LASSEN, ind. Alterthumsk., I., 303, &c.; PAULY's Real-encycl., III., 79, &c.). RÜRSCHL.*

Eleutheropolis.—This once renowned episcopal See is first mentioned in the Itiner. Anton., and upon coins of the age of Sept. Severus, as a city of S. Palestine, on the way between Jerusalem and Gaza. But Ammian. Marcell., 14, 8, says that it was older than Cæsarea Palest., and must previously have had another name; not Hebron, however, as Georg. Cedren., hist., I., 58, and SYNKELL., chronogr., p. 192, ed. Bonn, supposed, at a time when ancient E. had long disappeared. Robinson succeeded in discovering its true locality, and establishing its identity with Baitogabra (PROLEX., 5, 16), the modern Beit-Djibrin (Palest., II., 19, 27, 53, 57–66; III., 194). The place, now a village, lies between low olive hills. Ruins, belonging to different periods, are still found there, and are more massive and varied than those of any other locality in Palestine, including those of a powerful fortress of Roman-Byzantine structure, those of churches, masses of stones and fallen walls not yet fully examined.—Ancient E. (like the present village) was the chief town of the district, and an episcopal See. Eusebius and Jerome refer to it as a central point in southern Palestine, in designating the locality of other towns (RELAND, Pal., 408–411). It may have received its name from special privileges conferred by the Romans; but the Jewish legends concerning it are not worthy of credit. Its identity with the more ancient Baitogabra was first proven by RÖDIGER from an old Syrian notice in ASSEMANI (allg. Lit.-Zeitg., 1842, Nr. 72, p. 571. Cf. RELAND, l. c. 220, 227). The signatures of Councils show five Bishops of E., from 325 to 536. Epiphanius, born in its vicinity, often mentions it (hær. 40, 1); and B. Anton. Mart. seems to have visited it c. 600. In 796, according to a notice of the monk Stephan of Mar Saba, it was overthrown by the Saracens, and never regained its former importance. Thenceforth its Greek name disappears, and those who settled there revived the original native name, but Arabicized it. At the time of the Crusades the place lay in ruins, with "insurmountable remnants of walls" (Will. Tyr. 14, 22), of which King Fulco built a fortress, 1134, the keeping of which he assigned to the Hospitallers. After the battle of Hattin, Saladin seized it, and thenceforth the Moslem held it. Near it are remarkable caves, partly used for sepulchres, as though they had been a troglodite town (possibly of the primitive Horites). The extensive ruins above ground, and subterranean, leave no doubt that it must have been the centre of a large population, whose history is lost.—(See SOZOM., H. E., 6, 32; 7, 29; 9, 17. EUNAP., 115. GLYC., Ann., 509, ed. Bonn. RELAND, l. c., 72, 186, 215, 305, 307, 372, 627, &c., 749, &c., 957. PAULY's R.-encycl. III., 110. RITTER's Erdk., XVI., 134, &c.). RÜRSCHL.*

Eleutherus, a Greek by birth, for a time deacon of Anicet, was elevated to the bishopric of Rome c. 177, and occupied it until near 193.

Two interesting incidents occurred under his episcopate. The churches of Lyons and Vienne sent the Presb. (afterwards B.) Irenæus to him with the acts of the martyrs who had suffered here (EUSEB., H. E., V., 4). Next, a tradition reserved by Bede (H. E., III., 25) reports that the British King Lucius, wrote to E. declaring his willingness to embrace Christianity, and requesting teachers in its doctrines. E. complied with the request. The origin of this tradition may readily be accounted for by the effort of Romish Bishops, both in Italy and Great Britain to prove that the Roman Catholic was the primitive form of Christianity in Great Britain, and thus secure its ascendancy there. Hence the adoption of the tradition by Bede, and other English writers of the Rom. Church, and by the Liber Pontificalis. But even this shows its unreasonableness; for the form of Christianity which Augustine and his Benedictines found in England was certainly not Romish. How much truth there may be in the tradition it is hard to determine.

HERZOG.*

Eli (LXX. 'Heli, Vulg., Heli), 1) Priest (obviously High-priest) at Shiloh. His sons, Hophni and Phineas, assisted him, but soon, by their gross misconduct, drew upon themselves and their posterity the ill-will of the people and the judgment of God (1 Sam. 1 : 3, 9; 2 : 11, 12, etc.). Eli judged Israel for 40 years (1 Sam. 4 : 18. The LXX. says 20), but nothing special is said of his rule (see Samuel). The tidings of the defeat of the Israelitish army, and the capture of the ark, so overwhelmed him that he fell from his seat and broke his neck (1 Sam. 4 : 13-18). Eli was of the sacerdotal line of Ithamar (1 Chron. 24 : 6). His family was not excluded from the priestly dignity, but the curse resting upon it still showed itself in Abiathar (1 Kings 1 : 27). — 2) Eli, the father of Joseph, the reputed father of our Lord (Luke 3 : 23).

PRESSEL.*

Elias Levita (אֱלִיָּהוּ הַלֵּוִי), one of the most distinguished Jewish grammarians of the 16th cent., the son of Rabbi Ascher Levita, was born at Neustadt, not far from Nürnberg, in 1472. He was educated at his birth-place; and applied himself with such zeal to grammatical studies in the Hebrew language, that he received the surname of הַמְּרַקֵּק, or "the Grammarian, the teacher of languages." When, after the death of the margrave of Neustadt, he was expelled from Neustadt with other Jews, he went to Italy, lived there at different places as teacher of Hebrew, and especially, from 1504, at Padua, where he taught the Hebrew grammar of Rabbi Moses Kimchi, and wrote a commentary on it, which was afterwards published with a Latin translation by Sebas. Münster (Basle, 1531). He remained here until 1509, when, after losing his wealth by the plundering of Padua, he went to Venice and (1512) to Rome, where he was very kindly received by Cardinal Aegidius, of Viterbo. About this time he was already married. A warm friendship sprang up between him and Aegidius, who took him and his family into his house and richly provided for them. Elias instructed his friend in the Hebrew for a number of years, who, in turn, taught him the classic languages. During the time of his residence at Rome (1518) he wrote his grammatical works הַפְּחָד and הַהֲרַבָּה. His residence at Rome, his intimate relations with Cardinal Aegidius, his connections with other cardinals and bishops, the praise which he received from them and other educated Christians, etc., raised the suspicion among his Jewish brethren, that he was a secret Christian. At the sacking of Rome under Charles V. (1527) he again lost all his property. He now went again to Venice, where he remained until 1540, and published his book טוֹכ טַעַם, on the Hebrew accent, and his book מְסוֹרֶת חֲמִסוֹרֶת, on the criticism of the Old Test., Venice, 1538; the last named work was published in German by Semler, 1772. In the preface to the latter book, he defends himself against the suspicion of having apostatized from Judaism. He left Venice in 1540 and followed the call of Paul Fagius to Isny, in Swabia, to assist him in establishing a Hebrew publication house, and in publishing Hebrew books. He remained there until 1547, wrote several new works, especially his Chaldaic rabbinical dictionary, פִּתְחוֹרֵמָן, Jan., 1541, whilst Fagius published another lexicon in Latin by Elina, called תִּשְׁבִּי. Fabius left Isny in 1547, and

Elias went again to Venice, where, two years afterwards, 1549, he died. Comp. Jo. CHRISTOPHORI WOLFII, Biblioth. Hebr. Hamb. et Lips., 1715. Vol. I., p. 153-161; Vol. III., ibid., 1727, p. 97-102; Vol. IV., Hamb., 1733, p. 782. JOH. FRIEDR. HIRT's Oriental. u. Exeget. Biblioth., VII. Th.: Jena, 1755, p. 50, sq. De Rossi, Histor. Woerterb. d. jüdischen Schriftst. u. ihrer Werke, aus d. Ital. übersetzt von C. H. Hammerberger: Lpz., 1839. NEUDECKER.—Beck.

Eligius was born about the year 588, at Chatelat, near Limoges. He was early apprenticed to Abbo, a skilful goldsmith in Limoges. He learnt the trade of his master, and distinguished himself among other things, by a proper use of the language and by godly zeal. About the year 610 he went to Paris, where he soon gained the notice and favor of the King, Clotaire II., by making for him a chair of gold and precious stone, and, in a short time, he became wealthy. About this time a great religious awakening was produced throughout France, by the labors of Columban. Eligius was seized by it, truly repented, and began to lead an ascetic life, although he continued at his trade in Paris. He now sought to win others to his views, and succeeded among high and low, when Clotaire died, and was followed by his son, Dagobert. Eligius soon found great favor with Dagobert, both on account of his skill and of his piety. He became the King's counsellor in the most important affairs of the State, and was sent to Britannia to make a treaty of peace with Judicahill. His favor with the King aroused the envy of the nobles, which, however, he overcame, by using his influence and the King's favor in behalf of the poor and the Church. His benevolence was unbounded. Many captives, especially Saxons, were brought at that time to Paris, and sold as slaves. Eligius bought 20, 30, 50, and 100 at a time, and gave them either the privilege to return home or become monks, or remain with him as friends. He increased the number of the monks in every way; influenced many persons of both sexes to enter this state, and founded and extravagantly supported many monasteries and nunneries. His greatest establishments are Solignac near Limoges (632) where 150 monks were soon collected, and the nunnery at Paris, which numbered 300 inmates. He also founded and adorned many churches in Paris, and contributed largely to the adornment of the graves of the saints. His unlimited benevolence, reputed wonders, which he sometimes declared were natural, sometimes attributed to the saints, at last always to the Saviour, his piety and abstinence, made him a great name among the people. By degrees he began to realize his spiritual calling, laid aside his splendid court garments, girded his rough coat with a rope, and became already a saint in the eyes of the people. The influence and holy life of Eligius became a burden to the court after the death of Dagobert, 638, and in 640 Herchenwald, who was major-domus during the minority of Clovis II., appointed Eligius Bishop of Noyon, to get rid of him at Paris. He was forced into the priesthood against his will, and after a brief delay, was consecrated Bishop. He devoted himself to his office, as Bishop, with great zeal; travelled through all the towns of his diocese, and preached almost daily. The religious condition of the Franks at this time was very low, and Eligius had to contend with much opposition and persecution, in his efforts to elevate them. In addition to his labors in his own diocese, he took a leading part in the government of the Church of France. He, together with his friend Audoenus, Bishop of Rouen, controlled the synods of Chalon (644) and Clichy (652); and they also succeeded in influencing the Gallican Bishop to condemn and persecute the Monothelitic heresy. — After long estrangement from the royal court, Eligius was again restored to favor, which he preserved until his death, which occurred at Noyon, Nov. 30, 658, or 659. He was buried, by order of Queen Bathilde, with great pomp, at Noyon in the church of St. Lupus, afterwards called St. Eligius. Soon after his death, miracles were said to have been performed at his grave, healing power was attributed to his relics, and he was honored as a saint. — The only source of information is the Vita S. Eligii, which attributes itself to Audoenus, but which could not have proceeded from him in the form it now has. See d'Achery, Spicilegium. 2d ed., T. II., pp. 76–123. In this biography there are extracts of his sermons, which also exist as a tract under the title de rectitudine catholice conversationis, which, however, the publishers of the works of Augustine (T. VI., Append., p. 745) have proven to be taken verbatim from the sermons of Cæsarius of Arles. The 16 sermons, which are besides attributed to him (Bibl. max. patr., T. XII., Lugd., 1677, pp. 300–322) are probably from the time of the Carolingians. An Epistle of Eligius to Desederius, Bishop of Cahors, is found in Canisii, Antiqu. Lection. ed. Basnage, T. I., p. 646.

ALBRECHT VOGEL. — Beck.

Elijah (עֲלִיָּהוּ אֵלִיָּהוּ 'Hajás) born at Tishbeh, in Gilead, labored as prophet under Ahab and Ahaziah about 400 years B. C., against the general apostasy of Israel to the service of Baal (1 Kings 17—2 Kings 2). He appears suddenly in the midst of the idolatrous commotion into which Jezebel (see the Art.) enticed the court and the entire people. Perhaps he had withdrawn from the idolatry of the people into the wilderness, and was there called and prepared as a prophet, and was now summoned forth to his work. He appears, at last, suddenly before Ahab with the words, "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." During the time within which this prophecy was to be fulfilled, he does not again appear in Israel. He first concealed himself, according to divine direction, at the brook Cherith, where he drank of the brook and was fed by the ravens. When the brook was dried up, the Lord directed him to Zarephath in Phœnicia (in the province of Ethbaal, the father of Jezebel), where a widow—perhaps a heathen or proselyte—whose barrel of meal and cruse of oil did not fail, and whose son he raised from the dead, provided for him. After an absence of three years, he returned to Ahab. He commissioned Obadiah to announce his arrival to the King. Ahab went to meet him. According to the request of the prophet, all the people were assembled on Mount Carmel. He said unto them, "How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him." Then he proved against the 450 priests of Baal (the 400 priests of Ashera were absent), by fire from heaven, which consumed his sacrifice before the King and people, that the Lord is God, and at his command the people killed the priests of Baal at the brook Kishon. Then, although the sky was cloudless, he foretold approaching rain. He spoke the word, but sent his servant six times to the top of Carmel; yet he saw nowhere the smallest cloud. But at the seventh time, the servant brought the intelligence, that a small cloud, as large as a man's hand, arose out of the sea, which soon covered the heavens. Ahab hastened home, and Elijah ran beside his chariot. The prophet again fled from the vindictive Jezebel to the wilderness of Judah. He was greatly disheartened, and, beneath a juniper-tree, he prayed for a speedy death. But an angel came with food, and comforted him, and in the strength of this food he went forty days and nights to Horeb. Here he complained to the Lord about the apostasy of His people. A strong wind, which rent the mountains, passed by; but the Lord was not in the wind. After the wind came an earthquake; but the Lord was not in it, neither in the fire which followed. But after the fire, there came a still small voice: Elijah covered his face, for the presence of the Lord was sensible. Now the Lord announced to him, that there were still 7000 in Israel, who had not bowed the knee to Baal, and commanded him to anoint Hazael to be King over Syria, and Jehu King over Israel, and to consecrate Elisha to be his successor. The latter he did himself, the first two commissions were fulfilled by Elisha in his name. — The event on Carmel caused a reaction in Israel, and the 7000 worked as leaven among the whole people. For their sake the Lord again acknowledged Israel, and gave Ahab victory over Benhadad. After this Elijah worked more in retirement, appearing only twice in public. When Ahab forcibly appropriated the vineyard of Naboth (see the Art.), the prophet announced the ignominious destruction of his house; — and when Ahab's son, Ahaziah, being sick, consulted Baal-zebub, Elijah met the messenger, and said, "Is it because there is no God in Israel, that ye go to inquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron?" and announced to him the near death of his master. The messenger did not know him, but Ahaziah knew the man with the hairy mantle and leather girdle. He ordered him to be arrested. Twice was a captain with 50, who attempted to arrest the "man of God," as they contemptuously called him, consumed by fire. He accompanied the third, and told the king, face to face, his condemnation. — Meanwhile the close of the prophet's labors was approaching. Elijah, accompanied with Elisha, went to Jericho. His mantle opened a way across the Jordan. Then Elijah was carried to heaven in a fiery chariot and horses. Elisha cried after him, "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof." With reluctance Elisha allowed the sons of the prophets in Jericho, who supposed that the Spirit of the Lord had concealed him somewhere, to send out 50 men to seek him. These efforts were naturally in vain.

Thus do the Scriptures relate the life and labors of the most powerful and energetic of all the prophets from Moses to John the Baptist. Sirach (48:7) characterizes him strikingly: "Elijah appeared, a prophet like fire, and his words burned like a torch." He was filled with fiery zeal, and he was unsparing, either to himself or others. He is like a man cut out of the rocks of Sinai, and baptized with its fire. It is true, he manifested human weakness in the wilderness of Judah beneath the juniper-tree; and in his private life with the widow of Zarephath he showed, that a heart also beat in his breast, which could sympathize and be merciful. But absolute representation of the law characterized his official life. The horizon of his prophetic vision is bounded on the one side by Sinai, and on the other by the high mountain of crime, which the apostasy of his nation had raised. His words are like a hammer, and he has no balsam for wounded spirits. To understand this one-sided, hopeless, and promiseless position of the prophet, it must be remembered, that he labored in the kingdom of Israel, and not in that of Judah. Only in the former, and not in the latter, is the appearance of a prophet like Elijah comprehensible. Judah was true in its allegiance to God and diligent in worshipping him. This would have modified his legal inflexibility and acerbity. But in the kingdom of Ephraim, which had separated from the Davidical tradition, had broken the continuity of the past and present with the messianic future, a prophet with the character of Elijah was directed to the period anterior to David for hope, comfort, and healing, and in it it was the covenant in the wilderness and the giving of the law on Sinai, which enchained his vision. But the rocks of Sinai, the sound of the trumpets, the smoke, and lightning, and thunder could not teach him mildness and mercy, they could only steel his soul for conflict. — In Elijah and his school is represented the acme of the one-sided legal prophetic position, the greatest, the most powerful and exalted, which it produced. But here also culminates its one-sidedness, and its insufficiency, its inability to conduct the development of the history of salvation to its final successful issue, was manifested. Here it must turn around, and open a way for that new direction of prophecy, which soon after began to unfold its glory in Hosea and Isaiah. A commencement of this change already appears in Elisha.

When we contemplate the life and labors of Elijah in their particulars, an unusually large number of miracles appear, which rationalistic criticism attempts partly to convert into quiet natural events, and partly to transfer to the region of myth. It must be admitted that these miracles, at least in part, have a strange character on account of their externality, and if we were justified in allowing mythical embellishments anywhere in the biblical history, it would be here (and in the history of Elisha). But if we view the history of Elijah as a living, organic link of the great chain of divine wonders, which extends from Sinai to Golgotha and the Mount of Olives, and consider also the peculiarity of the position and surroundings of Elijah, then the appearance of any miracle in itself, as well as the multitude of them which he wrought, and their imputed externality, will appear in a different light. Elijah and Elisha cannot be compared in this respect with Hosea and Micah, Isaiah and Jeremiah. Their prophetic position was an advanced stadium of development; their standpoint was much more inward, spiritual and ideal. Neither can Elijah and Elisha be compared to the contemporaneous and earlier prophets in the kingdom of Judah. These had the temple and its worship, the enduring theocracy, the Davidical royalty and tradition; those would have had no foundation, could have begun nothing without very striking, i. e., external miracles. The objection made (by Winer for example) that the miracles of Elijah are wanting in moral contents, is based as well on a denial of the prophetic position of Elijah, through which he was an organ of divine judgments and a representative of divine holiness, as on a confusion of the Old and New Testament standpoints.

Among the miracles in the life of Elijah, those especially which were wrought upon him (rather than those wrought by him) have the appearance of mythical embellishment. This relation will not be found inexplicable, if we remember the high, isolated position of Elijah among all the prophets of the O. T. This applies especially to the feeding by the ravens at the commencement, and his ascension to heaven at the end of his career. With regard to the first of these, the rationalistic discoveries, which, with the ravens, would explain away also the miracle (ex. gr. the עֲרָבִים were the inhabitants of a neighboring town Oreb or Orbo, or they were Arabs, or wandering merchants), have long ago been condemned by criticism. Still more absurd, if possible, is the opinion of J. D. Michaelis, who thinks of carrion crows (Corvus corax L.) from whom Elijah took their booty. Even the latest interpretation (J. v. Gumpach, Alttest. Studien.: Heidl., 1852, p. 200, sq.), which makes the ravens themselves to be meat and bread for the prophet, can only lay claim to a philological invention.—With regard to the ascension of Elijah, its historical apprehension is a necessity at least to those who hesitate to regard the gospel history as a collection of myths, for the transfiguration of Christ, Matt. 17, is only tenable as a fact if 2 Kings 2 is a fact, the one account stands and falls with the other. The dogmatical difficulty connected with the ascension of Elias (as also that of Enoch), least of all authorizes us to transfer the matter out of the province of history into that of myth, for there are many dogmatical questions, which are yet to be answered.—It is true, an effort has been made to find a proof in 2 Chron. 21:12, sq., that the tradition which the author of the Chronicles had before him, said nothing of the ascension of the prophet—for, Winer thinks, the prophet surely did not write the letter in heaven. This will certainly be granted to him; and it is not necessary to suppose that Elijah wrote the letter during his life, and gave it to one of his pupils, who should afterwards give it to the king. Elijah could easily have lived to the commencement of the reign of Joram (comp. KEIL, apolog. Versuch. über die BB. d. Chronik: Berlin, 1833, p. 310, sq.).—In general comp. the Commentaries on the Books of Kings by Fr. Keil (Mosk., 1846) and O. Thenius (Leipz., 1849); besides also the homiletical treatment of the material by Gottfr. Menken (2 Aufl. Bremen, 1823) and F. W. Krummacher (2 Aufl. Elbf., 1835).

KURTZ.—Beck.

Eliot, John, was born, 1603 or 1604, in England. After completing his studies at Cambridge and teaching for a time, he went to New England in 1631, under the promise to become the pastor of a number of Independents, who were shortly to follow him to the New World. During the intervening time, he supplied the place of a clergyman who had returned to England, and on the arrival of his friends he went with them to Roxbury. Here he labored zealously with great success, although under great difficulties, and notwithstanding that his strength was heavily taxed by the duties of his office, he was not satisfied until he came to the conclusion to preach the gospel also to the Indians in the neighborhood. Having resolved upon this he at once commenced to prepare himself for this work by studying the Indian language, continuing at the same time to serve his congregation. On the 28th of Oct., 1646, accompanied with a few friends, he went to preach the gospel to the nearest tribe. His first effort made a powerful impression; this was strengthened by repetition; in December a number of children were offered for instruction, and adults desired his pastoral labors. He soon discovered that in order to promote Christianity, it was absolutely necessary to wean them from their wandering mode of life, and collect them in established colonies; and although he knew and weighed the difficulties which were in the way of the Indians, he was not deterred by them from vigorously undertaking it. A place of residence was selected, and houses were rapidly built under his personal direction. The first settlement was called Nonanetum-wonne. He labored on, unwearied by the severe toils and undiscouraged by the great difficulties, until, in 1674, there were 14 smaller or larger communities under his care. In connection with all the labor attending the care of these, he still continued to serve his congregation at Roxbury, which would not dismiss him; and at the same time he was preparing a translation of the Bible and other good books. For a long time he bore all the expenses connected with his labors from his own means, but later he received assistance, especially from England, so that he was able to publish his translation of the New Test. in 1661. In 1674 a great calamity befell him. The chief of an unconverted tribe, a sworn enemy of Christianity and of the English colonists, broke in upon the settlements of Eliot with fire and sword, and entirely destroyed them. The chief, it is true, lost his life in this attack, and thereby peace was made, but still the Indians were not only scattered, but many of them also apostatized, and when Eliot counselled his Indians not to assist the English when they were attacked, because he had hoped thereby to protect his people from the blood-thirsty chief, they regarded him as a traitor. But heavily as Eliot was afflicted, he did not succumb, and although an old man, he cheerfully applied his remaining strength to repairing the injury sustained, and he succeeded in a great measure. He finally received his dismissal from Roxbury, in order that he might devote all of his remaining strength to the Indians. The death of his wife in 1686, who was of like mind and spirit with himself, greatly affected him. By degrees it came so far, that he was compelled to keep his house and bed, but even then he could not rest, but obtained a blind negro boy, the son of a slave, whom he instructed in the way of salvation, repenting to him texts of Scripture until he remembered them. After a severe death-struggle he died at the beginning of 1690.—Source: "The life and death of the renowned Mr. John Eliot, who was the first preacher of the Gospel to the Indians in America, written by Colton Mather, 1691. Johann Eliot und die Familie Mayhew, die Apostel der Indianer, von Joh. Hartwig Brauer, in dessen Beiträgen zur Geschichte der Heidenbekehrung. Erster Beitrag. 2 Aufl., 1847.

BRAUER.—Beck.

Elisabeth, (she who swears by God, the true worshipper of God). 1) The wife of Aaron, Ex. 6:23. 2) The wife of Zacharias and mother of John the Baptist, Luke 1:5, 7, 13, 24, 40, 41, 57. She was truly pious, and is rightly counted among the holy women of the Bible.

In Luke 1 : 36 she is called the cousin of the Virgin Mary. This may have been in several ways. The supposition of the Manichean, Faustus, that M. was of the tribe of Levi is expressly contradicted by the angel in v. 32, where he speaks of her father David. Since marriage between members of different tribes was only forbidden, when, in default of sons, the daughters took possession of the inheritance, we may either suppose that the mother of E. (for her father was certainly a priest, Luke 1 : 5) was of the house of David, or that the mother of M. was of the house of Aaron. The former view is the best supported (see Hess, Leben Jesu, 1, 17). With genuine piety she united great worldly wisdom, and hence the younger Mary turned to her for counsel in her peculiar condition. She was also the first person who clearly saw the dawn of the new dispensation and greeted Mary as the mother of our Lord, Luke 1 : 43.

VAIHINGER. — Porter.

Elisabeth, St. a daughter of Andrew II., of Hungary, and Gertrude of Meran, born at Presburg in 1207, was betrothed, in her fourth year, to Louis of Thuringia, then in his tenth, and brought up with him in the Wartburg at Eisenach, under the eyes of the landgrave, Hermann I., and his wife, Sophia of Bavaria. There were early developed those traits of devoted piety which have crowned her life with a halo of glory. This religious bias was aided no little by the tidings of the murder of her still youthful mother in her distant home. She knelt frequently at the altar of the castle-chapel, laid the golden crown she usually wore before the image of the Crucified, distributed all the money given her, and all the food she could obtain among the poor and hungry, mingled with the common people, regardless of the displeasure of the landgravine, or the sneers of the courtiers. The young landgrave remained faithful to her, and their marriage was celebrated in the Wartburg, in 1221 (some say 1220). E. is described in the chronicles and songs of the time as "beautiful in person, with black hair and slender form, earnest in her conversation, and chaste in her manners." To her husband she was tenderly obedient in all things, without being hindered by him in her spiritual exercises. Often during the night she arose from their common couch to pray. Daily she grew more rigorous in her personal piety; she wore a haircloth under-garment, inflicted stripes upon her bare back, and ate coarse food. Along with this she was active in deeds of mercy to the poor, the sick, babes, the dying. On the slope of the Wartburg she built a hospital, with the landgrave's consent, for lepers, whom she herself attended. During the famine of 1226 she redoubled her charitable efforts, and founded an asylum for neglected children. In all this she was under the counsel of her father-confessor, the renowned persecutor of heretics, Conrad of Marburg, who gave her twelve rules of discipline, and often struck her with his own hands. She continued thus in wedlock until 1227, when landgrave Lewis died in Lower Italy, in the crusade of Frederick II. During her widowhood she suffered a series of unmerited wrongs, and self-imposed penances. She died Nov. 19, 1231. She and her four children, including one son, were expelled from the Wartburg by Henry Raspe, the barbarous brother of Lewis, who even forbid the inhabitants of Eisenach to harbor them. After wandering about for some time the B. of Bamberg gave her a home in the castle Botenstein. Subsequently Henry regretted his course, and invited her back to the Wartburg. She returned, but soon exchanged an abode there for a humbler dwelling near the village Wehrda, where she was untiring in her charities. She erected a hospital and poor-house there, and presented it to the adjacent chapel of the Franciscans. There she ended her days. It cannot be proven that she ever joined the order of St. Francis. She was canonized by Gregory in 1235. In the same year landgrave Conrad, of Thuringia, laid the foundation of a splendid church, bearing her name, and inclosing her tomb, in the valley near Marburg.—(See Ersch u. Gruber under St. Elisabeth III. BÖHRINGER's K.-gesch. in Biogr. II., 2. JUSTI, Elis. d. Heil., 2 Aufl. MONTALEMBERT, Hist. de Sainte Elis. de Hongrie, 2 parts. MERZ, E. v. Ungarn, in the first part of his Christl. Frauenbilder. BÖHRINGER, l. c., Simon, Ludw. IV., &c. GRÜNEISEN.*

Elisæus (properly Egisæ), a distinguished Armenian historian and theologian of the 5th cent., studied under Sahak (Isaac) and Misrop, and then became secretary of Vartan, the prince of the Mamikunir, and subsequently was appointed Bishop of Amatunik. As secretary of Vartan he wrote an able history of the war of the Persians, under Yessedschird II., against the Christians (publ. in Armenian, Constant., 1764, and 1823; Moscow, 1787; Venice, 1828; in English, transl. by C. F. Neumann, London, 1830, 4to.; in Italian by Capeletti, Venice, 1840; in French, Paris, 1844). As B. he attended the celebrated Synod of Artaschat, 449, which discussed the dangers threatened by Parsism. He also wrote several exegetical, homiletical, and ascetic works; Comm. on Joshua, the Judges (that on Genesis seems to be lost), and the Lord's Prayer; discourses upon the Life of Christ, on his second coming, the Judgment, the Apostles, and an address to Monks (see hist. of Varten, Ven., 1828); also a book of Canons. See all these in his complete works: Ven., 1838 (in which, however, two, spurious, discourses ascribed to him are omitted). Still unpubl. is his incomplete MS. discourse upon the souls of men, or on Spirits. His chief merit is as a historian. GOSCHÉ.*

Elisha (Ἐλισαῖος, Elisæus), a prophet of Israel from 896 B. C., under Jehoram, until 840 B. C., under Joash. He was the son of Shaphat of Abel-meholah, and was called from the plow to the prophetic office by Elijah's throwing his mantle over him (1 Kings 19 : 16, 19). Before obeying the call he begged permission to bid farewell to his father and mother. After making a parting feast, to the preparation of which he devoted his oxen and agricultural implements, he followed Elijah. Before Elijah's translation, Elisha besought that a double portion of his master's spirit might rest upon him, as his first-born son. The mantle of Elijah, which fell upon Elisha in his master's flight, was a pledge of the granting of the request. By means of it

E. opened a dry path over the Jordan, and the young prophets at Jericho willingly acknowledge him as their new master. In his future course E. wrought more miracles than his predecessor (2 Kings 2-13). At Jericho he caused a bitter fountain to become sweet. Near Bethel he pronounced a curse upon forty-two boys who had reviled him, and they were forthwith devoured by two bears. During a war of Jehoshaphat and Jehoram against Moab, he called up a shower of rain, which revived the fainting hosts of Israel and Judah. He relieved a poor widow pressed by creditors, by multiplying her little store of oil. To a hospitable Shunamite he promised a son, and afterwards restored him to life. During a famine he made some poisonous gourds nutritious by pouring upon them a handful of meal, and fed a multitude with twenty barley-loaves. He cured Naaman, the Syrian general, of leprosy, and transferred the plague to Gehazi, in punishment of his covetousness. He caused an axe, which one of the young prophets had let fall into the Jordan, to float on the surface. He informed Jehoram of Benhadad's secret schemes; the latter sent a company to Dothan to take Elijah. E.'s servant was alarmed. But in answer to the prophet's prayer God showed the youth that Elijah was encompassed by a mighty host sent to protect him. His enemies were then smitten with blindness, and E. himself led them back towards Samaria, fed them, and let them go in peace. Nevertheless Benhadad besieged Samaria. A fearful famine soon prevailed in the city, Jehoram, blaming E. as the cause of the siege, gave command that he should be slain, but forthwith relented. E. foretold that on the next day food should abound in the city. One of the lords of Jehoram ridiculed the prophecy. E. told him he would see, but not enjoy its fulfilment. That night the Syrians, smitten by the Lord with fear of the Egyptians, abandoned the siege and left behind vast booty. Samaria was relieved, but the mocking lord perished in the crowd that thronged its gates.—E. next told Hazeal, the Syrian general, that he would soon be made king, and as such inflict fearful woes upon Israel; and then anointed Jehu as king, and executor of God's vengeance upon the house of Ahab. Under Jehu's reign E. seems to have labored in retirement among his pupils. Joash of Israel, without renouncing the worship of the calf, attached himself closely to E., who died under his reign, after having, on his death-bed, symbolically foretold Joash's three victories over the Syrians (2 Kings 13: 14-19). After E.'s burial, a dead body which happened to be laid beside his corpse, was restored to life.—Concerning the number of E.'s miracles see what is said of Elijah's.—They are mainly distinguished from his master's by their merciful character, whilst in their outward form those of both often resemble each other. They seem to stand related to each other somewhat as Moses and Joshua, or David and Solomon. The close similarity between two of their miracles (the multiplication of the oil, and restoration of the dead to life) is designed to exhibit Elisha as continuing the efficiency of Elijah,—as a second

Elijah. The actual course of history is not without analogous, significant, repetitions.

KURTZ.*

Elvira, the Council of (Conc. Eliberitanum, or Illiberitanum). Illiberis, or Iliberi, Liberini was a town of the Spanish province Bætica (Andalusia) near Granada, in which there is still a gate called de Elbira. It was long ago destroyed. Illiberis in Gallia Narbonensis cannot be the place where the Council in question was held. It was the earliest synod in Spain, held c. 303, 305, or 309. It is certain that Christianity was not yet triumphant, that Christians were still persecuted, and tempted to apostasy, as many instances prove. The name of Hosius, B. of Cordova, proves that it was not held before the 4th cent. It is an erroneous inference of some Protestant writers, that this Council belongs to a far later period, because it condemned the hanging up of pictures in churches, and the lighting of candles in graveyards, and strictly enjoined celibacy, practices which did not exist so early as 303-309. On the contrary, Romish writers, Baronius ad a. 57, and Bellarmine, have opposed the validity of the decrees of Elvira, because they forbid pictures and the restoration of certain offenders. Bellarmine says it was merely a provincial synod.—The decisions of this synod possess special historical value; they inform us of the earnest, severe, and somewhat austere spirit of the Spanish Church, incited by some religious excrescences, and show how far Montanistic-Novatian principles then prevailed, or at least how inviting a field the Western Church opened to that tendency. It would be utterly wrong to interpret the 33d canon as enjoining marriage upon the clergy, as some have done: placuit in totum prohiberi episcopis, presbyteris et diaconibus, vel omnibus clericis positis in ministerio abstinere se a conjugibus et non generare filios; quicumque vero fecerit, ab honore clericatus exterminetur. The words might rather mean that marriage was not really forbidden to the clergy (as the word conjuges may imply), but that they were to refrain from connubial intercourse during the period of their official service (positis in ministerio); implying that in Spain there was an alternation in the performance of ministerial functions, similar to that customary among the Jews. But if the austerity of other canons is considered, it will seem less unlikely that celibacy was enjoined. Celibacy is Montanistic; permanent exclusion from the Church is Montanistic-Novatian.—The 34th c. refers to a superstition, and shows that the assembled fathers themselves were not strangers to superstitious notions: cereos per diem placuit in cœmeterio non incendi: inquietandi enim spiritus sanctorum non sunt.—The 36th c. is important as showing that then already the practice of hanging up pictures in churches was arising in the occident, and that it was at once associated with superstitions: placuit picturas in ecclesia esse non debere, ne quod colitur et adoratur in parietibus depingatur. Romish writers have unjustly endeavored to invalidate this canon.—Finally, absolute excommunication is enjoined in many cases (Can. 2, 6, 7, 8, 10, 12, 17, 19, 49, 66, 71, 75) with the usual formula: nec in fine dandam communionem.—The Canons of Elvira may be found in MANSI, Concil. nova et ampliss. collectio T. II., fol. 2, &c.; ROUTH, Reliquiæ, IV., 41–59. The best writer upon the subject is FERD. DE MENDOZA: de confirmando concilio Illiberitano ad Clem. VIII. A shorter treatise, by AUBESPIN, B. of Orleans. Both these may be found in Mansi, l. c., 58, &c.; 37, &c. HERZOG.*

Elxaites, or Elkesaites, a sect among the early Jewish Christians, tainted with Gnosticism. Epiphanius (Hær., LIII., XIX., XXX.) furnishes the fullest notice of them, under the name of Sampsæans (Σαμψαῖοι), but his reports are confused and unreliable; Theodoret's are drawn from others; those of Origen (in Euseb., H. E., 6, 38) are too fragmentary; the best source of knowledge is the Philosophumena of the Pseudo-Origen (IX., 13, ed. Miller, p. 292), with a cautious use of Epiphanius.

Concerning the name opinions vary. The Fathers and many others derive it from Elxai, their founder. Epiphanius interprets Ἠλξαῖ as “δύναμις πεκαλυμμένη” = יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, and this is the more likely, since he mentions a brother of his, whom he calls Ἰεξίος = יֵשׁוּעַ. But there can be little doubt that neither refers to a person. The δύναμις πεκαλυμμένη is, according to Gieseler's (Eccl. History) sagacious interpretation, the Holy Spirit (δύναμις ἁσάρτος Hom. Clem., XVII., 16), and the name is most probably the title of a book, which is the chief authority of the sect; and this is confirmed by the fact, that, according to Epiph., it is said to have held also to a book of the brother Iexeos (Hær., L., III., 3).—At all events, the sect regards as its highest authority a book, which, though he be not its author, owes its introduction to Elxai. This book we find, wherever we meet Gnosticized Christianity among the Jews; Origen (Euseb., l. c.) knew of it; and the Syrian, Alcibiades, carried it from Apamea to Rome (Philos., IX., 13). Epiph. traces its influence in nearly every part of early Jewish Christendom. Hence it must have occupied a central place, and does not belong merely to a small party. According to Origen (l. c.), it is said to have fallen from heaven; according to the more accurate account of the Philos., to have been revealed by an angel, who was the Son of God himself. Elxai obtained it from the Seers in Parthia. This is said to have occurred in the 3d year of Trajan's reign; a period, which the fabulous report of its origin may render suspicious, but which cannot be much too early, since the doctrines of the book form the basis of the Clementine Homilies.

These doctrines exhibit a strong ethnic, naturalistic element mingled with Judaism and Christianity. This shows itself especially in the purifications prescribed. A forgiveness of all sin is proclaimed on the ground of a new baptism; which doubtless consists in oft repeated washings, applied also for the cure of diseases and certainly performed in the name of the Father and the Son (Philos., p. 294, 50), in which seven witnesses appear—the five elements, and, according to Oriental ideas, oil and salt (bread also), to denote baptism and the Lord's Supper. The same heathen element shows itself in the use of astrology and magic (Philos., 293, 23); even the baptismal days were determined by the stars. The Judaistic element appears in this, that they regarded the law as binding and adhered to the Sabbath and circumcision. On the other hand, they rejected sacrifices (Epiph. XIX., 3), and particular parts of the O. T. Of the N. T. also they rejected much, especially the Epistles of Paul (Origen, l. c.). Their Christology is very ambiguous. Christ, on the one side, seems to be conceived of as a mighty angel; on the other, they taught a frequent, continuous incarnation, although they held fast to his birth of the Virgin. The mediating point between the two views is found in the conception of Christ as μέγας βασιλεύς. As regards religious rites, baptism oscillates between the ceremony once performed and oft repeated purifications, among which circumcision has a place; the eucharist was celebrated with bread and salt; the eating of flesh was forbidden; marriage was highly esteemed, and the denial of their faith in times of persecution permitted.

As to the origin of their system of doctrine, it is extremely probable that it owes much to the Essenes. It arose among the Jewish Christians, who were mingled with this sect on the shores of the Dead Sea and exposed to the influences of Oriental heathenism. In 274, Origen met with one of their apostles at Cæsarea; but before that, under Calixtus (221–226), a certain Alcibiades, of Apamea, had labored in Rome. All those efforts, however, seem to have had little success. At length their doctrinal ideas became merged in the Clementine Homilies (see Art. Clementines, and Uhlhorn, die Homilien, &c., 398, sqq.). UHLHORN.—Porter.

Emanuel, in its abbreviated form Manuel, a Roman corruption of the Hebrew עִמָּנוּאֵל (Immanuel). The LXX. and Matt. have Ἐμμανουῆλ. It means, God with us, and is the name of the child mentioned in Is. ch. 7–9. That these passages are Messianic, as Matt. (1: 23) testifies and the whole Christian world has held from the beginning, is disputed by several scholars. Some find difficulty in the expression עִלְמָה, applied to the mother of the prophetic child, though it can mean nothing else than a marriageable virgin, who, in the language of Mary, has “not known a man;” or rather in the prefixed article (הָעִלְמָה), which Luther, with Mary doubtless in view, omitted in his translation, but which they regard as indispensable, referring the term to the house of David, because Israel is often likened to a virgin betrothed to the Lord (Is. 54: 1, sq.), whilst at the same time they overlook the fact that in corresponding passages in Amos 5: 1, 2; Jer. 31: 20, 21, &c., יִשְׂרָאֵל is always added, and that Israel is not called עִלְמָה, but בְּתוּלָה. Others find special difficulty in the time assigned for the fulfilment of the prophecy, as it appears partly in the idea of the sign, for which the child should serve, and partly in the 16 v. of ch. 7, and what follows.

That by the appointed sign of the child Immanuel (Is. 8 : 18) we are to understand originally no other than the child of the prophet Isaiah himself, cannot be denied without violence to the text: the עֲלִמָּה, the virgin, who, though like Mary, she knew not a man, was to become pregnant, can neither be Mary, nor the house of David, nor some indefinite virgin, but must be "the prophetess" already betrothed to Isaiah, as Mary to Joseph, (hence הָעֲלִמָּה, and also in Is. 8 : 3, the article הַנְּבִיאָה, which Luther has likewise omitted), to whom the prophet goes in (Is. 8 : 1); her child, who was to be called Immanuel, is the same, whom the prophet, at the command of the Lord, was afterward to name Maher-shalal-chash-buz, to signify that the destruction of Damascus and Samaria was rapidly approaching, — the same child, in whose early infancy, "before he knew to refuse the evil and choose the good" (Is. 7 : 15, 16), the carrying away of the kingdom of Israel and the oppression of the kingdom of Judah should take place (Is. 7 : 17–25). But the child is not only a sign of judgment to the prophet, but also of the communion with God, by which all true Israelites were to be consoled under these afflictions. The sign thus had a negative and a positive side, and hence the child bore by design the two names, Maher-shalal-chash-buz and Immanuel; the one transient, the other enduring; for the prophet looked far forward to the time, when in this same land, in which judgment now first began, light should spring out of darkness; when another child should be born and a Son given, whose peaceful reign on the throne of David should have no end (9 : 6). Isaiah does not expressly call this other child Immanuel, but his own little Immanuel leads his mind onward to the future Messiah; he sees "God with us" first fulfilled in that other child, and the evangelist Matthew and the Christian Church only utter what was typified in the child of Isaiah: Jesus, the Son of the Virgin Mary, the only-begotten Son of God himself, is the true Immanuel, who was thus foreshadowed.

PRESSER. — Porter.

Emmaus, a village $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles N.-W. of Jerusalem, whither the two disciples were going, whom the Lord met after his resurrection (Luke 24 : 13) Jos. B. J., VII., 6, 6, speaks of it as the place to which Vespasian sent 800 soldiers as colonists. A tradition of the 14th cent. identifies E. with Kubeibeh, nearly 9 miles N.-E. of Jerusalem (see Robinson, II., 255). In 1 Macc. 3 : 40, 57; 4 : 3; 9 : 50, an Emmaus is named as the place where Judas M. overcame Gorgias, and the same that Bacchides fortified (Jos. Ant. XIII., 1, 3) Cassius conquered it and Gophna (Jos. Ant. XIV., 11, 2; B. J., I., 11, 2). Under the Romans it was a toparchy of Palestine (PLINY, V., 15; Jos. B. J., III., 3, 5; comp. II., 20, 4). It was burned down by Quintilius Varus (Jos. Ant. XVII., 10, 9; B. J., II., 5, 1) and rebuilt under Heliogab. a. 223, with the name

Nicopolis (RELAND, Pal., 759). Eusebius and Jerome suppose this to be the Emmaus of Luke 24 : 13, although it is 175 stadia, nearly 22 miles, from Jerusalem. This confounding of the two places continued to more recent times, when both were sought for in the modern Lâtrôn (the Castellum boni Latronis), and also located at Kubeibeh (Robinson, l. c., note 4). Its true locality has only lately been shown to be that of the village 'Amwâs, W. of Ialo, and N. of the road between Jerusalem and Ramleh, hence N. of Lâtrôn (see ARNOLD's Palestine, 178). Reland (l. c., 427, &c., 758, &c.) supposes there were two places of this name, and most modern writers follow him. (See Robinson, l. c.) Rödiger, in a notice of Robinson's work (Hall. Allgem. Lit. Zeit., 1842), remarks that the ancient tradition makes both identical; that upon Luke 24 : 13 the Cod. K. Cyprius, N. apr. m. and some others read 160 stadia, and that Jos. VII., 6, 6, may have been altered by Christian copyists to the common reading. Robinson adopts this view in III., 148–150. ARNOLD.*

Emmeram.—Through Radegund and Venantius Fortunatus the idea of Christianizing eastern Germany, became prevalent in Poitiers; and a B. of Poitiers might readily feel impelled to follow Irish missionaries who often passed through France on their way East. Of one such, who, c. 650, succeeded Hilary (but of whom the Frankish Church knows nothing, as he may have belonged to those clergy who, c. 640, withdrew at the instance of St. Eligius, or he may have been inflamed by the example of St. Eligius), Aribo, B. of Freising (about the 2d half of the 8th cent.), and after him Arnold of Vochburg, c. 1036, gives an account. Aribo's account, the only one now extant, probably rests upon a reliable written tradition. And even though Aribo's account was shaped to favor the Church, especially that of Bavaria, it must be substantially true. The legend is as follows.—Haimaram, or Emmeram had scarcely become B. of Poitiers when he resolved to convert the heathen in Pannonia. He placed another man in his chair, and with Vitalis as his interpreter crossed the Rhine for the East. When he reached Radaspona, the residence of Theodo, Duke of Bavaria, Theodo dissuaded him from going further, urging that the newly-converted Bavarians needed his care as much as the Avari. E. remained and spent three years among the Bavarians. Then he resolved to visit Rome, but after three days journey from Ratisbon he was cruelly murdered in Helfendorf. His murder is thus explained. Uta, Theodo's daughter, revealed to E. that she had committed a sin which could no longer be concealed, and begged him to screen her, allowing her to name him as the cause of her shame. He consented and fled. Uta herself was driven off, and her brother Lambert pursued, overtook and slew E. His remains were first placed in a chapel at Aschheim, but in consequence of threatening omens, Theodo had them brought to Ratisbon, and honorably interred in St. George's chapel, thenceforth called St. George and St. Emmeram. This change of sentiment is ascribed to the testimony of one Wulflaich, a clergyman, to whom E., before his death, communicated his secret arrangement with Uta, and that the true cause of Uta's shame was a certain Siegbald, the son of a knight. But this whole story is very suspicious, and at any rate does not relieve E. of reproach, even though he may thus have secured the martyrdom he had hoped to suffer among the heathen. It is more likely that E. was really guilty with Uta, and sought to escape punishment by flight to Rome. His death would more than atone for his sin in the eyes of the people, who thenceforth made him the hero of their song. The popular feeling in E.'s favor would induce Theodo to receive his remains, which became objects of veneration among the people. — It is not surprising that wonders were said to be wrought at his grave; but it is remarkable that the Jews ascribed them to a scroll of their law which they said E. carried about him. — The legend also says that Lambert died in banishment, and that none of Theodo's sons succeeded to his dukedom. As Arnold, of Vochburg, distinguishes this Duke Theodo from another who divided his duchy, 702, among his sons, he may have lived about 650. Hence the usual date of E.'s death, Sept. 6, 652, may be nearly correct. — Emmeram did not introduce Christianity among the Bavarians, but found priests, churches, and monasteries among them. His only merit consisted in preaching the gospel among them. His successors, Rupert and Corbinian, still found occasion for prosecuting the work. After his death E. acquired more importance for the Bavarian Church than he ever possessed during his life. The veneration in which his body was held gradually gave rise, though without a proper organization, to the monastery of St. Emmeram, at Regensburg, which became the centre of the Church of the Bavarian duchy; the abbot of the monastery was the head of that Church, and had the honor and title of a Bishop, though without consecration. Boniface founded a See of Regensburg, but did not appoint the abbot of St. Emmeram to it. It soon appeared, however, that a B. of Regensburg could not exist without having the influence and authority of an abbot of St. E. The two offices were, therefore, united, and remained so until near a. 1000. Under Otto II., B. Wolfgang called abbot Romuald from Treves to St. E. But the monks of St. E. tried every means of securing exemption from the Bishop; they even forged letters-patent. Finally in 1325, by a decree of John XXII. (subsequently indeed countermanded by a breve of Sixtus V., 1588) exemption was conferred upon St. E.; and it acquired great power. Its abbot became a prince, and belonged to the estates of the Romish German Empire, and retained this position until that Empire fell. The building is now occupied by the prince of Thurn and Taxis. — (See Acta sanct., Sept. VI., p. 454, &c. CANISIUS, lectiones antiquæ, III., 1, and in PERTZ, Mon., Vol. 6. Upon the relation of the monastery to the episcopate: P. HANSIZ (against Hemm's work) Illustratio apolog. prodromi episcop. Ratisb., &c.: Vien., 1755, 4to. RETTBERG, K.-gesch. Deutschl. II., 189. GFRÖRER, allgem. K.-gesch. III., 461. Ersch u. Gruber, Encycl. XXXIV., 66). VOGEL.*

Emser, Jerome, born at Ulm, March 26, 1477, of a noble family; in the 16th year of his age

went to Tübingen, where he studied Greek under Dionysius, the brother of John Reuchlin. Erasmus admired his skill in Latin poetry, and John Cochlæus (Hist. de Actis et Scriptis Mart. Lutheri) called him, on this account, virum amœnigenii. In 1497 he entered the University of Basle, where he studied law and Hebrew. Having travelled in Germany two years as secretary and chaplain of Cardinal Raimund, of Gurk, he finally located (1502) in Erfurt, where he delivered lectures on the humanities. Removed to Leipsig (1504), he lectured on the same subject; honored with the Baccalaureate of Theology (1505), at the expense of Duke George of Saxony, who also made him his secretary, he turned his attention to theology, but soon applied himself to law. On his return from Rome whither he had made an unsuccessful journey (about 1510) to procure the canonization of Benno, Bishop of Meissen, he took sick. His near approach to death determined him, in the event of recovery, to devote himself entirely to the Church. Attributing his restoration to St. Benno, he glorified his patron by writing his biography (Divi Benonis Misnensis quondam Episcopi Vita, etc.: Lps., 1512). — With the opening of the Disputation at Leipsig the friendship, which had hitherto obtained between Emser and Luther, was interrupted. In reply to an attack made upon him by E. in a letter to Dr. Zack, administrator of the Catholic Church in Prague, L. published ad Aegocerotem Emseranum Mart. Lutheri additio: Witeb., 1519 (in Löschers Reform.-Acts. III., p. 668); which elicited in turn A Venatione Aegocerotis assertio (Löschers, p. 694). Emser also opened his batteries against Nich. Hausman, Carlstadt, Zwingli, and Willibald Pirckheimer. The malice of his writings induced L. to burn them with the Papal Bull and Decretals, Feb. 10, 1520. The main points in dispute between him and E. were the sacrifice of the mass, the canonization of Benno and the translation of the N. Test. Duke George having forbidden the use of L.'s version, E. issued one by himself, according to the Vulgate, 1527. — E. died Nov. 8, 1527. Jerome Walther, of Nürnberg, marked his resting-place, in the cemetery at Dresden, with a monument of stone. — Besides Seckendorf and Löschers, see "continued collect. of theol. events, old and new, to 1720," pp. 8-27, 187-226; part. George Ernst Waldau records of Jer. Emser, Ansp., 1783.

NEUDECKER. — Ermentrout.

Ems, Congress of. — In order to execute the decrees of the Council of Trent, the Papacy had, from the close of the 16th cent., located nuncios in Switzerland, Belgium, and Germany. In the 17th cent. the German Emperor determined to put a stop to their encroachments upon the rights of the State, and Leopold I. (1680), informed Pope Innocent XI. that he had no authority to impose upon the nations nuncios armed with judicial power, and threatened defection if the Pope did not yield. Though Innocent seemed to bend to circumstances, he quietly held on his old course, whilst the hierarchy ridiculed the patience of the Germans. At length the Electoral-Archbishop of Mayence, Franz Lothar, boldly demanded of Innoc. that, as in France, in Venice and Genoa, so in Germany, spiritual matters should be regulated by its own subjects and laws. This course of action was also pursued by the Elector-Archbishop, John Hugo, of Treves, and cathedral-chapters, whilst the Emperor, Chas. VI., wrote the Pope (1736) that he would no longer countenance a nuncius in Cologne. In consequence of a circular sent (1764) by the Elector of the Palatinate to the Emperor, touching fresh encroachments of Rome on the rights of the German Bishops (see Hist. of Appellat. of Ecclesiast. trib.: Frankft. and Lpz., p. 316; Moser, Hist. of Papal Nuncios in Germany: Frankft. and Lpz., 1788), there was formed a Concordat which Pope Clement XIII. recognized in a Brief, Sept. 16, 1764. The influence of Rationalism, however, and the policy of Fred. the Great and Joseph II., soon disturbed the peace, and the German Catholic Church demanded that Rome should not be allowed to curtail the rights of its Bishops. But upon separating the Church in Germany from the See of Rome, John Nich. von Hontheim, under the title Justinus Febronius, issued a treatise De Statu Ecclesiæ et Legitima potestate Romani Pontificis liber singularis, etc.: Bullioni, 1763. Others, such as Ickstatt, of Ingolstadt; Barthel, of Würzburg; Eybel, of Vienna; Koller, &c., seconded his designs.

Matters soon came to a crisis. The Elector, Chas. Theodore, of Palatinate-Bavaria, was desirous of having a Papal nuncius at his court. Jerome, Archbishop of Salzburg, gave the alarm. He called upon (1785) Fred. Chas. Joseph, Archbishop of Mayence, as Primate of the German Church, to avert the impending danger. Receiving no encouragement at the hands of the Pope, these dignitaries had recourse to Joseph II. as protector of the German Church, who at once espoused their cause (Oct. 12, 1785, Polit. Journ., 1785, II.: Hamb., 1785, p. 1199), and declared that he would not allow the Archb. and Bishops of the kingdom to be disturbed in their diocesan rights, and that he would recognize the papal nuncios simply in a political capacity, and not permit them the exercise of any spiritual authority. Zoglio, nevertheless, appeared as nuncius at Munich, in March, 1786, exercised his powers, granted indulgences and dispensations, appointed a sub-nuncius in Düsseldorf, and even instituted a new spiritual tribunal in a foreign bishopric. So, also, the nuncius Pacca in Cologne. The King prohibited the exercise of such power, whilst Archbishops interdicted all intercourse between their members and the nuncios.

In order to put a final stop to these papal encroachments, the Archbishops appointed a Congress at Ems. There were present (Aug. 1786) Bishop Heimes, of Mayence, the official Joseph Ludwig Beck, of Trier, from Cologne, the official George Henry v. Tautphäus, and from Salzburg, John Michael Bönike. On Aug. 25, 1786, they framed a platform—called the “Emser Punktion”—composed of 23 chapt. of which the following is the substance:—1) Whilst the Romish Pope is and always remains Primate of the whole Church, all other prerogatives which were not connected with his primacy in the primitive ages, but grew out of the spurious Isidore Decretals, do not belong to his jurisdiction.—2) As Christ gave the apostles and their successors, the Bishops, unlimited power to bind and loose, all persons living within the ecclesiastical circuit of Bishops, are subject to them, and diocessans, therefore, are forbidden to have recourse to Rome whilst they pass by their immediate spiritual superiors; no exemption from this, those corporum excepted who may have obtained permission from the Emperor. The officers of monasteries cannot receive their rules from their General-chapters, nor superiors not resident in Germany.—3) Every Bishop can make laws and give dispensations touching the rules of abstinence and marriage; he can also abolish the obligations incurred by ordination, absolve religious persons from their vows, and change a religious institution into another better calculated to promote the interests of Church and State. No longer necessary, therefore, the so-called facultates quinquenales of the Romish court, nor are Romish bulls, briefs, and other papal ordinances binding without the consent of the Bishops, who shall also give authority and value to the decisions and regulations of Romish congregations in Germany.—4) The nuntiatures shall henceforth cease, the nuncios being nothing more than papal ambassadors, without Actus jurisdictionis or contentiosæ.—5) To the Bishop alone belongs the power of dispensing “in the majority of prebends,” and in the event of “Capituli de multa,” he alone shall decide whether such event exists.—6) The Decreta Basileensia, as received in 1439, shall be adopted pro Regula Concordatorum and the Jura in Concordia Aschaffenburger de An., 1448, pro Exceptione a regula; and the reservation of the Romish curia against the liberties of Germany, to be regarded as invalid.—7) The hereditary successors in ecclesiastical benefices to be entirely abolished; the coadjutorships, provostships, deaneries, and precedencies distributed at Rome to be without effect in Germany.—8) A German, not to the manor born, cannot be eligible to a benefice.—9) —The Indultum Administrationis and the Clausula in Temporalibus in the bulls confirmatory of elections, are henceforth inadmissible.—10) The relation sustained by Bishops to their country rendering it impossible for them to keep the oath prescribed by Pope Gregory VII., it cannot in the future be retained.—11) The amount of the “Annats and Palliums” shall be arranged, within two years, either by a national Church-convocation, or by the Emperor and the kingdom.

The Emperor Joseph, whilst promising his support of these Art., in his reply, Nov. 16, 1786, to the four Archbishops who put them in his hands, declared that the execution of the Punctat. depended on a mutual understanding between them and the suffragan-bishops and those countries into which any diocese extended, and that, therefore, a greater concert of action should be effected. The ultramontane party was not inactive. It accused the German Archbishops of a desire to elevate themselves at the expense of the Bishops, and him of Mayence in particular, of a disposition to secure the primacy over all the other Bishops and Archbishops. Pacca issued a circular (Dec. 1786), showing that the Archbishops had received every five years their dispensatory powers from Rome, and that they could not obtain others than those expressly contained in the Indulta. Archbishop Max. Franz, of Cologne, replied, whilst the Archbishops generally commanded their clergy to return the circular to Pacea, and to receive no papal regulation without the consent of their vicariate.—In the meantime the Pope had effectually gained the favor of Chas. Theodore, the Elector of Bavaria, who supported him and his nuncios. Many Bishops declared against the Congress of Ems, and the Bishop of Spire, who was seconded by the Bishops of Würzburg and Hildesheim, sent in a complaint to the Emperor, that said Congress had been held without the consent of the Bishops, whilst many others preferred the service of an absent chief to that of German Metropolitans. In the Responsio ad Metropolitanos Mogunt., Trevir., Colon. et Salisb. super Nuntiaturis, Romæ, 1789, the Pope refuted in detail the Ems Punctat. Self-interest divided the Archbishops, and in the midst of their differences the Pope achieved a signal victory over them, and the German Catholic Church remained a subject of Rome. Comp. Modern hist. of relig. under superintend. of G. I. Plank. I., Lemgo, 1787, p. 337; E. Münch, Hist. of Ems Congress and its Punctat.: Carlsr., 1840.

NEUDECKER. — Ermentrout.

Encyclopedia, French. — Encyclopédie ou Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts et des métiers, par une société de gens de lettres. Mis en ordre et publié par DIDEROT et quant à la partie mathématique par M. d'ALEMBERT. Thus runs the title of the famous work, which, begun at Paris in the middle of the 18th cent., has made its editors and contributors known over the whole civilized world, as the Encyclopedists. At the head of the enterprise stood Diderot, whose scheme it was; but d'Alembert, a member of the Paris Academy, already distinguished in the sphere of mathematics and physics, contributed most to its high scientific reputation.

Jean le Rond d'Alembert, born at Paris, Nov. 16, 1717, was the son of Destouches, a celebrated French playwright, and Mam'selle Tencin, a sister of the cardinal-archbishop of Lyons. He was exposed by his parents at the door of the church of St. Jean le Rond (whence his name), and sent thence to the foundling-hospital, but admission being refused on account of his weakness, he was placed under the care of a glazier's wife. In spite of these unfavorable circumstances, his great mental powers developed themselves in such a rapid and brilliant manner, that he entered the Mazarin College in his 12th year; two of his teachers were zealous adherents of Jansenism, and hoped to raise up in him a defender of their cause, a star of the first magnitude, a second Pascal; but d'A. felt himself drawn more and more to the study of mathematics, and accordingly left the establishment. To gain a livelihood he studied law and then medicine, but in a short time abandoned both in order to devote himself exclusively to his favorite pursuits. To these he owes his fame in the scientific world. In 1741 he was elected a member of the Academy of Paris, and, in 1746, of Berlin. Frederick the Great, attracted by some Latin verses of d'A., opened a correspondence, and settled on him a pension of 1200 livres. The same monarch wished him to accept the Presidency of the Berlin Academy, and Catherine II., of Russia, the task of educating her son; but although he had incurred the hatred of the Jesuits, and the displeasure of the French government by his writings, he declined both these tempting offers, and died at Paris on the 29th of Oct., 1783. (v. Fragments d'un mémoire de d'A. sur lui-même, and Supplément à ce mém. in the Œuvres posthumes de d'A.: Paris, 1799, T. 1). In 1805, at Paris, appeared the first complete edition of his works, under the title: Œuvr. philosoph., historiques et liter. de d'A., 18 vols.

Notwithstanding the high scientific reputation of d'A., the influence of Denis Diderot on the spirit and character of his age was far greater. He was the son of a cutler of Langres, in Champagne, and born in Oct., 1713. One of his uncles, who was a canon, promised to resign the canonicate in his favor. To fit him for the office, his father placed him, in his 9th year, in the school of Jesuits, who soon discovered the abilities of the boy, and sought by praise and flattery of every sort to win him over, with the design of sending him secretly to one of their Colleges at Paris. His father discovered the plot, and taking him thither at his own request, gave him to the Jesuits of the d'Harcourt College. Here also he soon distinguished himself; but, after the course was finished, resolved to abandon his original project, and, with the consent of his father, entered the office of an attorney-at-law. His literary inclination, however, proved too strong, and he threw himself into the mad vortex of Parisian life, relying on the pen for subsistence. His father withdrew all support, and for 10 long years he was compelled to struggle with bitter poverty. In 1744 he married an amiable, industrious, but poor girl, against the express wish of his father. At first their lot was wretched enough, but his wife made a journey to Langres, and after a stay of some months succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation with his parents. When she returned, the reward of her labors was to find her husband on familiar terms with Madame de Puisieux, who absorbed all the money he was able to earn by his romances and essays, but, proving faithless, he, some years later, during a second absence of his wife at Langres, formed a new connection with another. And yet his daughter, to whom we owe these memoirs, boasts of his morality, because he never associated with actresses, dancers, and persons of like character—a striking example of the condition of French society at that period!

Meanwhile the editing of the Enc. brought him both fame and money, and the hatred of the clergy also, on account of his free philosophical views. An article from the pen of the Abbé de Prades, attracted the attention of the government, and led to the banishment of its author and the imprisonment of D. for some months in the Bastille. Some time after an order was given to the police to search his house for papers of an obnoxious character. Of this he received a hint from the minister, Malesherbes, on the previous day, and not being able to arrange and conceal what might give offence, the minister took them into his own charge, and D. was saved. In spite of these persecutions he was unanimously elected a member of the Academy, but the King hesitated about ratifying the choice, because of his numerous enemies. The Empress, Catherine II., however, espoused his cause, and bestowed on him many favors. To express his gratitude he made a journey to St. Petersburg in 1773, and remained there a year. The hardships of travel, and the climate of the north, impaired his health for the last 10 years of his life, and brought him to the grave on the 30th of July, 1784. (v. Mém. pour servir à l'histoire de la vie et des ouvrages de D., par Madame de Vandeuil, sa fille; in the Mém. correspondance et ouvrages inédits de D., Paris, 1830).

Besides d'Alembert, the most distinguished contributors to the Enc. were the Abbé Mallet, D. D., royal professor of theology at Paris; a great part of the theological articles were from his pen. Numerous articles in the departments of metaphysics, logic, morals, and the history of philosophy were written by the abbés, Yoon, Pestrel and De Prades. Diderot generally confined himself to the task of editing. Several articles on music were furnished by J. J. Rousseau. Daubenton, member of the Paris Academy, and director of the Museum, was active in the department of natural history; the celebrated Tous-saint, in that of jurisprudence; Le Monnier and Malouin, in physics and chemistry, and Blondel in architectonics. Even men like Baron d'Argenville, privy-counsellor of the King, and Count d'Herouville de Claye, supported the enterprise. The further it progressed, the greater was its success. To the supplements, which soon became necessary, the first literary men of France and Germany contributed, among whom we may name, Marmontel, Condorcet, La Lande, Adamson, Turpin, Voltaire, Montigny, de Sacy, Bernoulli, Haller, Engel, and Sulzer.

In taking a closer view of this important work, we can best learn its spirit and design from the "Discours préliminaire des Éditeurs." This aims at setting forth the universal principles which pervade and bind together all the arts and sciences, and especially the source of all our knowledge. Though projected perhaps by the help of Diderot, it owes its form and contents to d'Alembert. And here the sensationalism of Locke appears at once as the scientific basis of the entire work. D'A. expressly declares: "All our abstract knowledge may be reduced to what we receive through our senses." To him nothing is more certain than the existence of our sensations. To prove that they are the ground of all our knowledge, it is enough to show that they can be. First, through them we learn our own existence; then, the existence of our bodies, and then, of the external objects which we regard as the causes of these sensations. He pretends, indeed, that they are subjective throughout, that there is "no relation between the particular sensation and the object, which occasions it or to which we refer it, and hence that it appears impossible to prove in a scientific way a transition from the one to the other." In the meantime he helps himself out of this difficulty by asserting, that a kind of instinct, more certain than reason itself, compels us to leap the broad chasm. He leaves it to metaphysicians to determine by what means our soul takes the first step beyond itself.—He deals in the same easy manner with the principles of ethics. The idea of injustice, of good and evil, indeed of all moral ideas, are said "to arise from the oppression, which by nature the stronger practises upon the weaker, and the latter bears the more reluctantly, the more violent it is, because he feels that there is no reason why he should submit to it; the evils which befall us through the vices of our fellow-men, lead to the indirect knowledge of antagonistic virtues." Finally, it is these ideas of right and wrong, and hence the moral nature of our actions, by which we are prompted to inquire "what the active principle, or willing substance, in us is." Since it cannot be the body, because the properties which we observe in matter have nothing in common with the power of willing and thinking, it is evident that the substance which we call Ego consists of two principles of a diverse nature, both so joined, that a correspondence, which we can neither abolish nor change, rules between the motions of the one and the affections of the other, and keeps them both in a state of mutual dependence. "This bondage in which without our own concurrence we find ourselves, together with the reflections we are forced to make upon the nature of the two principles and their imperfection, raises us to the conception of an Almighty Intelligence, which has made us what we are, and hence demands our reverence. The existence of such an Intelligence requires only our internal perception, in order to be acknowledged; and it is clear, accordingly, that the purely intellectual ideas of vice and virtue, the principle and necessity of law, the immateriality of the soul, the existence of God, as well as our duties toward him,—in short, all the truths of which we stand in most need, are the fruit of the first mental reflections to which our sensations prompt us."

From this brief review, we see how weak the grounds are upon which d'A. declares sensualism to be the only true and tenable philosophy. And yet it is this very Discours préliminaire, which, more than all the writings of Locke, Condillac, Helvetius, De la Mettrie, and Holbach, has made that philosophy so popular in all departments of French culture. The Enc., however, ought not to be accused, as is often done, of directly favoring materialism and atheism. On the contrary, the Discours préliminaire makes room even for the necessity of a divine revelation. After d'A. has shown how, in the same sensualistic way,—from the effort to maintain our bodies, to protect them from the ills which threaten them, and to cure them of those into which they have fallen—all the necessary arts—agriculture, medicine, the natural sciences, mathematics, &c.—have originated; after he has remarked how, of all the knowledge we have acquired, the idea of our own existence, which leads us to the idea of an Almighty Being, and the axioms of mathematics are alone fully certain; but that between that idea and these axioms a vast space intervenes, where the Highest Intelligence seems to mock at man's desire after knowledge, now shrouding it in thick clouds, and now illuminating it with stray beams of light, so that human nature, whose only torch is reason, remains an impenetrable mystery to itself,—he concludes: “Nothing, therefore, is more necessary than a revealed religion, which instructs us concerning so many things. Designed for the completion of our natural knowledge, it shows us a portion of what was concealed from us; but confines itself to that which is most needful, whilst all the rest remains forever hidden. A few points of faith, and a small number of practical precepts, is all to which the revealed religion refers; yet, thanks to the light which it communicates to the world! since then the people are more firm and decided concerning a great number of interesting questions, than the philosophers of any school ever were.”

This declaration has been thought ironical; but it certainly is not so, for the complexion of the whole work corresponds with it in substance. All the articles on religious and theological topics are anything but polemical; instead of being tainted with skepticism, they everywhere defend religion against atheism, orthodox Christianity against deism and rationalism, the Church against the sect-system, and are generally written in a thoroughly Catholic spirit. Thus, the article Dieu (c. Art. Réligion) in a long extract from Clarke sums up the proofs for the existence of God, and endeavors to refute the objections of Bayle against the proof from the agreement of all nations. Then comes the article Providence, which, with some ingenuity, if not thoroughness, repels the various attacks upon the divine government of the world. Besides, the existence of God, that of angels and the devil is also expressly acknowledged (s. Art. Ange, Diable). In the article Deïstes it is granted, indeed, that natural religion is very good in itself, but stated at the same time, that it is not sufficient to teach man how to worship God,—just as little as the natural law is able to lead him to happiness. The article Christianisme declares, emphatically, that Christianity is the only true revealed religion; that the titles of its divinity are contained in the books of the O. and N. T.: the severest criticism must acknowledge their genuineness, the proudest reason must respect the truth of the facts which they report, and a sound philosophy, supported by that genuineness and this truth, must conclude from the one and the other, that they are inspired: the hand of God is visibly imprinted on the style of the sacred writers, &c. The articles, Bible, Prophétie, Révélation, Testament, run in the same channel, inasmuch as they defend the prophecies of the O. and N. T., bring together the criteria of a true revelation, and adduce proofs for the authenticity of the Biblical writings; and the article Trinité strives to uphold that fundamental dogma of Christianity against the attacks of the heathen, the Jews, the Socinians, and the deists and atheists of modern times.

A special article, “Système du philosophe Chrétien”—a reprint of a rare little work of the Abbé de Gamaches (1646)—even gives the outlines of a kind of philosophy of religion, which by reflections on the physical and intellectual nature of man seeks to confirm the truth of revelation.

In regard to the government and constitution of the Church a certain freedom of opinion appears. The article Jésuites, for example, is a scorching philippic, and enumerates in long succession the scandalous deeds and doctrines of the Society and its members; and the article Pape gives a historical sketch of the Papacy, in no wise pervaded by an ultramontane spirit, although it openly favors the episcopal system, or the supreme authority of councils, and the so-called liberties of the Gallican Church. On the other hand, in all articles touching Protestantism and the Reformation, every innovation in doctrine and practice is strongly condemned, and these attacks are characterized by a disregard for truth, by a distortion—or if you will—an ignorance of facts. (See Art. Calvinisme and Luthéranisme).

If now it be asked, whence the injurious influence exerted upon religion and morals by this celebrated work springs, the source of it does not lie, as is generally thought, in open hostility or irreligion, but rather in the mode in which religion and Christianity, justice and morals, are defended. This defence falls back everywhere upon a eudæmonism, so gross and unconcealed that we may say, it bases religion, right and morality, upon the principle of all immorality. Thus, in the article Christianisme, Christianity is regarded as a new divinely inspired promulgation of the law, and the difference between Christ and other lawgivers is made to consist in this, that, although these likewise had the useful in view, and hence based their laws upon religion, they committed the mistake of wishing the useful without the truth, whilst the lawgiver of the Christians began by sweeping away prevailing errors in order to make his religion more useful. “Though he set forth, as its first object, the happiness of another life, he also meant it to render us happy in this world.” Hence he restored the natural law, which human passions had obscured, to its original glory, revealed a higher morality than was ever before known, etc. In other passages morality is put before faith, “because he who does good and makes himself useful to the world is in a better condition through morality without faith, than through faith without morality.” (Art. Morale, comp. Art. Foi). So, also, theism is to be preferred to atheism, because “it is more advantageous” for nations, princes, and individuals “to admit the existence of God than to reject it.” (Art. Théisme). On the same ground it is asserted, that faith and reason durst not be separated, since faith rests upon reason, and reason—which, in fact, alone assures us of the truthfulness of God and of his revelation—must lead to faith. For if reason has nothing at all to do in matters of religion, there must proceed from faith all those superstitious fancies and opinions, which play such a melancholy part in the history of religion; but superstition, put into practice, is nothing else than fanaticism, and this is more pernicious to human society than atheism itself. (Art. Foi, Raison, Théologie; comp. Art. Superstition). Monastic life, or the existence of too large a number of monasteries, is condemned, only because the land is thus robbed of its population, to the injury of a nation's power and prosperity (Art. Monastère); of the true philosopher, who is gifted with all virtues and held up as a perfect model, it is expressly said, that it does not belong to his nature to be content with a bare sufficiency, but unlike "a Cynic or a Stoic, he endeavors, whilst making himself useful to mankind, to enjoy life and its richest pleasures." (Art. Philosophe).

From these remarks it is plain, that great stress is laid upon the value of reason even in matters of religion, and faith is placed below reason and morality. It is said, in so many words, that faith durst not contradict the clear perceptions and evident axioms of reason, that revelation has value only, where reason and our natural powers fail to give us a clear insight or enable us to decide concerning the true and the false (Art. Raison). Passages also are not wanting, in which natural religion (so-called) is placed on the same level with the revealed; indeed, in the art. R. naturelle, the knowledge of God is so far extended, that revelation seems to be unnecessary. But yet such passages are rare and very few in number; and hence it is chiefly the prevailing sensualistic and realistic view of the world, and the fierce hostility against all and every kind of idealism, which rendered the work an ally of the irreligion, unchurchliness, and so-called illumination of the 18th century. As surely as Christianity is pervaded by the highest and noblest moral, as well as metaphysical, idealism, so surely is every attack upon idealism, at the same time, an attack upon Christianity itself. Indirect polemics are much more dangerous than the keenest direct assaults. The low, sensualistic realism of our work appears not only in the view of the origin and nature of science, contained in the Discours préliminaire, but still more in the superficiality of nearly all the articles that treat of the higher interests of the Spirit. This is particularly evident in its conception of the nature and end of art, that last and strongest bulwark of idealism. At the head of the article Art, we read: "Man is only the servant and interpreter of nature; he understands and achieves only so far as he gains a knowledge of the things around him, by experience or reflection." Accordingly the end of all art is "to give certain fixed forms to matter, or a function of the soul, or a product of nature." The difference between the liberal (fine) and the other (mechanic) arts is said, (Art. Arts libéraux) to arise from the difference between pleasure and want. "The liberal arts flourish, when society, satisfied as to its pressing wants, begins to employ itself in seeking pleasure; then the delight, once felt, becomes itself a necessity and enjoyment is the reward of life." Not the slightest reference is made to the relation between art and religion. The same shallow, worldly spirit is seen in the choice and extent of particular articles. Whilst Béatitude, Confession, Déisme, Dogme and Dogmatique, Immortalité, Liberté, Metaphysique, Mystère and Mystique, Protestant, Symbole, et al., consist of mere definitions of names and brief historical sketches, everything relating to the theatre, dancing, objects of luxury and pleasure, trade and manufactures, and the like, are discussed with a fulness and thoroughness worthy of a better cause; and whilst we look in vain for an article on pantheism, we find in its stead a long dissertation on the pantomime. On every occasion classical antiquity, its art and its science, its literature and its civilization are loaded with the highest praise, whilst in the middle ages, before the so-called renaissance des Lettres, "the very principles of the arts and sciences were lost," the true and beautiful were neglected, poetry "had dwindled to a mere childish mechanism," the philosophy of the ancients "was displaced by a barbarous tradition," all Europe had sunk into a condition of slavery, and superstition, the mother of ignorance, reigned over all. (Art. Sciences, comp. Discours prélim.).

Enough—a closer examination of this famous Enc. furnishes a new proof, that it was not the attacks of philosophy, nor the pantheism of Spinoza, nor the skepticism of Bayle, nor the sensualism of Locke, Condillac, et al., not even the spirited polemics of Diderot beyond its pages (in the work itself he prudently concealed his real views), nor the biting wit and scorn of Voltaire, which brought about the decay of morals, the contempt of religion and the Church, the prostitution of art and science to purposes of sensual pleasure and material interests, by which the so-called philosophic century is distinguished; but rather the universal spirit of worldliness that had infected the highest circles of society. As sure as Christianity is not founded on philosophical ideas and metaphysical speculations, so sure is it that it has nothing to dread from philosophy, as long as conscience and religious feeling maintain their rightful supremacy in the human heart.

II. ULRICH. — Porter.

Endor, the witch of.—The town of Endor belonged (Josh. 17 : 11) to the tribe of Manasseh, but actually lay in the bounds of Issachar, and was, according to Eusebius, a large place in his day, near to Nain, and Scythopolis, about 24 miles S. of Tabor (see Ps. 83 : 10; Judges 4 : 6, 14, &c.; 1 Sam. 28 : 29 : 1). It was still known to the crusaders, and later travellers have discovered its locality. (Robinson, II., 356, 360; Reland, Palest., 490, 762; Ritter's Erdk. XV., 1, p. 406).—Saul visited this place, shortly before his tragical death, full of gloomy forebodings, and on the eve of his last fatal battle with the Philistines, in order to ascertain from a necromancer, (the usual means of learning the future having failed him) what fate awaited him. In his better days he had banished those unlawful and idolatrous arts from the country (Ex. 22 : 18; Lev. 19 : 31; 20 : 6, &c.); but in his last extremity, having been told of this woman at Endor, renowned for her necromancy, he disguised himself, and went to her. But she no sooner saw Samuel's spirit, than she cried out, alarmed at his threatening mien, and at once detected Saul by his questions. The spirit, whom, however, he did not see, told Saul of his approaching end, as the punishment of his sins. Terrified he fell to the ground, and was raised with great difficulty by the woman and his own attendants. That same night he started on his way to meet his overhanging fate.—Some critics have assumed that the appearance was a fraud, practised by the cunning woman by means of ventriloquism, or some such art.

But the narrative shows, on the one hand, that the Israelites believed in the possibility of necromancy (cf. also Is. 8 : 19; 29 : 4; 2 Kings 21 : 10); on the other that to resort to it was most obnoxious to the O. T. religion. (See Ewald, Gesch. Isr. II., 1, p. 499. Winer's Lex.)

RÜETSCH.*

Engedi ('Eyyaddi, 'Eyyadu, &c.), the goat's fountain, the name of a fountain and town frequently mentioned in the Bible. Its more ancient name was Hazazon-tamar (2 Chron. 20 : 2) i. e. amputatio palmarum, probably from the custom of an artificial fructification of the date palms by cutting off the pistil (see RITTER, Erdk. XIV., 768, &c.). It lay near the centre of the W. shore of the Dead Sea, and was the most southern Israelitish town on that sea (cf. Ezek. 47 : 10). The country around is hilly, with steep, abrupt cliffs, rendering the approach to it from the desert of Judah difficult. It abounds in caves (1 Sam. 24 : 1, &c.), and is very fertile. Anciently it was well cultivated, and was noted for its vineyards, balm and palm-trees (Cant. 1 : 14; Ecclesiastic 24 : 18; Jos. Ant., 9, 1, 2; PLIN. H. N., 5, 15, [17]). The Amorites, primitively, dwelt there (Gen. 14 : 7, unless a much more southern town is meant. See ROBINSON, I., 500-6). David found shelter in its caves (1 Sam. 24, &c.); and there the Moabites and Ammonites perished (2 Chron. 20). The town belonged to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15 : 62), and according to Jos. B. J., 3, 3, 5, was one of the 11 toparchies of Judea, and (ibid. 4, 7, 2) was plundered during a passover feast by the Sicarii of Masada. Jerome still mentions it as a vicus prægrandis. This is the latest reference to it. The time of its overthrow is unknown. The monks of the middle ages sought the locality in entirely wrong places — near Bethlehem, at the southern or northern end of the Dead Sea — from a misapprehension of Jerome and Euseb. (Onom.) Seetzen was the first who saw the locality from the opposite shore of the sea, near the mouth of the Arnon; Robinson, the first modern traveller who visited and identified it. The fountain was still running, and around it lay remains of ancient buildings. The chief part of the town was some distance below the fountain. — (See RELAND, Palest.; RITTER, Erdk. XV., 1, p. 585. LYNCH's Expedition, &c.).

RÜETSCH.*

England, the Reformation in, sprang from two fundamentally distinct sources: the influence of the revival of religion in Germany upon the people, and the arbitrariness of a King enraged at Rome. The basis of union between these two factors was a common hatred of the Pope. But the separation from Rome led, of itself, to an approximation towards those favorable to a reform, and these, again, could hope to attain their end only under the wise guidance of the royal will. This explains both the peculiarity and development of the English Reformation. It was a compromise, and was impressed at each progressive step with the character of the reigning Prince. — The strong government of Henry VII. rose out of the civil wars with fresh energy and power. Henry VIII. (born June 28, 1491) succeeded his father on April 22, 1509. As the younger son he was destined for the Church, and did not lose his literary tastes when his brother's death made him heir to the throne. He was the favorite of the people. They hated Henry VII. for his avarice. The son was prodigal and fond of splendor. All the glory of royalty was displayed; the knighthood revived, the court became a stage. — At first Henry retained the prudent counsellors of his father — Warham, Fox, and Howard (see Articles). But these were speedily cast into the shade by a man whom Fox introduced into the cabinet as an offset to Howard's growing influence. Wolsey soon superseded his patron and his patron's opponents. None knew better than Wolsey how to manage the will of the King. He studied Henry's humors, flattered his learning, and whilst feigning acquiescence did as he pleased. Wolsey soon persuaded Henry to transfer to his servants the onerous cares of government. Thenceforth the ambitious counsellor rapidly rose in power. As early as 1516 he stood at the head of Church and State, being at once Archb. of York, Cardinal Legate, and Lord Chancellor. He was a second King. More successful than Becket, he made the spiritual equal to the temporal power, and even superior to the throne. With its elevation it also acquired greater compactness in its several parts. The highest offices of State were held by ecclesiastics. In the Upper House 21 bishops and 26 mitred abbots sat beside a smaller number of temporal lords. The common people were led by a host of mendicant monks. Among the 4 millions of people 16,000 priests were distributed. But the chief props of Church power were the cloisters — 1000 in number, with 50,000 monks and nuns. They held more real estate than the nobility, their annual revenues reached £300,000, and enabled them to wield an immense patronage. But in their religious and moral character they had greatly degenerated.

Upon this spreading darkness, however, light broke in from two points; from the declining star of Lollardism, and from the rising star of Humanism. Lollardism, once so powerful, had long been banished from the upper classes, and the colleges, although Wickliffites were yet found in Oxford under Edward IV. But it was still cherished by the common people. The secret circulation of its tenets was facilitated by the press. The severe measures enforced against its followers failed to convince, and only exasperated them against the degenerate Church. — As Lollardism was the salt of the lower classes, so Humanism was a means of spreading light among the more educated classes. It was introduced into England in the early part of the 15th cent. As the colleges had sadly declined, and offered nothing but tedious lectures upon canon law and the sentences, those thirsting after knowledge repaired to Italy, where the sciences were reviving, and brought back rich treasures of learning and books. Among those educated in Italy were Fleming, Grey, Tiptoft, and Selling. Of this number also were William Grocyn († 1519), who taught Greek in Oxford, and studied not only Aristotle, but the Greek Testament, and John Colet († 1519) the English Erasmus, who founded (1512) the St. Paul's school, for the free education of 152 youth, of which the celebrated philologist, Wm. Lily († 1523), was the principal teacher. Many other schools were soon established upon the model of Colet's. A number of the more prominent clergy favored this movement—as Wolsey, Chadworth, Langton, Fisher, Fox, who, besides some free schools, founded Corpus Christi College at Oxford, with three professorates, for Greek, Latin, and Theology. Among these humanists Thomas More deserves to be specially named. Erasmus became associated with these men. Thus, under Henry VIII., a golden age for literature seemed about to dawn. The humanists, "the Greeks," assailed the immoralities and ignorance of the clergy and the superstitions of the people with the weapons of learning and irony. "The Trojans" had poor means of defence against such skilful foes.

Thus the way was open for a reformation of the Church. Bishop Fox desired one (Letter to Wolsey, Jan. 2, 1517), and had many influential men, besides the urgent wishes of the people, with him. But a champion was wanting to gather the forces of the reform movement, and cast down the gauntlet before the powerful hierarchy. A German monk ventured forth. The tidings filled the friends of reform in England with joy and courage. The writings of the continental Reformers spread rapidly in England. A papal bull, early in 1521, complained of this, and demanded their extermination. Wolsey issued (April, 1521) orders accordingly, and had a list of 42 heresies, found in those writings, nailed to the church-doors. The Lollards, and others of like mind, hailed the German Reformers as brethren and confederates. But the Humanists, who had really built the bridge over which the continental reform had passed into England, now opposed its progress. In this they followed Erasmus. Unsparingly as they chastised particular abuses, they earnestly defended the Church itself; for they derived the means of pursuing their studies from the Church's benefices, and under it they could more freely indulge their religious or irreligious views. As the champion of this Humanist counter movement Henry himself stepped forth in his "Assertio septem sacram.," directed against Luther. Leo was so delighted by the King's zeal, and the assurance that Henry would defend the Church with the sword as well as the pen, that he conferred on him (Oct., 1521) the title: Defensor fidei—a title found in a charter of Richard II. for the University of Oxford.—Henry's determination to root out the new heresy appears from a decree of Oct. 21, 1521, enjoining it upon all the civil authorities to aid in the detection and punishment of its friends. The Humanists, headed by Thos. More, forgot their zeal for illumination and tolerance, and turned all their learning and wit against the Reformation. Its friends had to choose between prison and flight, recantation and the stake. The next twelve years were years of blood. But the work advanced. Even the places where exiles found refuge became workshops for the issue of the most important reformatory writings sent into England. This was especially the case in Antwerp. And respectable citizens were found in London, as Humphrey Monmouth, John Petit, who received and circulated such works, the chief of which was Tindal's version of the N. T. with notes. Among those most active in its circulation were R. Necton and Thomas Garret, a London clergyman. B. Longland, the cruel persecutor of the Lollards, vainly resisted: B. Tonstal, of London, in vain bought up and burned (1528) all the copies of Tindal's version he could obtain; More showed in vain that Tindal's version was full of errors. Its superiority over all previous translations was too well known. Other works of Tindal: "Of the Wicked Mammon;" "On the Sermon on the Mount," &c., and John Frith's "Mirror," &c.; "Treatise on the Sacrament;" "Book of Purgatory," were widely scattered. But scarcely any was more read than "The Supplication of the Beggars," by Simon Fish, a fugitive Kentish lawyer, issued about 1527. It exposed, with biting sarcasm, the state of the Church, from a social-political point of view, and especially the vicious influence of monasticism. More's reply: "The Supplication of Souls," only laid bare the weakness of his cause. Henry, who received a copy of Fish's book from Anne Bolen, regarded it with favor, and protected Fish against persecution.

Thus the seed of evangelical truth secretly grew in spite of foes and flames. It is remarkable that its ablest advocates were found in Wolsey's Cardinal's College in Oxford. In 1526 Garret distributed some of Tindal's Testament among its students, and in 1527 a society, those friendly to Luther's views was formed there. Frith, whom Wolsey had called thither as a professor, was of the number. He was cast into a damp prison where many died. But he escaped and became a co-worker with Tindal. For his refutation of More's Defence of Purgatory, and his book against transubstantiation, he died at the stake in 1533.—The Reformation took still stronger hold upon Cambridge, where Stafford (1524–27) lectured upon the Bible instead of the sentences, and Thos. Bilney, Barnes, Hugh Latimer, Bradford, Allen, Coverdale, Lambert, and others, devoted themselves to the study of the Word of God.—Whilst, therefore, the old Humanists adhered to the old religion, a new race of classical scholars arose, who, by their writings and preaching, ably advocated the evangelical movements. But as long as the King, the chief civil officers, and the Bishops remained hostile to the Reformation there was no hope of its success. At this juncture an event occurred, which, though seemingly insignificant, estranged Henry from Rome, and led him to favor the Reformation.—The King desired his marriage with his brother's widow, for which a special papal dispensation had been granted (Dec. 26, 1503), to be annulled. Of their three sons and two daughters, only Mary survived. Catherine, moreover, had ceased childbearing, and was growing more and more infirm. With this Henry's old doubts about the lawfulness of their union revived. From Thomas Aquinas he learned that the Pope could not dispense from a divine injunction. His perplexity was increased by the question raised as to the legitimacy of Mary, whose marriage with Charles V., and then with Francis I., had been proposed. Negotiations were opened for Henry's union with the Duchess

Alençon, then with Renate; but they failed. Thereupon Anne Bolen, who had just returned from Paris, and drew all eyes upon her by her charms, appeared at court. Henry's strongest passions were inflamed, and when Anne resisted all unlawful advances, he became more determined to obtain a divorce from Catharine. The most distinguished Bishops and jurists were consulted. All but More and Fisher yielded to Henry's wishes. Wolsey wavered for a while, but finally pressed the King's request at Rome (Dec., 1527). Clement VII. was sorely perplexed. By annulling the bull of Julius II. he would enrage the Emperor, by refusing he would offend Henry; whereas he needed the help of both against Francis. At length he yielded to the persuasions of Wolsey, trusting to the prudence of Wolsey for the longest delay in the execution of the decree of divorce. Catharine was not summoned before the Legates entrusted with the case until June, 1529. Campeggio deferred a final decision. He knew that negotiations for peace were pending between the Emperor and the Pope, and actually held a letter from Clement (of July 19) recalling him from England, when tidings of the peace of Cambray (Aug. 5) reached him. Further proceedings in reference to the divorce were transferred to Rome, and Campeggio left London in Sept., 1529. — Then came Wolsey's fall. His numerous foes urged him with the failure of the divorce scheme. On Oct. 17, 1529, the King transferred the Great Seal from him to More, and he was dismissed from the court. His enemies even sought to press the præmunire against him. Although the act did not apply to his case, Wolsey hoped to gain something by meek confessions. The Parliament was convoked, Nov. 3, 1529, the first time for seven years, and numerous charges were brought against him. The Upper House at once sustained them, but through the influence of Cromwell, Wolsey's secretary, the Lower House rejected them. The fall of this mighty Prelate brought relief to the people. Men favorable to reforms in Church and State, became the King's councillors, such as the Duke of Suffolk, Sir Thomas Bolen, Cromwell, and Cranmer, who advised Henry to refer the question of divorce to the judgment of theologians. The opinion of Universities and distinguished scholars, at home and abroad, was accordingly sought. By menaces and bribes an approving sentence was obtained from Oxford; the Sorbonne reluctantly yielded to the King. But the French Bishops and Italian Universities at once approved. Among the Reformers Zwingli, Ecclampadius, and Andrew Osiander favored the divorce, Luther and Melancthon disapproved of it. These opinions were laid before the Parliament in Jan., 1531, and published; in July Catharine left the court forever. — Simultaneously with the above movement, the King used measures to make the clergy of the realm more dependent upon the throne. As most of them had acknowledged Wolsey's primacy they were also threatened with the præmunire. Seeing the sword overhead, they resolved, in the Convocation of Jan. 24, 1531, to purchase exemption with £100,000. But Henry demanded (Feb. 7) a recognition of himself as head of the Church. They hesitated, but finally added to the preface of the subsidy bill: "We acknowledge his Majesty as the chief protector of the English Church, and its only and supreme Lord and Head, so far as the law of Christ allows this." By this act of submission, which was signed by 9 bishops and 62 abbots and priors of the Upper, and by 64 members of the Lower House, the clergy of the diocese of Canterbury were released from the præmunire. The Convocation of York followed this example, May 4. The next year the Convocation was deprived of the right of making ecclesiastical laws without the King's approval, and a change was proposed in the laws limiting the royal prerogatives. — Henry now stood at the head of his pliant clergy: the Parliament zealously seconded his plans: Sir Thomas Audley was made Chancellor (May 16, 1532), and Cranmer, Archb. of Canterbury (Aug. 23, 1532), both friends of the Reformation; he was on good terms with Francis I., and in union with the German Protestants. Whilst, therefore, Clement VII. was preparing a bull of excommunication (Nov. 15, and then Dec. 23, 1532), in case Henry refused to relinquish Anne Bolen, he secretly married her (Nov. 14, 1532; others say Jan. 25, 1533). The next step was to substitute another tribunal for the papal. This was done in Feb., 1533, by the statute (24 Henry VIII., c. 12), which made all appeals to Rome liable to the præmunire, and gave the episcopal courts jurisdiction over all the ecclesiastical affairs of the realm, with the right of ultimate appeal to the King, or if he were a party in the case, to the Upper House of the Convocation. Thereupon the matter of the divorce was brought before both Houses, and decided in the King's favor. But he had previously (Apr. 12, 1533) been publicly married to Anne. In May Catharine was summoned, and for refusing to appear, was condemned for contumacy, May 23. Her marriage was declared null, Henry's marriage with Anne Bolen confirmed, and Anne crowned on June 1. As soon as this was known in Rome the Pope annulled the divorce and the new marriage, and threatened the ban; but fearing to offend Francis I., he agreed to open negotiations, when Bonner appeared before him (Nov.) and appealed to a general council. Nevertheless, pressed by the Emperor and his own cardinals, Clement signed the ban (March 23, 1534). In England this event had been anticipated by a statute extending the King's powers (25 Henry VIII., c. 19; March 30, 1534), in the preface of which the Pope's supremacy is questioned, all the acts and decisions of the Convocation are made dependent upon the permission of the King, appeals referred to a royal court of delegates, the choice of bishops vested in the King, all tithes to Rome prohibited, the right of dispensation transferred to the Archbishop, and a visitation of the monasteries ordered. At the same time the royal succession was fixed, Mary declared illegitimate, and all assaults upon the new marriage, high treason. The oath of succession had to be taken by all the members of Parliament before its adjournment. The Convocation also signed a declaration (March 31, 1534) that the Roman bishop enjoyed no higher divine authority over England than any other foreign prelate. The province of York, the universities, and many monasteries, also assented to this. The bishops speedily took the oath of succession from their clergy, and urged obedience to the King. Henry answered the ban of the Pope by abolishing the supremacy of the latter in the realm. On Nov. 3, the Parliament passed the act of the King's supremacy (Stat. III., 492), by which act a Catholic National Church, under the royal supremacy, and independent of Rome, was established. Henry desired no more. But in order to justify this rupture with Rome, and otherwise bring the people over to the new order, it was necessary for the King and his friends to fall back upon the authority of the Holy Scriptures, and to abolish the monasteries and mendicant orders, which were the bulwark of Popery in the land. This led the King to favor the friends of Evangelical truth. The violent denunciations of some of the monastic orders rendered severe measures necessary. During the winter of 1535-6 a visitation of the monasteries brought facts to light, touching their moral degradation and immense wealth, which led Parliament, Feb., 1536, to abolish 376 smaller ones, and transfer all their rights, possessions, and revenues to the crown, their treasures amounting to £100,000, and their annual revenues, £30,000, were committed to the management of a special commission. The priors of these monasteries received a dowry; the rest received little or no help. Many nuns were thrown out on the highways; many monks had to beg their bread. A diocesan visitation was likewise ordered, so that the clergy might also be instructed in the new measures, and the refractory punished. At the same time Henry sought favorable foreign alliances against Rome. In 1535 Fox, Heath, and Dr. Barnes were sent to the Smalcald Convention of Protestant princes, to close with them a league of mutual defence. They required Henry to adopt the Augsburg Confession, and to pledge money for the war, promising in turn to acknowledge him as Protector, and not to aid his foes. But Gardner managed to contravene the league. Further negotiations, to prosecute which Melancthon, Bucer, and Draco were to have gone to England, failed in consequence of Queen Anne's death, May 19, 1536. Catharine had died on Jan. 8 preceding. The tyrant Henry married Jane Seymour the day after Anne's execution. Both queens being now out of the way, Paul III., who, upon hearing of the execution of Fisher and More, and the dissolution of the monasteries, had prepared a violent bull of condemnation, hoped anew that the controversy might be settled. But his legate in England was soon convinced that the schism was incurable. The new queen also was favorable to the Reformation. The new Parliament was more pliant than the old, and declared both Mary and Elizabeth illegitimate, and yielded everything to Henry. The Convocation opened June 16, 1536, by Cromwell, the vicar-general, laid the basis of a Confession of Faith, by adopting the ten articles prepared by Cranmer and other theologians. These acknowledge: 1) the S.S., with the three old creeds as the ground of faith; 2-4) three sacraments, Baptism, Penance, and the Lord's Supper under both forms, retaining transubstantiation; 5) justification as the gift of God's grace in Christ, and appropriated by contrition, faith, and active love; 6) pictures as helps to devotion, but not as objects of worship; 7-8) the saints as examples and intercessors; 9) the utility of Church usages; 10) that prayers and masses for the dead were allowable, but not papal indulgences. These articles were approved by 18 bishops, and 40 abbots and priors, and 50 members of the Lower House. By the King's orders they were published, the clergy were directed to preach upon the royal supremacy and upon the doctrines of the articles, saints' days were abolished, and a Latin and English Confession (Coverdale's, 1535) were to be placed in every church. This first Confession, however unsatisfactory, was the best that could be done at the time. The leaders of the Reformation did not wish to tear down the old Church, but correct its abuses. To this conservative party belonged, besides Cranmer and Cromwell, Bishops Latimer of Worcester (1535-9), Edw. Fox of Hereford (1535-8), Goodrich of Ely (1533-54), Shaxton of Sarum (1535-9), Barlow of St. David's (1535-54), Hilsey of Rochester (1539). The extreme Romish party was headed by Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, and Stephen Gardiner, B. of Winchester, and included Stokesley of London, Lee, Archb. of York, with his three provincials, Longland (the King's confessor), Tonstal, and Kite. York was still the stronghold of Romanism; there popular ignorance, and clerical and monkish fanaticism most abounded; there the enforcement of the new measures caused the greatest commotion. In Lincolnshire a host of 20,000 men, led by two priests, rose in rebellion; but the prudence of the Duke of Suffolk soon suppressed it. Many of these rebels, however, joined another more alarming movement in Yorkshire, mustering 40,000 men, and favored by James V. of Scotland. Negotiations were opened with them. An amnesty and a parliament at York were promised; but the pledge was broken. The insurgents marched forth anew, but were soon put down, and the leaders, with 70 others, were executed. A general amnesty (July, 1537) then restored peace. The first result of these insurrections was the dissolving of the larger monasteries, as the chief sources of the recent troubles. Visitations were instituted. The officers, conscious of guilt, and fearing exposure and punishment, at once yielded upon being promised an annual stipend. One after another these seats of Romanism fell, and their relics and images were brought forth and burned. Even Becket's bones were not spared. The ban long withheld was now sealed against the heretical, adulterous, murderous, traitor; and the Emperor and Francis I. were commanded to wage a crusade against him. Henry parried the blow by warlike preparations and artful diplomacy, and went on dissolving the cloisters. The Parliament sanctioned his measures by a special act, and authorized further proceedings. The remaining monasteries were accordingly dissolved, and thus £160,000 added annually to the state treasury. The monks and nuns, with thousands who had been employed at the monasteries, suffered greatly. This may have been unavoidable; but there is no justification for the reckless squandering of the wealth thus obtained, instead of using it, as Cranmer wished, for the establishment of free theological seminaries, many additional bishoprics and hospitals. But only six new sees were founded: Bristol, Oxford, Gloucester, Peterborough, Chester, and Westminster (the last soon again dissolved), with two university colleges, and a few schools. For the King desired reform only so far as it filled his coffers, and confirmed his supremacy. Things now took an unfavorable turn; Jane Seymour died (Oct. 24, 1537) after giving birth to a male heir to the throne. The King grew more morose and arbitrary than ever, and more accessible to the insinuations of the Romish party. Norfolk's influence increased; Gardiner had returned from a foreign mission, and found a new coadjutor in Bonner (B. of Hereford from 1538-40, and of London. 1540-9). The acts of the same Parliament which dissolved the cloisters, show the growing power of the friends of Rome. The want of a definite system of doctrine became ever more apparent. Lambert was executed at the stake (Nov., 1538), for holding Zwinglian sacramental views. The Parliament had never sanctioned the 10 articles of the Convocation. A commission of theologians, with Cranmer at their head, revised them, and in Dec., 1537, submitted "The godly and pious institution of a Christian Man," or "The Bishops' Book" to the King's approval. Henry made various changes, but gave no orders for its introduction. Cranmer now hoped to effect more by the help of the German Reformers. Henry thought much of Melancthon, and often invited him to England. M. could not comply, but in the spring of 1538 Burckhardt, Boyneburg, and Myconius were sent to England. Gardiner, however, frustrated the scheme. After discussing a few points the Germans returned, and the Parliament undertook the framing of articles. After violent debates the "six bloody articles" were adopted (June 28, 1539). They maintained, 1) transubstantiation, 2) the communion in one kind, 3) sacerdotal celibacy, 4) the perpetuity of vows of chastity, 5) masses for the dead, and 6) auricular confession. The penalty of denying the first, and of delay on the part of priests to dissolve marriages contracted, was death. The doctrines were enforced with unheard of cruelty. In a short time 500 persons were imprisoned. Cranmer and Cromwell strove to moderate the cruelties. Whilst Cromwell was at the helm, there were no executions. But his attempts to counteract the Papists, by inducing the uxorious King to marry Anne of Cleves, wrought his downfall. Henry was seized with such aversion towards Anne at his first sight of her, that though he consented to the marriage (Jan., 1540), he soon effected a divorce (July 10, 1540). The King's anger vented itself upon Cromwell. He was beheaded, July 28, 1540. His fall was a severe blow to the Evangelical cause. Cranmer could not, single-handed, stay the encroachments of the Romish party.

The rest of Henry's reign exhibits a wretched wavering between progress and retrogression, according to the King's humor, and party predominance. At first the Papists triumphed. Even before Anne's death Henry was captivated by Catharine Howard, niece of the Duke of Norfolk. He married her on Aug. 8, 1540. On Feb. 12, 1542, she was beheaded, ostensibly for her previously immoral life. In Henry's sixth wife, Catharine Parr (July 7, 1543), the Protestants found a true and prudent friend. The progress of the Reformation during this period may be briefly stated. Whilst Cromwell still lived two commissions were instituted (1540) for the establishment of a system of faith, and order of worship. "The godly and pious institution of a Christian Man," after being revised with Henry's assistance, was published, 1543, under the title: "A necessary doctrine and erudition for any Christian Man," also called "The King's Book." In many particulars the influence of the Romish party is seen. In Art. 1 an attempt is made to harmonize justification by faith with the efficacy of good works. Art. 2 treats of the Romish C. as including all believers, whatever their diversity in regard to externals. Art. 3 recognizes the 7 sacraments. Art. 4, of the decalogue, admits the utility of pictures. Arts. 5 and 6 retain the Lord's Prayer, and Ave Maria in the vernacular; 7 acknowledges free will; 8 and 9, on justification and good works, hold up rather the example than the merits of Christ, sanctification than justification, and admit the meritoriousness of good works, but not such as are merely outward; 10 approves of prayers for the dead, but says nothing of masses for them, or of purgatory. The Liturgy, revised by the other commission, was altered but little; but in 1544 the prayers for processions and litanies were ordered to be translated into English. In 1546 Henry's Primer was published,—an abbreviation of the Romish breviary, in English, which was used in public worship. But immediately after Cromwell's fall the Romish party carried an act of Parliament which made the King's orders in ecclesiastical matters, laws of the realm. In 1542 they obtained a prohibition of all religious works excepting the "King's Book," and in 1543 the reading of the Bible was limited to the higher classes. Their hopes of suppressing the Reformation were strengthened by Henry's alliance with the Emperor, on which occasion he legitimized Mary and Elizabeth. But the growing infirmity of the King changed matters. Mary turned towards the Seymours, the nearest kin of the successor. Henry, to secure Edward against peril from party conflicts, appointed his maternal uncle regent. Gardiner lost the King's confidence. Norfolk and his son Surrey were put out of the way by false charges; Surrey was beheaded, his father barely escaped by Henry's death.—The reign of Henry is commonly thought to have impeded the Reformation. It is true the faith of the people was fashioned after the arbitrary will of the King, who was prompted chiefly by worldly, selfish motives. Still it was fortunate that a monarch, at heart a Papist, was led even thus to aid a cause which he might have suppressed by force, as his predecessors did Lollardism. And although the free development of many evangelical germs was hindered, the political and religious unity of the realm was preserved. It must be remembered, also, that England lacked men, like those raised up in Germany and Switzerland, who possessed the requisite ability to organize fully, and carry forward a complete Reformation. This will be more clearly seen in the next period of its history.

Edward VI. (Jan. 29, 1547, to July 6, 1553) ascended the throne in his 10th year. He was educated, under Cranmer's direction, by Dr. Richard Cox, and Sir John Cheke, who sedulously taught him the principles of evangelical truth. He combined the talent of his father with the amiability of his mother. Great things were expected from his reign. He was placed, during his minority, under the guidance of a council of 16 men, at whose side stood the privy council. The regency, according to intimations in Henry's will, at once raised themselves to a higher rank, and appropriated some earlier church estates. The two religious parties were pretty equally balanced in the Council. At the head of the Romish party stood the Lord Chancellor, Wriothesley and Bishop Tonsal; at that of the other party Cranmer and Count Hartford (Duke of Somerset) Edward's uncle, who was chosen president, in spite of Wriothesley's opposition. The latter was deprived of the Great Seal for some misdemeanor, and thus quieted. Somerset now became protector of the realm, and chief of the regency (March 13, 1547). Thus the Protestants obtained a decided ascendancy. Still the Romish party wielded great power, and found an able champion in Gardiner, supported by many bishops, nearly all the clergy, and by the Universities, where the light of the gospel was soon extinguished. The mass of the people was but little penetrated, as yet, by the leaven of truth. The cause was also endangered by the fanaticism of its friends. To preserve the unity of the Church, and reconcile conflicting views, a medium course had to be opened. No one could do this so well as Cranmer. In rearing the new edifice he endeavored to use as much as possible of the material of the old, and to retain its general plan. But he did not despise other material. Worthy exiles were encouraged to return home, and continental scholars were invited to assist in the work. The confessional writings of this period bear distinct traces of the influence of Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin. The royal supremacy furnished the surest defence of the Reformation, and made all attacks upon the measures of the regency high treason. Cranmer, therefore, received his office anew from the King, and requested all the bishops to do the same. In order to carry out this measure among all the clergy, and to prepare the way for a general Reformation, a Church visitation was appointed in April, 1547. Previously means were used to acquaint the people with the Holy Scriptures and evangelical principles. Cranmer had Erasmus' paraphrases circulated (July, 1547) in English. The Book of Homilies, composed by Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, &c., distinctly asserted the doctrine of justification by faith. Both books were ordered to be read in the churches—a measure required by the ignorance of the clergy, and their hostility to the Reformation. To prevent disturbances, either by the sermons of Papists or fanatics, permission to preach had to be obtained from the superior courts. Accordingly the visitation began in September, in conformity with 37 articles of instruction, directing not merely the taking of the oath of supremacy, but also the abolition of pilgrimages, processions, and pictures from churches, the use of the paraphrases and homilies, of the litany in the vernacular, the reading of Scripture lessons, the examination of communicants, the strict observance of the Sabbath, the zealous discharge of ministerial duties, and the keeping Church records. The visitors were accompanied by preachers, who instructed the people concerning the Reformation.

On Nov. 4, 1547, the Parliament was opened which laid the foundation of the Reformed Church. Measures previously adopted were approved; the laws against heretics were abrogated; the royal supremacy was confirmed anew, and so far extended that the appointment of bishops and of ecclesiastical courts was invested entirely in the King; masses for souls were abolished; and the communion in both kinds was introduced,—but at the same time severe penalties were threatened against the frequent assaults upon the sacrament. The covetous nobility gave ready assent to the dissolution of still remaining eccl. establishments; but, as before, the wealth thus obtained was sadly squandered. The Protector, especially, appropriated a large share of it. Other propositions, however, as the revision of the eccl. laws, the remodelling of the order of worship, the abolition of celibacy, and the participation of the convocation in eccl. legislation, were not entertained. Cranmer went forward with his reforms. In Jan., 1548, he forbid the use of candles, ashes, and palms, and readily granted exemptions from fasting. In Febr. he ordered all pictures to be removed from the churches. He likewise had the sermons upon the Nuremberg Lutheran Catechism translated into Latin, by Justus Jonas, and then published an English version of the book. At the same time he, with Bishops Goodrich, Ridley, &c., prepared a new order of worship on the basis of the best ancient liturgies, and that of Cologne, in which the service for the Lord's Supper was copied almost literally from the Romish missal, and auricular confession, prayers for the dead, signing with the cross, unction, and priestly vestments were retained. It was published late in 1548, and offered as a Christmas present to the King. Early in 1549 the first act of Uniformity adopted it as the general prayer-book, and ordered its introduction on July 1. The abolition of celibacy was ruled by the same Parliament, but only as a necessary evil. Thus far the Papists resisted in vain. Gardiner, who, from the first, had opposed the paraphrases and homilies, and disputed the authority of the regency, was in the Tower. Tonsal had retired to his see, and was quiet. Bonner was now as pliant as he had been fierce. Others were equally indifferent, Mary alone excepted. But the populace, ascribing the prevailing poverty and distress to reformatory measures, gave vent to smothered anger when the new liturgy was introduced. The excitement raged most in Devonshire and Norfolk, where Cardinal Pole had many adherents. In Cornwall an army of 10,000 men demanded the restoration of Popery, and was put down with difficulty. In Norfolk, Ket, a tanner, at the head of 20,000 insurgents, declared war against the nobility and regency. The Earl of Warwick had to be called with his troops from Scotland before the rebellion could be quelled. In addition to this England was involved in a war with France by Henry's scheme of having Mary of Scotland espoused to Edward—a scheme favored by the Protestants. This war emptied the treasury, and endangered the English possessions in France, and led to the fall of the Protector, whom the other councillors hated for his ambition—the Papists especially for his eccles. innovations. Warwick joined with Southampton, Somerset's chief opponent, and soon succeeded in having the Protector sent to the Tower (Sept., 1549), and deprived of his office. Still Warwick, to keep the King's favor, had to aid the Reformation; so that during Somerset's imprisonment, not only were stricter orders enforced for introducing the liturgy, but a form of ordination, and book of eccles. law were resolved upon; the former was completed in March, 1550, the latter work took several years. The ordination-service, with a few alterations, made under Charles II., is the same now used. Thus far the aim was not so much to found a new Church, as to purify the old. Hence the means used to suppress the Anabaptists, Antitrinitarians, Gospellers, and other fanatical bodies, were severer than those employed against Popery; for so far as they maintained views adverse to the State and good morals, they forfeited claims to toleration. But it is a stain upon Edward's reign, that Joan Bocher was burnt (May, 1550) for denying Christ's true humanity, and van Paris, a Hollander, for denying his divinity.

Gradually the principles of the German and Swiss Reformation exerted a more decided influence upon the further development of that in England. This was mainly effected by the return from exile of such men as Miles Coverdale, John Rogers, and John Hooper, and by such foreign fugitives as Peter Martyr, Ochino, Bucer, Fagius, and de Lasky. To secure competent teachers for the colleges, Cranmer had (1548) called P. Martyr Vermigli, and Bern. Ochino to Oxford, and (1549) M. Bucer and Paul Fagius to Cambridge. Fagius died in Nov. following. Bucer continued a year and a half, and by his learning as well as piety and peaceableness, won high regard. After his death the post was left vacant for two years, in the hope that Melancthon might be obtained for it. These men scattered seed which yielded fruit in the rising generation. The scholastic professors vehemently opposed the new doctrine—especially that touching the Lord's Supper. But the frequent disputations about it led the Reformers themselves further off from the Romish dogma. Knox and Hooper particularly asked for more thorough reforms in the cultus and constitution of the Church. On Hooper's motion the cabinet ordered, Nov., 1550, that communion tables should be used instead of altars; Heath and Day opposing lost their offices (Oct., 1551). Knox rejected the liturgy and episcopacy, and declined a see. The Holland Church of de Lasky (1550) became a pattern to others. It was a complete Presbyterian Church, holding decidedly Reformed doctrines, after the model of the Apostolic Church. It realized what the Lollards strove after. Many desired the English Church to be modelled after it. These foreign influences produced a tendency adverse to that of the national Church, which subsequently caused so much dissension. But at first it was confined to a narrow circle, and was harmless. The light of the Gospel had penetrated but a little way into most places. And no wonder. There were congregations which had not heard a sermon for years. Many clergymen had several parishes let out to such as worked cheapest; most of them were secret Papists. Fagius wrote, 1549, that scarcely ten competent preachers could be found. Hence Cranmer's plan of having six court chaplains, four of whom should always be travelling through the country to preach. He also endeavored to appoint the most evangelical men bishops and priests. By the close of 1551 all Romish bishops had been removed. But Somerset's fall checked the joy of the evangelicals. And yet it did not stop the progress of their cause. Northumberland's private interests constrained him to abet the Protestants, especially as Edward had declared his full approval of the reforms urged by the foreign theologians, and insisted upon a revision of the Prayer-Book. Calvin, Martyr, and Bucer thought it retained too many Popish features. Bucer desired not only the elimination of many Romish usages, but the introduction of well organized congregations, with discipline, the care of the poor, schools, and the restitution to the congregations of the eccl. property. His work, "Censura supra libro sanctorum" (1550), led Edward to appoint a committee of revision. This committee adopted many of Bucer's suggestions, derived some things from Polanus' edition of Calvin's liturgy—the introductory sentences, responses, part of the confession, and the commandments in the Lord's Supper—and struck out the use of oil, the exorcism, sign of the cross, auricular confession, prayers for the dead, and the Romish vestments. The revision was submitted to the Convocation, and to the Parliament happily convoked before Somerset's execution, and which met immediately after it, Jan. 23, 1552, which, by the second act of Uniformity, Apr. 6, 1552, adopted the revised Prayer-Book, and ordered its introduction upon the following All-Saint's Day. After enacting some other laws for the observance of the Sabbath and holydays, and modifying the extreme act against high treason, the Parliament was dissolved, April 15.

Simultaneously with the Liturgy, the code of eccl. laws was revised. A comm. was appointed for this purpose in 1549, but the work was not vigorously taken up for two years; and though finished before Edward's death, it was first publ. under Elizabeth, and entitled: "Reformatio legum ecclesiastic." It was prepared by Cranmer, Goodrich, Cox, P. Martyr, and four jurists. The Bible is made the basis, with continual reference to the first four general councils, the Church fathers, and the reformatory laws of the realm. Though a most excellent work, it was never legally adopted. At last Cranmer addressed himself to the preparation of a Confession of Faith. The peculiar course of the English Reformation caused the usual order of events in this respect to be thus reversed. It was hoped, also, that by this delay continental Protestants might unite with England in one Confession. Cranmer prepared 42 Articles (see Anglican Church), and laid them, May, 1552, before the Privy Council. Their Calvinistic tone so predominates that they scarcely harmonize with the Liturgy. This made it almost impossible to use the Nuremberg Catechism. A new one, probably by B. Poinet, was therefore prepared. The King ordered its use, May, 1553, and also that the clergy should take an oath of approval of the 42 Articles, although these were not submitted to the Convocation or Parliament for confirmation. Thus the Reformation was completed; and very fortunately, for Edward's declining health opened a gloomy prospect. Northumberland, as ambitious as he was covetous, now aspired to nothing less than to secure the crown for his daughter-in-law, Jane Grey. The illegitimacy of Henry's daughter had not yet been annulled by Parliament; the mother of James V. was not named in Henry's will, so that Lady Jane Grey's mother, as Henry's niece, had the next claim to the throne. Northumberland showed Edward the danger to which Mary's reign would expose the Reformation, and in spite of the objections of Cranmer and others, effected (June 10) a change of the succession in favor of his daughter-in-law. Edward died on July 6, 1553 — deplored by the friends of the Gospel at home and abroad. On the 9th Lady Jane was proclaimed Queen, and Mary a few days later. The Romanists, strengthened by Northumberland's many foes, rallied around Mary. Many were gained by promises of liberty of conscience. But Mary did not feel bound by promises given to heretics. Her previous training and wrongs inspired her with glowing hatred against all innovations. Neither the entreaties nor threats of her brother, or the regency, could change her mind. She felt called to restore Romanism in her realm. On the day she entered the Tower (July 31), Norfolk and Gardiner, on the next, Toustal, Heath, and Day were released and reinstated. More than 60 persons were excluded from the general amnesty, including Northumberland, who was forthwith convicted of high treason, and executed, Aug. 22. Edward's burial, and Mary's coronation were performed according to the ancient ritual. An edict of Aug. 18, curtailed, "until further enactments," the liberty of preaching and the press. For resisting this, Hooper, Ridley, Latimer, Coverdale, Rogers, Cox, and others, and, finally,

Cranmer, were imprisoned. The Parliament convened that fall validated Henry's marriage with Catharine, and abrogated, after violent opposition, all the Reformatory laws passed under Edward. The body of the people, hankering after the pomp of Romanism, and the fleshpots of the cloisters, rejoiced; the nobility, not yet required to restore the church treasures, acquiesced; the Convocation, from which all the Reformed prelates were excluded, exulted in the doings of a Queen who had "chosen the better part." The friends of the Gospel, and the married priests, were in consternation. In one thing, however, friends and foes agreed, in their aversion to the plan of Mary and Charles V., of her marriage with Philip of Spain. The Parliament, fearing foreign influence, desired her to choose an Englishman. But Cardinal Pole, whom Mary once regarded favorably, was now too old for her, and young Courtenay was too frivolous. In Jan., 1554, therefore, she had her purpose announced to marry Philip. This caused disturbances in Warwickshire, the home of the Greys, in Cornwall, and in Wales. These were soon quelled. But the approach of Sir Thomas Wyatt, with an army, filled London with alarm. Mary, however, did not fear. Her warm appeal to the citizens in Guildhall inspired them with courage, and thousands rallied around her, and compelled Wyatt to surrender (Feb. 11, 1554). On the next day Lady Jane Grey was executed. Her husband had preceded her; her father and uncle soon followed. Fifty of Wyatt's followers were put to death in London, others in Kent. He tried to screen himself by placing Elizabeth under suspicion. She was brought to the Tower, soon released, but strictly watched. Many nobles fled to France. Peace being restored, Mary was married to Philip on July 25. Mary, relying upon the support of Papal powers, now recklessly pressed her plans. A royal order drove thousands of worthy foreigners from England; 800 Englishmen, including many students and theologians — Knox, Grindal, Sandys, Jewel — also fled, to Frankfort, Basel, Zurich, and Geneva. Another edict abrogated the supremacy, in consequence of which the remaining evangelical bishops were deposed, and probably half the clergy were involved in misery for violating the law of celibacy. In Nov., 1554, Pole entered London as the Papal legate. The beginning of 1555 found the English Church in the arms of Popery again. Now came those fearful persecutions which brand Mary's reign. In a few years, about 300 persons, including men and women, old and young, 5 bishops, 21 theologians, died at the stake. Many others perished in prisons. The persecutions lasted until Mary's death, Nov. 17, 1558, put an end to her reign of terror. Pole died the day following. Mary's reign was a baptism of fire for the Reformation. The cloud of witnesses which arose testified to the worth and power of the Gospel; the bloody persecutions kindled inextinguishable hatred of Popery in the hearts of the people.

A brighter day dawned with Elizabeth's accession. It was her vocation to consummate the work of the Reformation. In pursuit of this she adopted a mediating policy, rising above existing parties. Her Privy Council was composed of Romanists and Protestants. The coronation ceremony was performed according to the Romish ritual; the oath was taken upon an English Bible. Through the influence of the new government many friends of the Reformation were returned to the new Parliament, but it was opened (Jan. 25, 1559) with a high mass. The transactions of the body were left untrammelled, and to show her impartiality, the Queen had referred the revision of Edward's Liturgy to an equal number of Romanists and Protestants. After some violent struggles the Romish worship restored by Mary was thrown aside, the royal supremacy reasserted, and its exercise entrusted to a High Commission appointed by the crown, and, finally (April), by a new act of Uniformity, the revised Book of Common Prayer was introduced. In execution of these enactments the Queen ordered a general visitation under instructions based on those of the visitation under Edward, and having regard as well to Romanists as to the stricter Protestants. Altars, images, crucifixes and candles were to be removed, but instrumental music, kneeling in prayer and at the communion retained. Attendance upon public worship, and the sanctification of the Sabbath were urged; but liberty to preach and of the press, and even of the clergy to marry, had to be obtained from the higher courts. Most of the clergy seemed willing to take the oath of supremacy and uniformity; of 9400 only 80 priests, and 70 cathedral ecclesiastics, university professors, and principals of colleges, refused. Of the 16 bishops all but one refused. The vacancies occasioned by the non-juring clergy were temporarily supplied by lay readers, but soon well filled by theologians who returned from exile. It was more difficult to fill the bench of prelates. Matthew Parker, the Queen's instructor, an unassuming, learned man, was made Archb. of Canterbury. Fortunately, three bishops, Barlow, Scory, and Coverdale, who had fled under Mary, and Hodgkin, suffragan of Bedford, were at hand to consecrate Parker (Dec. 17, 1559). Parker then consecrated other bishops, and within two years all the sees were invested with evangelical men. As before, matters pertaining to government and worship were first arranged, and then steps taken towards forming a Confession of Faith. A brief temporary confession of 11 Articles was framed, which the clergy were required to subscribe, and to read twice a year in their churches. Meanwhile the 42 Art. were revised and submitted, in Jan., 1563, to the Convocation, which, after striking out the last three, adopted (Febr.) the remaining 39 almost unaltered. With the royal approbation they were published in Nov., but were not sanctioned by Parliament until Apr., 1571; till then they were binding only upon the clergy. The same Convocation adopted the Latin Catechism of Noel, based upon Poinet's, and publ. in English in 1570, a Book of Homilies, prepared by Parker and Jewell, and, finally, resolved upon a new version of the Bible, which was publ. in 1572. In accordance with her conciliatory plan, full liberty of conscience was allowed to the laity during the first ten years of Elizabeth's reign. The order of worship retained so much of the ancient forms, that it might satisfy the reasonable demands of Protestants and Romanists. And though zealous Papists shunned the oath of conformity by flight, the most of them succumbed. But ere long the seditious movements of Romanists, and stubborn opposition of the Puritans, required severe measures. In 1561 a conspiracy was discovered, under the management of Pole's nephew, which led Parliament to insist upon the oath of supremacy. This was done to frighten the malcontents. Afterwards Popish tracts were circulated by fanatical priests, who, having returned from Holland, went through the country in disguise, and used various means to inflame the people, until a conspiracy in favor of Mary of Scotland was fomented. The Pope, moreover, by a bull of Apr. 27, 1570, excommunicated Elizabeth, and sought to excite a crusade against her. Then the Parliament passed a series of enactments in her defence, making all assaults upon her person, her orthodoxy, her title to the crown, as well as the introduction into the realm of Papal bulls, &c., high treason. All the clergy and officers of the kingdom were required to subscribe the 39 Articles, and fugitive Romanists were threatened with confiscation. Various other edicts were subsequently issued to suppress the spreading of seditious prints which issued mainly from the English colleges in Douay (founded by Philip II., 1569) and Rome (founded by Gregory, 1579). If, therefore, during the next 20 y. 62 priests were executed, they suffered not for their religious views, but as traitors. But whilst the movements of the Romanists were chiefly political, the opposition of the Puritans was based in religious considerations (see Puritans).—(Sources: Statutes of the Realm, III., IV., 1817, &c.; Fox's Martyrology; BURNET's History of the Reformation, &c., 1679; STRYPE's Eccl. Memorials, &c., 1721, and Annals of the Reformation, 1725; HENRY SOAME's Hist. of the Ref., &c., 1825, &c.; J. BLUNT, Sketch of the Ref. in England, 1832; TURNER, Hist. of England, 1839; G. WEBER, Gesch. d. akatholischen Kirchen u. Sekten in Grossbrit., 1845–53; J. COLLIER, An Ec. Hist. of Gr. Britain, 1708; LINGARD, Hist. of Engl., 1819, &c. C. SCHÖLL.*

England, Church statistics of.—The census of the 30th and 31st of March, 1851, in other respects full and reliable, fails to give the number of members belonging to the different denominations. This defect, however, may be partly supplied from the statistics of church-attendance. Assuming that $\frac{1}{2}$ the afternoon and $\frac{1}{2}$ the evening attendance should be added to that of the morning, we may obtain a pretty accurate result. Others suppose the membership to be $\frac{2}{3}$ the whole attendance. These calculations must further be compared with the number of communicants, &c., given in the course of the article.—The population of Great Britain in 1851 was 27,557,313: that of England and Wales 17,927,609; the smaller islands 143,126; Scotland 2,870,784; Ireland 6,615,794.

CHURCH STATISTICS OF ENGLAND AND WALES IN MARCH, 1851.

Names of Churches and Sects.	Places of Worship.	Accommodation.	Attendants.
CHURCH OF ENGLAND.....	14,077	5,317,915	3,773,474
Other Chs. and Sects.
METHODISTS
Wesleyans.
Original Connexion.....	6,579	1,447,580	907,313
New Connexion.....	297	96,964	61,319
Primit. Methodists.....	2,871	414,430	260,555
Bible Christians.....	482	66,832	38,612
Wesl. Meth.-Assoc.....	419	98,813	56,430
Independent Method....	20	2,263	1,659
Wesl. Reformers.....	339	67,814	53,494
Calvinistic Methodists.
Welsh Methodists.....	828	211,951	151,046
Huntingdon Soc.....	109	38,727	29,679
INDEPENDENTS OR CONGREGATIONALISTS.....	3,244	1,063,136	793,142
BAPTISTS
General B. (Arminian)	93	20,539	12,323
" " New Soc....	182	52,604	40,027
Partic. B. (Calvinistic)	1,947	582,953	471,283
Seventh-Day B.....	2	390	52
Scotch B.....	15	2,547	1,246
Miscellaneous.....	550	93,316	63,047
SCOTCH PRESBYTERIANS..	160	86,692	60,131
Church of Scotland....	18	13,789	8,712
United Pres. Church...	66	31,351	23,207
Presb. C. in England..	76	41,552	28,212
UNITARIANS.....	229	68,554	37,156
MORAVIANS.....	32	9,301	7,364
FRIENDS.....	371	91,599	18,172
PLYMOUTH BRETHREN....	132	18,529	10,414
SANDENIANS.....	6	956	587
SWEDENBORGIANS.....	50	12,107	7,082
IRVINGITES.....	32	7,437	4,908
SMALLER SECTS.....	539	104,481	63,572
ROMAN CATHOLICS.....	570	186,111	305,393
MORMONS.....	222	30,783	18,800
Foreign Churches.
Lutheran.....	5	2,406	1,184
Reformed.....	1	200	140
German Catholics.....	1	300	567
Swede Luth. C.....	1	20	100
Reformed Dutch.....	1	350	70
French Protestants.....	3	560	291
Italian Reformers.....	1	150	21
Greek Church.....	3	291	240
JEWS.....	53	8,438	4,150
Total.....	34,536	10,225,558	7,267,694

From the above (deducting 21,673 superfluous seats from the number given for the C. of England) the proportion of the Episcopalians to the rest is, as 51.9 to 48.1, and that of attendants as 52 to 48. Of this last number 21 per cent. are Methodists, 11 Independents, 8 Baptists, 4 Roman Catholics, and 4 all others. Taking the entire population, the proportion of attendants gives 21 per cent. Episcopalians, all others 19.5. But as it is pretty certain that 58 per cent. might attend church at one time, we get 17.5 per cent. of non-attendants. But the above table gives only the regular attendants, exclusive of children, sick persons, and others necessarily detained, making 42 per cent. of the population, 15.2 of which may be put down as Episcopalians, 14.1 as Dissenters, and 12.7 as non-attending. Thus we get a population of 6½ millions for the first; 6 millions for the second; and nearly 5½ millions for the last class. But this non-attending class must, in the widest sense, be included in the National Church, which nominally extends to all who are not Dissenters.

The table given below¹ shows the rapid increase of the Free Churches from 1801 to 1851. But although the number of church buildings has so greatly increased, the present accommodations are far too limited. The deficiency is greatest in large cities, especially in London, where, in no less than 28 parishes, there is not church-room for 30 per cent. of the population. The comparative church accommodation of the National and other churches in the different parts of the country is as follows, for 1851:

Locality.	Popul'n. in 1851.	National Church.	Wesleyans.	Inde. and A.	Baptists.	Rom. Cath.	Total.
City Districts.	9,229,120	1,295,729	895,375	154,729	318,015	116,116	2,780,964
Country "	13,696,469	2,766,613	1,297,926	613,001	434,354	67,915	5,179,739

The Nat. C. preponderates in the southern part of England, excepting in Bedfordshire, Monmouthshire, and Cornwall. In Wales not $\frac{1}{4}$ of the population are Episcopalians. The Wesleyans predominate in Cornwall, York, Derby, and Nottingham. The Independents in Wales, Essex, Dorset, Monmouth, and Suffolk. The Baptists in S. Wales, Huntingdon, Bedford, Northampton, Leicester, and Buckingham.—The following difference exists in church-attendance in city and country:

Locality and Chs.	Morning.	Afternoon.	Evening.	Pr. c. of pop.
				A.M.	P.M.	Ev'g.
City Districts....	2,202,943	970,140	4,900,329
Country "	2,444,539	1,213,995	6,205,737
National C.....	2,541,244	1,890,764	860,543	23.9	10.5	15.3
Wesleyans.....	707,921	645,895	1,063,537	23.9	25.5	19.8
Independent....	524,612	232,285	457,162
Baptist.....	360,806	224,268	345,115
Roman Catholic	252,783	53,967	76,880

From this general review we proceed to notice the principal denominations separately.

I. THE NATIONAL CHURCH is divided into 28 bishoprics, of which 21 belong to the province of Canterbury, population 12,785,048, and 7 to that of York, pop. 5,285,687. In England and Wales there are 11,728 benefices, of which 1144 are held by the Crown, 1853 by the Bishops, 938 by the cathedral clergy and other dignitaries, 770 by Universities, 931 by the clergy of the parent church, and 6092 by private persons. In 1841, when there were 10,987 parishes, 3736 clergymen were absent; viz., 1853 as pluralists (though 401 in service), 917 by permission, and 961 without. — In 1854 there were about 18,000 clergymen, some engaged as teachers, about $\frac{1}{3}$ as assistants, and $\frac{1}{3}$ of these supply the place of sinecurists. — The Church revenues amount to more than 5 millions of pounds, the Episcopal income alone having reached, in 1851, £282,936. The revenues are very unequally divided; whilst the six wealthiest dioceses yielded £143,000, there were,

Yr.	Popul'n.	National C.		Wesleyans.		Independents.		Baptists.
		Ch'ns.	Seats.	Ch'ns.	Seats.	Ch'ns.	Seats.	Ch'ns.	Seats.
1801.	8,490,536	11,379	1,289,883	825	165,000	91	39,791	652	176,692
1811	10,161,256	11,441	1,314,388	1,485	296,100	1,140	373,920	819	232,516
1821	12,100,236	11,558	1,357,386	2,748	519,600	1,478	484,784	1,170	317,070
1831	13,896,797	11,783	1,481,591	4,622	924,400	1,999	615,672	1,613	437,129
1841	15,914,145	12,868	1,755,836	7,919	1,563,800	2,606	851,765	2,174	599,154
1851	17,927,609	14,077	2,317,915	11,007	2,194,286	3,244	1,067,700	2,780	732,343 in 1853, 3528 parishes yielding less than £150 annually.

II. THE METHODISTS.—1) Wesleyans.—a) The W. Meth. Connexion was founded in 1739. The classes form the groundwork of its organism, each class consisting of about 12 members, and meeting weekly under a leader. Several classes form a congregation, with one or more local preachers, (laymen). About 15 congregations form a circuit, having from 1 to 4 preachers, appointed usually for 3 years, one of whom is superintendent; these preach alternately in the chapels of the circuit, and administer the sacraments,—using the Common Prayer Book. From 2 to 20, or more, circuits form a district, in which regular meetings are held under a presiding officer, who statedly reports to the highest court, the Conference. This consists, according to law, of 109 members, exclusively ministers, and fills its own vacancies from the clergy. At the annual meetings of the Conference, other clergy of the Church may speak and vote; but all decisions must be confirmed by the 100 legal members, who govern the Church. Standing committees are appointed, partly of laymen, to manage the various affairs of the connexion. The Conference annually elects a president.—In July, 1854, the connexion numbered in Great Britain 264,168 communicants, 32 districts, 428 circuits, and about 915 clergymen; in Ireland, 19,608 members, with 160 clergymen, and in other countries 94,520 members, with 356 clergymen. United with the British Conference are the congregations in Canada, with 264 clergymen and 36,323 members; and in France 1098 members, with 25 clergymen. The local preachers are reckoned at 15,000; they receive no pay.—The connexion has 2 theol. seminaries, at Richmond and Didsbury (near Manchester), with 55 students, 3 schools for educating the sons of ministers (New-Kingswood, Woodhouse-Grove, and Bath), a Normal Training Institution, Westminster, with 100 students (of which 40 are young women), 326 day schools with 39,216 pupils, and 4084 Sunday-schools, with nearly 400,000 children.—In the foreign missionary field they have 367 principal circuits, with 3116 stations, 507 missionaries, 703 catechists, &c., 8779 local preachers and Sunday-school teachers, 110,000 communicants, and about 5000 catechumens, 844 day, and 879 Sunday-schools, with 79,000 scholars. The contributions to missions amount to £114,498.—The income of the Church is derived from the weekly payments, in the classes, of the members. In 1854 about £230,000 besides were paid for chapels, schools, &c.

b) Other Wesleyan connexions. Soon after Wesley's death divisions arose because many were dissatisfied with the unlimited power of the Conference. (1) The New Connexion, 1797, which gives laymen equal rights with ministers in governing the church; (2) The Primitive Methodists 1810; (3) The Wesleyan Reformers, 1849, which sect has drawn 50,000 communicants from the parent connexion, and is gaining ground. Another split occurred in 1834, from opposition to the founding of a theol. seminary. Those clergymen driven off on this account formed themselves into (4) the West. Method. Association, which gives laymen part in the eccl. government. (5) The Bible Christians, started 1815 by O'Bryan, a local preacher. They are found chiefly in Devonshire, and Cornwall.

STATISTICS OF JULY, 1854, OF THESE SMALLER BRANCHES.

Countries	Chapels & Stations	Circuit Preachers	Local Preachers	Missionaries	Members	S. Schools	Teachers	Scholars
(1) England.	291	87	820		16,001	280	7,199	44,515
Ireland...	116		11	11	674	10	114	877
Canada...	468		79	51	4,466	87	457	2,997
(2)	5,220	583	9,834		107,913	1,550	22,934	123,341
(3)	1,468		2,963		49,082	779	13,673	80,000
(4)	480	93	1,017		18,373	294	6,603	40,328
(5)	482	62	1,249	88	16,614		4,046	17,167

2) Calvinistic Methodists.—The Whitefield Methodists gradually became Independents, those of the Lady Huntingdon Connexion alone excepted; but of late years Congregational principles gained ground among these also. The seminary in Cheshunt numbers 20 students.

The Welsh Methodists have been formed into a separate connexion since 1811. Each county constitutes a circuit, the ministers and class-leaders of which meet monthly for counsel. Their quarterly meetings answer to the "Conference." They have 2 theological seminaries, in Bala and Trevecca. In 1853 they had 207 ministers, 234 local preachers, and 58,577 communicants.

III. THE INDEPENDENTS (Congregationalists) notwithstanding their avowal of independency, have various unions among themselves. The largest, "The Congregational Union," composed of the clergy and lay representatives of the congregations, has charge of "The British Missions:" a) The Home Mission Society (since 1819) with 51 missionaries, 63 assistants, 154 lay-preachers, 130 chapels, 34,801 hearers, 4865 communicants, 172 Sunday-schools, 13,171 scholars. b) The Irish Evang. Soc. has 21 stations. c) The Colonial Miss. Soc. supports about 60 ministers. This Union also has a Board of Education, to establish and aid schools, and assist young persons in acquiring an education.—Another Union of clergy in and around London was started as early as 1729; but in 1848 many of these separated and formed the "Independent Union," for the defence of Congregational principles.—For the protection of the civil rights of Dissenters a society of "Dissenting Delegates" has existed since 1732.—In the Congregational school, founded 1811, the sons of ministers are educated.—They have 8 theol. seminaries: in Plymouth, 1752; Rotherham, 1756; Airedale, 1794; Hackney, 1803; Manchester, 1806; Brecon, 1838; Birmingham, 1838; and St. Johnswood, 1850,—with 161 students. University College, London, is under their auspices.—The London Soc. for Foreign Miss. was founded in 1795, its income in 1854 was £76,781. It has 167 missionaries, and more than 600 native catechists, &c.—In 1854 the Independents had, in Great Britain and Ireland, 2140 congr., in the colonies 120, and in all 2320 ministers and missionaries.

IV. THE BAPTISTS also, although professedly Congregational, have "The B. Union of Great Britain and Ireland," comprising, 1854, 35 associations with 1158 churches, 102,815 members, 561 village stations, and Sunday-schools with 108,056 children. The whole number of their churches on the British isles was 1925. The B. Home Miss. Soc. (founded 1797) has 144 stations, 4475 members, and 7255 Sunday-school scholars. In Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, and Sweden, they have 338 stations, and 4600 members. An Irish mission exists since 1814.—To the Union belong General and Particular Baptists. Both unite in the Home and Irish mission, and also in sustaining the Bible Society, founded 1840 (the annual income about £2,157); but they have separate seminaries and For. Missions.—The Calvinistic B. Miss. Soc. (founded 1792) has 385 missionaries, catechists, &c., and 4956 members; the "Western Union" (Jamaica) 18,000. Its income, 1854, £24,759.—The "Particular B." have 5 seminaries at Bristol, founded 1770; Horton, 1804; Pontypool, 1807; Stepney, 1810; and Haverford, 1841,—with 93 students.—The "New Soc. of the General B." founded 1769, had in 1854, in England, 18-244 members, 25,492 Sunday-school scholars, and 300 members in 4 mission churches. In its seminary, Leicester, there are 10 students.

V. ROMAN CATHOLICS.¹—England is divided into 12 bishoprics under the Archb. of Westminster. They are most numerous in Lancashire, being $\frac{1}{4}$ of its population, and comprising $\frac{2}{3}$ of all the Rom. Cath. in England; then in London, Warwickshire, and Staffordshire. Of the 92 monasteries 75 are nunneries.

VI. THE SMALL SECTS.—1) Mixed, including 128 congregations. The mixture consists chiefly of Independents and Baptists; but there are various other combinations, as of Methodists, Baptists, Independents, Presbyterians, &c.—2) Sects of one-sided tendencies (mostly Calvinistic), such as Supralapsarians, Universalists, Predestinarians, Millenarians, &c., about 7 varieties with 92 congregations. 3) Orthodox Societies, belonging to no particular Church or sect, and assuming some general name. There are about 198 congregations of such. 4) Thirteen other sects, such as Southcottians, Agapemonists, Christian Israelites, Rational Progressives, &c.—5) Separate Mission congregations, connected with the London city Mission, &c., in all 48.

The contributions to the several religious societies, for 1854 were:—Bible Soc., £230,616; For. Miss. £444,007; Home Miss., £166,867; Irish Miss., £42,147; Educat. Soc., £78,512; Benev. Soc., £132,904; Miscell., £24,463.—Total, £1,109,376. C. SCHÖLL.*

English Versions of the Bible.—Anglo-Saxon literature is rich in paraphrases and translations of portions of the S.S. The first attempt at translation was made by Bede, who,

Year.	Churches.	Priests.	Colleges.	Monastic Houses.	Members.	Schools.
1780	200	(9,367	...
1830	392
1841	468	667	...	17
1851	583	824	...	68	305,393	...
1854	781	1,309	11	92	132

according to Cuthbert, his pupil, finished the Gospel of John on his deathbed; this is lost. Several interlinear-glosses followed this, one on the Psalms (8th cent.; ed. Thorpe); two on the Gospels, one in the "Durham-book" (MS. in Brit. Mus., D. IV.); another, the "Beeshworth-glosse" (Bodl. Libr. D. 24. N. 3964); both of the 9th cent., and all in the Northumbr. dialect. King Alfred is said to have begun a transl. of the Psalms. In the 10th cent. Aelfric, the monk, transl. the Heptateuch and portions of the other histor. books, and of Job; often, however, he gave only the contents. The Gospel cod., 140. Corp. Chr. Camb. of the 11th cent. is also a gloss, departing often from the Vulgate; it is probably a copy of an older work. Finally the Gospels, Jun. I., Bodl. Libr.—We have several metrical paraphrases of the transition-period from the Saxon to the more modern English, as the "Ormulum" and a revision of the Psalms, but in prose, only a version of the Psalms by Rolle, a monk of Hampole († 1349), the Gospels of Mark and Luke, and Paul's Epistles (No. 32, Corp. Chr. Camb.), and the gospel pericopes (MS. Harl. 5085).

John Wycliffe (b. 1324, † 1384) was the first to appreciate the infinite value of the Bible, not only as the rule of faith, but for popular use. He made a transl. from the Vulgate with the use of existing helps, which however is so literal that the sense is often obscure, and the idiom violated. As he studied simplicity of style his book spread rapidly. His N. T. was publ. 1731 and 1810.—The Reformation called forth a new version. Unlike the German version it required many laborers during a period of 90 years, to produce one which was generally received.—William Tyndale made the beginning. He was probably born in Gloucestershire, and studied at Oxford, just when the Greek Testament of Erasmus appeared, which he read there and then at Cambridge with Bilney and Frith. Afterwards appointed chaplain and tutor in the house of Sir John Walsh, Gloucestershire, he began the transl. of the N. T. For greater security he went to London, and enjoyed the hospitality of Alderman Monmouth; thence to Hamburg and Cologne. But he first found safety in Wittenberg, and there publ., 1526, his N. T. Its circulation in England was strictly prohibited. Sir Thos. More violently assailed it. It was publicly burned. And yet it spread so rapidly that in four years five editions were sold. T. returned to Hamburg and joined Coverdale in translating the Pentateuch. C. became acquainted in Cambridge with the N. T. of Erasmus, was led by Bilney to embrace Reformed principles, and for these forsook his home. Tyndale soon left Hamburg for Antwerp, where, aided by Frith, he secretly prosecuted his work. Whilst there his enemies seized him, imprisoned him in Vilvoord, near Brussels, and burned him Oct. 6, 1536. T.'s version is faithful and clear, and forms the basis of all subsequent ones, which are properly mere revisions of it.—In 1535 Coverdale finished his transl. of the O. T., making use of five older versions (German) besides the Vulgate and original text. It was admitted into England.—In 1537 "Matthew's Bible" was publ. by royal permission, probably by Rogers, Tyndale's friend, who added a preface and notes. It contained Tyndale's transl. with slight changes, the lacking parts supplied from Coverdale's. C. publ., 1538, an improved version of the N. T., with the Vulgate, which C. followed only too closely; he also publ. paraphrases of some Psalms, with tunes, the first attempt of this kind. Matthew's Bible was well received by the people, but regarded suspiciously by the clergy on account of its preface and notes. The clergy desired a new version. At Cromwell's suggestion Coverdale began a revised ed. without notes at Paris, and finished it in London, 1539. It was styled the "Great Bible," also Cranmer's Bible because he added a preface to the 2d improved ed. of 1540. But papists were not satisfied. They wished a version which closely adhered to the Vulgate. The Convocation passed a resolution to this effect in 1542, but it was never carried out; meanwhile the general use of the Bible was greatly restricted.—Under Edward VI. the Great Bible was the authorized version, though others were used. Mary's elevation drove the Reformed to the Continent. In Geneva, 1557, a version of the N. T. appeared (probably by Wittingham, an English clergyman) in which first, words not in the original were enclosed in brackets, and the division into verses copied from Stephen's Greek N. T. It mainly follows Cranmer's Bible, but has many new transl., and practical notes in the Calvinistic spirit. The "Geneva Bible," with the last named N. T. revised, was publ. by Coverdale, Wittingham, Gilby, and others, in 1560. This version of the O. T. is more original than any after Coverdale's Bible, and is furnished with notes. The people highly prized it, and even Parker acknowledged its merits, though on account of its Calvinistic source he could not favor it. He therefore projected a new version of the Great Bible. He distributed the work in 14 parts among learned theologians, mostly bishops, for examination; each one returned his part signed with his initials. Parker himself edited it, with a preface and notes, in 1568; it was styled the "Bishops' Bible." The "Great Bible" is closely followed, with an occasional use of the Geneva version, and the omission of the Vulgate's additions. The persons engaged on it were Davies, B. of St. David's; Sandys, afterwards Archb. of York; Horne, B. of Winchester; Bentham, B. of Coventry; Grindal, afterwards Archb. of Canterbury, Parkhurst, B. of Norwich; Cox, of Ely, and some others. It was read in the churches, but never spread among the people. The struggle between the Romish and Reformed parties extended to a transl. of the S. S.; they kept apart until the last revision. Before this was undertaken the Romish fugitives, William Allen and others, transl. the N. T., 1578, at Rheims. The entire Bible, transl. from the revised Vulgate of 1592, appeared at Douay in 1610.

The chief mover of a new revision was Dr. Reynolds, of Corp. Chr. Coll., Oxford, and leader of the Puritans. He advocated it at a conference in Hampton Court, 1604. King James approved the measure, and appointed a commission of 54 members, in six parties, to each of which a portion was assigned. Each member was separately to revise the portion assigned to his company; then the party was to meet, compare results and report to the other parties. Difficult points, and the final revision of the whole, were to be submitted to a general conference, composed of the chairman of the parties and three or four professors of theology, the Vice-Chancellor presiding. The list of revisors (of whom there were actually but 47) has been preserved, as well as the portions prepared by each.—The 1st party of 10 members sat in Westminster, revised from Gen.—2 Kings. Their chairman was Dr. L. Andrews, Dean of Westminster, a noted linguist, co-laborer of the learned Spaniard, Dr. de Savaria, previously professor in Leyden:—2d, of 8 in Cambridge, rev. Chron. to Canticles, chairman, Prof. Lively. The rabbinical scholar, Dr. Chaderton, belonged to this party; 3d, of 7 in Oxford, rev. the Prophets, Dr. Harding, chairman, and Dr. Reynolds, &c., members; 4th, of 8 in Oxford, rev. the Gospels and Acts, Prof. Revel, chairman; 5th, of 7 in Westminster, rev. Romans to Revelation, consisted of Barlowe, Hutchinson, &c.; 6th, of 7 in Cambridge, rev. the Apocrypha, members, Dr. Duport, J. Bois, &c. The King gave strict instructions for the revision. The Bishops' Bible should be the basis, and varied from only when the original demanded it; words of divers significations to be used in the patristic sense; the previous division into chapters to be retained if possible; no marginal notes excepting as various readings; and marginal references to parallels. The work was probably done during 1604–7, but the Bible, with a dedication to King James and an introduction, was not publ. and authorized until 1611. It was generally well received, but the other versions were only gradually supplanted; in the Common Prayer the Gospels and Epp. of the Bishops' Bible, and the Psalms of Cranmer's, are retained.—An accurate revision of King James' Bible was made by Dr. Blayney, 1769, and contains some improvements. But the excellence of the standard version is almost universally admitted.—(See BAGSTER's Hexapla; "Our Engl. B.," by the author of the Introd. to 2d ed. of Bagster's Hex., publ. by Lond. Rel. Tr. Soc., and Amer. S. S. Union; LEWIS, Hist. of Translations; Anderson's "Annals of the Bible," London.

C. SCHÖLL.*

Enkratites, 'Εγκρατῆς, 'Εγκραταῖται, continentes—the name of one or more Gnostic sects, or rather of a wide-spread Gnostic-ascetic tendency in the early Church. Their founders were Saturnin, Marcion, particularly Tatian (see Arts.). According to Epiphanius and others, they were a specific party, and regarded marriage as a φθορά καὶ πορνεία, abstained from meat (ἐμψύχα), wine, and spirituous liquors, and as they used water in the communion, were called ὑπονασταταῖται, aquarii. The name, however, does not denote so much any special founder or sect as that tendency of Gnosticism which sought to spiritualize life by sundering it from matter as the principle of evil, or that form of strict asceticism which vested itself in Gnostic-dualistic theories, and in practice went far beyond the asceticism recognized and encouraged by the Church. Individual societies of such continentes may have existed in the form of the later monastic orders, and as the heads of such, perhaps, are to be regarded, e. g., Tatian, the Docetic Julianus Cassianus, and Severus. In the 12th cent., to denote and condemn the Bogomiles, the names of ancient heresies were used, amongst them Enkratites (Euthym. Zigab. Ἐκκραῖτες καὶ Σπριαμβοῖτες). See Church Hist. and Daniel's Tatian, 1837.

WAGENMANN.—Ermentrout.

Ennodius, Magnus Felix, B. of Ticinum (Pavia), b. 473, at Arles, or Milan, of a poor but eminent Gallic family, was early left as an orphan to the care of an aunt in Milan, who furnished him with his first instructions. After her death, 489, he married a woman of wealth, but ere long a dangerous sickness led him to consecrate himself to a holy life, should he recover. Restored to health he became an ecclesiastic, his wife a nun. In 494 he accompanied B. Epiphanius of Pavia on his Burgundy mission; in 502 wrote in vindication of Pope Symmachus against Laurentius. He was the first who, in his letters, addressed the B. of Rome as papa, and was zealous for the Papal supremacy. In 510 or 511 he succeeded Maximus as B. of Pavia, then was sent by Pope Hormisdas on two missions (1515, 1517) to Emp. Anastasius of Constantinople with reference to the preservation of union between the E. and W. Churches. In both he failed; the second time he and his companion, B. Peregrinus, were even sent out of the country. He died 521. The following writings, by E., have been preserved: 1) several poems, composed before his conversion; 2) a fulsome eulogy upon King Theodorick; 3) Letters, in 9 books, mostly about private affairs, and of little historical value. From Ep. 19, B. II. we discover that he was a Semipelagian, in decided opposition to Augustine's doctrine that since the fall man is only free to do evil; 4) libellus adv. eos, qui contra Symmachum scribere præsumerunt, or briefly: lib. apolog. pro Synodo IV. Rom., and by J. v. Trittenheim: de fide cath. ad Symm. papam; 5) biogr. of Epiph. B. of Pavia, and of Antony, Monk of Lerina—both fulsome and legendary; 6) Eucharisticon de vita, furnishing hints of his own life before his conversion, the title is by Sirmond; 7) Parænesis didascalica, to youth; 8) Præceptum, a diocesan address; 9) Petitorium, touching the liberation of a slave; 10) Dictiones, 28, on various subjects (some in DURAND, Coll. Mon., V., 61). The 1st ed. of E's works was publ. Basel, 1569; far better that of Schott, Tournay, 1610; the best, Sirmond's, Paris, 1611 (also in S.'s collected works, Par., 1696, Ven., 1728).—(See Hist. littér. de la France, III., 9639; FABRICII, bibl. lat. II., 100; DUPIN, nouvelle bibl. des auteurs eccl., V., 12; SCHRÖCKH, K.-Gesch., 17, 204; WIGGERS, Augustinism. u. Pelagianism., II., 356; BÄHR, d. chr. röm. Theologie, 1837, p. 406).

HERZOG.*

Enthusiasm, fanatical inspiration, from ἔνθεος, filled with a divinity—as Apollo, the god of prophecy. In this sense it must be distinguished from true inspiration (see Art.). And yet we may notice points of contact between them, in defining the two conceptions. Inspiration, as such, is a moral power of vast bonds of selfishness, and the free expansion of the heart and soul; an excitement and elevation of the world of feeling; a self-surrender of soul and body. Hence 2) a surrender to a higher power, a rising above the mere material and tangible. It presupposes, therefore, the presence of an operative, impelling idea, not in the form of an abstract philosophical thought, but in a concrete form; something ideal, yet in such a form (of a person, object, or principle) as sets it definitely before the consciousness. Thus there may be an enth. for art, for one's country, for the temperance movement, &c., &c.; and this again will be likely to attach itself to some leader, as the personal representative of the object of the enthusiasm. For 3) such an operative idea will inflare not one mind only, but many, who may be related, nationally, or may sympathize with each other on some other ground. For not only in religion, but in art, politics, &c., enthusiasm spreads from some given point, kindles a common flame in many breasts, and unites them for a common end. It must, consequently, be acknowledged as a great ethical, moral power, which has sprung up in important epochs of the world's history, and wrought wonderful changes in the life of nations: as in the Crusades, the Reformation, and in mighty political movements. An age of enthusiasm is always a great age. But viewed more closely there is a difference between inspiration and enthusiasm, which we have intimated by the term fanatical. 1) as a surrender of self, a being carried away by some ruling idea,—as the "pathos" of passion—enthusiasm is ever prone to overleap all limits of internal and external feasibility, to disregard them, to break through all conditions of time and locality,—and by violence to force events. This may secure temporary success, but no enduring results. 2) It is one-sided, and fails to take comprehensive views of principles and means. Its sphere of life is feeling, and feeling unrestrained by law. Hence its affinity to fanaticism (see Art.). 3) It lacks firmness of will, is transient; in special matters it is dilettantic, in an age it moves by bounds. If one or two sudden and violent assaults fail, its spirit flags, and it yields. The electric idea which ignited it, exhausts itself, and the flame dies out. The men who eagerly rallied around the uplifted standard scatter, and desert it. Enthusiasm is like a fire kindled with straw; inspiration like the genial illumining light of the sun. But there are differences in enthusiasm as such. There is a genuine and a fictional enthusiasm. The former shows its genuineness in its grounds and in its operations. It rests upon a real tangible idea, which is its justification, an idea the significance of which constitutes its claim to sympathy, and thus to personal support. The latter, when it is excited artificially by one of whom it has not, itself, taken full possession, but who seeks by it to use others for purely selfish ends. The more genuine enthusiasm is, the more enduring; empty, artificial enthusiasm soon vanishes in smoke. It may likewise be distinguished as pure and impure, and equally in regard to its source, means, and aim. It is impure in its source when the impelling motive, whether in involves, 1) the breaking of the

the mind in which it originated, or in those who take up and disseminate it, lacks moral force, and is the product of a selfishness which believes in no idea, and cannot appreciate ideal worth, or of caprice and folly, which delight in starting new things. Thus the idea may be objectively good, but is subjectively without moral power, as recently in the case of German Catholicism. The motive idea must be something positive, not a mere negation, which collects only such as are opposed to something existing, but have no definite conception of what they really wish to secure. E. is impure in its means, when it has no faith in the inherent power of its idea, and therefore employs extraneous, foreign means—as in the European revolution of 1848. It is impure in its aim, when it does not contemplate the welfare of mankind, not even that of those immediately enlisted in its service, but employs them merely in suberviency to its own projects. Thus, at different periods, enthusiasm has scandalized religion, by using it to further the purposes of a hierarchy, caesareopapy, or sectarianism. Pure enthusiasm, on the contrary, makes self a sacrifice to truth, and the good of the world. Its motto is, "one for all."

CARL BECK.*

Epaon.—In order to correct abuses that had crept into the Catholic Church of Burgundy, and to attend to its government in general, Viventius, Archbishop of Lyons, and Avitus, Bishop of Vienne, convened a Council of the Burgundian clergy on 6th Sept., 517, at Epaon. The 24 bishops who had obeyed the summons, soon finished their deliberations, and on 14th Sept., 517, put their names to the memorial they had drawn up "under Divine inspiration." In 40 canons they fixed the relations which should subsist between bishops, clergy, monks, private persons, the state and heretics, and made regulations touching Church property and discipline. Worthy of note are the rules concerning the Arians of Burgundy, c. 15, 16, 29, 33, which forbid the clergy to take a meal with heretics. A layman dare not dine with a Jew under penalty of being never invited to sit at table with a Catholic priest. If sick unto death, and he desire it, a priest can administer the sacrament to a heretic; if well, he must have recourse to a bishop. Though the King Siegmund had a short time previous to the Council joined the Catholic Church, its proceedings were not adapted to conciliate his Arian subjects, who seemed to be in the majority. Nor was he himself by any means satisfied with the hierarchical temper of the bishops who had presumed to govern the Church without any consultation with himself. Circumstances afforded him an opportunity for venting his displeasure. The 30th canon forbade marriage between relations; also that with the sister of a deceased wife. Stephanus, an esteemed and powerful courtier, had married his sister-in-law, and still retained his position. The Council, dreading the vengeance of the King, hurriedly closed its sittings. Eleven of the assembled bishops, however, retired to Lyons, and under the presidency of Viventius, re-affirmed the condemnation of Stephanus and Palladia, pronounced it against all guilty of the same sin, and pledged each other a mutual support in the event of persecution. And in case the King separated himself from the Church, they would retire to cloisters, and remain there until their prayers had reduced him again to allegiance. Against any bishop who would discharge their functions whilst absent, excommunication was pronounced by 4th canon. The same punishment was visited by 5th canon on any one who might be consecrated to fill their places. The 6th canon, however, declared that the King should be obeyed, and that Stephanus and Palladia should be allowed to pray at holy places until after the reading of the Gospel. In the end Siegmund became their pliant and obedient servant. Though the freedom of the Burgundian Church passed away with the incorporation of Burgundy with France, 13 of the canons of Epaon were included in the 24 can. added to the 47 adopted by the Council of Agde (506). The following can. correspond with each other: Epaon, can. 4 = Agath, can. 55; Ep. c. 6 = Ag. c. 52; Ep. c. 7 = Ag. c. 53; Ep. c. 8 = Ag. c. 54 and 56; Ep. c. 9 = Ag. c. 57; Ep. c. 10 = Ag. c. 58; Ep. c. 17 = Ag. c. 51; Ep. c. 18 = Ag. c. 59; Ep. c. 29 = Ag. c. 60; Ep. c. 30 = Ag. c. 61; Ep. c. 34 = Ag. c. 62; Ep. c. 35 = Ag. c. 63. For many centuries attempts have been made to determine what town is meant by Epaon, there being no longer a place by that name. It is certain that it denotes some town in the kingdom of Burgundy. Claudius Castellanus, as early as 519, contended that by Epaon was meant the small Savoyan town Yenne or Hyenne, on the left bank of the Rhone, opposite Beley. Ukert (Geography of Greeks and Romans, II., 7: 454) thinks that Etanna named on the second Peutinger table as on the right bank of the Rhone, is the present Yenne. According to Chorier (histoire générale de Dauphiné, pp. 583–586), it is the little town Ponas, situate between Vienne and Lyons, and in the Mémoires de Trevoux (Fevr., 1715), mention is made of an Epaona sine Tortilianum, near to Vienne.—Comp. MANSI, Collectio Conciliorum, T. VIII., 319–342, 347–372, 555–574; LABBE, Dissertatio philosophica de Concilio Epauensi; J. J. CHIFFLET, Dissertatio de loco legitimo Concilii Epauensis.

ALBRECHT VOGEL.—Ermentrout.

Epaphras, born in Colosse (Col. 4: 12), member of the Church there, teacher and deacon (διακονος). Welte, in his Church Lexicon, gives no proof for the assertion that he was the founder of this congregation; it is more probable from Col. 2: 5 (ἀνεμι), and 1: 7 (χαί), that Paul established it, either after his first journey from Ephesus, Acts 18: 23 (comp. Schneckenburger in Zeller's Jahr Buch, 1850, 3, 313), or during his second sojourn there, 19: 8. This worthy co-worker with Paul (Col. 1: 7; 4: 12), seems to have extended his labors to Laodicea and Hieropolis (Col. 4: 13). Love for the apostle took him to Rome, where Paul was a prisoner, 60–62 A.D. (Col. 2: 1, 5, 8, 18, 20–23; 3: 8, &c.). There he himself was made a prisoner, Philemon v. 23. The Martyrologies mention him as the first Bishop of Colosse, where he died a confessor (see Epaphroditus).

VAHINGER.—Ermentrout.

Epaphroditus, a distinguished Christian and leader of the congregation at Philippi, in Macedonia, called by Paul a co-laborer and an apostle of the Church at Philippi. In order to nurse Paul in his imprisonment, he was despatched to Rome with liberal contributions (Phil. 4: 18). Whilst here he was sick nigh unto death (Phil. 2: 27). To console the Philippians, on his recovery, Paul sent him back with the Epistle bearing this name. From the title "your Apostle," Theodoret supposes that he might have been bishop in Philippi; he was so-called, however, as is most probable, to designate him as an ambassador of the congregation (see John 13: 16; comp. 1 Kings 14: 6).

Grotius and others supposed that, as their names were similar, they were one and the same individual. But the name Epaphrodet was quite common (Tac. Annal. 15, 55; Sueton. Dom. 14; Joseph., vita 76). Besides the one labored in Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierophilus, the other in Philippi and Macedonia. Comp. Epaphras. VAIHINGER.—Ermentrout.

Eparchy, a province, consisting of several districts, and forming part of a diocese. This political division of the Roman empire, to which allusions are found in the Notitia dignitatum et administrationum utriusque imperii of a. 400–404 (ed. Boecking., Bonn. 1839, sq.), was adopted in the organization of the Church. Those having charge of districts became Bishops: those of the eparchies, in their chief towns, Metropolitans; those of the dioceses, Patriarchs. This is apparent from c. 4 of the Council of Nice: τὸ δὲ πῦρος τῶν γινόμενων δίδωσθαι καὶ ἑκάστην ἐπαρχίαν τῷ μητροπολίτῃ, as transl. by Dion. in c. 1, dist. LXIV.: Potestas sane vel confirmatio pertinebit per singulas provincias ad metropolitanum episcopum. Hence the explanation of Macarius of Ancyra (in Suicer, thes. eccl., I., 1159): ἐπαρχία λέγεται ἡ ἑκάστης μητροπόλεως ἐνορία (see Bishopric). This mode of expression so far changed in the later Greek and Russian C. that eparchy was used to designate the episcopal diocese; because the distinction between metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops, disappeared in everything but the title and external rank. (See STRAHL, Gesch. d. russ. K. (Halle, 1830), Th. I., p. 671, &c.). H. F. JACOBSON.

Ephesus, Robber Synod (σύνδος ληστρικὴ, so-called, first by Leo, epist. 95), the name given to the Synod, held Aug., 449, in reference to Eutychianism (see Art.). As its object was particular, although properly œcumenical, it was stricken from the list of regular Church Councils, by the Synod, which afterwards met at Chalcedon. Its spirit and probable results were foreshadowed by the measures taken to bring it to pass. The imperial proclamation, declaring its proper object to be the utter extirpation of the arch-heresy of Nestorianism, and that no one would be allowed to speak, who was not fully satisfied with the Nicene and Ephesian creeds, and ready to submit implicitly to the judgment of the presidents; the order also to arrest all who attempted to agitate anything to the prejudice of the holy faith, and the authority given the president to employ the military to enforce it; the arbitrary exclusion of all who favored the Antiochian form of doctrine, especially of Theodoret, for the undisguised reason that he had spoken against the views of Cyril; on the other hand, the no less objectionable introduction of the fanatical Abbot Barsumas, as the representative of Oriental monasticism: these and other preliminary arrangements, were so many indications that the Synod was not intended to come to an impartial decision as to Eutyches, or to the promotion of truth in any way, but merely to favor the previously concerted intrigues of the ruling court party. The first instance of violence was the attack upon the Bishop of Ephesus, whose soldiers and monks were threatened with death, because he had hospitably entertained the enemies of the Emperor, as those were regarded who favored the Synod of Antioch. Nor was it without significance, that the patriarch Flavianus of Constantinople, in an assembly of perhaps 130 bishops, amongst whom were two legates from the Bishop of Rome, was only admitted to the fifth seat, and took rank after the Bishops of Antioch and Jerusalem. The patriarch Dioscurus of Alexandria was honored with the presidency. He succeeded Cyril in 444, and was a man whose unlicensed ambition was only equalled by his rapacity. Accustomed to look upon Egypt, in a certain sense, as his province, he ordered everything according to his own will and pleasure, and regarded the exclusive prevalence of the Alexandrian doctrines, as the means of promoting his profoundly laid hierarchical plans; and thought everything right that was required for their accomplishment. In entering upon his bishopric, instead of protecting the friends and relatives of his predecessors committed to his care, he robbed them, banished them from the city, and threatened their lives. In the habit himself of trampling upon all law, civil and ecclesiastical, he permitted no free expression of opinion to go unpunished. If, indeed, the charges brought against him by the Synod of Chalcedon were but half true, no one will deny that his proper place would have been at the head of a band of robbers, instead of being one of the dignitaries of the Church. That he might at once place everything at variance with the Alexandrian theory of doctrine in the light of a heresy contradictory of the teachings of the Fathers, he had the address at the opening of the proceedings at Ephesus, to declare that every innovation upon the Nicene and Ephesian creeds, as universally received, or any investigation or discussion of the same, would be inadmissible, inasmuch as it called in question the grace of the Holy Ghost, under whose inspiration the decrees were drawn up. To this piece of trickery the witless assembly paid the tribute of their vociferous approbation. After the citation of Eutyches, one of his petitions was read, in which, after solemnly declaring that he held firmly to the confession adopted at Nice and Ephesus, condemning every heretic from Simon, the magician, down to Nestorius, he earnestly asked for protection and a new investigation. So little did the Synod regard it necessary to maintain the appearance of impartiality, that they did not even allow Eusebius, the Bishop of Dorylaum, the accuser of Eutyches, the hearing he desired. With great dexterity Dioscurus also prevented the communication of Bishop Leo of Rome, verified upon oath, from reaching the Synod. At the reading of the acts of the provincial Synod of Constantinople, in 448, when they came to the acknowledgment of the two natures in Christ after his incarnation, the meeting broke up in the wildest disorder, with the cry: away with Eusebius! burn him alive! as he has divided Christ, so must he be torn into two pieces! (Mansi, VI., 737). Eutyches, recognized as orthodox, according to the Alexandrian confessions, was restored to his office and rank, and with him, the monks of his cloisters, having renewed the professions of their faith, were again received into the communion of the Church. This reaffirmation of the Ephesian decrees had the effect indirectly of establishing the Alexandrian theory of one nature, as the only orthodox view, and of revising the Ephesian canon, that no one should be allowed to teach anything to the contrary, or to change or disturb, in any way, the acknowledged faith. This blow was aimed directly at Flavianus and Eusebius of Dorylaeum, although other distinguished bishops of the East, such as Theoderet, Domnus of Antioch, and Ibas of Edessa, were included in this anathema. The vote was carried by acclamation; the only dissenting voice was that of the Roman deacon, Hilarus, one of the Pope's legates. Flavianus presented an oral and written appeal to the Bishop of Rome, and to another Synod, to be convoked by him in Italy. From first to last Dioscurus controlled the terrified assembly with threats and abuse. When a viva voce vote was not in accordance with his wish, he would call for a show of hands. Many of the members were cowardly enough to retract the confession of the two natures, which they had made at Constantinople, so that the reproach of having falsified the acts was made to rest upon Flavianus (Mansi VI., 637, 688, &c.). Those who ventured to speak after his condemnation, were told: he who does not subscribe, has me for his enemy. After the reading of the sentence, when several bishops rose from their seats, and embracing his knees, begged him not to be guilty of an act of such gross injustice to an innocent man, he furiously repelled them, exclaiming: if his tongue were cut out, he would pronounce no other judgment! Glad of this opportunity he at once proceeded to violence, and called out in a voice of thunder that resounded through the assembly: you are exciting tumult! officers here! This was the signal for the commencement of those disgraceful scenes, which, as long as a sense of justice remains in the human breast, will brand this assembly with the name of the Robber Synod. Behind the soldiery who now entered the church, there rushed in also a crowd of fanatical monks, together with the rabble of the city. A blank sheet of paper was placed before the bishops, and the cry was, cut down every man that speaks of two natures, or that refuses to subscribe. Those who hesitated were abused and locked up in the church. The notaries of the independent bishops were driven from the writing-desks, lest any account of their shameful proceedings should be made public.

The brutality was so great, that Dioscurus knocked Flavianus down, and trampled him with his feet; although at Chalcedon Barsumas was charged with his murder. Hilarus, the Roman deacon, escaped with difficulty, and reached Rome in disguise; having solemnly protested against their decisions as irreconcilable with the Catholic faith, and declaring that they never would receive the sanction of the Apostolic chair. Such substantially was the character and termination of a Synod, of which the Emperor Theodosius II., the Augustus of the Western Empire, willingly imposed upon, perhaps, by a falsified protocol, affirmed that there was nothing in its proceedings contrary to the rule of faith and righteousness, but that as its proper results, it had contributed to general peace and harmony and truth in the Church (Mansi VI. 67). For more information, see Art. Eutychianism. Principal sources: Verhandlungen des chalced. Concils, in MANSI. Bearbeitungen: SCHRÖCKH, Christl. Kirchengesch. XVIII.; NEANDER, Ch. Hist.; ILLGEN's Zeitschr. für d. hist. Theol., 1838, H. I., p. 39. &c. SEMISCH. — Dr. Wolff.

Ephesus, a city of Asia Minor, visited for a short time by the Apostle Paul, in company with Aquila and Priscilla, upon his return from Corinth, during his second missionary tour, Acts 18: 19-21. Aquila and Priscilla remained when Paul left, and were instrumental in the conversion of Apollos. Upon his third journey, the Apostle returned to this place, and continued there two years and three months, teaching first in the synagogue and then in the school of one Tyrannus, and organized a church made up of those who had received John's baptism. The success of the Apostle excited the fears of the Ephesians, that their great goddess, Diana, would be brought into discredit, and led on by Demetrius, a goldsmith, they raised a great tumult, endangering the lives of the Apostle and his companions. Upon leaving the city the Apostle left Timothy behind to guard against impure doctrines (1 Tim. 1: 3), which led to the tradition that Timothy was the first bishop of Ephesus. The Epistle to the Ephesians was written by Paul during his imprisonment, and was transmitted by Tychicus. In the revelations of St. John, Ephesus is one of the churches to which the Apostle addresses himself, and in ch. 2: 1-7, a favorable testimony is borne to its members. According to tradition, John himself, after his return from exile in Patmos, lived and died at a great age in Ephesus, and with Mary, the mother of our Lord, was also buried there. Their graves were still to be found at the time of the Crusades, (see Art. John the Ap.). The city subsequently became the seat of a bishopric, and in the years 431 and 449 two remarkable Synods were held within its walls. The ancient Ephesus, one of the most celebrated cities of Asia Minor, lay upon the bank of the Cayster near the sea, between Smyrna and Miletus (Plin. II., 87). The original inhabitants, according to Strabo, were the Carians and Leleges; Pliny and Step. Byzant. suppose that it was built by the Amazons (according to Mela, 1, 17, and Solin. Polyhist. c. 40, the Amazons only dedicated the temple of Diana), and adduce a number of names by which it was said to have been called. When the Ionians emigrated to Asia Minor, under the command of Androclus, a son of Codrus, they took possession of the city, extended it, and made it the capital of the twelve cities of the province (Strabo, XIV., p. 682, &c.). It was afterwards captured by Croesus (Herod, I, 26), came then under Persian and Grecian rule, and under the Romans was the chief city of Proconsular Asia. After the division of the Roman empire, it fell into the hands of the eastern monarch, and subsequently into those of the Arabs and Turks. In ancient times the city was celebrated for its commerce (Pliny, V., 31, mentions the nations that attended its markets), and still more as the principal seat of the worship of the great goddess, honored by the Grecians under the name of the Ephesian Diana. She is the same with the great Asiatic goddess of nature, Anaitis, whose service was spread over the larger portion of anterior Asia, see HYDE, de rel. vet. Pers., p. 92, &c.; RELANDI, diss. Miscell., p. 118, &c.; CREUZER, Symbolik, II, S. 190; GESENIUS, Mon. Phœnici, p. 155, &c. Her temple at Ephesus was one of the seven wonders of the world. The building of it, to which King Croesus and the cities of Asia Minor contributed, took 220 years. According to the description of it by Pliny, Hist. Nat., XXXIV., 21, its length was 425 feet, and its breadth 220, and was adorned with 127 columns, each 60 feet high. The altar was the work of Praxiteles. This temple was set on fire by Herostratus, the night Alexander the Great was born, for the purpose of perpetuating his name to posterity. To prevent this, the Ephesians decreed that no historian should mention his name, which however was done by Theopompus. It was replaced by a still more magnificent edifice, to the erection of which the Ephesian ladies contributed their ornaments. This temple may also have been rebuilt more than once, at least Pliny, XVI., 79, says that at the seventh reconstruction, the image of the goddess remained unchanged. About the middle of the third century it was at last utterly destroyed by the Goths, (Hist. Aug., p. 178, comp. Gibbon, Hist., cap. X). Small silver images of the temple were made and sold to the worshippers of the goddess, and the apprehension that Paul's preaching might interfere with this traffic led to the uproar excited by the goldsmith, Demetrius. Of the ancient magnificence of the plan, nothing now remains but ruins; even the name is lost; for the village lying north of these ruins is called Ajasoluk, derived probably from ἅγιος θεόλογος, and referring to the Apostle John. The ruins consist of the remains of the great theatre, a circus, several palaces, some relics of the temple, and a few tombstones. See POCOCKE, Descript. of the East; and, more recently, FELLOWS's Journal of Excurs. in Asia Minor.

 ARNOLD.—Dr. Wolff.

Ephod (עִפְדָּן, Sept. ἐπωμίς, Vulgate superhumera, Luth. Leibrock), the cape, a short cloak of the high-priest, worn on his dress, or long gown, during the discharge of official duties, and covered in part with the breast-plate, together with the Urim and Thummim. We have a description of it in Ex. 28:6-11; and 39:2-5. According to this it was made of fine woven linen, inwrought with threads of gold and ornaments of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and consisted of two pieces, which, like a surplice, hung down upon the breast and back. The two pieces were held fast together upon the shoulders with clasps of onyx stones: upon each the names of six of the tribes of Israel were inscribed. Around the waist, the two folds of the Ephod were adjusted by a girdle worked in the same way. Over the Ephod, or short cloak, in front upon the breast, was the official breast-plate, four square and a span long on each side, (עֶפְדָּן Sept. λογίον τῶν κρίσεων, Vulg. rationale judicii), a sort of purse or pocket, similar in workmanship and material to the Ephod, and connected with it at the shoulder pieces by means of small chains of pure gold running through the rings, and fastened at the same time below to the surplice by a blue lace passing through two rings, so as to be secure. Upon the official breast-plate were four rows of precious stones, three in a row, each stone inscribed with the name of one of the twelve tribes of Israel. In front upon the open breast-plate, were the Urim and Thummim, probably two sacred stones of judgment, with which the high-priest prophesied. (Instances, 1 Sam. 10:20, 22; 23:9-12; 30:7). It would seem that this piece of apparel, in the same or similar form, was the official dress in ancient times and amongst the oldest nations. Among the ruins of Persepolis, we meet with the pictures of persons in similar costume. If then the Ephod properly belonged to the priestly apparel, or was used upon festival occasions, it is not surprising that we meet with it made of ordinary material, as used by common priests, 1 Sam. 2:18; 22:18, or that David himself should have worn it in a sacred procession, 2 Sam. 6:14. Inasmuch as in Israel the Ephod was regarded as the official dress of the high-priest, to wear it is frequently spoken of as equivalent to being high-priest, 1 Sam. 2:28; 14:3. Thus too it may have happened, that in the consciousness of the people, they ascribed to it, as was the case with the brazen serpent, a magical operation, and that they made use of imitations of the same in gold and silver in connection with the teraphim as household gods privately for idolatrous worship, as may be seen from the history of Gideon: Jud. 8:27, and Micah: Jud. 17:5, and much later, Hosea 3:4.

VAHINGER.—Dr. Wolff.

Ephräm (the Syr. form of Ephraim), commonly known as Ephräm Syrus, is the most prominent Syrian Church Father of the 4th cent., and at the same time the most distinguished orator and hymnologist. Having a reputation for eminent sanctity, Mar, or as the Maronites pronounce it, Mor (properly Mari), that is, "Lord," was prefixed to his name. He was also called "the pillar of the Church," "the Syrian Prophet," the "persuasive mouth," and as a pious poet, "the harp of the Holy Ghost." In the memoirs written of him there is mixed up much that is traditionary and marvellous. Besides his so-called confessions, and his pretended Testament, extant in the Greek and Armenian languages, we have his full biography in Syriac, which, however, is not fully reliable. In modern times, Hoffmann, Hahn, Credner, von Lengerke, Alsleben, and others, have written concerning him. He was born in Mesopotamia, as he himself says in his commentary upon Genesis. According to Sozomenus, and the Syrian biographer, his birth-place was Nesibis, in the early part of the reign of Constantine the Great, although he lived also at Edessa. His father, it is said, was a pagan priest, who punished his son for conversing with a Christian. Jacob, the Bishop of Nesibis, took the boy under his protection, instructed him, and afterwards appointed him tutor in the school which he had established. It is also said that he accompanied the Bishop to the Council of Nice, which, however, is doubtful. He studied the Scriptures profoundly, and became learned as a theologian. He soon acquired great reputation among his cotemporaries, for his strict orthodoxy, and ascetic devotion. In the year 363, when the Emperor Jovinian surrendered Nesibis to the Persians, Ephräm removed to Roman territory, lived awhile in Amed, his mother's birth-place, and finally settled in Edessa, which then already was regarded as the emporium of Syriac learning. He there became acquainted with the hermits, determined upon a monastic life, and lived as a monk in a cave near the city, where, with prayer and fasting, he employed himself in the study of the Scriptures and writing theological books, frequently preaching repentance to the monks and the people, and opposing most earnestly every form of error and idolatry. In his polemical writings he combated the various forms of pagan worship prevalent in his day, the Chaldaic astrology, as well as the heresies of Bardesanes and Harmonius, of Arius and Sabellius, the Manichaeans and Novatians, Apollinarians, Marcion, &c. We are also told that he established a school at Edessa, which was continued after his death.—At a later period of his life, Ephräm also made a journey to Egypt, where, according to tradition, he spent eight years among the hermits of that country, and wrote several books in the Coptic language. He afterwards went to Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, for the purpose of making the acquaintance of Basilus the Great, who received him with distinguished honor, and ordained him a deacon. According to the Syriac biography, and the testimony of (pseudo)-Amphilochius, their first meeting was marked by the miracle that Ephräm was enabled immediately to speak in the Greek language, and Basilus in the Syriac, and they were capable of conversing without an interpreter. This improbable story is introduced in connection with the more important question, whether Ephräm was at all acquainted with the Greek language, and thus able to read the original text of the New Test., the Septuagint, and the writings of the Greek Fathers. There is a difference of opinion upon this point; and although a knowledge of the Greek was not unusual at that time amongst cultivated Syrians, still we have nothing in the Syriac writings of Ephräm to establish the facts; and just as little to assure us that he had more than a superficial acquaintance with the Hebrew. His residence at Cæsarea was short. He soon returned to the scene of his earlier labors at Edessa, where he died during the reign of the Emperor Valens, according to some in 373, perhaps not before 378.

Ephräm was a copious and very distinguished theological writer. His numerous writings, a part only of which appear in the Syriac original, and other portions in Greek, Latin, and Armenian translations, are most complete as published by Jos. Simon Asseman in the Biblioth. Orientalis, T. I., p. 59–164, and in the Prolegomena of the Roman edition of Ephräm's works. Comp. also HARLESS, Fabric. Biblioth. graec., Vol. VIII., p. 219, &c.

The writings in Greek, yet extant, ascribed to Ephräm, consist chiefly of spiritual discourses, homilies, and tracts, of an exegetic, dogmatic, paraitic, and ascetic character. Of such dissertations, Photius was acquainted with fifty-two, and supposes there were more than a thousand. Sozomen is also of the opinion that he must have written 300 myriads of verses. He mentions his poetic tracts against Bardesanes and Harmonius, and says that his writings in his lifetime already were translated into Greek; a statement confirmed by the testimony of Chrysostom and Jerome. Of the printed writings in Greek there are several that can scarcely be attributed to Ephräm, and others are so much involved in suspicion that their authenticity can only be established by the production of the Syriac original. But few of his writings exist in this original form; more of them have an Arabic translation, made at first from the Greek. We are not, however, with Tzschirner, to infer from this, that Ephräm composed some of his writings in Greek, although one of his paraneses is arranged after the order of the Greek alphabet.

In many of the Eastern churches, as stated by Jerome, several of Ephräm's sermons were read in public worship after the Scripture lessons. The same honor was paid to them in the West, where some of them were, at an early period, translated into Latin, and included in their ancient Homilies (Assem. Proleg., &c.). In the 16th cent., and indeed as early as the 15th cent., smaller collections of Ephräm's discourses were printed in Latin. The first larger collection contained the Latin translations made by Ger. Vossius from Greek manuscripts in the Vatican and other Italian libraries, and published in three folio volumes at Rome, in 1589, 1583, and 1598. It was reprinted in 1603 and 1619 at Cologne, and in 1619 also at Antwerp. In 1709, the first new complete Greek edition, containing 156 discourses, appeared at Oxford under the supervision of Edw. Thwaites. The principal edition, however, is that which appeared at Rome in the year 1732–1746, in six folio vols., under the auspices of the Pope. Clement XI. already had bought up manuscripts for the purpose in the East, although the printing was only commenced by Clement XII., and was carried on chiefly by the librarian of the Vatican, Cardinal Angelus Maria Quirinus. The edition consists of three volumes in the Greek, and three in the Syriac text, with Latin translations.

The first volume of the Greek work appeared in 1732, prepared and furnished with copious prolegomena by the learned Maronite, Jos. Sim. Asseman. As he, however, was sent to Syria upon a mission by the Pope for several years, the publishing of the succeeding volumes was left in the hands of the Maronite and Jesuit Peter Benedict (Mobarek). In 1737 the first volume of the Syriac work appeared, which was followed by the second in 1740. During the printing of the third volume Benedict died. It then passed into the hands of Step. Evod. Asseman, the nephew of Jos. Sim. Asseman, who finished it in 1743. In the meantime, Jos. Sim. Asseman returned, who finally published the second and third volumes of the Greek work, and brought it to an end. The Oxford edition is based upon the Greek text, but its deficiencies and mistakes are filled up and corrected from the Italian manuscripts; the Latin translation is essentially that of Ger. Vossius. The translation of the Syriac text by Pet. Benedict and Step. Evod. Asseman (the latter translated from page 425 of the 3d vol. to the end) is very free and often arbitrary and unreliable. The critical treatment of the Syriac text is also defective, owing in part to the paucity and imperfect character of the manuscripts. A new collection of the manuscripts is accordingly very desirable. Nineteen hymns selected from the Roman edition were edited and illustrated in HAHN and SIEFFERT'S Chrestomathia Syriaca sive S. Eph. carmina selecta (Lips., 1825, 8vo.). Hahn has treated of others in his Bardesanes Gnosticus, and in his tract on the Psalmody of the Syrian Church (in Stäudlin kirchenhist. Archiv, 1823). Many of his discourses and hymns have been happily translated into German by Pius Zingerle: "Select writings of the H. C. Father, Ephräm:" Insbruck, 1830-38, 8vo., &c.; the "Complete works of the Church Fathers," Vol. 38, part 1: Kempten, 1850, 8vo. The funeral hymns have been recently translated into Italian. There has also been an elegant translation of the metrical hymns and homilies of Ephräm the Syrian, with illustrations by Henry Burgess: London, 1853, 2 vols., 12mo.; also, The Repentance of Nineveh, a metrical Homily on the Mission of Jonah and some smaller pieces: London, 1853, 12mo. Comp. Zeitsch. d. D. Morgenl. Gesellschaft., Bd IX. p. 285, &c. Alsleben has in contemplation a new complete edition of his works.

Of Ephräm's writings in the Syriac language, we mention, first of all, his commentary upon the books of the Bible. This commentary, at least so far as the Pentateuch is concerned, was written during the later period of his life, for in it he refers to his Homilies. The commentary upon the Psalms is wanting in the Roman edition, although the Cod. Vatic. 752 contains fragmentary portions of it in Greek. Of Ephräm's commentary on the N. T., the Roman editors could discover no manuscripts, although later Syriac writers testify that he expounded the Gospels, and that, too, according to the Tatian Diatessaron, fragments of which in Greek still exist. Of his commentary upon the Pauline Epistles, we have an Armenian translation, so that the commendation of Gregory, of Nyssa, "that Ephräm commented upon the whole Bible, from the first book of Creation to the last book of Grace," is altogether and literally true.

The remaining Syriac writings of Ephräm are all composed in verses, that is, in lines of the same number of syllables, generally seven, although without regard to prosodic measure, and these are grouped in stanzas of different compass, from four to twelve lines. Rhyme and accent are only occasionally regarded, and that without any particular rule. This very mechanical sort of rhythm was certainly not inappropriate to the elevated tone of the Ephrämian homilies, and especially the earnest and solemn character and grandiloquence of satirical discourses in general, at the same time that it would be too external and monotonous, if the expression and the thought were extended too far, which was not unfrequently the case. It was only his compositions of a tenderer character which really possessed poetic merit; such as his elegiac odes, his funeral hymns, and the rhetorical parts of passages in which the judgments of God, the torments of the damned, the terrors of death, the inward power and blessedness of faith, the love of the Saviour, or something of the kind was described.

Besides these published works of Ephräm (see the list in ASSEMAN'S Bibl. Critic., Tom. 1, p. 63, &c.), some of his writings are yet in manuscript, and much has been lost. Amongst these are his seven metrical tracts, de Ecclesia. Also, a chronicle from the Creation down to the time of Christ, in six periods, each of a thousand years, containing a great deal of traditionary and apocryphal matter relating to primal biblical history, bears the name of Ephräm, and is to be met with in a Codex Vatican., and also in a manuscript belonging to the British Museum. It is there found immediately after the testament of Ephräm, and it is possible that the author may have been more recent than Ephräm, and may have only availed himself of his writings. In the liturgical books of the Syrian Church, many of the hymns and prayers, &c., bear his name, although it is certain that he never wrote them. To such belong the two prayers at the end of the baptismal Form prepared by Guido Fabricius Roderianus, Antw., 1572, and improperly ascribed to Severus. They are also printed in the Opp. Graec., p. 605, and greatly improved. In the three Syriac parts of the Rom. edition, there is also more or less that is spurious, as may easily be seen in several additions and interpolations.

Ephräm was a man of inward and strict integrity. As a champion of the orthodox faith, as well as a zealous popular orator, and theological writer, he maintained a highly honorable position in the ancient Syrian Church. As a commentator, with all his defects and advantages, he is best and most faithfully described by Lengerke in his work: De Ephraemi Syri arte hermeneutica: Königsb., 1831). He does not expound the original text of the Scriptures, but the Syriac translation, the Peschito, which may be much improved by the use of his commentary. His occasional references to the Hebrew, and to the Septuagint, rest exclusively upon oral interrogatories and the Syriac annotations. Of the Apocrypha, which is sometimes adverted to, and other New Testament books, wanting in the Peschito, such as 2d and 3d John, 2 Pet., Jude, and Revelations, as made use of by Ephräm, there were Syriac translations then in existence. His commentaries, accordingly, were especially serviceable in the critical study and illustration of the Peschito, although they also contained much that was useful in explanation of the original. — The doctrinal value of Ephräm's writings, and his precise theological standpoint have not yet been clearly and distinctly exhibited. It has been partially done by Hahn, Uhlman, and others. Tschirner describes him in his peculiarities as an orator, but only as seen in his Greek writings. The poetic merit of his works we find appreciated by Zingerle and Burgess. Ephräm wrote especially for the people, and for this purpose chose the metrical form, by means of which the heresies of Bardesanes and Harmonius obtained such a wide circulation. The doctrines he promulgated were those then prevalent in the Church. He was not accustomed to explain them learnedly, but to present them in a parnetic way, less in a dogmatic than a pathetic form. He insisted upon a believing reception of the same without philosophical speculation. He required moral strictness, demanded an ascetic mode of life, despised and condemned all worldly employments, and these requisitions and principles he enforced by his own example. The Holy Scriptures, as to form and contents, were the basis of his whole literary activity; still he did not hesitate to give to the words of Scripture a poetic or rhetorical expansion, or to admit a slight apocryphal tradition, or even a legendary embellishment. His elocution is often graphic, sometimes dramatic, although not always at the right place, for instance, the way in which Mary speaks to the child Jesus. He delights in exclamations and apostrophe, antitheses, and an ingenious play upon words, frequent and striking pictures, which, in the way of diversified comparison, he made use of and applied, sometimes even to insipid superfluity and far-fetched sport. His exhibitions generally had a great deal of outward adornment; he knew how to avail himself of the external means of oratory, although it frequently also betrayed him into bombast and extravagance, and diffuseness perfectly wearisome. His language was affecting, for it was generally addressed to human joys and sorrows, it described the conflicts and storms of life, as well as its undisturbed repose. He knew how to excite fear and alarm, when he portrayed to the sinner his punishment, or the judgments of God on the fate of the damned; but he also knew how to encourage and comfort when it pleased him to preach of the hope of the believing soul, or the joys of eternal salvation. His discourses would sweetly ring with mild and soft tones when he delineated the peaceful rest of the pious, and the inward joys of the believing saint; it stormed and thundered when he castigated the heretic, or reproved pride and obstinacy. Ephräm was a spirited and skilful speaker, and the measure of his poetic gifts was well calculated to make him effective as a teacher among the people. See the writer's article "Ephräm," in the Hall. Encyclop., and Aschbachs allg. Kirchen Lexikon Bd. II., § 613.

E. RÖDIGER. — Dr. Wolff.

Ephraim (עֲפְרַיִם, fruitfulness, from פֶּרָה, as אֶפְרָא with א prefixed, Gen. 41:52; Hos. 13:15). — 1. The name of the second son of the patriarch Joseph, and of the tribe proceeding from him, Jacob out of pure love to Joseph adopted him, together with his brother, Manasseh, as a child, and gave him an equal portion with the rest of his children, preferring him on account of his future significance to his older brothers. Gen. 48:1-19. It is true that the tribe, which, at the time of their departure from Egypt, numbered 40,500 fighting men, whilst that of Manasseh consisted of 32,200, Numb. 1:32-35, was reduced by misfortune in the wilderness to 32,500, according to the second enumeration at the close of their wanderings, when at the same time Manasseh had increased to 52,700 (Numb. 26:34, 37); for which reason, owing to the discretion of Joshua, who belonged to this tribe, it received, as compared with Manasseh in the division of the land, an inferior inheritance, with which it also was dissatisfied (Josh. 17:15). But under Joshua already, who gave them by lot a very fruitful tract of country intermediate between the tribes of Dan and Benjamin, and the half tribe of Manasseh, reaching from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, and still more under the Judges, it attained again to a consciousness of its strength and decided superiority; which may have been increased by the fact that until the death of Eli, the tabernacle and ark of the covenant were kept in Shiloh as the central point of Palestine (Josh. 18:1; 1 Sam. 1:3, &c.). Its numbers at a later period are given in 1 Chron. 12:30, and it may thence be inferred that many of the people in the time of the Judges had settled among other tribes. In this tribe it was that the idea of a monarchy was first entertained and intimated to Gideon, Jud. 8:22, and afterwards for a short time realized under Abimelech. Samuel also, who was of this tribe, gave to it additional significance. After the death of Saul, the tribe of Ephraim, jealous of the spiritual superiority of Judah, took Ishbosheth, and, in connection with the ten other tribes, made him King, 2 Sam. 2:9; and when he was assassinated they submitted to David, without, however, being able to overcome their aversion to the tribe of Judah, 2 Sam. 19:41. After the death of Solomon, they again separated from Judah and the house of David, finally and forever, the prophet Ahijah, an Ephraimitic Shilomite, having proposed the step (1 Kings 11:29). The chief seat of the new kingdom (Sichem, Thirza, Samaria) was uniformly in this tribe, and Ephraim was the name generally given to it by the prophets, Is. 7:2; 9:9; 11:13; 28:1; Hos. 4:17; Wisdom 47:23.

2. The name of a mountain and forest. The mountain, which in Josh. 17:15; 19:50, and Jud. 3:27; 4:5; 1 Sam. 1:1; 9:4; 2 Sam. 20:21, is called Mount Ephraim, and in Josh. 11:16, 21, the mountain of Israel, in which passage it is carefully distinguished from the mountain of Judah, commences in the plain of Esdraelon, near the village of Ginea, and extending beyond the southern boundary of Ephraim in the direction of Jerusalem, it is then joined to the mountains of Judah. It consists of lofty ridges covered with forests, and pervaded by long and fruitful valleys, becoming narrower and milder as they approach towards Judah. Ritter, 2, 392; Schub. 3, 127. The prominent mountains in the tribe of Ephraim were Zalmon, near Shechem, Jud. 9: 48; Ps. 68: 14, Ebal, the northern, and Gerizim the southern peak of Mount Ephraim, Gaas, (Josh. 24: 30), and the mount of the Amelekites, Jud. 12: 15. — The forest of Ephraim, 2 Sam. 18: 6, comp. Josh. 17: 15, was doubtless in the north-eastern part of the tribe towards Jordan and Succoth. There was fought the decisive battle between the armies of Absalom and David, to the advantage of the latter. Ewald, Isr. Gesch., 2, 656, and Thenius upon 2 Sam. 17: 22, 24, improperly place the forest on the east of Jordan. If, for instance, Ewald is unable to conceive why David, in case he was on the side of Jordan next to Jerusalem, did not at once proceed thither, it is nevertheless perfectly intelligible that, in not advancing upon the tribe in rebellion against him, he spared the effusion of blood, and that his return to Mahanaim was suggested by wisdom and forbearance.

3. The name of a city, mentioned in John 11: 54. Josephus also speaks of a city named 'Εφραιμ, in the neighborhood of Bethel. It is, doubtless, the same spoken of in Josh. 18: 23, and that probably at a later period changed its name in consequence of its enlargement, (comp. Josh. 15: 19). By the wilderness, of which mention is made (John 11: 54), as lying in the neighborhood, we are not to understand the wilderness of Judea, but that of Bethaven, which, as is known, was in the immediate vicinity of Bethel (Jos. 7: 2; 18: 12, &c.).

VAIHINGER.—Dr. Wulff.

Ephron, עֲפְרוֹן, the name of several localities in Canaan. It designates, 1) Jos. 15: 9, a mountain range (not a single mountain) on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin; the same, doubtless, with the "mountains of Ephraim," which stretch towards Jerusalem, and unite with the "mountains of Israel," (comp. Judges 4: 5; 1 Sam. 1: 1; see Robinson Pal., I., p. 447, &c.). 2) A city in the vicinity of Bethel, taken by Abijah from the kingdom of Jeroboam, 2 Chron. 13: 19, and is probably the place spoken of (John 11: 54), to which Jesus retired after the resurrection of Lazarus, and from whence he made his last journey to Jerusalem. This city was near to the so-called wilderness of Bethaven, upon the north-eastern boundary of Benjamin, Josh. 16: 1; 18: 12. Josephus also speaks of a small city called Ephraim, near Bethel. Josephus makes Εφρων, the place mentioned by John, to be eight miles north of Jerusalem, and Jerome increases the distance to twenty miles. The same place, with a slight change, is called Ophrah, in the tribe of Benjamin, Josh. 18: 23, while the LXX. read 'Εφραδα (Cod. Alex. Αφρα). This lay in the N. E. part of Benjamin, and, according to Eusebius,

5 miles east of Bethel; perhaps it is the place called, Mic. 1: 10, Beth-leaphra, only that the form is slightly changed for the sake of a play upon the word. It is well translated by Rückert: "Staubheim." In all probability there are only different names for the same place, which, as ascertained by Robinson (Pal. III., 290), is the Taigibeh of our day—a village inhabited by from 3 to 400 Greek Christians, built upon a hill, planted with olive and fig trees, and covered with the ruins of an ancient Roman town. The distances, 20 miles from Jerusalem, and 5 from Bethel, also corresponds; so too it is marked upon Kiepert's map; comp. Lightfoot, centur. chorogr. in Matth. c. 53. The native city of Gideon in the tribe of Manasseh, which is also called Ophra, LXX.: 'Εφραδα, 'Εφρα, 'Εφραιμ, is a different place, Jud. 6: 11, 24; 8: 27; its precise locality has, however, not as yet been ascertained.

3. Finally, there is a large and populous city in Gilead, called 'Εφρων. It was taken and destroyed by Jud. Maccabeus, upon his return from Ashtaroth Karnaim, upon the Jordan, in the direction of Scythopolis, 1 Maccab. 5: 46, 52; 2 Maccab. 12: 27; Jos. Antiq., 12: 8, 5. As is the case with many other places in that inhospitable region beyond Jordan, this locality also has not yet been ascertained. As to the opinion of Kloeden, in Winer, R.W.B., 1, 335, that it is the place of the present mountain castle, Kalerat er Rabbad, it must be said that this is too far south. Ewald is, perhaps, more correct (Gesch. Isr., 2, p. 360) in supposing it to be Fau'arah, on Kiepert's map, south of Jarmak; whilst to locate it in the "wilderness of Ephraim," where Absalom was killed, as is attempted by the same learned author, would again carry it too far south. RÜRTSCH.—Dr. Wulff.

Epiphany, Feast of the Manifestation, Revelation of Christ, ΕΠΙΦΑΝΙΑ, τὰ ἐπιφάνια, was the feast in the Eastern Church, according to Tit. 2: 11; 3: 4, until the time of Chrysostom, with which the cycle of Christian festivals commenced (Chrys.: παρ' ἡμῶν ἡ εὐρητη πρώτη τὰ ἐπιφάνια). It commemorates the baptism of Christ, for, as Chrysostom also observes, it was not at his birth, but at his baptism, that Christ was manifested to men, so that his ἐπιφάνια refers particularly to this transaction. A particular Christmas or birth-day festival was not yet at that time observed in the Oriental Church, but it was regarded as præcedens, and subordinate to the feast of the Epiphany, which took place on the 6th of January. In this the reference to his birth would be the less prominent, for the reason, that with the baptism of Christ was connected the thought of the baptism of Christians, so far as it was admitted that Christ, by his baptism, had communicated to the water the property of a laver of regeneration (Chrys.: τὴν τῶν ὑδατῶν ἡγιασὲ φύσιν). Wherefore, according to Gregory of Nazianzen, the festival was called τὰ φωτὰ ἡμέρα τῶν φωτῶν. The baptism of Christ was regarded as his φωτισμός, in relation to mankind; the baptism of Christians as their φωτισμός in regard to themselves; and hence the feast of the Epiphany, as well as Easter and Whitsunday, was set apart in many of the eastern churches as the proper time for baptism (thus Greg. of Naz. calls it Χριστοῦ ἐμφανισθῆναι). Neander is of the opinion, that the feast originated with Jewish Christians, inasmuch as they regarded the baptism of Christ to be of more significance than his birth. It is a fact that the Basilidians, according to the testimony of Clem. of Alex. Strom., 1, 1, first observed the feast in Alexandria, and Neander supposes that they had the custom from the Jewish Christian congregations of Syria and Palestine. In this way we can best explain how it came that the Alexandrian Church so soon adopted a feast introduced by heretics. It was their purpose to authenticate and establish the true antagonistic significance of the baptism of Christ.

Be this as it may, the feast is peculiar to the Oriental Churches, and the Christmas festival was first introduced in the latter part of the 4th century, as Chrysostom distinctly avers, in a homily on the 25th Decr., 386, at Antioch. We have the first trace of the Epiphany in the Western Church in the second half of the same century. Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. 21, 2, mentions that the Emperor Julian, in 360, celebrated the feast of the Epiphany at Vienne; and Neander justly remarks, that, by the connexion of the Grecian colonial and commercial cities of southern France with the East, this festival might have been introduced into those countries earlier than it was in other portions of the Western Empire. Just as the Christmas festival originating in the West was carried to the East, so the feast of the Epiphany took the opposite direction; and though the Donatist polemics objected to it as an innovation from the East, they could not arrest its progress, but were obliged to encourage its extension. As, however, it did not belong to the tradition of the Western Church, its significance could the more easily be changed. In the time of Augustine already it was regarded as the feast of the Manifestation of Christ to the heathen, and the adoration of the wise men of the East was used as an argument in favor of it. Hence the name of the "festival of the three kings" (see Art.). But the idea of the Epiphany is also derived from the first revelation of the miraculous power of Christ after his baptism in Cana, John 2: 11, hence the names dies natalis virtutum Domini, and Bethphania; but these three relations, the baptism of Christ, the first manifestation to the heathen, and the first manifestation by miracles, were all combined and retained, as may be seen in a sermon by Bishop Maximus, of Turin, upon the subject of the festival in the beginning of the 5th century. At that time already, the tradition had obtained that the three events just mentioned had all taken place on the same day. The miraculous feeding of the 5000 was a fourth reference in addition to these, and hence the name Phagiphania. In the West, however, the most prevalent reference was to the adoration of the wise men, and the appearance of the star was accounted for and explained by the word Epiphany. In the Western Church, in some of the congregations, the feast of the Epiphany was also regarded as the time for baptism (dies luminum), and so too in the African Church. At first the custom was strenuously opposed in Italy by Leo I., who denounced it as an irrational innovation. It however found its way into France. Gerbert, in the vetus lit. Alem., p. II., disq. 5, cites an old ordo, S. Gallensis, in which Epiphany is given as the time for baptism; and Charlemagne, in the epistle to the Bishop Garibald, speaks of the custom as prevalent to some extent in France, without, however, approving it. Gregory II., in 726, already had forbidden the performance of baptism, except at Easter and Whitsunday. The prohibition was repeated by several Councils during the 9th and 11th centuries.

In accordance with an old tradition of the Greek Church, it is customary in the Græco-Russian Church in our day, to consecrate the water at the feast of the Epiphany. S. Stäudlin says (kirchl. Geogr. u. Statist., I., 279), that whilst in Rome, persons of various countries, educated in the Propaganda for missionaries, are accustomed to deliver addresses, at Epiphany, in their native tongue, and thus illustrate the manifestation of Christ to the heathen; upon which occasions the celebrated Mezzofanti was wont to exhibit his extraordinary talent for speaking. It must also be borne in mind that the feast of the Epiphany was the time prescribed by the eastern bishops for the celebration of Easter; it was called indictio paschalis. The custom also prevailed for a time in the Western Church, and was finally sanctioned by the fourth Synod of Orleans, in 541. See Neander, Ch. Hist., Amer. ed., I., 301, &c.; Augusti Handbuch. chr. Arch., I. 528, II. 476.

HERZOG.—Dr. Wolff.

Epiphanius, Bishop of Constantia, the ancient Salamis of Cyprus. If every tendency of spiritual life, before it has impressed itself decidedly and permanently upon the age, has its prototypical expression in particular prominent personalities, it must certainly be true in a twofold measure, in reference to the monastic piety and the verbal orthodoxy of Epiphanius, as connected with the largest liberty of religious inquiry. He lived at a time when monasticism, averse to the world and its refinements, and having been strengthened by the self-denials and sufferings which the ancient Church was obliged to endure, took the first step towards authority and power in the Church, and pervading all its departments, without regard to evangelical freedom, sought to petrify Christianity into a system of outward arbitrary prescribed customs, founded more upon heroic, than upon morally ennobling exercises of strength, and to substitute in the place of a positive believing Biblical philosophy, with all its earnestness of inquiry, as seen in the course of the great doctrinal controversies, a predilection for the formularies of traditional Church doctrine, this so-called patristic theology. Epiphanius was, by nature, education, habit of life, and study, one of the chief promoters of both these tendencies. He was born at Besandus, a village of Palestine, in the neighborhood of the city of Eleutheropolis, in the beginning of the 4th century, and from his early youth was brought up by the monks of Palestine. At a later period, he was under the care of the monks of Egypt, where he, perhaps, came into contact with Antonius, the father of monasticism, and venerated as the archetype of ascetism. In Egypt, his zeal for orthodoxy, imbibed, as may be said, with his mother's milk, met with its first trial. Gnostic women, of fascinating charms, sought to lead the young zealot astray, but he at once avoided the danger, by delivering to the bishop of the place the heretical books placed in his hands, by which means nearly a hundred of the prevailing heresies of the land were proscribed. Having returned to his native country, he co-operated with Hilarion, the founder and ideal of Palestinian monasticism, in the strictest intimacy; and more enthusiastic even than he, for this form of secluded and pious life, he labored for a long time, as superior of a convent in the vicinity of his native village. From Constantia, his metropolitan residence after 367, where he spent his time either in reading devotional books, the discharge of episcopal duties, the study of theological writings, and the defence of church doctrines against the heretics, or in actual controversy, his fame spread throughout the whole Church. Thus we meet with him as a member of the Synod at Antioch in 376, endeavoring to allay the disturbances which had arisen in relation to Apollinarianism. A few years afterwards, in 382, he went to Rome, at the request of the emperor, to advise with the bishops there present concerning the final settlement of the protracted Meletianic division at Antioch, upon which occasion he was successful in renewing the bond of mutual admiration and esteem. His peculiar vocation, next to the spread of monasticism, was, as he thought, to oppose heretics, the most formidable of whom was Origen. This burning hatred of heretics, and especially of Origen, he acquired from the hermits of Egypt. Then Pachomius was accustomed to denounce the great Alexandrian, of whose services to the Church and to science the monks of his class had no conception, not merely as the worst of all heretics, and to forbid the reading of his writings, as great and deceitful perversions of the sense of the Scriptures, but he solemnly obliged every superior placed at the head of the convention which he governed never to have anything to do with the followers of Origen. To justify this bitter denunciation, Epiphanius put himself to the trouble of perusing the whole of Origen's numerous works; and having satisfied himself, that, as the father of Arianism, and a bold innovator in almost every article of faith, he was an arch heretic, he was surprised to learn that he was still held in high estimation by the most distinguished divines of Palestine. This determined him to go there, and pronounce the same anathema upon them. He did so at Easter, in 394; and his furious attack upon Bishop John of Jerusalem, and his equally unwarranted intermeddling with his acknowledged diocesan rights, led to those protracted Origenistic controversies, which, paltry and odious as they were in their origin, engaged the Church for a long time in religious speculation and philosophy. Urged on by his feelings, he was not ashamed to avail himself of the artful hypocrite, Theophilus, of Alexandria, who after all held him in slight estimation, and to suffer himself to be used as a mere tool in his hierarchical plans against the pious Chrysostom, of Constantinople. Not doubting, as he wrote in a letter to Jerome, that Amalek could be destroyed, and that the trophies of the cross would be displayed on Mt. Rephidim, he communicated to Chrysostom, whose mind was not yet made up as to the errors of Origen, although he was fully aware of their importance in reference to the Church, the sentence of condemnation passed upon them, by an assembly of the bishops of Cyprus and the neighborhood, in 401. Chrysostom took no notice of this communication, and Epiphanius concluded that he was disposed to favor Origen, and that nothing more now was necessary to destroy the last remaining head of the hydra than his personal presence. An old man, nearly an hundred years of age, he was stirred up by Theophilus to go to the metropolis in the midst of winter, in the year 402, where he was kindly received by Chrysostom, who sent the whole body of his clergy to welcome him at his entrance into the city. He would, however, have no church-fellowship with him, nor would he even pray for a dying son of the empress, until every follower of Origen was expelled from the residence, and immediately threatened to excite the fury of the populace against Origen, and those who favored him, by solemnly publishing the anathema against him from the altar of the metropolitan church, and was only deterred from attempting it by considering the possible consequences to himself. Rash, but honest, as he was, he saw something of the tendencies of his partizan zeal, and at length entirely undeceived in a conversation he had with the heretical Origenists, he abruptly withdrew from a service of such doubtful character, with the remark: I leave you the city, the palace, and the hypocrisy. He seemed to have a presentiment of his approaching death, to which he gave expression in the words: I go, and must be in great haste. He died upon the ship, before he got home, in the summer of 403.

In the character of Epiphanius, mingled with honesty of purpose and sincere piety, we meet with great imperfections. His ardent zeal for purity of doctrine, and his strict self-denial, which abated nothing of the privations of the monk, when he was seated in the episcopal chair, show that he was prompted by a holy earnestness in what he regarded as the perfection of Christian truth and duty. But this easily excited zeal was not accompanied by the proper measure of spiritual freedom and prudence. Disposed by nature, and still more by his monastic education to be moderate, he was unable, owing to the want of an inward independent religious development, to conceive of the rights of the religious subject alongside of the despotic authority of the Church, and thus made the whole of salvation to consist of outward confession and practice. His extensive reading only served to increase his hatred of heresy. Besides his native language, the Syriac, he spoke the Hebrew, the Egyptian, the Greek, and, to some extent, the Latin language, which induced Rufin successively to remark, that he considered it his duty as an Evangelist, to denounce Origen's errors in every language and amongst all nations. His credulity frequently betrayed him into all sorts of opinions and purposes, and when heresy was to be extirpated, he could be both defamatory and despotic. But with all his faults and indiscretions, he stood so high in the estimation of his contemporaries, as the patriarch of orthodoxy, that such instances of violence were only the occasion of new triumphs. It was not just a Jerome who gratulated him as the relic of ancient holiness. As he one day passed along the streets in Jerusalem, in company with Bishop John, mothers carried to him their children that he might bless them. The multitudes thronged around him to kiss his feet, and thought themselves happy to touch the hem of his garments. To hear him preach, the assembled multitudes would listen breathlessly for hours. That his life would be adorned with the halo of miraculous powers and revelations, and that his childhood already would be provided with a garland of traditions of significant import by some younger mythograph, as was always the case in ancient times, and at the birth of extraordinary men, could scarcely fail with one to whose memory the Cyprians dedicated one of their churches.

In 374 already, Epiphanius, at the request of the priests and monks, prepared a work upon faith, which, as were all his writings, was read with eagerness, by the learned, for the sake of its contents, and by the unlearned on account of its style. It was intended to be a defence of Christian doctrines, especially the doctrine of the Trinity, of the incarnation of Christ, and of his resurrection from the dead; for the benefit of such as were driven about upon the ocean of uncertainty by heretics and the devil. But, as in this work, the controverted errors were simply enumerated in brief categories, Epiphanius readily consented to complete his principal work upon heresy as a sure and certain remedy against the stings of the soul-destroying serpent, to which, as it only gave a historical statement of the 80 forms of schism, but was also a refutation of them, he gave the title πανάριον, medicine-chest. Its object was to exhaust the idea of heresy in its whole range. With untiring diligence he here collects and presents to view every heresy known to have existed in the world. Rich, however, as it is in material, everything is thrown together in the greatest confusion, without any regard to chronology or logical arrangement. The style is old, diffused, and unpolished, as might be expected of one deficient in attic grace, and fatiguingly monotonous. But with all these imperfections, the work is one of the most important literary productions of Christian antiquity, as a rich record on the one hand of the history of ancient heresy, and on the other as a memorial and type of polemics as carried on in that age against religious error. An abridgement of his Panarion, with a somewhat different arrangement, was attempted by Epiphanius himself in his δρακεφαλαίωσις. Of his other less accessible works there is still extant his treatise "on the weight and measures of the Bible," of the year

393, with all sorts of digressions — and his tract upon the twelve precious stones in Aaron's vestments, in triple text, a historical exposition of their seams, forms, and properties, with their allegorical interpretations. The Latin translation by Foggini (Rome, 1750, 4to.), of his published commentary upon Solomon's Song abounds in mystical remarks, partly moral and partly prophetic in their character. The brief eulogy upon Hilarion is lost. Much was never printed.—(Sources: SOCRATES, H. E., 6, 10, 12, &c.; 7, 27; SOZOM., 6, 32; 8, 14, and JEROME in several places; SCHRÖCKH, Chr. K.-Gesch. 2, Aufl. X., 3, &c. Concerning his writings: FABRIC., bibl. graec., p. 261. SEMISCH.—Dr. Wolff.)

Epiphanius, Bishop of Pavia, was born in Pavia, of a noble family, in the year 439, and was trained up for the ministry under the care of the Bishop of that city. In his eighteenth year already, he was ordained a sub-deacon, and two years afterwards, as deacon, he was entrusted with the management of the property of the Church, and was so attentive to the poor and the suffering, and in all respects of so much assistance to the Bishop in his declining days, that after his death, in 466, he was unanimously chosen, by the public and clergy, to be his successor. In entering upon his office, he delivered a discourse to his clergy, in which he requested, that if they observed anything improper in himself, they should let him know it. From that time forth his life was more strict than ever; he ate but once a day, and then no flesh, and it was reported as a proof of his devotion, that he always attended upon worship with his feet in fetters. At that time earnest-minded Bishops were much needed in the Church. The West Roman empire lay under the lash of Odoacer; Theodoric was deposed, and the people groaned for deliverance. Under these circumstances it required that the Bishops should be strong-minded men of the old Roman families, who would protect the oppressed, promote peace between the opposing parties, and introduce Roman and Christian civilization among their conquerors. Epiphanius must be considered as one of these Bishops, if even he did not immediately exert himself for the preservation of the spiritual treasures of ancient Rome. He it was who mediated peace between Ricimer and his father-in-law, the Emperor Anthemius. When Eurich, King of the Western Goths, in 474, threatened the Western empire with new dangers, the Emperor Nepos sent to him the Bishop of Pavia, by whom he was induced to listen to terms of peace. When, in the same year, Odoacer subdued Pavia and destroyed its cathedral, Epiphanius succeeded in having it rebuilt; and it was by his influence that Odoacer remitted to the inhabitants of Pavia, after its destruction, their taxes for five years. Especially did he distinguish himself in the war between Odoacer and Theodoric in meliorating the destiny of thousands. Theodoric held him in great esteem. At his request E. went to Gundobald, King of Burgundy, for the purpose of ransoming a number of Ligurian prisoners, who might again populate Upper Italy. The mission was eminently successful; all the Ligurians, who had not taken up arms were set free without ransom, the others were redeemed at a low rate. At a later period he interposed still more successfully in favor of the oppressed Ligurians. He died in consequence of his exposure upon his journey to Theodoric, in the 55th year of his age. His biography may be found in the works of his successor, Ennodius.

HERZOG. — Dr. Wolff.

Epiphanius, Scholasticus, the friend of Cassiodorus (see Art.), at whose request he translated the Church histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, which, abridged by Cassiodorus and somewhat improved in style, were so celebrated during the middle ages as historia tripartita. At the request of Cassiodorus, he also translated several other works, the so-called Codex encyclicus, a collection of synodical letters to the Emperor Leo I., in defence of the Synod of Chalcedon against Timotheus Aelurus; the Commentaries of Epiphanius, Bishop of Cyprus, upon the Song of Solomon, and the Commentary of Didymus upon the Proverbs, the Catholic Epistles, &c.

HERZOG. — Dr. Wolff.

Episcopus in Partibus, Ep. titularis, Ep. suffraganeus, terms often used synonymously, refer, strictly speaking, to different matters.—As the jura pontificalia could not be performed by the ordinary assistants of the bishops (archpresbyter, archdeacon, &c., see Art.), and each diocese could have but one bishop (c. 8, Conc. Nic., a. 325), assistance in those functions could be obtained, originally, only from a neighboring bishop. Afterwards bishops expelled from their own sees were thus employed, since they were regarded as still having de jure possession of their diocese. For the Church was ever intent upon maintaining congregations once founded, and the connection of bishops expelled by enemies with their cathedra (GREG. I., a. 592, in c. 42. Can. VII. qu. I.). Those driven from Spain in the 9th cent., by the Arabs, fled to Oviedo, patiently awaiting an opportunity to return to their sees; and when one died a successor was immediately chosen. Meanwhile they labored as assistants of the Bishop of Oviedo, "ut episcopi, qui ditone carerent, Ovetensi præsuli vicariam operam exhiberant, cura in multos partita, ejusque redditibus alerentur" (see THOMASSIN, vel. ac nova eccl. discipl. de benef., P. I., lib. I., c. XXVII., nro VIII.; BINTERIM, Denkwürdigk., &c., Bd. I., Th. II., 379–80). Later instances of such Vice-Episcopi, vices gerentes in pontifical., vicarii in pontifical. are also met with in Germany, especially since the 12th cent. After that bishops were appointed as assistants in other dioceses, with the title of sees (episc. titulares) wrested from Christians by unbelievers (in partibus infidelium). This soon led to abuses, as prominent monks aspired after such dignities, and degraded the episcopate. Hence Clem. V., decreed at Vienne, a. 1311, that such bishops should no longer be created without the authority of the Pope, and that no monks should be appointed without permission from their superiors (c. 5 Clem. de electione [I. 3]). Other limitations were enacted at Ravenna, 1311, 1314, &c., but the office itself continued. In 1322 a titular b., Ep. eccl. Hennensis (HARTZHEIM, Conc. Germ., IV., 284), attended a Synod at Cologne, as substitute for the

B. of Liege. And the Synod of Salzburg, 1420, refers to ep. titul., and that of Passau, 1470, to suffraganei, authorized to ordain clergy, and consecrate churches (HARTZ., l. c., V., 179, 478). They were called suffraganei because they were to aid the bishops by act and word (suffragio, DU FRESNE). Leo X., at the 5th Lat. Council, 1514, s. IX., allowed cardinals to have vicarii seu suffrag. The abuses which still occurred, especially the attempts of titular B., to found exempted dioceses within existing sees (episcopalem cathedram in loco nullius diocesis) were opposed by the Council of Trent (s. VI., c. 5, de ref., s. XIV., c. 2, 8, de ref.). The present practice of the Romish C. still rests upon the decree of Trent (see Bishops).—Episcopi in partibus, as mere titular B. are revocable papal delegates, apostolic vicars. Even when employed as missionary B. they may be recalled.—(See ANDR. ILLERON. ANDREUCCI, tract. de ep. titul. &c.: Rom., 1732, 4to. FR. AUG. DÜRR, diss. de suffrag., &c.: Mogunt., 1782, 4to. J. H. HEISTER, suffrag. Colonienses extraord., &c.: Mogunt., 1843).

H. F. JACOBSON.*

Episcopal System in the Romish Church.—It is an essential principle in the constitution of this Church that all authority is vested in the clergy, the Eccl. docens, and that the C. is governed by the organized clerical hierarchy, with the Pope at its head as the organ of its unity. In regard to the relation of this organ to the entire hierarchy, two systems obtain, the feudal Papal system (see Art.), and the aristocratic Episcopal-system, which regards the bishops as the jure ordinario rulers of the C., who receive their authority immediately from God, and, for the maintenance of unity, appoint the Pope as primus inter pares. Some suggest, as a third system, a combination of these two (WALTER, Lehrb. d. K.-rechts, 11 Ausg., § 128).—The Episcopal-system bases itself upon Matt. 18:18, contending that equal authority was given to all the Apostles, and that Peter was placed foremost (comp. Matt. 16:16; 17:4, &c.), merely to exhibit their unity. Thus CYRILIAN, de unitate eccl. says, Loquitur Dominus ad Petrum: Matt. 16:18. Super unum ædificat eccl., et quamvis Apostolis omnibus post resurrectionem suam parem potestatem tribuet et dicat: sicut misit, etc. Joann. 20:21, tamen ut unitatem manifestaret unitatis ejusdem originem ab uno incipientem, sua auctoritate disposuit. Hoc erant utique ceteri Apostoli, quod fuit Petrus, pari consortio præditi et honoris et potestatis. Sed exordium ab unitate proficiscitur, ut eccl. una monstretur (c. 18, Can. XXVI. qu. I.). Peter was made primus inter pares less for the Apostles' sake than for subsequent times, when an infallible primacy would be more needful (SAUTER, fundamenta juris eccl. Cathol., ed. III., Rotwilæ, 1825, § 62). In thus singling out Peter, our Lord merely indicated in general that one bishop should perpetuate the primacy, but did not fix the episcopal seat; and though circumstances favored the choice of Rome, the primacy might be transferred to the Bishop of another see, if the good of the Church required it (SAUTER, l. c., § 63, 64).—The course of history has determined the prerogatives of the primacy. The Episcopalists distinguish between jura essentialia, primigenia, naturalia and jura accidentalia, acquisita, secundaria (SAUTER, l. c., § 466; EICHORN, K.-recht, I., 574, &c.; ROSKOVANY, de primatu Pont. Rom. Augustæ Vindelicor., 1834, § 44, &c., 54, &c., opposes this distinction). Among the essential prerogatives are the primacy of honor and jurisdiction, of supreme supervision, general government, especially of discipline, devolution and protection, and legislation. To the acquired prerogatives may be reckoned the disposal of causæ arduæ ac majores, jurisdiction over referred cases in the first appeal, over others in appellatorio, and manifold reservations.

Doctrinally this system was not perfected until a later period, and was based upon the historical development of the Church itself. The controversies of Bonif. VIII. with Philip the Fair, and of John XXII., Bened. XII., and Clem. VI. with Louis of Bavaria, led to investigations upon the relation of the papacy to the temporal powers and the Church in general. Marsilius, of Padua, Bebenburg (see Art.), et al. affirmed that the primacy of the Pope does not transcend the authority of the Emperor in temporal matters, nor allow him to arrogate the jurisdiction of Bishops, or the rights of general councils. The schism of 1378, and the efforts made to correct the evils it entailed, led to the conviction that a general council, as representing the universal C., was superior to the primacy of the Pope (see D'Ailly). Even Clem. VII. said, in 1387: "se Concilii generalis auctoritati et definitioni libenter submissurum imo cessurum, si sic Eccl. videretur expedire (BULÆI, hist. universit. Paris, IV., 618, and 687, &c.). The University of Paris issued an opinion to this effect in 1394 (BULÆI, l. c., 687, &c.), was often afterwards reiterated (GIESLER, Eccl. Hist., § 104, § 105, § 136). And although the validity of the Councils of Pisa, Costnitz, and Basel, by which this view was confirmed, has been assailed, they have always had advocates. In France the episcopalistic principles were supported by Gallicanism, and were officially affirmed in the pragmaticsanction at Bourges, 1438, in the declaration of the Theol. Faculty of Paris, 1663, and in the articles of the Gallican clergy approved by Louis XIV., &c. (DUPIN, manuel du droit public eccl. franç.: Par., 1845, &c.). G. DE CHAMPAUX, le droit civil eccl. franç.: &c., Paris, 1848, &c.)—In Holland this system was advanced by the Jansenist controversies. It found special favor in the Austrian Netherlands and in Germany itself, where the suffragan N. v. Hontheim, of Treves, published a complete system of Episcopatism (de statu eccl. et legitima potestate Rom. Pont. (Francof., 1763, 4to.).—Rome persistently opposed this tendency. Thus Innoc. XI. in a bull of April 11, 1682; Pius VI. in a letter of Nov. 24, 1789 (in ROSKOVANY, Monum. Cathol. pro independentia potestatis eccl., &c., 1847, I., 352, &c.).

The adherents of the system sought aid from the State, but without the desired success. And when the Church, in consequence of the revolution and its secularizations, found itself forsaken by the State, the only alternative left was for the Episcopacy to attach itself more closely again to the Roman curia, the claims of which were thus strengthened.—In France, however, the system is still adhered to, and the government acts, from time to time, in accordance with its principles. Thus, the papal encyclical of Aug. 1, 1854, was not publ. until Jan., 1855, and then with the remark: "but without assenting to or approving of those clauses, &c., which may conflict with the constitution, the laws of the empire, or the liberties of the Gallican Church."—In Holland the Archbishopric of Utrecht and its suffragans still exist upon the principle of the system. H. F. JACOBSON.*

Episcopal System in the Evangelical Church.—The Reformers of the 16th cent. pronounced the old Romish hierarchy unscriptural; and though willing to tolerate the Episcopacy as a human ordinance, they set aside the hierarchical element. In many countries, therefore, evangelical bishops with restricted functions, or some other officers, were substituted for those of Rome. Consequently the jus episcopale underwent many changes, both material and formal, especially through the partial assumption of episcopal prerogatives by the State (see JACOBSON, Gesch. d. Quellen d. evang. K.-rechts v. Preussen, I., 2, 53. Corpus Reform., II., 994). It was argued that circumstances required this, that the Bible made it the duty of the civil government to maintain religion (Corpus Ref., III., 224, 470, &c.), and even that Christ had appointed civil rulers heads of the Church as custodes utriusque tabulæ (CAPITO in his Resp. de missa, matrimonio et jure magistr. in relig., to Russrecht, 1537, Argentor., 1540). But such sentiments show the influence of circumstances rather than the actual convictions and wishes of the Reformers, who expected no better results from the union of spiritual and temporal power in the persons of princes, than from their previous concentration in the episcopacy (Corp. Ref., II., 333, 362). It was their constant desire, rather, to keep the government of the Church separate from the State (Corp. Ref., VI., 882). But their desire was frustrated, as the bishops would not consent to an arrangement which subserved the Reformation. Their only alternative, therefore, seemed to be to transfer episcopal jurisdiction, as a jus episc., to the civil rulers (see Augsb. Religionsfriede, 1555, § 20. RICHTER, K.-ordnungen d. 16. Jahrh. II., 178, 349. NETTELBLADT, obs. juris eccl.: Halæ, 1783. J. GERHARD, loci theol.: Jenæ, 1610. And Consistorial Constitution. H. F. JACOBSON.*

Epistolæ obscurorum virorum.—With the conversion to Christianity of the Jew, John Pfefferkorn, who, in a circular publ. 1589, advocated the banishment of the Jews, the education of their children in the Christian religion, and the burning of all their books, the Old Testaments excepted, the war which had been going on towards the close of the 15th and the beginning of the 16th cent., between the Humanists and the adherents of the old, worn-out Scholastics, reached its height. On the side of Pfefferk., between whom and Reuchlin several encounters had taken place (comp Ernst. Theod. Mayerhoff, Reuchlin and his times: Berl., 1830), were ranged the Dominicans, Arnold von Tungarn, Ortwinus Gratius and Jacob Hochstraten, of Cologne; and on that of Reuchlin, a numerous host of Humanists. Of the many satires issued by the Reuchlinists, the Epistolæ obscurorum virorum is worthy of special mention. Written in barbarous monkish Latin, they describe the mode of thought and action pursued by the Obscurantists, and, in piquant style, paint the immoralities, stupid ignorance, and pretended piety of Popes, monks and clergy. So successfully did they imitate the character and language of the monks that the Franciscans and Dominicans of England, and even Erasmus (in a letter to Mart. Lipsius, 5th Sept., 1528; Ernsmi, Opp. III., 2, Pag. 1110) supposed they had been written in vindication of the monks, and against Reuchlin, whilst a Dominican prior had some copies printed and circulated in ordinis honorem. Enraged by the discovery of their mistake, they raised a large outcry against the Letters, and succeeded in obtaining from Pope Leo X. a Brief of Condemnation, 15th March, 1517 (see Ed. of Epistolæ obscur. vir. by E. Münch, Lpz., 1827, Introd., p. 31, comp. Pag. 504; Oratio de virtute clavium et Bulla condemnatoria Leonis). Pfefferkorn, in 1516, issued an Apology against the Letters, and the monks the Lamentationes obscurorum virorum, Col., 1518.

These Epist., which in type, binding, and general appearance, as well as in substance, caricatured the monks, were published in three books, at different times, places, and with different titles. The first of them, in 1515, at Hagenau, by Wolfgang Angst, or Anxst, a learned printer, poet, and philologist; its title: Epistolæ obscurorum virorum ad venerabilem virum Mag. Ortuinum, Daventriensen, Coloniae Agrippinæ bonas litteras docentem, variis et locis et temporibus missæ ac demum in volumen coactæ: the second, by Froben, in Basel, 1517, with the title: Epistolæ obscurorum virorum ad Mag. Ortuinum Gratium, Daventriensen, Coloniae latinas litteras proficientem, non illæ quidem veteres et prius visæ, sed et novæ et illis prioribus elegantia, argutiis, lepore ac venustate longe superiores; the third, later, and smaller in extent, with the title: Epist. obscur. vir. a diversis ad diversos scriptorum et nil præter lusum jocumque continentium, in arrogantes sciolos, plerumque famæ bonorum virorum obtrectatores, et sanioris doctrinæ contaminatores, Pars. III. That the authors of these Epist. sometimes went beyond the truth, cannot be denied. Luther in a letter to John Lange (De Wette, L.'s Lett., I., p. 37), puts them on a level with the Supplicatio contra Theologastros, which he terms Ineptias, and adds: nimis apparet, a non modesto ingenio effictas, prorsusque eandem olentes testam, quam Epistolæ obscurorum virorum; also in a letter to Spalatin, of these Ineptias he says: eundem vel similem histrionem sui testantur autorem. quem et Epistolæ obscurorum virorum. Votum ejus probo, sed opus non probo, quod nec a conviciis et contumeliis sibi temperat.

Touching the authorship of these Epist. it was at first attributed either to Erasmus, or Reuchlin, or Hutter, &c. The latest investigations prove that neither Erasmus nor Reuchlin had anything to do with them; that the learned printer, Angst, and Crotus Rubianus had most to do with the first book, and Crotus Rubianus, Hutter, and Pirkheimer, perhaps, also Angst, Eoban Hess, Franz v. Sickingen, and other humanists, with the second, and that the third was completed on the Ebernburg. The original conception of the Epist. is ascribed by some to Angst, by others, to Crotus Rubianus. On the authors, comp. MEUSEL, Hist.-lit.-bibliog. Mag. St. 7, 1788, Zürich, p. 38; PANZER, Ulrich v. Hutten in a literary view, Nürmb., 1798, p. 40; MOHRKE, in the Encycl. by Ersch and Gruber, Art. Angst; MÜNCH's Ed. of Epistolæ, Introd., p. 28, also his exploits of Franz v. Sickingen, Stuttg., 1827, I., p. 348. The best editions of the Epist. are those pub. in Frankfurt, in 1643, in London, and by Maittaire (London, 1710). Of the modern edit. the best by H. W. ROTERMUND (Ham., 1827), and by MÜNCH. NEUDECKER. — Ermentrout.

Equitius, Abbot of several cloisters in the Province Valeria, lived in the 6th cent. Though not ordained, he frequently preached in various towns and cities, clothed in poor garments, and riding on the meanest horse he could get. The Scriptures were his constant companion. The Pope, though not pleased with his exercise of an unauthorized ministry, allowed him to go on without interference on account of the holiness of his life. Gregory the Great, in his Dialogues I., 4, speaks in detail of his life and actions. According to Alanus, the Waldenses, when they began to preach without the consent of the hierarchy, claimed him as their antecedent authority. HERZOG. — Ermentrout.

Erasmus, Desiderius, an illegitimate son of his mother, Margaretta, and a young man by the name of Gerhard, born 28th October, in Rotterdam. In his sixth year, he sang in the choir of the cathedral Church in Utrecht, where, and also at Deventer, he was put to school. When 12 years old his parents died, and he was sent to Herzogenbusch to prepare for the ministry, and, from thence, after two years' sojourn, to Gouda (South Holland). Having spent five years in the cloister, Erasmus (1486-91) accepted an invitation from the Bishop of Cambray to travel with him to Rome. In Feb., 1492, Erasmus became a priest; in 1496 he went to Paris to study scholastics, and through one of the English students whom he taught for a livelihood — Lord Montjoie — he passed over to England, where he made the acquaintance of Thomas Morus, chancellor, and Prince Henry, the future King of that country. At the end of a little more than a year, he returned to France and the Netherlands, and, in 1506, journeyed to Italy. Having received the Doctorate at Turin, he sojourned a while in Bologna and Venice, where, under the patronage of the celebrated printer, Aldus Manutius, he published his Adagia, and an edition of Terence and Pliny. Called to England by Henry VIII., he issued his ἑρξώμων μωρίας, laus stultitiæ. Devoted to authorship, in the year 1516, he retired to Basel, and pub. the first printed edition of the New Test.,¹ which, in his own lifetime, went through five new editions.¹ Beside the text, he added an elegant Latin transl. dedic. to Leo X. His Ratio s. method. comp. perveniendi ad veram theol. 1522, he also sent to Leo X., from whom he had received a brief of approbation for his transl. of the N. T. His Adnotationes in N. T., Basel, 1522, and his Paraphrases of the N. T. were, and still are in part, highly esteemed; though, it must be confessed, his elegant paraphrase of the text sometimes weakens its sense. His exegetical labors, as Melancthon acknowledges, prepared the way for a more tasteful treatment of theology and the overthrow of the dry scholastic method.² Around him in Basel, where, from 1521, he determined permanently to reside, was gathered a numerous company of learned men and admirers, such as John Amerbach, John Œcolampad., Bishop Christopher of Utenheim. That Erasmus prepared the way, both negatively and positively, for the Reformation, cannot be denied; negatively, by lashing with his merciless satire the ignorance and laziness of the monks, the barbarousness of the scholastic system, and the follies and immoralities of the age; positively, by pointing to the Scriptures as the pure fountain of Christian knowledge which should be opened to all, and to Christ as the source of salvation.³ Though he was better adapted by nature to appreciate those portions of the Christian system which accorded with the wisdom of the ancients⁴ than to penetrate the depths of its mysteries, it would be a mistake to regard him as the Voltaire of his age. His contemporaries, the monks, declared that Erasmus laid the egg, and Luther hatched it.⁵ In his correspondence with Zwingli,⁶ E. took occasion to warn him against the extravagances of those who, like Luther and Hutten, went too far. Between Luth. and Eras. there was not much conge-niality. Religious convictions and deep earnestness were the mainspring of L.'s actions, whilst E. aimed chiefly at the improvement of taste and the spread of knowledge. The one was a man for the people, the other for the learned. As early as the Reuchlinian contest, E. had not evinced that energy which his hatred of the obscurantism⁷ of the monks warranted his friends in looking for, and, when the theses controversy broke out (1515-17), he regarded it at first as a fight among the monks, but later, recognizing in L. a co-worker against the ignorance of the times, expressed a more favorable opinion.⁸ Whilst L. in private letters to his friends (to Spalatin,⁹ and to John Lange,¹⁰ Prior in Erfurt, March, 1517), expressed his apprehensions touching Erasmus, and feared he did not make enough of Christ and divine grace, he vindicated his merits against the advocates of ignorance. In reply to a friendly letter (28th March, 1519) from L.,¹¹ E. encouraged him in his preaching of the Gospel, but advised a moderate course, accommodation to the prejudices of his enemies, and a more respectful language towards the head of the Church.¹² Hutten, in order to drive E. into an open advocacy of the Ref., having changed the word "Luther" into "our Luther" in a letter from E. to the Elector Albert of Mayence, in which honorable mention had been made of L., and the stupidity of the monks censured as the fountain of evil,¹³ E. sought to separate himself from the Reformation.¹⁴ Still he did not wish to come into collision with L., whom he regarded as a powerful opponent.¹⁵ When hard pressed at Cologne (Dec., 1520) by the Elector Frederick the Wise, of Saxony, he gave utterance to the following well-known evasive reply: Lutherus peccavit in duobus, nempe quod tetigit coronam pontificis et ventres monachorum.¹⁶ His journey to Rome, whither he had

¹ Novum Instrumentum omne, diligenter ab Erasmo Roterdamo recognitum et emendatum, non solum ad græcam veritatem, verum etiam ad multorum utriusque linguæ codicum eorumque veterum simul et emendatorum fidem, &c., una cum annotationibus, quæ lectorem doceant quid et qua ratione mutatum sit.

¹ The second, 1519; the third, 1522 (into this he put 1 John 5:7, which he had omitted on critical grounds); the fourth, 1527; the fifth, 1535. See Wetsteni, Proleg. in N. T.: Amst., 1730, p. 132; Hug, Introd. to N. T., Vol. I, chap. 7.

² Comp. also Herder, who, although averse to all paraph., thought those of Erasmus worth their weight in gold, on account of their clear thought and beautiful language. Lett. on study of Theol. Luther, on the other hand, despised them, calling them Paraphroneses.

³ In quite reformatory style the preface to the P. of N. T. says: Judeorum est populum celare sua mysteria, qui in umbris vergebantur. Evangelici lux premi non sustinet. Olim in sancta sanctorum unus ingrediebatur sacerdos. At ubi templi velum in morte domini scissum est, ad ipsum usque Christum, qui vere sanctus est sanctorum et sanctificator omnium datus est omnibus aditus, et exaltatus a terra omnia trahit ad se, qui cupit omnes salvos facere. Exclamant indignum fucinus, si mulier aut coriarius loquatur de sacris litteris, at ego puellas quaedam audire mallet de Christo loquentes, quam quosdam summos vulgi opinione Rabbinos. . . . Equidem cupio (sacras litteras) in omnes verti linguas, &c.

⁴ Characteristic the passage in the Colloq. familiar. (Convivium religionum): sacris quidem litteris ubique primum debetur auctoritas, sed tamen ego nonnunquam offendo quodam vel dicta a veteribus vel scripta ab Ethnicis, etiam poetis, tam caste, tam sancte, tam divinitus, ut mihi non possim persuadere, quin peccus illorum, cum illa scriberent, numen aliquod bonum agita-

sanctorum, qui non sunt apud nos in catalogo. Proinde quum hujusmodi quædam lego de talibus viris, vix mihi tempero quin dicam: Sancte Socrates, ora pro nobis. At ipse mihi sapientissimo non tempero, quin bene ominer sanctæ animæ Maronis et Flucci.

⁵ Erasmus was frequently named by the enemies of the Reformation in connection with Luther.

⁶ Comp. OPP. ZWINGLI, ed. Schuler et Schulthess, VII., (Epist. lat., Pars., 1), p. 9, 12, 221, 222, 251, 307, 310. Amongst these only one letter (p. 12) from Z. to E., all the rest from the latter to the former.

⁷ Conflictationes illæ virulentæ inter Reuchlinum et hos, qui Jacobo Hoogstrato favebant, mihi majorem in modum displicuerunt.—(Epp. ed. Bas., p. 400).

⁸ He wrote, 1518, to Card. Wolsey: Adversus Lutherum aliquando fuimus iniquiores, ne quid invidia recideret in bonas litteras, quas volebatur amplius onerari.

⁹ Comp. Lett. to Spalatin, Oct. 19, 1516, in DE WETTE, I., No. XXII.

¹⁰ In DE WETTE, I., No. XXIX., comp. also the Lett. to Spalatin, Nov., 1517, No. 47, and 18; Jan. 1518, No. 53.

¹¹ He calls him a virum amabilem, himself fraterculum in Christo. See DE WETTE, I., No. 129.

¹² Epp., p. 244 (ed. Bas.).

¹³ Erasm. Epp. (ed. Bas.), p. 4011, Adolf. Müller, p. 280, 83.

¹⁴ Comp. Müller, p. 297, and particularly the excellent judgment of Melancthon, p. 298.

¹⁵ Epp. (ed. Bas.), bb. XV., p. 475.

¹⁶ See the representation of this in Spalatin's Annals, p. 28 (copied by Marheinecke, Hist. of Ger. Ref., I. p. 225).

been invited by Pope Hadrian VI. to a conference touching the Reformation of the Church, was interrupted at Constance by sickness. On his return to Basel, his refusal to grant an interview to Ulrich von Hutten (1522) caused some alienation of feeling between them,¹ which soon led to open hostilities. Hutten gave vent to his feelings in his Expostulatio, and Erasmus, in his Spongia. Circumstances soon compelled him to enter the list against Luther, who, in the year 1524, had written him a letter² not very complimentary to his theological knowledge. E. replied, May 5th,³ and prepared himself for a final attack. In semipelagian style he defended the freedom of the will against Augustine's doctrine de seruo arbitrio. Whilst ascribing the greater part of man's conversion to Divine grace, E. also left room for the action of man's free will. The enemies of L. greeted the treatise with jubilant joy, and Henry VIII. returned thanks to its author. L. read it with disgust,⁴ and soon answered it by his de seruo arbitrio. Erasmus replied,⁵ and thenceforth made it a point to satirize the Reformation which he could not stop. The friendly relations hitherto subsisting between E. and the Basel Reformer, Œcolampadius were now also disturbed,⁶ and, as the Ref. in Basel was accompanied with tumults and disorders, though personally safe, he yet thought it prudent to retire, in 1529, to Freiburg (in Breisgau), where he was joyfully welcomed by the celebrated jurist, Zasius, and honored by the most distinguished notabilities of Europe. Declining all ecclesiastical honors, the cardinal's hat, which Pope Paul III. offered, had no attractions for him. His contemplated visit to Brabant, at the invitation of the governess of the Netherlands, was prevented by sickness. His body, previously reduced by the gravel and gout, yielded to an attack of dysentery, July 12th, 1536. He died unaided by the ceremonies of the Church, calling on the name of Jesus. His remains were interred with great honors in the Basel Minster. He made his learned friend, Amerbach, heir of all his property. In the Basel Library are to be found several of his MSS., a copy of laus stulticie, with illustrations by Holbein, and other relics, and in the Museum a striking likeness by Holbein. His native city, Rotterdam, erected in his honor, a brazen column, 1622. As the Protestants regarded Luther a second Augustine, so the Catholics, Erasmus a second Jerome. Besides his theol. works already mentioned, are Enchiridion militis christiani (1508); Modus orandi Deum; de immensa Dei misericordia; de contemptu mundi; Expli- catio in Symb. Apostolorum et Decalogum; Institutio principis christiani; Pacis Querela; de sarcienda ecclesie concordia, &c. He edited the works of many of the Church-fathers (Irenæus, Origen, Cyprian, Lactantius, Chrysostom, Augustine, &c.), and by his translations of the Greek Fathers into Latin, promoted the study of Patriatics. In his Ecclesiastes, sive de ratione concionandi may be found a useful homiletic. Among his philological and philosoph. writings, besides the above-mentioned Adagia and laus stult., are edits. of various classics, Ciceronianus, s. de optimo genere decendi, Anti-Barbarus, Colloquia, and annotations to Curcius, Sueton., Terence, &c. His entire works were first pub. in Basel (1540) in 9 vols.; the best edit. by Clericus, Lugd. Batav., 1703-1706, in 11 vols. Of his letters — valuable for his biog. — various editions. He himself wrote a brief outline of his life (Ed. by Cler., Tom. I.); also his friend, Beatus Rhenanus. Besides these, worthy of mention: ADAMI VITÆ, p. 40-47; BAILE, Dictionnaire; LE CLERC, Bibliothèque choisie, T. V., p. 135; S. KNIGHT, The Life of Erasmus: Lond., 1726; JORTIN, Life of E.: Lond., 1758-60; BURIGNY, Vie d'Erasme: Par., 1757; ADOLF MÜLLER, Leben E. v. Rotterdam: Hamb., 1828, and by ULLMAN, in Stud. & Crit., 1829, II. 1; ERHARD, Art. Erasmi, in Ersch and Gruber., 36; STOCKMEIER, E. in his letters to Ronif. Amerbach, in Swiss Museum for Hist. Science; Frauenfeld, 1839, III., p. 73; ESCHER, in Raumer's Hist. Manual, 1843, p. 489; GLASIUS, on E. as a Reformer (Holland prize-treatise in vindic. of Christ. rel. in the Hague, 1850).

HAGENBACH. — Ermentrout.

Erasmus, the Saint, Bishop, and martyr; his oldest acts are in the Act. SS. of 2d June. According to the Bollandists, he was Bishop in a town of the Antiochian Patriarchate under Diocletian, and, having suffered much in Antioch and Sirmium, finally settled in Formia, Campania, where he died. Greg. the Great calls him a martyr, Ep. I., 8. This town having been laid waste by the Saracens in 9th cent., his bones, it is said, were transferred to Gaeta; other towns in Italy claim the possession of his remains. He is often painted with his entrails torn out, on which account he is invoked by the people as their patron against colic and the pains of child-bearing. In Italy and Portugal he is honored under the title of St. Elmo.

HERZOG. — Ermentrout.

Erastus, Thomas, properly Liebler or Lieber, born in 1524, according to some, in Baden, Switzerland, acc. to others, in Auggen, near Mühlheim and Badenweiler, in the upper part ¹ Comp. the one letter to Melanchth. (Ep. 703, p. 817), the other to Laurinus (Ep. 650, p. 748), and on the whole dispute: Stolz, Ulrich v. Hutten against Desiderius Erasmus, and Des. E. against U. v. H.: Aarau, 1813, 8vo.; and Stockmeier, Ulrich v. Hutten in "Beiträgen vaterländ. Geschichte": Basel, 1843, II., p. 99.

² DE WETTE, Vol. II., No. DXCII.

³ Not to be found in the ed. of E.'s letters. SECHENDORF, Commentar. de Lutherismo, I., p. 310.

⁴ DE WETTE, II., No. DCXXIX.

⁵ HYPERASPISTES, Diatriba adv. servum arbitrium

Lutheri. Comp. also the violent letter to Luther, April 11, 1526 (ed. BNA., p. 790).

⁶ Comp. HERZOG, Œcolampad. I., p. 120, and 123. An unfriendly opinion by Luther concerning Eras. in a letter to Œcolampad. (DE WETTE, II., No. DV.), in all probability first tended to lessen their friendship. Later, Luther advised Œcolampad. to effect a reconciliation (DE WETTE, II., No. DXCIII.). Characteristic is E.'s judgment on Œcolampad's treatise on the Lord's Supper (1525): Perlegi librum . . . mea sententia doctum, disertum et elaboratum, adderem etiam pium, si quid pium esse posset, quod pugnat cum sententia consensu que ecclesia, a qua dissentire periculosum est iudico.

of the then margraviate of Baden. The plague having driven him from Basle, where he studied theology, he retired to Bologna, and devoted himself there, and in Padua, to philosophy and medicine. After 9 years' residence in Italy, he became physician to the Count of Henneberg, in 1558, to the Elector Otto Henry of the Palatinate, and professor of medicine in Heidelberg. Whilst he vigorously exposed the astrological and magical errors of Paracelsus and others, he justified the infliction of capital punishment on witches. In the department of theology, he belonged to the Zwinglian school. At the command of Frederick III. (1559-1576), who nominated him a member of the Church-council, he attended the religious conference between Lutheran and Reformed theologians in Heidelberg, 1560, and in the cloister Maulbronn, 1564. He advocated the Swiss view of the Lord's Supper in a treatise: "Of the meaning of Christ's words, This is my body, &c.," and in a reply (1565) to Dr. John Marbach, of Strassburg, who had attacked his position. His view may be thus briefly stated: The Sacramental bread is a sign by which they, who partake of it, publicly profess that they are members of Christ, and put their trust alone in Him. Whilst all who eat of it are outwardly one, they only who partake inwardly of the crucified body of Christ, according to John 6 c., are really members of the body of which C. is the head. The "communion of the body of Christ," as mentioned in 1 Cor. 10: 16, he refers to the bread as being the sign, seal or pledge of such communion. Not only on the sacrament was he strictly Zwinglian and anti-Calvinistic, but also on Church-power, government, and discipline. Against the Calvinistic party of Heidelberg, which, since 1560, had sought to introduce the Presbyterian gov. and discipl., he together with some preachers and professors of philosophy, waged a determined, but, for the most part, unsuccessful warfare. He was the first to fall a victim to the newly-introduced system. His correspondence with the Transylvania Unitarians, exposed him to the charge of heresy touching the Person of Christ and the Trinity. Without openly informing him of their actions, his enemies procured his excommunication which was not recalled until 1575. According to his own declarations, he was farthest removed from Arianism, and believed unreservedly the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. In 1580 E. left Heidelberg and went to Basel, where he died, Jan. 1, 1583. E. is best known by his opposition to Church-discip. and the Presbyterian system. After his death the husband of his widow, published a treatise of his with the title: Explicatio gravisrimæ quæstionis, utrum excommunicatio mandato nitatur divino, an excogitata sit ab hominibus; to which Beza replied in his De presbyteris and De excommunicatione. His fame now reached England, where, in the 17th cent., arose a sect called Erastians. And to this day, both in England and Scotland, Erastianism is the name used to denote that system of thought which combats the autonomy of the Church and seeks to subject the Church to the State. E. himself regarded ecclesiastical excommunication as unscriptural and tyrannical, and was afraid that Presbyteries, if permitted to exercise it, might become Romish hierarchies, or Spanish inquisitions. Accordant with his views was the rule in Zürich, where the Christian magistrate governed the Church in the name of the congregation. Comp. Vierordt, Hist. of Ref. in the Grand-duchy of Baden, 1847, pp. 456, 474.

LECHLER. — Ermentrout.

Ernesti, John Augustus, D. D., the distinguished founder of the grammatico-historical system of interpretation, was b. Aug. 4, 1707, at Tennstädt, Thuringia, where his father, John Christopher, was preacher and inspector. He took his university course at Wittenberg and Leipsic. In L. he was chosen corrector in 1731, rector of the Thomas-School in 1734, prof. of ancient literat. in 1742, of elocution in 1756, of theology in 1758, and subsequently canon at Meissen, and decemvir and president of the Jablonowski Scient. Assoc. He died Sept. 11, 1781. His chief strength lay in philology, but in this sphere we can only name his ed. of Xenophon, Homer, Tacitus, &c., especially that of Cicero (first at Leips., 1738), his Opusc. oratoria (Leyd., 1762), Opusc. philol.-crit. (1764), and Initia doctr. solidioris (Lps., 1736). Prominent among his theol. works is the Instit. Interp. N. T. (2d ed., 1765; 3d, 1774; 5th, by Ammon, 1809). He lays down the principle, that "the verbal sense of the S.S. must be determined in the same way in which we ascertain that of other books." But, somewhat inconsistently with this theory, he adhered to the Church doctrine of inspiration, and sought to defend other doctrines of his confession (Lutheran. See his Opusc. theol., p. 1, 135). By his Prousiones de theol. histor. et dogmat. conjungendæ necessit. et modo universo, E. partly laid the basis of the science of Doctrine-history. His "neue," and "neueste theol. Bibliothek" (the former in 10 vols., Lps., 1760-9, 8vo., the latter in 4 vols., Lps., 1773-9), to which he was the largest contributor, anticipated later journalists, and did good service to theol. literature. Of his sermons, 4 vols. were printed, Lps., 1768-82. — (See TELLER, Ernesti's Verdienste. &c., Lpz., 1783; SEMLER, Zusätze zu Teller, Halle, 1783; S. v. VORST, Oratio de Ernesti, &c., Bat. Lugd., 1804. On his Interpres, CLAUSEN, Hermeneutik, p. 291, &c. Upon his doctrinal position, BAUR, Gesch. der Versöhnungslehre, p. 558. Cf. also, Biog. Univers., Ersch & Gruber, &c.).

HAGENBACH.*

Eschatology, in dogmatic language, means the doctrine of the last things. The phrase last things (εσχατα, novissima) includes every change, which conducts to the end of the period of this world, and of human existence connected with it. It has always been divided into the last things of the individual, and of this world. The immediate change of the individual, by which he is separated from the present course of the world, or passes over from the same into another mode of existence is death (see Art.), the dissolution of the earthly existence of the individual, a consequence of sin, of the voluntary disturbance of the communion of the human spirit with the divine, by which it becomes incapable of maintaining the natural material as its organism, and of pervading it with the life of the spirit, and by which too this material, and the course of the world generally become foreign to it, and opposed to its spiritualization. To this succeeds a state, which in its relation to death on the one hand, and to the resurrection, or abolition of death on the other, is called the middle or intermediate state (see Art.). To think of this as a state of unconscious repose, or death sleep (Weizel, Stud. u. Krit., 1836, p. 915), is at variance with the idea of spirit, and by no means requires the epithet, κοιμησάμενος (fallen asleep). Nor does the Pauline passage, 2 Cor. 5 : 3, refer to a perfect incorporeity, which is the case, too, with other passages cited for the purpose. Luke 16 : 23, on the contrary, indicates a corporeity, in its nature, of course, corresponding with the whole state. This, however, substantially must be defined by its twofold relation to man's previous earthly existence, and to that which will succeed the æon, to which he will be introduced at the resurrection. As the result of the past, it will be well or evil, and he will have a susceptibility, or insusceptibility, for the proclamation and offer of salvation, which are perpetuated in the place of the departed, in consequence of Christ's descent into hell; both, too, in very different grades, and with the conviction that they have their ground respectively in the moral relations, which obtained during their earthly existence, which presupposes a wakeful recollection, and a real identity of self consciousness, that is immortality. As the result of the other relations, the intermediate state, is to be thought of as an invigoration of the spirit on the part of those who have brought spiritual life with them,—as an inward sifting and purifying of such as are in want of it—as a ripening for a decision on the part of those who are yet undecided—and as an elaboration of those, who have been received there, in a good or bad direction, so that they may be prepared for a resurrection to life, or to damnation, and for the various grades of glorification, or the reverse. The resurrection, however, is not alone determined, either in the one way or the other, by subjective maturity, but depends also upon changes which affect the whole: the first, that of the righteous, will be consequent upon the coming of Christ, who will destroy the power of the antichristian world, restrain the influence of Satan, and bring about an ethico-physical state of this earthly life, that will be the prelude of the glorification, or restoration, by which those who have been faithful unto death, will be awakened to life, the saints who are then living will be changed as in the twinkling of an eye, and all will be caught up to Christ, that, in immediate efficient powerful communication with him, they may carry on and complete the further development of Christianity to perfection in all truth and purity and joy (1 Cor. 15; 1 Thess. 4; Rev. 20). The millennium (comp. Chiliasmus)—a period, which, by means of the powerful, uninterrupted, all-pervading influences of revelations and communications from on high, and the surpassing spread, and the universal, if even relative, perfection of Christianity (see Art.), will prepare the way for the last decision, just as the extensive and intensive powerful working of the spirit will prepare the way for, and make possible the decision which must precede the millennium. This last decision, however, will follow the final reaction of the antichristian power again unbound, whose destruction and utter ruin will bring in its train the end of this æon, the close of this world period (συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου): the passing away of the old heavens and the old earth, and the coming of the new, and the spiritualization of the whole, by the full revelation of the power of the Lord, who, after the general resurrection, will hold the final judgment, and will determine the destiny of all the dead, and of all who may then be living, that in the new æon, they may either enjoy the happiness prepared for the saints in glory, or endure the pain of the wicked, who, with their head, will be cast into the lake of fire prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. 25 : 41, 46; Rev. 20 : 15, comp. 10), both with corresponding corporeity.

Thus, the parts of the doctrine of eschatology are: 1) Death and the intermediate state; 2) the millennium and the first resurrection; 3) the end of the world, and the restoration with the general resurrection, and the final judgment, determining the destiny of the righteous and the wicked of that æon. In all three, however, there will be a manifestation of Christ, a parusia, or epiphany: in the death of believers (John 14 : 3) and in the middle state or hades (1 Pet. 3 : 19; 4 : 6), with continued efficiency; for the destruction of Antichrist, and the establishment of the Christocracy; and finally for the last judgment, with the twofold resurrection (John 5 : 28; Matt. 25 : 31). This manifestation will be partly in the invisible (death and hades) and partly in the visible world (in 2 and 3); the last the most glorious. As, however, in the O. T. prophecies, the coming of Christ in the flesh, and his coming in glory, or for the performance of the work of redemption in self-denials and humiliations, and for the establishment of his kingdom in glory, still flow into each other, so too in the N. T. prophecies, his future second coming for the establishment of his kingdom, and his third appearance for the final judgment, and, indeed, all his manifestations, as judge for the protection of his people and the punishment of his enemies, not excepting the judgment upon Jerusalem, are spoken of in such a mixed up way, that it was impossible to distinguish the different grades and periods until the apocalypse of St. John furnished the analogies, as was done previously for the O. T. by the prophecy of Daniel.

This view of eschatology obtained already substantially in the first century of Christian chronology, differently modified according to the theological tendencies (fanatical sensual Chiliasm on the one side, and Platonizing and Spiritualizing interpretations on the other). The second coming of Christ, with all that depended upon it, was generally expected and desired as near at hand, until, in the first place, the intrusion of the Roman empire into Christianity, and afterwards the Church and State construction of things, the Roman-Germanic Christocracy, the alliance of Popery with the empire, pretending to be the government of Christ, forbade such hopes. This unfounded anticipation of the kingdom of Christ to be exhibited in Popery, or some such constitution, which, however, gave no satisfaction to spiritually minded persons, at length led to a reaction, and the expectation and longing for the establishment of Christ's kingdom were strengthened into prophecy, not, indeed, without fanatical excrescences (Joachim and the Franciscans). In the Romish Church, the middle state was interpreted and turned to account (see Purgatory) for the advantage of the hierarchy, and, as was often the case before, salvation or destruction were taught in the sense of churchly orthodoxy and ascetic holiness. In the time of the Reformation, the eschatological questions were again warmly discussed. The evangelical Church, occupying intermediate ground, rejected both Anabaptistic fanatical Chiliasm and the Roman doctrine of purgatory, and took, in regard to both questions, a decidedly negative position, but in it, as it regards the original question, was not altogether correct. Here, for evangelical Christianity, appropriating to itself the Word of God on all sides, there was a great temptation to fill up this felt and acknowledged deficiency, and to bring out the whole apostolical prophetic view, with all the slighter intimations, in regular connection. In this, mystical theosophic individuals and parties took the lead. The pietistic movement took this direction, partly in the way of ardent enthusiasm, as in the case of Petersen, the promulgator of the restoration of all things, partly in a quiet prudent way, as in that of Spener, with his Chiliasmic views, keeping aloof from everything fanatical. The Wurtemberg divine and theosoph, Bengel, went beyond this; unlocking the apocalypæ, he exhibited the millennium in a clearer light than any before him. Oetinger, in this respect, following Bengel, although as it regards the middle state, more of a Swedenborgian, has in a remarkable way thrown light upon every part of eschatology, and especially has brought out the ἀποκαταστάσις πάντων most satisfactorily, as well as it respects its accordance with the Scriptures, as its inward connection with saving truth. — Whilst rationalism fritters eschatology away in a naked immortality of the soul, and pantheism sets it aside, evangelical theologians have been preparing the way for a full and comprehensive exhibition of the doctrine. Men, such as F. F. v. Meyer (respecting Scheol), Menken, &c., pointed to theologians the way in which Lavater and Stilling brought out their rich, if even when sifted they are to some extent deficient, views. J. P. Lange, in his "Land der Herrlichkeit," and in his bibl. theol. Erörterungen, appears as a spirited champion of the realistic mode of thinking. In a very peculiar way Dr. Rothe, in his Ethics, has sought to bring the eschatological problem to a higher solution, and certainly has given a rich and valuable contribution to the thorough construction of the doctrine, and for the understanding of many scriptural thoughts and intimations more or less obscure, both as it regards the intermediate state, as the continued development and activity of the soul in the new æon.

Well worthy of notice, too, is the concise eschatological essay, at the close of the admirable, and too little known work of Dr. Petersen on the Church, and the statement of the doctrine by Martensen, theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1852. — Nor should we overlook the philosophical essays upon this subject, especially those of the younger Fichte, and of Dr. C. F. Weise, and also Becker's, excellent and instructive collection of views upon the state of the dead. — As regards the questions which relate to the eschatology of the whole, the doctrine of the millennium, and of all that, according to prophecy, has preceded, and must follow it, Prof. Auberlen, availing himself of ancient and modern investigations, and improving upon them, has, with remarkable thoroughness and clearness, discussed and answered them in his work, "The prophet Daniel in his relation to the revelation of St. John," in which he has given us a true and triumphant criticism upon old and new errors, and especially upon Hengstenberg's misplacing the millennium between the 8th and 18th cent.

If we compare the old and new methods of treating the eschatological doctrine, we will have the antithesis of abrupt immediate catastrophies and of more progressive development. The older view has its justification in the prophetic statement; the relative truth of the more modern rests upon the fact, that in the history of the kingdom of God, a careful investigation reveals connection and interposition. Faithfulness to the word of revelation, compels us to admit disastrous epochs, moments of new revelations and the introduction of new divine facts, just as all analogy and the sacred history itself requires the acknowledgment on every side of preparations and precedents, the harbingers of something greater which is yet to come, and subjective as well as objective interpositions and arrangements for the new. — It is not to be mistaken that, in our day, the eschatological investigation is pursued with greater earnestness and effort than ever before, and that the completion of the doctrine is pressing forwards — a proof amongst others, that we are "hasting to the coming of the day of the Lord." — (Besides the works cited, comp. also NITZSCH, Syst. der christl. Lehre. 4. Hauptst., § 209, &c. KRABBE, Lehre von der Sünde und vom Tode. BAUMGARTEN = CRUCIUS, Comp. der christl. Dogmengesch., Bd. 2, § 367, and others). KLING. — Dr. Wolff.

Esdrælon, Jezreel, Ἐσδρηλὼν or ὠμ (Judith 1 : 8 ; 4 : 6) ; later, Ἐσδράηλα, Stradela (itiner. hieros.) ; nearer the original form, Ἰεσραῖλ (LXX.) Ἰεσράηλα, and εἰλα (Jos. Ant.), Ἰεζραῖλ (Euseb.) ; furthest from the original Ἀζάρη and Ἀζάρου, and Ἀζάρου πόλις ; during the crusades Gerinum parvum in Guil. Tyr., 22, 26. — 1) The city of Jezreel, in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. 17 : 16, 19 : 18. In 15 : 56 mention is made of a Jezreel in Judah, where doubtless Ahinoam, David's second wife, was born, 1 Sam. 25 : 43), became Ahab's residence (though Samaria remained the capital, 1 Kings 18 : 46 ; 21 : 1), hence the abode of Jezebel during her widowhood (1 Kings 9 : 15–37 ; 10 : 1–11). Euseb. (itiner. hieros., p. 586) says it lay between Scythopolis and Legio, 12 Rom. miles from S. (others say 10). Its present Arabic name is Zerim, or Zarasin. The adjacent fountain, named in 1 Sam. 29 : 1. is probably the modern Tubania (Guil. Tyr., 22, 26), called 'Ain Jâlûd (see ROBINSON, Palest., II., 318; III., 163, &c.).—2) The plain of E., on the E. side of which lay the city, resembles in outline, a right-angled triangle. The Kison flows down its centre from E. to W., and passes finally through a ravine formed by Carmel and the mts. of Galilee into the valley of Acre, and thence to the sea. The valley is about 24 m. long, and 12–15 broad from N. to S. Being watered by numerous streams it was once very fertile and beautiful; now it is an uncultivated waste. From its comparative extent, it is sometimes called μέγα πεδίων (Joseph). It bears other names, also, from corresponding points of interest in it, as the valley of Megiddo (2 Chron. 35 : 22, &c.); campus legionis from Legio Maximianopolis (el Lejjûn); in the middle ages, from the village and castle of Saba, planum Sabæ; the modern Arabs call it Merj Ibn 'Amîr (ROBINSON, II., 253). The boundary between Galilee ran through its centre; and the road from Gal. through Samaria to Jerusalem, passed through the valley in a S. course, whilst a little W. of this was the road from Damascus to Egypt. Hence the valley was the scene of many great battles; besides those mentioned in the Bible (Judges 6 : 33; 7 : 1, &c.; 1 Sam. 29 : 1; 31 : 1, &c.; 1 Kings 20 : 26, &c.; 2 Kings 9 : 17, &c.; 23 : 29; 2 Chron. 35 : 22; Judith 7 : 3) one between Vespasian and the Jews (Jos. B. J., IV.), and the Crusaders and Saracens. Here, in 1799, 25,000 Turks were beaten by 3000 French soldiers under Bonaparte and Kleber.

PRESSEL.*

Esnik, or Eznik, an Armenian theologian of the 5th cent., distinguished for his steadfast opposition to the enemies of Christianity. Incited by the zeal of his Church during that period in the study of the more earnest Hellenic literature, especially the Church Fathers, E. made a patristic tour through Mesopotamia to Constantinople. He was active, as a Bishop, at the renowned Synod of Artaschast. He died, at an advanced age, as B. of Bagrewand. (See SOMAL, quadrio della storia letter. di Armen., p. 22; NEUMANN, Gesch. d. armen. Lit., p. 42–44).—Nothing remains of his pen but his "Overthrow of Errors," in 4 books. The 1st is against the advocates of materialism (ὕλη); the 2d against the religion of the Persians; the 3d against Greek philosophy; the 4th against Marcion and the Manichæans. The first original ed. appeared in Smyrna, 1762; far better that of Venice, 1826 (forming a part of the Armenian Classics). Portions have been given in "ILLOEN's Zeitschr. f. d. histor. Theol.:" Bd. 4 (1834), p. 71–79, and in the "Bayerischen Annalen v. 23. Jan., 1834. The work of LE VAILLANT DE FLORIVAL, "Refut. d. différ. sectes d. païens par le docteur Ezniq:" Par., 1853, 8vo., is defective.

GOSCHE.*

Essenes, one of the three principal Jewish sects in the time of Christ. The meaning and etymology of the name uncertain; called by Philo, Ἐσσηνοί; by Josephus, Ἐσσηνοί; by Pliny, Esseni. Essa (Jos. Ant., XIII., 23) most likely derived from the Aræmaic ܥܨܢܐ, medicatus est,

"the curers" (θεραπεύται), so-called from the fact of their healing bodily ailments, and of their mode of life being a protest against the corruption of the world.—According to Philo (l. c., 876) and Josephus (Antiq., XVIII., 1, § 5), flourished in the time of Christ, in Palestine (Philo, l. c., "Παλαιστίνη καὶ Συρία," to be read Παλ. Συρίας, comp. Viger. ad Eus., H. E., VIII., 12), about 4000 in number, some of them separated from the rest of the Jews, and living in colonies on the Dead Sea (Plin., l. c., "ab occidente lacus litora Esseni fugiunt usque quæ nocent"), and others with them in cities and villages (comp. Jos. de B. J., II., 8, § 4, and Philo in Euseb. Præp. Ev., VIII., 11). Shut out from the temple on account of their rejection of sacrifices (Jos. Ant., XVIII., 1, § 5), they formed a strictly exclusive order (τάγμα). A double noviciate preceded a reception into it. The applicant (ὁ ζητών, Jos. de B. J., II., 8, § 7), who lived one year on the outside of it, had to practise its manner of life, and into his hands were put an axe (symbol of labor), an apron (a sign of purification), and a white garment (the usual dress of the order). The year past, and due proof of worthiness, being given, they were permitted to take part in the washings, but not in the repasts or meals. Another probation of two years over, and promising by affirmation to honor God, to practise justice, to hurt no one, to be obedient to their superiors and never to reveal the secrets of the order, they were received. The members were divided according to the time of their entrance into four classes (Philo, l. c., p. 877—particularly Jos. de B. J., II., 8, § 6, 10), which were separated from each other by an impassable gulf. The superiors enjoyed unlimited rule, no one being able to do anything, works of mercy excepted, without their command (Jos. de B. J., II., 8, § 6). There existed also a special judicial tribunal which had to do particularly with the excommunication of unworthy members (Jos. l. c., 8, 8).

They had all things in common, even the common treasury presided over by superintendents. Every town had a director to attend to the wants of strangers, and persons not of their number received support (Jos. de B. J., II., 8, § 3). Abstinence and labor were the chief features of their life. Pleasure was regarded as an evil, luxury was condemned, anointing with oil looked upon as an unclean thing. Though the great majority of them abstained from marriage, they took the children of others and educated them in their system (Jos. l. c., § 2, 3.—Plinius, l. c.: "Gens sola, sine femina, omni venere abdicata"—"ita per sæculorum millia, incredibile dictu, gens æterna, in qua nemo nascitur; tam secundu illis aliorum vitæ poenitentia est"). Some of them, however, allowed marriage under certain restrictions (Jos. l. c., § 3). Agriculture and the peaceful arts constituted their chief pursuits; the making of warlike instruments, trade and commerce were discarded (Philo, l. c., 876, sqq.). Slavery was prohibited; so, too, the taking of oaths, except in the form above-mentioned. Before the rising of the sun, they indulged in no secular conversation, and the day was begun by prayer. Then followed labor to the fifth hour, the holy ablutions in cold water, and the meal, which was enlivened by prayer and religious exercises. Work again to twilight and another meal. The Sabbath they observed strictly, but allowed no bloody sacrifices (Philo, l. c., 876; Jos. Ant., XVIII., 1, § 5; — comp. DÄHNE, Hist. of Jew. Alex. Relig. Philos., I., 491).

According to Philo (l. c., 877), the Essenes, whilst ignoring the logical and metaphysical parts of philosophy, paid great attention to ethics (Jos. de B. J., II., 8, § 7). In doctrine, they affiliated more or less with the Jewish-Alexandrian school, and the asceticism of the sects. The body they regarded as the prison-house of the soul; death freed the latter from its confinement, which winged its flight to heaven, whilst the matter of the former for ever perished (Jos. B. J., II., 8, § 11). Great attention was paid to angelology (Jos., I, c. § 7). They did not believe in an absolute fate, as Gfrörer supposes (II., 319); the passage in Jos. seeming to sanction it ("τὸ δὲ τῶν Ἐσσηνῶν γένος πάντων τῇ ἐμαρμένῃ κυρίαν ἀποφαίνεται καὶ μηδὲν ὁ μὴ κατ' ἐκείνης ψῆφον ἀνθρώποις ἀπαντᾷ," Ant. XIII., 5, § 9), must be explained by that in Ant. XVIII., 1, § 5, "Ἐσσηνοὶς δ' ἐπὶ μὲν θεῷ καταλιπεῖν φιλεῖ τὰ πάντα ὁ λόγος." Nor can it be said that their saluting the rising sun with prayers was derived from Parsism. They did not pay divine worship to the sun, but merely regarded it as a symbol of the divinity.—Whilst some have identified the Essenes and Therapeutæ, as Bellermann and Gfrörer, (the latter, however, admitting some modifications, whilst the former allows no difference), others can discover no relationship at all between them, as NEANDER, Church Hist., I., 1, 73. The same tendencies and wants, however, which in Egypt established the religious philosophy of the Jewish-Alexandrine school and the Therapeutæ, gave rise to the Essenes in Palestine, who differed from the Therap. in this, that whilst the latter indulged in a merely contemplative asceticism, the former joined with it an active, laborious life.

The records touching the history of the Essenes are very meagre. According to Jos. Ant., XIII., 5, § 9, they arose about the middle of the second cent., before Christ. The first-named member of the order is a certain Judas who lived in the age of Antigonos, about 110, B. C. (Jos. Ant., XIII., 9). That Christ had any intercourse with them is a mere arbitrary hypothesis. Retiring towards the East, they came into contact with Christianity, and, in passing over to it, carried with them some of their peculiarities. Thus Epiphanius (Hær., XIX.) makes mention of the Ossenes, a provincialism, no doubt, for Essenes. Though the pseudo-Clementines show traces of the Essene element, it is impossible to tell how far they may have been influenced by it. Later no vestige of its power can be discovered; the supposition of RAUMER, Hist. of the Hohenstauffen, I., 473 (from VITRIAC. Hist. hier., 1062, and BROCARDI. Descript., 23) that the kingdom of Jerusalem embraced Essenes, being erroneous.

Literature: — Trium scriptorum illustrium de tribus Judæorum sectis syntagma ed. JACOBUS TRIGLANDIUS, Delphis, 1703, II., fol. 4to. — BELLERMANN, Hist. Acc. of Ess. and Therap.:

Berlin, 1821. — JOS. SAUER, De Essenis et Therapeutis disquisitio: Vratislaviæ, 1829. — GFRÖRER, Philo and the Alexandrine Theosophy, II., 299. A. F. DÄHNE, Hist. Ex. of Jewish-Alex. Religious Phil., I., 467, &c. — CREDNER on Ess. and Ebionites, in WINER's Journal for Scientific Theol., I., 211. — Sources: — PHILO's "Quod omnis probus liber" ed. HÆSCHELIUS: Francof. 1691, p. 876, sq. — (ed. MANGEY: Lond., 1742, Vol. II., p. 457). — EUSEBIUS' Præp. Evang., VIII., 77. — Jos. de B. J., II., 8, § 2-13.; Ant. XIII., 5, § 9; XV., 10, § 4, 5; XVIII., 1, § 2-6; PLINY's Hist. Nat., V., 17; SOLINUS' Polyhistor. XXXV., 7-12; PORPHYRIUS de abstin. ed. Rhoer: Traj., 1767, p. 331. UHLHORN. — Ermentrout.

Esther — the Persian name of the Jewish Hadassa, the wife of King Ahasuerus. After her marriage, her name, signifying a myrtle, was changed into the Persian, Sitareh, which, allied to the Greek, ἀστὴρ, designated the queen, by the epithet of the star. It is also the title of that canonical book of the Old Testament which narrates the delivery and preservation of the Jews, through her influence as queen on the Persian throne, in one of their greatest extremities.

This book opens with a scene in Shushan, the Persian residence of the king (1: 2). Ahasuerus, whose kingdom, embracing 127 provinces, extended from India to Ethiopia (1: 1), and received tribute from the isles of the West (10: 1), made a feast of 180 days' duration, for his princes and nobles, and this ended with one for all the people in his palace, which continued 7 days, whilst Vashti, the queen, entertained the women in like manner (1: 3-8). These festivities were suddenly interrupted by Vashti, who refused obedience to the king's command, that she should show her beauty before the people and the princes (1: 10-22). The king now looked round him for a new queen, and of all the women presented for his inspection, he selected Esther, who, her father and mother being dead, had been adopted as his own daughter by Mordecai the Jew. Her uncle, aware of the opposition that always obtains between a mere civil polity and a religious government, and yet indulging the hope that his niece might be of service to her people, cautioned her against any betrayal of her religion, and the better to accomplish his purposes, entered the service of the king (chapt. 2). A storm now began to lower over the Jews. Mord. had refused to bow the knee to Haman, the Agagite, who was the king's chief favorite (3: 2). The furious wrath of H. demanded satisfaction, and he obtained a decree from the throne that all the Jews in the land should be put to death (3: 15). Mord., fully conscious of the impending danger, rent his clothes, put on sackcloth with ashes (4: 1), and called upon Esther to intercede with the king (4: 8). Overcome by his entreaties and threats (4: 13, 14), after having, together with all the Jews in Shushan, fasted for three days (4: 15, 16), she appeared before the king, and found so much favor in his sight, that he promised to give unto her the half of his kingdom (5: 1-3). At the banquet which she had requested the king and Haman to attend (5: 4), Est. obtained a renewal of this promise, and the acceptance of an invitation to another feast (5 : 8). Meanwhile, two events conspired to bring things to a crisis. Instigated by pride and the evil counsel of his wife, Seresh, H. erected a gallows, on which he expected to obtain the decree of the king, that Mord. should be hung (5 : 9-14). Ahasuerus, wishing to honor M. for discovering a conspiracy against his life, H. became an instrument for the elevation of the man he hated, as may be read in c. 6, whilst he himself was hung from the gallows his own hands had made (c. 7). Mord. now took the place H. had occupied (8 : 12), and Esther obtained for her people the privilege of defending themselves against their enemies (c. 8), many of whom were slain, whilst Haman's ten sons were hung (c. 9). The Jews celebrated their deliverance with great rejoicings, those in Shushan on the fifteenth of the month Adar, those in other parts, on the fourteenth. The festival of Purim, which commemorates this event, was established by Mord. and Esther (c. 9), and, though plainly to be distinguished from the great festivals which have reference to the divine origin of the Jewish nation and the sanctuary of Jehovah, must not be invested with a completely worldly character, as is done by Buxtorff (Synag. Judaica, pp. 554, 560, 561), J. J. Rambach, ad Esth., 9 : 31, and by Hengstenberg (Christol., II., 567), and Luthardt (John's Gosp., II., 4), who also affirms that Jesus did not go up to the festival of Purim, though that mentioned in John 5 : 1, could not well have been any other. Whilst it must be admitted that the celebration of Purim frequently degenerated into riotous excesses, it may well and justly be asked, whether these were any worse, the Gospel being the criterion, than the Pharisaic rigorism not unfrequently connected with the keeping of the Sabbath. In its original institution, it was an expression of national joy, which showed itself in giving presents to the poor, and in the interchange of kindly offices (9 : 19, 22), nor was fasting altogether pretermitted (Buxtorff, I. c., p. 554; Relandi, Antiquit., p. 498). When our Saviour went up to the feast of Purim, he wished to teach the Jews that their preservation as a nation, which was so providentially begun in the time of Ahasuerus, could only be completed and perpetuated by Him as the source of unending life. And so He healed the sick man at the pool of Bethesda, who was a representative of His people (comp. Hengstenberg, I. c. 2, p. 568).

In the way of reply to Oeder, Corradi, and Semler, who first threw suspicion on the historical character of this book (see Baumgarten's Comm. de fide libri Estheræ, p. 4, 5), to de Wette and Winer, who have done something towards vindicating it, and to Ewald, who regards it as a legend (Geschichte Israels, I., 254-256; III., 2, 258-263), it is to be said that the book itself not only refers to original sources (c. 9 : 20, 29, 30, 32; 10 : 2; comp. 2 : 23; 6 : 1), but is remarkable for accuracy and precision of statement (c. 1 : 16, 17; 2 : 3, 14, 21; 4 : 5; 7 : 9; 9 : 7-10), that a comparison of it with various apochryphal additions (comp. Zunz, die gottesdienst. Vorträge der Juden, pp. 121, 122; Ewald, I. c., III., 2, 264, 265) brings out in bold regard., I. c., pp. 63-76), and that its account of Persian institutions and manners is so accurate that two most learned students of Oriental history, Heeren (Ideen, I., 1, 132) and Rosenmüller (Biblische Alterthumskunde, I., 1, 376), declare it a reliable source for Persian antiquities (comp. Comment., pp. 77-113). Besides there is every reason to believe that modern researches into the antiquities of Mesopotamia will contribute to the vindication of this book. Of them can already be mentioned the deciphering of the name of Xerxes in the cuneated letters; which name, according to Lassen (see die alt-persischen Keilinschriften von Persepolis, p. 33) = Kshârâs, who adds the remark that the royal name of our book, Ahaschverosh, is a Hebrew softening of the original Xerxes, and thus seems to strengthen the supposition of J. J. Scaliger, that the Ahasuerus of Esther was the Xerxes of the Greeks (see Comment., pp. 124-151). Another proof from the same source: it cannot be doubted but that in Esther, 6 : 8, the words "crown-royal" are to be regarded as a continuation of the preceding sentence, and must be referred to the horse, and yet, Aben Ezra excepted, all have supposed that the crown-royal must have been worn by the man himself. Now Layard has discovered that the horses on Mesopotamian memorials are richly and variously decorated — not simply horses used for wagons, but for riding, these latter having head-dresses (see Nineveh and its Remains, pp. 208, 472, Fig. XV.). Does not this go to prove the credibility of the book of Esther?

But if this book be considered a portion of the inspired literature of the Jews, all objections must be waived. What relation does it sustain to the divine revelation? Its chief characteristic seems to be the non-mention of the divine name. Zunz remarks: "Whilst it mentions the Persian king 1187 and his empire 26 times, it mentions not once that of God" (I. c. p. 15). Though Luther believed the history it contains (Carpzov's Introductio in libros historicos, V. T., p. 354), he still wrote of it: quavis hunc librum habeant in canone, dignior omnibus me iudice qui extra canonem habentur (De servo arbitrio Oper. ed. Jena., III., 182). If we regard this silence as intended to glorify the works of God — and, indeed, the book itself forces this view on us — we can adopt Carpzov's explanation of it: sileatur nomen dummodo Dei in libro opera, miracula, beneficia celebrentur, agnosci sane inde Deus poterit (I. c., p. 358). — Our Lord crowned with honor the silent doing of duty (Matt. 20 : 6-13), and Peter recommends a quiet, meek spirit (1 Pet. 3 : 1-4). Is not this the character of the two persons who figure most conspicuously in this beautiful drama? whilst they exhibit an undying love for their people. M.'s inflexible opposition to Haman sprang from the fact that, whilst he himself stood related to the family of King Saul (see 2 : 5, comp. 1 Sam. 9 : 1; 2 Sam. 16 : 5), H. was a descendent of that Amalekite king whom Saul had been ordered to destroy (see 1 Sam. 15 : 20, 32), and so one of those people against whom Jehovah had declared eternal war (Exod. 17 : 15, 10; Numb. 24 : 20) — an Edomite (Gen. 36 : 12, 16), an original enemy of the Israelites

(Gen. 25:23). Espousing the cause of their nationality, their conduct must not be considered as the result of a revengeful spirit, but as a necessary self-defence. In not mentioning the name of that God in whom they trusted, they did but imitate Ilm who, in their circumstances, quietly fulfilled His purposes. Filled with the Spirit, the inspired writer of this book mentioned not His name. We cannot, therefore, agree with Hävernicks, who only recognizes in M. and E. an inferior order of piety (Einleitung, II., 1, 357, 358), nor with Hengstenberg (Christ., II., 567), who, because Christ and his Apostles never cited the book, disparages its canonicity. Their piety equalled their circumstances as fully as that of David those in which he was placed; and the divine silence which characterizes the book sprang from the same fulness of the Spirit from which were generated the holy sayings and signs of the Psalms and its Prophets. Nor is there need of much discernment to apprehend the immense benefit (Rom. 15:4; 2 Thess. 3:16) which has accrued to the Church in time past, and which must continue to accrue in time to come from a holy silence combined with the spirit and action of martyrs.

BAUMGARTEN.—Ermentrout.

Etheldrida (Edilthryda, Ætheldritha, Edeltrude), St., daughter of Anna, King of the East Angles, had made a vow of chastity, when she was compelled to marry Tondberten, a nobleman. At her entreaty he regarded her vow. He soon died, and then she hoped to be allowed to carry out her purpose of leading a retired religious life. But she was again constrained to marry Egfrid, son of the Northumbrian king. But as she maintained her vow in this case also, the marriage was dissolved by the advice of Wilfrid, B. of York. In 671 she retired to the cloister Coldingham, and thence to the island of Ely, where she founded a double cloister—partly for men, and partly for women. She died in 679.

HERZOG.*

Ethiopia, Church of.—To it belongs the Church of Nubia and Sennaar, that of Abyssinia from its origin to its separation from the Cath. Church, that of Adel, and, on account of its origin and relationship, that of S. W. Arabia. The oldest of these is the Abyssinian Church. That the Abyssinians had become Jews through the descendants of the Queen of Sheba, but had afterwards apostatized, is an unfounded report, owing its origin to the probably early immigration of the Jews, and to the practice of circumcision, which is still prevalent (LUDOLF, Comment. ad hist. æth., p. 279). The Ab. Church did not originate in the Apostolic age. Even though the eunuch of Napata (Acts 8:27) brought the first light of the gospel to the country, we must still distinguish between Napata and Habesh, whence so early an origin of the church there is still in doubt (LUDOLF, hist. æth., III., 2). Christian antiquity knew so little of such a church, that Jerome (Catal. scriptor. eccl., I., 265) and Asseman (biblioth. orient., III., 2, p. 592) regarded Arabia Felix as the home of the eunuch. The legendary history of the Apostle assigns to no less than three of them Ethiopia as a missionary field, viz.: to Thomas, Andrew, and to Matthew. But these are all in Asia, viz.: in Colchis, in S. Asia, and even in India. Only one monument, an Ethiopic manuscript in Axuma, represents the eunuch as converting the land of Habesh. Ludolf, however, has refuted this legend (Hist. æth., III., 2, § 19, etc.). In Nubia, where, from the age of Alexander the Gr., to that of Eusebius, the queens were called Candace, the monuments buried in the sand may still preserve information for us. It is certain, however, that under Constantine (about A. D. 330), Metrodorus, a heathen philosopher, returned from extensive journeys of discovery to Tyre, and incited Meropius to similar enterprises (RUFINI, hist. eccl., I., 5, 9; THEODORET, hist. eccl., I., 22; SOCRATES, hist. eccl., I., 19). He was accompanied by Fruementius and Ædesius, and was wrecked on the coast of Ethiopia (India, say the ancients): the crew was murdered by the inhabitants, but the two young men were taken as slaves to the court at Auxume, where one of them became the treasurer, and the other the butler of the king. They were liberated by the king before his death. The queen, as guardian of her son, Aizan, retained them in high offices, of which they took advantage to introduce Christianity. They attracted Egyptian merchants, and the Christians obtained the right of immigration, with certain privileges. Under Aizan, Ædesius retreated to Tyre; Fruementius went to Alexandria, where Athanasius was patriarch, from whom he obtained priests for this new country. He himself was ordained Bishop, and was now called Abba Salama, the patriarch of Abyssinia (LUDOLF, hist. æth., III., 2, § 31). The king and his brother were baptized, and Christianity spread rapidly. The Arian troubles reached hither also. After the expulsion of Athanasius, the Arian patriarch demanded of Fruementius to be ordained anew: this being refused, the Emperor Constantius wrote to the king to dismiss F., and to receive Theophilus, an Indian. The latter actually arrived at Axum, but had to leave shortly after (A. D. 356. LE QUIEN, Oriens christ., II., 644); CACHENUS (ad ann., 541, p. Chr.); NICEPHORUS CALLISTI (hist. eccl., XVII., 32) and PROCOPIUS (de bel. pus.) give a different account of the founding of the Ethiopic Church; which, however, has been refuted by Ludolf and Le Quien. The patriarch of Abyssinia was always ordained by the p. of Alexandria. They had the rank, but not the power of a patriarch, were always foreigners, and could never have more than 7 bishops under them—so that their office could never be equal to an archbishopric. The other guardians of the Church were monks from Up. Egypt, of whom 9 are especially prominent as saints. They introduced monasticism, and built churches and hermitages. Through their efforts the Church seems to have spread to the interior of Africa, and towards the East and North. In the 6th cent. monasticism was already so highly esteemed, that King Elasban entered a monastery. After the chief seat of power was no longer at Tigre (Axum) but in the interior, the language became more African through the influence of the Galla-dialects. At this time the Amharic is spoken along with the modified Tigre language. The people no longer read the Bible:

and though some of the priests read it they do not understand it. Of equal authority with the Bible is the Synodus (Apostolic Constitutions and Canons). Hence 35 books of the N. T. are spoken of. Next in rank are the Acts of the Synods (those of Nice, Constantinople, and Ephesus, and several provinc. Synods), the Liturgy, the Hadschmanota Aban (creed of the Fathers, extracts from the homilies of Athanasius, Basil, the Gregories, Chrysostom, Cyril, and Ephraem). The other ecclesiastical literature consists in martyrologies, calenders of saints, hymns, and works against heresies (LUDOLF, hist. æth., III., 4, § 41; Isenberg and Krapff, Journals, Lond., 1843, p. 230; Combes et Tamisier, Voy. en Abyss., III., 348, etc.). When, in 451, the Synod of Chalcedon condemned Dioscorus, P. of Alexandria, as Eutychian, whence the Monophysites, the Eth. Church followed its patriarch. They were called Jacobites, after Jacob Baradaï. They always protested against the charge that they denied one of the natures in Christ, and asserted that they had only avoided Nestorianism. From this time the Jacobite or Coptic Patr. of Alexandria ordained the Abuna. After the Mohammedan conquest of Egypt, the separation from the Cath. Church was widened still more. It is unknown how far the missionary labors of the Eth. Church extended, towards the north their missionaries reached Meroë; but when and how Christianity was introduced there, is unknown. In the 10th cent. the Nubian historian, Selim el Assuany, tells us, that the inhabitants of the island of Alon (Metoë, Shendy) were Jacobite Christians, who obtained their bishops from Alexandria. Elmacin also (hist. saracen. ed. CAPENIUS, p. 99) speaks of all Nubia as a Jacobite Christian country in the 14th century. In the 16th cent. yet, the Mahomedans were merely tolerated, though pretty numerous. In the 16th cent. the coast was conquered by the Osmian Turks, and soon all Nubia was in their power. Christianity vanished, and Islamism prevailed. Abyssinia thus became isolated from the rest of Christendom. Northward was Dancalla, where there was an episcopal seat in the 10th cent. already. Still further north the Eth. missionary labors touched upon those of Egypt. There seems to have been no spread of Christianity towards the East. The Funga negroes remained heathens. Along the coast in the East, however, Christianity was prevalent, and we find there the bishopric of Adule. Along the coast of Arabia, among the Homerites, Christianity seems to have been advanced, though not planted, by Abyssinia, until it was extinguished by Mohammed; the influence of the Eth. Church reached as far as Kaffa and Narea, and perhaps even to the interior of Africa (Isenberg and Krapff, Journals: Lond., 1843, p. 13, etc.). Concerning its present condition, see Art. Abyss. Church. W. HOFFMANN.—Reinecke.

Ethiopic Version of the Bible.—In the ancient language of the Axumite kingdom, commonly called the Ethiopic, but by the natives the Geez language, there still exists a translation of the S. Scriptures, which has always been among all the tribes of Abyssinian Christendom the only authoritative one, and which still maintains its ancient authority, though the Eth. language has long ceased to be spoken. Concerning its origin we have no historical information. The Abyssinians mention their first bishop, the Abba Salâma (Frumentius), or also the nine saints (see Art. Eth., Church of), as having translated the Scriptures from the Arabic into the Geez: but this is very improbable, since it presupposes an Arabic Bible in the age before Mahommed. Other reasons also make it certain that the translation was prepared from the Greek in the earliest times of the spread of Christianity in Abyssinia, or from the 4th to the 5th cent.; wherefore it is both the most ancient monument and also the basis of all Eth. literature. That it was made from the Greek, and according to the received text of the Alexandrian Church, is shown conclusively from a comparison of both texts. Several pseudepigraphic books, the Greek text of which is now lost, give additional evidence. All on this point, e. g., that of Renaudot, that the translation was made from the Coptic, may therefore be regarded as antiquated. But its origin from the Greek is in turn of weight in determining its age; for translations from the Greek were made only in the first period of Eth. literature; whilst, after the Arabic language had forced its way into Egypt, it governed the literature of Eth. also. But conclusive in determining its age is the fact, that among no people can Christianity take permanent root, unless its chief source of nourishment, the written word, is given at the same time: wherefore in the conversion of a people it always has been and must be a first object, to translate the Bible for it. In the 5th cent. Christianity was firmly established in Abyssinia: in the 6th, the great poet and musician, Jared, originated the Ab. church music, which he could not have done without Scriptures. Chrysostom already (hom. in Joh., II., § 2) seems to know of an Eth. version of the Bible (an Ethiopic version before Frumentius, however, as asserted of the O. T. by B. Bruce, and of the N. T. by V. Cajetanus, is altogether without foundation). Who was the author of the translation, cannot now be determined; internal evidence seems to imply a diversity of authors and successive periods of the translation. The translation itself is very faithful, generally a verbal reproduction of the Greek, even to the very position of the words, sometimes abbreviates what is apparently superfluous, and must be pronounced to be as a whole a very successful and happy one. Notwithstanding its adherence to the Greek, it is very readable, and, especially in the historical books, fluent, and in the O. T. often corresponds in a surprising manner with the sense and words of the Hebrew original. In all this there are, of course, different degrees in different books. The translators were certainly not learned men; nor do they seem always to have been master of the Greek. This becomes evident when unfrequent words, names of things, and terms of art had to be translated. Hence, besides the errors originating in the defects of the Greek manuscripts used, and the imperfections to be referred to the comparative poverty of the Eth. language, there are errors and misconceptions that can be charged to the translators alone. But the course of time has subjected the old translation to many alterations also. In many of the variations now existing there is an evident effort to accommodate the original sentences and words, as adhering too strictly to the Greek, more closely to the Ethiopic, and to substitute current expressions for obsolete ones. The text has also been corrupted, more, however, in the last 3 or 4 cent. than before, by the carelessness and the arbitrary interpolations of readers and copyists. This is especially the case in those books which are read more than others, such as the 4 Gospels, where the corruptions in some manuscripts are such, that we would suspect a paraphrase rather than a translation, or a new translation instead of the old. It seems, indeed, not impossible that different readers and copyists remodelled some passages and books according to other, especially Arabic, translations; for the influence of Arabic literature was at certain times very strong. This is proven by the prolegomena to books of the N. T., translated from the Arabic; also by the Arabic titles of different N. T. books. The want of a more reliable text, as also a comparison of their Bible with that of other nations, gave rise subsequently to revisions of their Bible. That such revisions were actually undertaken, is certain. Hence, also, it is evident that the original text of the Eth. Bible can no longer be restored without critical care and caution. But since the Eth. Bible originated from the Greek in comparatively very early times, it is in turn important for the criticism of the Greek text; and as having also preserved thence other peculiarities and original features. The introduction into their more recent manuscripts of our divisions into chapters, seems to have resulted from their intercourse with Europe: formerly they had a division of their own. Its compass also seems to betray the origin of this Bible. It contains not only all our canonical books of the O. and N. T., but also all the Apocrypha of the Luth. Bible, besides several Pseudepigraphs. Nor is the difference between canonical and non-canonical books known. This seems to be a heritage of the Abyss. Church from its mother, the Alexandrian, in which the Apocrypha stood in high authority: but the entirely uncritical and credulous mind of the people had also undoubtedly its influence. The number of books is always given as 81, viz.: 46 to the O. T., and 35 to the New. In particulars the enumeration varies. The enumeration and division of the books given by Ludolf, is by no means a general one. Others are given, e. g., in the Cod. Æth., V. and XXXV. of the Brit. Museum. The canons of the Abyss. Church (Fatha Nagast, P. I., Cap. 2) give another. Sometimes the pseudepigraphs are enumerated among the 46 books of the O. T., and sometimes they are omitted. In the N. T., after an unvarying enumeration of our canonical books, follows the Synodus in 8 books, a collection of canones, beginning with their peculiar recension of the canon of the Apostolical Constitutions. (See LUDOLF, hist. æth., III., and Comm., pp. 295–298; the prolegomenon to the London Polyglott, No. 15; the preface of C. B. MICHAELIS to BODE, evang. secund. Matth. ex vers. æth., 1749; LE LONG, Biblioth. sacr. ed. A. G. Masch, 1778, Tom. II., pp. 140–157 — what portions of this Bible were formerly published, is stated in the above Bibl. sacr.; in 1830 the N. T. was republished by Th. P. Platt, at the expense of the B. & F. B. S. It is better than the Rom. edition, but not free from errors and uncritical. By Platt was also published in 1834, a part of the Synodus, viz.: the Eth. Didascalia; by R. LAURENCE, the Ascensio Jesajae, 1819; the Apoc. of Ezra, 1820; the B. of Enoch, 1838. (Dillman's critical edition of the entire Old Testament).

A. DILLMANN.—E. W. Reinecke.

Ethnarch, a ruler of a nation or tribe. 1) several members of the Asmonean dynasty joined this title to the office of the high-priesthood. It is first applied to Simon Macc. (1 Macc. 14: 38, 47: 15: 1, 2), whom the Jews also styled "Benefactor" (Jos., Ant., XIII., 6, 6; see Luke 22: 25). In this sense the title is a translation of נשיא, for נשיא ישראל, is Simon's name on coins (ECKHEL, doctr. numm. vet., I., 3, 468, 471). J. Hyrcanus also bore the title (Jos., B. J., I, 2, 8; A., XIII., 10, 7). Aristobulus took that of king in its stead. But Pompey again applied it to Hyrcanus II. (Ant., XIV., 8, 5), whom Julius Cæsar also styles "High-priest and Ethnarch" (10, 2, 3, &c.), whilst Antipater was merely called προστάτης, ἐπιμελητής, or ἐπίτροπος (8, 1, 3; 5, 9, 1). Herod the Great again assumed royal dignity, but Archelaus became simply an ethnarch, and was the last who bore this title; βασιλεύειν, Matth. 2: 22, is a general expression. An ethnarch occupied a medium position between a tetrarch and a king (Jos., B. J., II., 6, 3; Ant., XVII., 11, 4).—2) In 2 Cor. 11: 32, an ethnarch of King Aretas (see Art.) is named. In this case the title is used (rather than ὑπαρχος, ἐπίτροπος, διοικητής), in imitation of the Romans.—3) The Jews in Alexandria obtained certain immunities from Alexander Max. confirmed by Jul. Cæsar and Augustus and Claudius (Jos., B. J., II., 18, 7–9; C. Ap. II., 4, 5; Ant. XIX., 5, 2), being allowed to have a sort of government of their own under the general government. In this respect they were under ethnarchs (Jos., Ant., XIV., 7, 2), to whom, also, the Jews in all Egypt and Cyrene were subject. These E. were also called alabarchs (XVIII., 6, 3; 8, 1; XIX., 5, 1; XX., 7, 3), a term of still doubtful import.

H. PARET.*

Euchology, Εὐχολόγιον, is the common name for the rituals and liturgies of the later Greek C. The Greek C. has been more fruitful in such works than the Latin. Even the Apostolic Constit. contain material upon which subsequent forms of the mass-service were constructed, under the name of distinguished Ch. Fathers. The term in this sense is first found in Anast. Sinaita (quest., 141), in the 6th cent., then in the mystagogic and liturgical writings of the Byzantians, and Suidas. Such liturgical collections were numerous, and of various extent; some merely for private devotions. The MSS. in Vienna, Rome (Bibl. Barberina), Paris, Venice, the monasteries of Mt. Athos, of course differ in their contents. But usually the larger euchol. contains both the mass-service of Chrysostom and Basil, and the so-called missa præsantificationum (τῶν προσηγιασμένων), i.e., the formula of those masses which were performed on Sundays during Lent, as a consecration of the elements of the Holy Supper, which might then be used during the week. Then followed evening-prayers, forms for administering the other sacraments, and a number of other prayers and consecrating addresses. — Among the best known ed. of the E. is that of Venet., 1619, apud Anton. Pinellum. The best is that of J. GOAR, Par., 1645. An abstract of the large E. is: Σύνταγμα τινων ἀναγκαζων ακολουθιων, &c., ed. curante EM. GLYZONIO, Venet., 1595, apud Fr. Julianum. Extracts in A. DANIEL's Cod. liturg. eccl. orient., &c., Lips., 1853. — (Comp. L. ALLATIUS, De libris Græc. eccl. ed. A. Fabric. diss., I., § 17, p. 71; CAVE, Histor. liter. Genev., 1699, II., Append., p. 24; NEALE, the office-books of the holy Eastern Church, II., 819, &c.).

GASS.*

Eudists, missionaries of Jesus and Mary, so-called from their founder, Eudes. Eudes, b. 1601, at Mezera, Normandy, studied with the Jesuits at Caen, and joined the Oratorians, Paris, in 1623. At first he devoted himself mainly to those smitten with the plague, afterwards he prosecuted missions among the clergy. Subsequently he was induced to establish a congregation for the pursuit of missions among the clergy and the training of men for the ministry; but it never spread much. During the revolution it went down, but was revived in 1826. The Eudists have a college, St. Gabriel's, in Indriann.

HERZOG.*

Eudo, or Eon de Stella, a French fanatic of the 12th cent, probably connected with the Cathari. Once, on entering a church, he heard the words: "per eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos," he was seized with the notion that this eum meant himself. Accordingly he went forth proclaiming this conceit, and soon gathered many followers. Among other things he taught that baptism availed only for believers, that true baptism was conferred only by the laying on of hands, that the hierarchy was not of God, the Romish C. not the true one, as its priests led bad lives, that there was no resurrection of the body, and that marriage was no sacrament. His progress was opposed by arguments and by the sword. Many of his followers perished at the stake. The Synod of Rheims pronounced him mad, and ordered him to be confined. This fanaticism disappeared after E.'s death.—(See GIESSELER, H. E., § 84.)

C. SCHMIDT.*

Eudoxius, the Arian or Semi-Arian, was the son of the martyr Cæsarius, of Arabissus, in Armenia, and B. in Germanicia, a city near Mt. Taurus. Philostorgius describes him as a ready man, agreeable and modest, but timid; Theodoret says he was ambitious and sensual (THEODOR. II., 20, 27; Hær. fab., IV., 2; PHILOSTR., IV., § 4). After Leontius' death he seized the bishopric of Antioch, and began to assail the apostolic doctrine (Theod.). He, with others, had previously brought the longer Antioch formula of 345 to Italy (SOCRAT., II., 19). Expelled from Antioch he joined the Synod of Seleucia, 359, and the party of Acacius. He was deposed (SOCR., II., 40; SOZOM., IV., 12), but so wrought upon the Emperor that the reproach of being an Anomœan was transferred from himself to Aetius (THEOD., II., 27). The Acacians secured, 360, his elevation to the See of Constantinople. By means of duplicity he acquired greater influence. Socrates says of him: ὁ πατὴρ ἀσεβής, ὁ υἱὸς εὐσεβής. Subsequently he took bolder ground, baptized Valens, confirmed his Arianism, and defended his party against the Synod of Lampascus, 365. He died in the 19th year of his episcopate. (SOCR., IV., 14; SOZOM., VI., 7).

GASS.*

Eugendus, Augendus, Abbot of Condat in the Jura, founded by St. Roman and his brother, Lupicinus, c. 430. He entered the monastery in his 7th year, and, c. 480, succeeded Roman and Lup. as its abbot, but without becoming a priest. He practised the greatest simplicity in his manner of life, enforced the same upon his monks, and laid great stress upon learning. He died 510–17, without ever having left the precincts of his monastery.

KL.*

Eugenius, chosen by the Catholics, B. of Carthage, 480, under the rule of the Arian Vandals, was banished, 484, to the desert of Tripoli for his opposition to Arianism, by Hunneric. After H.'s death Gundamund recalled him; but his zealous efforts to have the eccl. property restored to the Catholic bishops, led Thrasimund to exile him again, 498, to Gallia, where he died 505. He wrote an expositio fidei cathol., an apolog. pro fide, and an altercatio cum Arianis. KL.*

Eugenius, of Toledo was appointed, against his will, Archb. of Toledo, by King Chindaswinth. He took an active part in three councils held at Toledo, improved the Church-music, and died 658. He also rewrought a poem of Dracontius, of Toledo, upon the Creation of the world, added a hymn upon the Seventh-day, wrote an epigram, and a treatise de resurrect. carnis, et beatitudinis statu; — all publ. by J. SIRMONDE, Paris, 1619.

KL.*

Eugene I.–IV — I. The son of the Roman Rufianus, born Sept., 654, was made Pope by the people and clergy of Rome to succeed Martin I., who had been dethroned by the Emp. Constantine. Mild in disposition, he was disposed to yield to the Emperor and the Monothelites. The strange agreement with Peter, the Patriarch of Constantinople, who, for peace sake, was inclined to adopt three instead of one or two wills in Christ, was not calculated permanently to restore any good understanding between the Eastern and Western Churches. Died June 1, 657, and canonized; anniversary June 2. Of his writings, if he left any, none have been transmitted.—(See his life by ANASTASIUS and PLATINA, Baron. Annal. h. annor.; Pagi Breviar., T. I.; BOWER, Histor. of the Popes). — II. (elected Feb. 14, 824, † in Aug. 827), born in Rome, where he had been presbyter and archpresbyter. Whilst E. coincided with the decision of the Frank Council which had been convened at Paris, Nov. 1, 825, at the instigation of Louis the Pious, touching the image-controversy, in practice he followed the ancient custom. The Romish Council, which the Pope convened on Nov. 1, 826, drew up excellent decrees for the restoration of eccles. discipline, the advancement of theological literature, the founding of schools and cathedrals, and against the worldly spirit of priests. Anastasius and Platina praise E.'s zeal for the welfare of the poor, the widows and orphans of Rome.—(BARONIUS, Annal. h. annor.; BOWER, l. c.; ELLENDORF, die Karolinger, II., p. 28).—III., born in Pisa, a Cistercian and pupil of Bern., of Clairv., was raised from a low condition to the papacy, Feb. 27, 1145. Before Arnold of Brescia (see Art.), visited Rome the city was agitated by his antibierarchical sentiments. The spirit of old Roman liberty still survived, and was now being excited by fanatical appeals. Sword in hand the people demanded the Pope to renounce all temporal authority. Eugene fled by night, and took refuge with his court at Viterbo. There he received tidings of the fall of Edessa, and on Dec. 1, 1145, he called upon Louis VII., of France, to organize a new crusade (see Crusades).—Against the insurgent Romans he hurled a bann, and then compelled them to join their enemies, the Tiburtines, in a compact which dissolved the patrician dignity, and gave the Pope the power to appoint the Senate. He returned in triumph to Rome, but the state of feeling produced by Arnold's preaching, compelled him to flee again early in 1146. He went to Treves, where, at a Synod, in Bernard's presence, he approved the writings of St. Hildegard. Then, with Bernard still at his side, he went to Paris, and was received by Louis with pious humility (April, 1147). On his way thither Synods were held, matters of faith discussed, and controversies settled. He was honored everywhere except in Rome. On his return to Italy, Roger of Sicily, helped him to reduce the city to submission once more; but in 1150 the republicans again compelled him to leave, and thenceforth he lived mostly at Segni. Frederick Barb. promised, indeed, to aid him in subduing the rebels, but before this was done E. died, July 8, 1153, only 43 days before Bernard. (See JAFFÉ, Regesta, Baron. l. c.; NEANDER, der h. Bernh., &c., 190–296; WILKEN, Gesch. d. Kreuzz., III., Abth. 1; BOWER, l. c.).—IV. (in minoribus Gabriel Condolmiere) sprang from a Venitian merchant's family, related to the Corrari. Gregory XII. made him B. of Siena in his 24th year, and then, 1408, a Cardinal. On March 3, 1431, contrary to expectation, he was chosen successor of Martin V. He forthwith committed three indiscretions. First, by summoning the Basel Council (see Art.) which became a source of constant annoyance; and then by revoking the summons (Nov. 12). Next by exciting the relatives of his predecessor, the Colonna, against him, so that in his war against Milan and the Aragon dynasty of Naples, they joined his foes. During this struggle one province after another was lost, and even the populace of Rome became so unmanageable that he was compelled to escape in disguise, and even then was pelted with stones on his way out of the city. He transferred his court to Florence, and remained there 3 or 4 years dependent upon his confederates. During this time he was controlled by the tyrannical Vitelleschi, whom he had made a cardinal, but afterwards imprisoned, and had poisoned, for treason. Iudov. Scarampo, the successful warrior, took V.'s place. The Pope's fortunes now rose. He opened a papal council at Ferrara, Jan. 8, 1438, afterwards transferred to Florence (see Art.). With the waning of the authority of the Council of Basel, and the anti-Pope Felix V., fortune smiled on the arms of Eugene, especially after he faithlessly turned against the republics. On Sept. 28, 1443, he returned to Rome. He died Feb. 23, 1447—just when the Basel Council and the anti-Pope were in their last agonies.—(See PLATINA. The references under Basel Council. RAYNALD, Annal. annor., 1431–47. BLONDUS, Histor. Dec., III., Lib. IV. S. ANTONIN., Chron. P. III., tit. XXII. BOWER, l. c.). VOIGT.*

Eugippius, (Eugipius, Eugyppius, Egippius, and, erroneously, Egesippus). The life of this man, though but little is known of him, is not involved in so much uncertainty as the divers opinions as to his place of birth and abode, would imply (HEROLD's Thes. ex D. Augustini Opp.: Basil, 1542. T. II., Præf.) Sigebert's discovery that B. Redux, of Naples, furnished (582) the treatise entitled "Spirit," from the works of Augustine, for the use of his Church, has misled some to distinguish between the author of that treatise and the author of the vita S. Severini (Bolland., Jan. 8), which was certainly written in 511. But J. Basnage (ed. of Antiq. lectiones, of Canisius. I., 409, &c.) has shown that Redux may simply have copied an earlier work; also, that the dedication of the book points to the beginning of the 6th cent., that the author lived and died some time before 560, since Cassiodorus speaks of him (c. 560) as one whom he remembers having seen, and finally, that there is no reason for supposing that there was any other Eugippius besides the author of the Vita S. Sev.—The only original sources of his history to 500, are his letter to one Paschasius, a deacon, and P.'s reply (CANIS. Lect. Ant., I., 411, &c. BARON., Annal. Eccl., ad a., 496). E. had requested Pasch. to prepare a biography of Severinus. P. declines this, pronounces E.'s treatise satisfactory, and adds: facilius virtutes magistrorum a discipulis exponuntur. As he bases E.'s competency for the work upon his frequent conversatio docentium, he seems to imply that E. was an immediate pupil of Severinus. But S. first appears in Noricum, 454, and never left that country until his death, in 481. Hence E. must have lived in Noricum during that time. His activity as an author during 500–510, renders it probable that at S.'s death he was still a young man, had spent but a short time with that St., and learned his master's history from older disciples. He claims no more in his letter to P.: ex notissima nobis et quotidiana majorum relatione composui. This does not, as Basnage thinks, conflict with his personal connection with Sever., for at the close of the letter he says: Hæc igitur sola, quæ retuli, quotiens de beati Severini patria sermo ortus est, etiam IPSO SUPERSTITE, semper audivi. E. also requests Pasch. to introduce into the biography his accounts of the miracles which attended the removal of the remains of Severinus from Vienna to Italy, and calls the miracles events, quæ FIDELIS PORTITOR filius vester optime novit. This portitor must mean E. himself, so that he must have been among those Romans who quit, 487, the monastery prope Fabianus, in the Danubian districts, and rallying around the relics of S. returned to Naples, and took up his abode in a monastery there. And there are no grounds for supposing that he ever changed this residence. Here Abbot Maximus urged him to prepare an abstract from Augustine's works. He never speaks of himself as Abbot; and Pasch., Fulgentius, and Cassiodorus call him presbyter. It is uncertain, therefore, whether, according to Greek custom, he merely was called Abbot complimentarily, or really became such late in life. The year of his death is uncertain, but must have been prior to 540.—In regard to E.'s connection with Severinus in Noricum, c. 480, we suggest, that he may have gone thither with Pirmenius, of whom mention is made in E.'s letter to Pasch., and who fled from Italy after the murder of Orestes (at the close of 476); that E. belonged to a family which found it expedient to leave Italy after Odoacer's victory.—E. seems to have held an honorable position in the Church and his native land. A letter of Fulgentius, of Ruspe, to E. (Basel ed. of F.'s works, 1587, pp. 535–46) indicates this. E. also sustains honorable scientific relations with Dionysius Exiguus, as the transl. of the de opificio mundi of Greg., of Nyssa, and the biogr. of Pachomius, proves. A. VOGEL.*

Eulalia, St.—Barcelona and Merida, near Badajoz, both revere martyrs of this name. They are probably identical. Prudentius praises her in his verses. Born of a respectable family she was ascetic from childhood. In her 12th year the Diocletian persecution broke out. Hearing the command to sacrifice to the gods, she escaped from her mother one night, resolved to brave the peril of a refusal, entered Augusta Emerita (Merida) at dawn, presented herself before the officer, and denounced the attempt to compel Christians to apostatize. The officer sought by mild words to persuade her merely to touch the salt and incense with the tip of her finger. But she threw down an idol, and spit in the officer's face. The flesh was then torn from her breast to the bone—but she praised God. Fire was then kindled around her and she perished. REÜCHLIN.*

Eulalius, was set up as anti-Pope to Boniface I., by a minority of the Roman clergy, and gathered a strong party around him. The Emperor Honorius convoked a council to settle the strife. Meanwhile both Popes were to leave Rome, and commit their affairs to B. Achilles, of Spoletum. Eulalius rejected this proposition. An insurrection followed, and E. was expelled from the city. Afterwards he became B. of Nepe, and remained quiet. When Boniface died the friends of E. again urged him to take the papal chair, but he declined. KL.*

Eulogia — εὐλογία. — This word in the N. T. (Greek) signifies praise (Rev. 5 : 12 ; 7 : 12), benediction (Heb. 12 : 17 ; James 3 : 10), the good conferred (Rom. 15 : 29 ; 2 Cor. 9 : 5 ; Heb. 6 : 7), or the thanksgiving with which the sacramental cup is received (1 Cor. 10 : 16). — It occurs but once in a bad sense (Rom. 16 : 18). —

The patristic and ecclesiastical use of the word became twofold. In the first place it was natural to apply it to the various clerical benedictions. This clerical blessing, according to the "Apost. Constit." (VIII., c. 28), could not be imparted by a deacon, a presbyter could receive it only from a bishop at his ordination, a bishop only from other bishops. The people receive it, on solemn occasions, from the bishop or presbyter (Constit. II., c. 57, εὐλογεῖν τὸν λαόν). The distinction made, III., c. 10, between εὐλ. μεγάλη and μικρά, refers not to its being dispensed by a bishop or presbyter, but to its being pronounced in public or private, or perhaps upon clergy and laymen. The term was also applied to the benediction pronounced upon the catechumens, competentes (VIII., c. 8, 15), sacramental elements (VIII., c. 29), and in later liturgies upon persons when married, monks at their assumption of the vow, &c. The rules of Basil made the withholding of the blessing one of the minor eccl. penalties.

The second familiar use of the term is the sacramental, based upon the opinion that in 1 Cor. 10 : 16, εὐλογία was synonymous with εὐχαρίστια in Matt. 26 : 26, 27. In the 3d cent. the εὐλογία had to precede the consecration and presentation of the elements (EUSEB., H. E., VI., 43). Many passages in Cyril, of Alex., show that εὐλογία was then used of the Lord's Supper itself, or of the host (lib. Glaph. in Levit., pp. 351, 367 ; in Deut., p. 414, Opp. Par., 1638. See SUICERI, Thes.). But another peculiar modification underlay this latter sense. As early as Irenæus it was customary for bishops, during festivals, to send the consecrated eucharist around among their various parishes, as an emblem of the communion of saints (EUSEB., V., 24) ; it was also sent around to the sick, &c. (JUSTIN., Apol. I., 27 ; Constit. Apost., VIII., 13). But the Council of Laodicea decreed that τὰ ἅγια εἰς λόγον εὐλογιῶν should not be thus sent out to other parishes (Can. 14, 32). From Augustine, however, we learn (de pecc. meritis, c. 26) that such eulogia (the name being Latinized) were offered even to catechumens and penitentes, who were not yet admitted to the sacrament. This explains some passages in later liturgical commentaries (Nomocan. Cotelier. n. 11, 224, 231. Pachymer. lib., V., c. 4. Maximus in Dionys. Hierarch. eccl., c. 3. Socr., VII., c. 12). Accordingly this εὐλογία is not the consecrated host, but the bread brought for the use of the sacrament, from which the host was taken, and which was blessed, and thus offered as a sort of substitute to those who could not yet be fully admitted to the sacrament. This is the panis benedictus of Chrysostom's liturgy (DANIEL, Cod. liturg., III., 371, 419). The same custom obtained in the Latin C. (Conc. Nannent. can. 9, a. 890). The Greek C. associated with this custom the peculiar one of the missa præsanctificationum.—(Cf. AUGUSTI, Denkw., VIII., 31, 398 ; X., 185. BINGHAM, Origines, VI., 377. SUICER. Thes. DU CANGE, Lex. med. et inf. Græc. s. v. εὐλογία. PFAFF, de oblat. Veterum euchar., 171). GASS.*

Eulogius, first a presbyter in Antioch, then (581–608) Patriarch of Alexandria. Pope Greg.

I. commends him highly for his controversies with the Nestorians, Severians, Theodosians, Cainites, &c. He died 608. KL.

Eulogius, of Corduba, chosen (858) Archb. of Toledo, but kept from his See by the Moors. He was a learned and bold defender of Christianity against the Mohammedans; also an admirer of the ancient heathen poets. He was greatly persecuted for his zeal, and finally beheaded, March 11, 859, for giving shelter to a Moorish maiden, Leocritia, who had been baptized and reared by Christian relatives, but was abused for her faith by her unbelieving parents. — His writings, first made known by AMBROS. DE MORALES, and publ. by PETER PONT. LEO, 1574, Complutum, — may be found in ANDR. SCHOTT's Hisp. illustr., IV. The chief is: Memor. sanctorum sive libri III. de marty. Cordubens. — Alv., of Corduba, wrote his biography. KL.

Eunomius and the Eunomians. — The history of E., the most prominent of the later advocates of strict Arianism, is involved in much uncertainty. Born in Dacora, Cappadocia, a town in the province of Cæsarea. Through the intervention of Eudoxus, Bishop of Constantinople, he obtained the bishopric of Cyzicum (Theodor., II., 29; Philost. Hist. eccl., VI., § 1–3), about the year 360. A full avowal of his views (comp. Socr., IV., 7, and Sozom., VI., 8), and an unwillingness to subscribe the formula of Ariminum and the deposition of Ætius (Sozom., VI., 26; Philost., VI., § 1), whose pupil and secretary he had been (Theodor., II., c. 27; Philost., VIII., § 20), led to his resignation. Now began his career as the avowed leader of a party. During the reign of Julian, in Constantinople, he and Ætius were busily engaged in gathering followers and ordaining bishops (Philost., VII., 6; VIII., 3; IX., 4), who settled in Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt (Philost., VIII., 2; Sozom., VI., 27). Valens recalled him from Mauritania and Illyricum, whither he had been banished, but his fate was finally sealed by Theodosius, who, in 383, rejected the creed of Eunom., and visited him with condign punishment (Socr., V., 10, and Sozom., VI., 17, and Philost., X., 6). Captured in Chalcedon, he was sent to Halmyrus, in Moesia, thence to Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, and rested finally in the place of his nativity. His shorter compositions have survived his death, whilst his Commentary on Romans (Socr., IV., 7) and Letters, highly prized by Philostorg (X., 6), and known to Photius (Cod., 138), are not to be found. His first Apology (comp. about 360, accord. to Rettberg, 365) was a reply to certain slanders and misunderstandings — the same combatted by Basilus, in the well-known five books. From this work is settled the text of E., which was given, in fragmentary form, by Cave, Hist. lit., I., p. 171, and fully by Fabricius, Bibl. Gr., VIII., pp. 262–305; improved editions followed (Cunis. Lectt. ant. ed. Basn., I., p. 181, and at last, Biblioth. dogm. curavit. Philo., II., p. 580). Of his second Apology — written before 379 — fragments can be gleaned from the reply of Gregory of Nyssa; collected by Rettberg (Marcelliana, p. 125). The Confession — ἡ ἀποκρίσις — he handed to the emperor, was given by Valesius in the notes to Socrates (V., 10), by Fabricius, I., cp. 253, and by Rettberg emended (Marcelliana, p. 149; comp. Mansi, T. III., p. 645–49; Basnage, Thes., I., p. 1, 178; Biblioth. dogma. II., p. 618).

Though possessed of talent, and an acute, fearless spirit, his immense pride blinded his eyes to the ability of those who differed from him, and made him appear, in the estimation of his enemies, an insolent fellow and a blasphemer (comp. Theodor., II., 29), whilst his use of Aristotle's logic was calculated to bring down upon his head the reproaches of an age which did not appreciate it. The fundamental thought on which he based his system, was the absolute, independent being of Deity. According to Scriptures and the Fathers, God is the One Unbegotten. As His essence is commensurate with His eternity it is impossible to predicate of Him generation or a communication of His being. As nothing can precede the Unbegotten, so He cannot exist with another equal to Him, or generated by Him. The unity of the Divine being excludes diversity, whilst the words Begotten and Unbegotten imply difference of essence. If it be said that the name of Father indicates generation, it must be borne in mind that the understanding, or logic (ὁ τῆς ἀκολουθίας) forbids the use of this appellation beyond what its meaning or conception allows. Thus did Eunomius render intelligible the Deity as to His absolute aseity and simplicity. He even went so far as to assert the comprehensibleness of the divine essence especially (Basil. adv. Eun., I., c. 13; Theodore, in Dan. c. 8; Opp. ed. Schultze, II., 2, p. 1220, ὅς αὐτὴν εἶδέναι τοῦ θεοῦ τὴν οὐσίαν ἀρξομένους, Socr., IV., 7; ὁ θεὸς περὶ τῆς ἑαυτοῦ οὐσίας οὐδὲν πλεον ἡμῶν ἐπιστάται, THEODORET., fab. haer., IV., c. 3), and taught that the understanding should go beyond all secondary things, and grasp the first and highest. Touching the second and third Persons of the Trinity, he held that, as the Son derived not his being from an immanent generation, he must be regarded as a creature. As the First-born, by the immediate power of the Unbegotten, he stands above all created things which were made by means of Him, and accomplishes the work of redemption which the Christian faith ascribes to Him (Schol. Eunom. in THEODOR., Dialogo de Trinit. Opp., V., p. 957). Third in point of dignity and nature comes the Paraclete, the noblest production of the First-born, the source of all light and holiness. — The bulwark of E.'s argument was his assertion of an unconditioned and absolutely independent God; his error consisted in putting the second and third Persons of the Trinity between an abstract Deity and the world. It must be confessed, however, that his opponents did not succeed in refuting his dogmatic proofs, for, though Basil and Gregory attempted to conceive of non-creativity (Agennesie) as a mere hypostatic attribute of the Father, they could not make the Divine essence independent of that ὑπεροχῇ of uncreatedness, or self-existence, which, according to E., was absolutely necessary to the very idea of God. Of the later critics of E. we mention Epiphani. haer., 76; Theodore, fab. haer., IV., c. 3; Theod. est, Philastr., haer., 68; Joh. Damas

GREG. NAZ., Orat. theol., I., Epist. ad Nectar., and Chrysostom (Fabric., Bibl. Gr., VIII., p. 250; ed. Harl. IX., pp. 64, 207; X., 717; XII., p. 341). The second Ecumenical Council condemned his followers and those of Ætius, as heretics. After his death, they separated themselves from the communion of the Church. Some of them assumed the names of individuals, e. g., Eutychius, Theophronius (Socr., V., c. 24). The Churchmen loaded them with nicknames, e. g., ὀνοκιστὰι, spadones (comp. Barnage, ap. Canis., I., p. 174). According to Socr., V. 24, they did not baptize in the name of the Trinity, but in the death of Christ. Inward dissensions and numerous transitions to the Catholic Church soon put an end to their existence as a body. Comp. Klose, Gesch. u. Lehre des Eunom.: Kiel, 1833; L. Lange, der Arianismus in a. weiteren Entwickl.; Baur, Dreieingkeit., Bd. I. S., 365–87; Dorner, Entwick.-gesch. d. Lehre v. d. P. Christi., Bd. I. S., 853; Ritter, Gesch. d. christl. Philos., Bd. II. S., 63. GASS.—Ermentrout.

Euphemia, distinguished for beauty and Christian courage, was the daughter of Philophron, a respected senator of Chalcedon. In the persecution under Diocletian, her zeal outran the sympathy of her judges, who, charmed by her personal appearance, sought to save her. What fire, the rack, and a lion could not do—destroy her life—the bite of a bear effected. The church her parents built over her tomb she signalized by miracles. Taken to Constantinople and thrown into the sea, her body swam to the island Lemnos, and was again placed in Constant., where veneration for her memory continually increased. Several Latin poets of the middle age, Paulinus of Nola, Enodius, Venantius, Fortunatus, sang her praises, whilst in Chalcedon was erected in her honor a splendid church, in which an Ecumenical Council held its sessions.—Besides this one, legendary lore is enriched with several other Euphemias.

KL.—Ermentrout.

Euphrates.—For the geography of this river, see Ritter's Erdkunde, Bd. X. and XI. We will confine ourselves to the relation it sustains to the interpretation of the Bible. In Hebrew its name—פְּרָת; in Arabic, “sweet water;” in the Persian cuneated letters (Benfey, p. 76), Ufrātu—“the very wide,” from which the Greek Εὐφράτης. The Bible generally mentions it with the prefix, נְהַר פְּרָת (Jer. 46: 2, 6, 10), seldom without it (Gen. 2: 14; Jer. 51: 63), often “the great river” (Gen. 15: 18; Deut. 1: 7), or simply “the river,” נַחַל יְעֹזְבָן (Ez. 23: 31; Isa. 8: 7), without the article as a proper name (Isa. 7: 20; Micah 7: 12). It rises from two chief sources in the Armenian mountains (Plin. H. N., 5, 20), and uniting itself with the Tigris, about 30 leagues from the sea, both pour their waters into the Persian Gulf. Though the ideal-prophetic description of the Israelitish kingdom makes the Euphrates its extremest eastern boundary (Gen. 15: 18; Deut. 1: 7; 11: 24; Ex. 23: 31; Jos. 1: 4), it extended thus far only during the blooming period of the reign of David and Solomon, when, as the result of the glorious victories of the former (2 Sam. 8: 3; 10: 16), his son marched from Gaza to Thapsacus, and all the princes “this side of the river” became his vassals (1 Kings 5: 1, 4; 8: 65). During the Assyrian monarchy the prophets used the Euphrates as the image of its power (Isa. 8: 7; 11: 15; Jer. 2: 18). In the age of Roman Imperialism, it was the eastern boundary of the Roman empire (Tac. Ann., 15, 17); hence, in Apoc. 9: 14; 16: 12, the enemies of Rome (the Partheans) are represented as coming over the Euphrates. The shores bordering its central course are uniform, and enriched with tamarinds and poplars, further down more fertile, with palm-groves and willows. Its width and depth vary according to locality and season. Here and there fords are met with; at other places it is crossed on rafts, or more recently by bridges; whilst lower down it is navigable for large vessels. The upper portion of the river is rapid, whilst below it moves slowly, except in April and May, when the melting snows of Armenia swell its volume, cause its banks to overflow and cover the flat land with its muddy but fertilizing waters, comp. Isa. 8: 7 (see Arrian. Alex., 7, 21, 2, 9; Tac. Ann., 6, 37). Its chief source of supply is the Chaboras, which empties into the Euphrates at Circesium, where lived the Prophet Ezekiel (1: 3; 3: 15; 10: 15), and, perhaps, a part of the Ten Tribes were transplanted by the Assyrians, (2 Kings 17: 6; 18: 11; 1 Chron. 5: 26, Comp. Thénius and Bertheau Comm.). Here Pharaoh Necho, 604 or 605, was defeated by the Chaldean Nebuchadnezzar, who became possessor of Syria, and, after his father's death, king of Babylon, Jer. c. 46; 2 Chron. 35: 20.—See Winer, Lexicon: Grotefend, in Pauli's Real-Encyclop., IV., p. 283. RÜETSCH.—Ermentrout.

Euphrosyna, a saintly virgin of the 5th cent., according to Acta Sanctorum, the accomplished daughter of the rich Alexandrine Paphnutius, who, in order to escape a marriage repugnant to her feelings, disguised in man's clothing, entered a monastery, and was received under the name Smaragdus. The distressed father, who had gone for consolation to the abbot, was sent by him to Smaragdus, who, recognizing her father, comforted him with the hope that he would find his daughter. Thirty-eight years passed by, and Paphnutius finally recognized her in the dying Smaragdus. After her death he put on the garb of a monk, and lived 10 years in the cell his daughter had occupied. This narrative is contained in the Acta Sanctorum. Tillemont doubts its truth. KL.—Ermentrout.

Eusebius, of Alexandria.—Under this name antiquity read a number of homilies, which enjoyed a certain celebrity in the Eastern Church during the 6th and 7th centuries. They may be divided into two classes: those which treat of events in the history of our Lord, and those which deal with the practical, moral questions of the age. A majority appear as if they had been delivered to a congregation, but not a few, in both classes, have the form of answers to questions put to the speaker by a certain Alexander. Their origin is also obscure. From the titles, which they bear, their author must have been a monk or a high dignitary in the Church. He is called now bishop, now archbishop, and now patriarch or papa—most frequently, bishop or archbishop of Alexandria, after Cyril. The succession of Alexandrian bishops, however, forbids the latter supposition, whilst the internal evidence, derived from language, style, and reference to historical events, points to a period not earlier than the close of the 5th cent. as the time of their production. The number, as yet discovered, amounts to 21. For their disinterment from the rubbish of antiquity, we are chiefly indebted to the labors of Thilo and Cardinal Mai (Spicileg. Rom., IX., pp. 1 and 652). On the question of their authorship comp. DÄHN (Erach and Gruber, allg. Encycl., Sect. 1, vol. 39, p. 194).

SEMISCH.—Porter.

Eusebius, surnamed Bruno, Bishop of Angers from 1047 till † 1081, has a twofold interest to the Church historian; first, as an ecclesiastical prince, who resisted the claims of the Pope, and refused to obey him, except so far as he represented the cause of Christ; and then, as a defender of the more ideal view of Berengar concerning the Lord's Supper, against the prevailing dogma of transubstantiation. Of his life before this, only one thing is certainly known, that soon after his succession to office he incurred suspension along with many other bishops, probably through suspicion of simony, from which charge, however, he was fully acquitted, since in the very same year (1049) he not only had a seat and vote in the Reformatory Council convoked at Rheims by Leo IX., but was one of the few prelates appointed to welcome the Pope in the name of the assembly. Elevated above the mass of his episcopal contemporaries by virtue of a clear understanding, an earnest love of truth, and a mild, pious disposition, it is no wonder that he felt inclined to side with Berengar in his view of the Lord's Supper. In a letter written from Rome he bitterly complains of the unworthy manner in which the Pope had treated Berengar, who was free from any doctrinal error (1049). B. himself counted him among his supporters (Coen. sacr. ed. Visch., p. 52), and following his counsel, at the Synod of Tours (1054), resolved to parry off the oath imputed to him. So too the opposite party thought. Bishop Theotwin of Liege (Galland, bibl. patr., XIV., p. 244), in a letter of the year 1051, mentions him expressly, along with B., as one of the advocates of the heresy, that in the eucharist there is nothing but the shadow and image of the body of Christ. But although E., enlightened by the study of the N. T. and the Latin Church-Fathers, saw how untenable the dogma was, he had not courage enough to wear the thorny crown of martyrdom. By the aid of the powerful Count Gaufried of Anjou, he was indeed able to stand up against the ban of the Church, but as soon as this valiant protector of heretics died (1060), his independence and his sympathy with Berengar both sank with him into the grave. Terrified by the blind fury of the people and the hierarchy, which threatened to overwhelm every one who held more spiritual views of the eucharistic mystery, E. gradually withdrew his support from Berengar. The most interesting memorial of this change is a letter, written some time between the years 1063 and 1066. B., provoked by opposition, accepted a challenge to discuss the doctrine of transubstantiation, and invited his bishop to preside as umpire. This invitation E. coldly declined, and added various remarks defining his own position in regard to the question. As the Holy Supper was not a matter for logical dispute, but for pious faith, which held closely to the Scriptures, he wished to acknowledge once for all, that, by virtue of the power of the Creative Word active in the priestly consecration, the bread and wine became the body and blood of Christ. Without curiously inquiring as to the mode, we must simply adhere to the words of institution. Analogous to this miracle, wrought by divine power, is the incarnation of the Son of God, and the passing of the Saviour through closed doors. Little stress also is to be laid upon the writings of the Fathers, because of their ambiguity, and because they cannot take rank beside the Holy Scriptures.

The only accurate copy of this letter is given by MANARDUS (Augustini c. Julian. operis imperfecti 1, 2, priores, p. 499). Two other letters of Eusebius are found in SUDENDORF (Berengar, Turon., 1850, pp. 202, 222). — For his biography, see Histoire lit. de la France, VIII., p. 99; LESSING (Berengar Turon., Works by Lachmann, VIII., p. 403); NEANDER (Church Hist.); SUDENDORF (l. c., pp. 32, 140).

SEMISCH.—Porter.

Eusebius of Cæsarea, surnamed Pamphili (i. e., the friend of Pamphilus), † 340; b. 260 or 270, and most probably in Palestine. At least he spent his youth there, where he early met with Constantinus (vit. Const., 1, 19), and received his first impulse to piety and learning. His biography by Acacius (SOCRAT., H. E., 2, 4) being lost, we know but little of his education but what he himself incidentally reports. Thus he mentions among his teachers the learned and eloquent B. Meletius (H. E., 7, 32). During a visit to Antioch he became acquainted with the presbyter Dorotheus, a distinguished Biblical scholar, whom he heard preach (H. E., 7, 32). Nature and disposition inclined him to avail himself of all the rich treasures of learning for which Palestine was then pre-eminent: of the valuable eccl. libraries of B. Alexander of Jerusalem, and of Pamphilus of Cæsarea (H. E., 6, 20; 7, 32). But he was chiefly attracted by the writings of Origen. This preference may be attributed as well to the influence of Pamphilus, as to allurements of Neo-Platonism for intelligent young Christians. It was at the school founded by Origen that E. made his first attempt at expounding the S.S., 305 (de martyr. Palest., c. 4). During the imprisonment of Pamph. under the Diocl. persecution, E. spent days with him in preparing a eulogy and defence of Origen (PHOT., cad., 118). In his last years yet, E. wrote with admiration of his martyred friend (de martyr. Pal., c. 11, H. E., 6, 32; 7, 32). E. himself had to flee before the raging storm. He went to Tyre (309), thence to Egypt, where he became a witness of the savage butcheries, and for a time a confessor (H. E., 8, 7, 9). It was only through partizan suspicion, that a fellow prisoner, B. Potamon of Heraclea, charged him at the Synod of Tyre, 335, with having escaped from that persecution by foul means (EPI PHAN., Haer., 68, 7). It was, indeed, not E.'s nature fanatically to covet martyrdom; but he was too magnanimous and religious to betray his faith. Moreover in that age an apostate would not have been so soon entrusted with a bishop's staff (315); indeed we should hardly err in supposing that he became bishop in 313. (The statement of Athanasius (Apol. c. Arian., c. 8) rests upon hearsay).

Until the breaking out of the Arian controversy, E.'s labors were chiefly private. The catastrophes which meanwhile overwhelmed the Church, only furnished him with material and incentives to new apologetic works. He entered the Arian contest against his will. When Arius, by messengers and letters, and then in person, sought his aid, E. hoped to reconcile the dispute by mutual concessions; his doctrinal views and disposition both led him to this middle course (EPIPHAN., Haer., 69, 4; SOZOM., H. E., 1, 15). He wrote two letters to Alexander, and a third to Euphrasion, to show that Arius was misrepresented (see fragm. in MANSI, conc. coll., XIII., 316, &c.). At the Council of Nice, also, he stood with the mediating party. That he then enjoyed the honor of sitting at Constantine's right hand, and of greeting C. in the name of the bishop, is attested by Sozomen (H. E., 1, 19), by the manner in which E. himself mentions the speaker on that occasion (vit. Const., 3, 11), and by the fact that he pronounced his eulogy upon C. in the midst of "the servants of God" (vit. C., 1, 1), during the tricennalia then celebrated. The assertion of Theodoret, that Eustath. of Antioch (H. E., 1, 6), and of Theod. of Mopsuesta (in NICET., thes. orth. fid., 5, 7), that B. Alexander in Alexandria, enjoyed this honor, must be attributed to the partisan zeal of the Athanasians. The respect entertained for E. had great weight in the discussion; though his own account of this may be deemed partial (SOCRAT., H. E., 1, 8). After a stormy debate the Confession of Faith prepared by E. was approved, with the addition of the familiar clauses concerning the true essential divinity of Christ. He opposed the term ὁμοούσιος to the last, and does not mention it in any of his post-Nicene writings. The love of peace, and the Emperor's will prevailed over all his scruples. With mental reservations, therefore, and timidly, he subscribed the formula, still holding his place among the Arians. A treacherous test, however, was presented in the proffered patriarchate of Antioch, after the deposition of Eustathius (331). After a brief hesitation his better convictions triumphed, and he declined the dignity, partly because the deposition of bishops conflicted with Church order, but mainly because the sanguinary agitations in Antioch alarmed a man inclined to quiet literary pursuits (SOCR., 1, 24; SOZ., 2, 18, &c.). Constantine commended this rare declinature of eccl. preferment (vit. C., 3, 61). E. participated, during the continuance of the strife, in the measures taken against the Nicene leaders. He seems to have presided at the Synod of Tyre (335), convened to try Athanasius (EPIPH., Haer., 68, 7). At the dedication of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (vit. C., 4, 45), the Sabellianism of Marcellus of Ancyra was spoken of, and he was appointed by the synodical committee in Constantinople to write a refutation of it (c. Marcell., 2, 4). In 336, memorable for the tricennial anniversary of Constantine's reign, E. wrote his panegyric upon C. (vit. C., 1, 1; 4, 46) which embodied his entire theology. After the Council of Nice the Emperor cherished the warmest regard for E., confiding to him even the secrets of his religious life (vit. C., 1, 28; 2, 8, &c.). Inspired with high respect for E.'s learning, he entrusted him with the preparation of 50 parchment MSS. of the Bible, for the churches of the capital (a. 331, vit. C., 4, 36; SOCR., 1, 9). Laying aside all other labors, E. addressed himself with untiring diligence to this work (vit. C., 4, 35, 46), and in the midst of it, toiling to his last breath, died.

Eusebius combined many excellent qualities of mind and heart. In more quiet times, or away from the atmosphere of the court, his moderation, contentment, and peaceableness, would have made him one of the best of bishops. He did not lack resolution in sacrificing personal inclination to duty, but the systematic thought and firmness, so essential in his circumstances. It is especially significant that whilst in the controversy with Athanasius he betrays even extreme partizanship, he seems to verge on a sacrifice of the truth when arrayed against Constantine.—His theology, modified in all leading points by Origen, is characterized by the same empiricism. In erudition, Hellenic, and Christian, he surpasses all the Church Fathers, not even excepting Origen and Jerome. Neither is he deficient in some tact for distinguishing essentials from non-essentials. But in everything he is a compiler, hence he traverses Christianity rather than enters its inmost sanctuary. His considerateness, by which he stood in affinity with the theologians of Antioch, shows itself in his style also.—Two things cast a shadow upon E. from the start. First his position in regard to Arianism. Whilst zealots like Hilary and Jerome at once branded him as the standard-bearer of Arianism, and the 2d Council of Nice (787) summarily condemned him as such, others charged him with duplicity (SOCR., 1, 23). Few defended him as orthodox according to Nice (SOCR., 1, 23; 2, 21), among whom was Athanasius (ep. ad Afros c. 6: de decr. Nic. syn., c. 3), on the assumption that E. turned from Arianism to the orthodox faith. The truth is, E. was neither Nicene nor Arian, but always adhered to his own form of the doctrine of the Trinity. He piously adhered to the Logos-doctrine of Origen, and desired to have the divinity of Christ expressed in simple Bible terms. But the apparition of Sabellianism drove him into the path of Arianism, the bearings of which he did not clearly see. Hence the apparent changeableness of his delineations of the doctrine of Christ.—He places the origin of the Son in a casual connection with the existence of the world. The world as a vast body, of innumerable parts, needed a head to arrange and govern all, and to keep it from wandering too far from God. The Father could not be this head, because the glory of his unlimited deity would be too great for created things to endure. When, therefore, his love determined to create the world in order to impart to it the life of that love, he first begat the Son, not from any necessity of his nature, but freely. As a kind of intermediate being between the perfect first source of all things and frail creatures, he should be the foundation of all that might be created, and the organ (ὄργανον, ἐκπύρετης) and living norm, who should combine all existing things into unity. To call him a creature, and suppose him to have sprung like other creatures ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων, would deny his divinity; for only the begotten is like him that hath begotten, and the Son was continually with the Father, before all time. But the nature of this begetting, as the entire relation of the Son to the Father, is beyond human conception. The nearest similitude is that of the odor of flowers. Thus the Son is the sweet odor proceeding from the Father—his perfect image, his essential glory—αὐτόθεος, αὐτοζών, αὐτοαγαθόν, superior to all creatures. To the only begotten Son alone does the Father sustain this specific, and, as the name implies, physical relation. But this origin involves the reality of his Sonship, as a being hypostatically distinct from the Father. And as the Father is the only unbegotten absolute first cause, the Son finds the ground of his own existence first in the Father. Hence the Son does not possess equal majesty (ἰσότης) with the Father, though before all time he is not without beginning or eternal (ἀπλῶς ἀίδιος); the idea of the Father's existence precedes that of the Son. The Son, as a second God subordinate to the Father, must also worship the Father. This unity of the Father as the sole first cause of all things, is the root of the unity of the Trinity. For we cannot conceive of three hypostases in a monad, excepting the triad spring from the monad. The being of God is independent of the Trinity; this, therefore, is not immanent in his being, but the product of a free act of the Divine will.—Thus in the theory of Eusebius subordination and omousianism are constantly checkmating each other. Through all his expressions of divine dignity, &c., applied to the Redeemer, we may often see the lineaments of the Arian subordinate deity. No wonder that he is still regarded by some as Arian, by others orthodox. (The chief passages on the subject are: Demonstr. Evang., 4, 1–6; 5, 1. Theophan. 1, 4, 15, 21, &c.; 2, 3, 24; 3, 19, 39. H. E., 1, 2; 10, 4. Theol. eccl., 1, 2, 6, 8–13, 2, 6, &c., 23. See MÖHLER, Athanasius, &c., II., 36, &c. BAUR, d. Lehre v. d. Dreieinigkeit, I., 472, &c. HÄNELL, de Euseb. relig. christ. defens., 1843, p. 42, &c., 67, &c. DORNER, d. Lehre v. d. Person Christi, 2. Aufl., I., 2, p. 792, &c. NEANDER, Ch. Hist. KLOSE in Niedner's Ztschr., &c., 1846, p. 395, &c.).

It is more difficult to decide upon the merits of E. as the author of the life of Constantine (see Art.), as to which he is open to the reproach, not merely of exaggerated panegyric, but of misrepresenting facts. But here we must make allowance for the influence of the pragmatism of the historical writings of that age, for the fact that to the hierarchical episcopacy of that period Constantine seemed to be God's honored instrument for the spread of the triumphs of Christianity, that E. wrote, not a succinct biography of C., but simply a sketch of his merits as a Christian Emperor, that his bombastic style was that of the Byzantine court, and finally that E. sustained relations of intimate personal friendship for Constantine. That the book was not written for flattery, or personal aggrandizement, is evident from its having been composed after C.'s death, and that the author ever showed himself superior to such selfish motives.

Eusebius owes his chief ecclesiastical importance to his writings, which may be divided into four classes. I. HIS HISTORICAL WORKS.—1) The ἐκκαταστατική ιστορία, in 10 books, undertaken with a full sense of the difficulties in the way, and yet with the use of all available helps, is limited to a selection of the material to a. 314. With all its merits it has many and grievous faults. It is neither organic nor uniform. Essentials are barely mentioned, trifles enlarged upon. The fidelity of the narrative is sometimes invalidated by inaccuracy and credulity, sometimes by being fitted to the procrustean bed of theological prejudices. The frailties of Christianity, the worldliness of bishops, &c., are concealed (8, 2). Doctrinal considerations obscure, and narrow, his historical horizon. Even chronological mistakes abound. Altogether it exhibits the Church as a petrification, shows us what the organic original was. And yet it cannot be overestimated for its thorough conformity to the authorities consulted. The narrative is also enriched by old traditions, information obtained from parties to the transactions or contemporaries, and personal knowledge. The nature of the authorities consulted, whether oral, written, or traditional, is carefully stated, and when the narrative lacks satisfactory authorities it is expressly acknowledged (4, 35).—The principal editions of his history are: DU VALOIS: Par., 1659, fol. (the ed. of 1672 is defective); HEINICHEN: Lps., 1827, 3 T., with a crit. suppl., 1840; BURTON: Oxon., 1838, 2 T.; manual ed. by SCHWEGLER: Tubing., 1852. German transl.: STROTH: Quedlinb., 1776; CLOSS: Stuttg., 1839. English transl.: HANMER, 1584: Cambridge; T. SHORTING, c. 1690; CRUSÉ: Philadelphia and Boston, 1833–6.—Upon the historical credibility of the work: MÖLLER: Havn., 1813; DANZ: Jena, 1815; KESSNER: Götting., 1816; Illgen's Ztschr., &c., 1839, II. 2, p. 10, &c. Also Cf. BAUR, comparatur Eus. hist. eccl. parens cum parente hist. Herodot.: Tub., 1834.—As a sort of basis to his history E. previously wrote 2) his Chronology, χρονικά συγγράμματα, παραδοτική ιστορία, for centuries the standard. It is in two parts: a) an outline of the hist. of the world to A. D. 325, often copying from Jul. Africanus; b) a tabular abstract of this, carried down to 378 by Jerome (the best recension by SCALIGER, thes. tempor., 1606; Amstel., 1658, fol.). An Armen. transl. was discovered in Constant., 1792, with many improved readings, and some additional sections (the best ed. by Mai: Ven., 1833. See Abhandl. d. Berlin. Akad. d. Wissensch., &c., 1820).—3) The Life of Const., in 4 books, written after 337. Ed. by Heinichen: Lps., 1830.—4) Eulogy upon C., of 336.—5) The tract on the Martyrs of Palestine, 303–310, now usually publ. as the 8th b. of the Hist.—6) Part of a letter to Constantine, upon the likenesses of Christ.—7) Lost are: the collection of the ancient Martyrologies (H. E., 4, 15; 5, 4, 21); the life of Pamphilus, 3 books (libri elegantissimi, says Jerome); the account of the Church of Jerusalem (vit. C. 4, 46); the work on the Passover, Easter (vit. C. 4, 35).

II. Second in rank, as well as to contents as literary merit, are the apologetic writings of E., two works, composed before 324 (præp. ev., 15, 1, 62), demonstr. ev., 1, 1; 3, 3), and consisting of: 1) προπαρασκευὴ εὐαγγελικὴ in 15 b., a negative argument based upon the insufficiency of the Hellenistic religion, and even of Judaism; 2) ἀποδείξεις εὐαγγ., positive proofs, &c., in 20 b., now but 10. (Both publ. by Gaisford: Oxon., 1843, 1852); 3) the contents of both works are well reproduced in the Theophany (libri 5 in Hieron., vir. ill., c. 81), rescued from the darkness of a Nitrian monastery by Tattam, in a Syrian version (ed. by Lee: London, 1842. In English, &c.: Cambridge, 1843). 4) ἐκλογαὶ προφητικαί (H. E., 1, 2), the argument from prophecy, which is scarcely broached in the preceding works; 5) the less important treatise adv. Hierocles (Phot. cod., 39), a refut. of the parallel between Christ and Apollon. of Tyana, probably written before 312; 6) the Apology for Origen. See Jerome, apol., 1; adv. Rufin., II., p. 135; apol. 2, p. 148. The 6th b. written after the death of Pamph. Only the 1st b. remains in the unreliable transl. of Rufin. (in Origen, Opp. de la Rue, IV., 17, &c.; Greek portions in Photius, cod. 118; comp. Socr., 3, 7); 7) Λεστ. excepting the titles, are: the 2d b. ἐλέγχου καὶ ἀπολογίας (Phot., cod., 13) against heathen objections; 25 or 30 b. adv. Porphyry (Jerome, vir. ill., c. 81; ep. ad Magnes., 84); finally the ἐκκλησ. προπαρασκευὴ (Phot., cod., 11), and ἐκκλησ. ἀποδείξεις (Phot., cod. 12).

III. The feeblest of E.'s works are the doctrinal. 1) Κατὰ Μαρτέλλου, 2 b. — 2) Περὶ τῆς ἐκκλησ. θεολογίας, against Marcellus; both works composed after 336. (Publ. by Gaisford, Oxf., 1852).—IV. Equally inferior are E.'s exegetical works, from his ignorance of the Hebrew, and adherence to Origen's style. Preserved are most of the comm. on the Psalms, to Ps. 118, the 10 b. on Isaiah, not composed before 324. A small remnant upon Canticles (see these ed. in MONTFAUCON, coll. nov. patr., 1707. MAI gives Luke in scriptt. vet. nov. coll., I., 1, p. 107, &c. Cat. patr.). But E.'s exegetical introductions have attracted general attention. 1) περὶ τῶν τοπικῶν ὀνομάτων ἐν τῇ θείᾳ γραφῇ. The 1st, lost part, contained the topography of Palestine; the 2d, revised by Jerome, an alphabet. list of places named in the Bible, &c. (The Greek by BONFRÈRE: Par., 1631, rev. ed. by CLERIC., onomast., &c.: Amstel., 1707, fol.).—2) The 10 Evang. canons, prompted by the gospel harmony of Ammonius. The ep. to Carpius stands in front.—3) Ζητήματα καὶ λύσεις, 3 b. (demonstr. ev., 7, 3), a solution of the seeming contradictions occurring in the first and last chaps. of the Gospels.—4) περὶ τῆς τοῦ βιβλίου τῶν προφητῶν ὀνομασίας, fragm. by J. Curterius, 1580.

Biogr. of E.: MART. HANKE, de Byzant. ver. scriptt. graec.: Lps., 1677. Du VALOIS, de vita scriptisque E., &c., also in Hein., I., XXXIII., &c. FABRICIUS, bibl. graec. ed. Harles VII., 335, &c. STROTH, introd. to his transl. of the H. E.

MÜHLER, l. c. DÄHNE in Ersch and Gruber Encycl. Sect. I., Vol. XXXIX., p. 179, &c. KIMMEL, de Rufino E. interpr., 1838). SEMISCH.*

Eusebius, B. of Emesa, Phoenicia († c. 360), was descended of a noble family in Edessa, where he laid the basis of biblical and secular learning, and then visited the eccl. schools of different countries. Eusebius of Cæs., and Patrophilus of Scythopolis were among his instructors in the Bible. The principles of interpretation adopted by the rising school of Antioch especially suited his practical understanding, and there his own views were methodically systematized. His desire to secure a philosophical basis for his system, and also to escape the priestly ordination urged upon him by B. Euphronius, led him to visit Alexandria. But c. 340 he was again dwelling in Antioch. Then already his talents as an exegete and orator, seemed to point the Synod of Antioch (341) to him as Athanasius' successor in Alexandria. But E. knew the attachment of the people for the martyr of omousianism, and doubted his qualifications for so perilous a post. He preferred the humbler bishopric of Emesa. But the Emesans were afraid of his astronomy, which, in that age, involved astrology and magic, and they opposed his induction. E. escaped to Laodicea. The Patriarch of Antioch settled the disturbances, and E. was allowed to enter upon his duties. But, either because the suspicions of the people prevented full fellowship with him, or he preferred quiet scientific pursuits, his last days were spent in Antioch, where he taught Diodorus of Tarsus. His skill in astrology made him a favorite of Constantius, whom he often attended during his campaigns. His theological views were shaped by the training to which choice and circumstances subjected him. Their fundamental traits are simplicity and conformity to the S.S., to which his mind, ever open to new peculiarities, but shy of the narrow formulas of the recent doctrinal terminology, the more firmly adhered, as he saw that pride of opinion and love of logomachy were the chief cause of the distractions of the Church. Hence his affinity for semi-Pelagianism, and his intimacy with many of its leaders. But his relation to the school of Antioch exhibit him in a loftier position; as one of the most influential predecessors of the masters of that school, he prepared the way for their labors. This is clear, not only in his style of expounding the S.S., which distinguished carefully between subjective opinions and the truth revealed, and uniformly followed the grammatical and historical sense of the language (Jer., vir. ill., c. 91), but still more in his manner of harmonizing the doctrine of the two natures in Christ: the Logos assumed flesh, the Logos dwelt in the body. And whilst laying full stress upon the impassibility of the divine nature, he held that even the compassion ascribed to Christ was to be thought of analogically. That which made E.'s writings so popular especially with those who made oratory a profession, was their truthful natural simplicity with all their artistic elegance.—Among his many productions Jerome mentions as chief those against the Jews, the heathen, and the Novatians; 10 b. of comm. on Galatians, and short homilies upon the Gospels. Others, preserved by the Syrian C., may yet be discovered in transl. or reproductions. Besides the two against the Marcionites and Manicheans (THEOD., fab. hæc., 1, 25, &c.), Ebed Jes. knew (ASSEM., bibl. or., III., 1, p. 44) the questions upon the O. T., and a discourse upon Stephen, Xenias (ASSEM., II., 28) a work upon faith, and other discourses. Of all only brief fragments remain (doctrinal in THEOD., dial. 3, ed. Schulze et Nösselt, IV., 258, &c.; exeget. in Cat. Patr.; polemic. opusc. 14 ed. Sirmond., 1643, and opp. var., I., 1, &c.). The homilies of E. publ. by Gagnée, Par., 1547, more complete by Fromy, Par., 1575, and often since, are unquestionably spurious. — (Sources: the biogr. of B. GEORGE in Laodicea, is lost. From it SOCR., H. E., 2, 9; SOZ., 3, 6. AUGUSTI, Euseb. Em. opusc., &c.: Elberf., 1829 (this last criticized by Thilo, Halle, 1832). SEMISCH.*

Eusebius, B. of Laodicea, in Syria, † 269, by birth an Alexandrian, is a bright example of primitive love, self-denial, and zeal in deeds of charity, qualities which he displayed amid the persecutions which then raged, and especially during a fearful plague which swept over the empire under Gallus. In 263, when civil war distracted the Alexandrians, he interceded effectually with the Roman general, for the relief of the thousands perishing of hunger. In 264 the disturbances caused in Syria by the errors of Paul of Samosata induced E. to go abroad. He attended the Synod of Antioch as delegate, and took the place of the aged and infirm B. Dionysius, and made so favorable an impression that he was appointed B. of Laodicea. As such he is reckoned among the most prominent teachers of the Church (JEROME, Chron. ad. a. 2. Aurel.). His successor was his excellent and cherished friend Anatolius. Nothing is reported of E. as an author. — (See EUSEB., H. E., 711, 21, sq., 32). SEMISCH.*

Eusebius, of Nicomedia, the leader of the Eusebians in the Arian controversy, called by his party the Great († 341). His unbounded ambition, reckless of means, and prizing the episcopate only for its worldly glory; his courtizan worldliness wedded to zeal for forms of doctrine and a nice psychological instinct which enabled him keenly to measure arguments, men, and circumstances; his tact, combined with learning and eloquence; all show how he could play the part he performed both as court-bishop and partizan leader. Ammianus Marcell. (hist. 22, 9) says that being related to Julianus, E. sprang from one of the first families of the empire; an advantage which placed him near to Constantine, and favored his lofty schemes. At first he was B. of Berytus in Phœnicia. But this secluded sphere did not suit him, and ere long, probably through Constantia, who placed unbounded confidence in him, he secured the See of Nicomedia, where he intrigued for Licinius (Theodor., 1, 19), but on his defeat quickly made favor with the victor. When Constantinople was built as the capital, E. schemed, despite Church laws, for his own transfer to the new court, and in 338 succeeded by the authority of Constantius. Thus he was the first to set the contagious example of hierarchical hanker-

ings after the See of the capital, that from such central point the Church also might be controlled. Like Arius, and other coryphæi of the Arian controversy, he had once sat at Lucian's feet in Antioch, where a christology obnoxious to the orthodox faith had taken its rise (EPIPHAN., 69, 5; PHILOSTORG. 2, 3, 15). Hence he also held subordinationism, so that Arius might well reckon upon that sympathy and aid which E. so zealously rendered (SOCR., 1, 6; SOZ., 1, 15; THEOD., 1, 5. ATHANAS. de Synod. Arim. et Seleuc., c. 17). At the Council of Nice he, indeed, through selfish prudence, signed the orthodox confession, but nothing could induce him to acknowledge the anathemas (SOZ., 1, 20, &c.; THEOD., 1, 6, &c., 19). Soon after this the arrival in Nicomedia of an embassy of Egyptian Meletians, afforded him an opportunity of strengthening Arianism by a league with those schismatics (ATHANAS., apol. c. Arian., c. 5; EPIPH., hæc., 68, 5, &c.). — Contradictory reasons are reported for E.'s subsequent banishment to Gallia. The tradition in Philostorgius (NICET., thes. orthod. fid., 5, 8) that immediately after the Synod he retracted his signature, and thus displeased the Emperor, is refuted by the chronology; for the banishment was not imposed until three months afterwards. Another report (SOZ., 2, 21) says he bribed some one to strike out his name from the signatures, and publicly opposed the homoousian dogma, even before the Emperor. It is most probable that his treatment of the Alexandrian agitators, whom Constant. had sent to Nicomedia, exasperated C. (SOZ., 2, 21; THEOD., 1, 19). But the recall of Arius was soon followed by that of E. (328). The ostensible ground for this was a letter addressed by E. to the principal bishops, in which he avowed his adherence to the Nicene faith, and abhorrence of all heresy. Restored to his dignity, and to the Emperor's favor, he toiled zealously to establish Arianism. The crafty scheme was adopted of effecting the downfall of the chief Nicenists, E., meanwhile, accommodating his language to the views of semi-Arianism (PHOT., cod., 257). The first blow took effect; Eustathius of Antioch (see Art.) was removed (THEOD., 1, 20). In Constantinople Euseb. was at the head of those bishops who effected the expulsion of Athanasius by political accusations (336, SOCR., 1, 35; SOZ., 2, 28). And the pomp with which E. required Alexander to readmit Arius into Church-fellowship, was doubtless with a view to obtain the See of the capital for himself (cf. SOCR., 1, 37; SOZOM., 2, 29; EPIPHAN., hæc., 69, 10; ATHANAS., ad episc. egypt., c. 19). — The last remarkable act of E. was his participation in the manœuvre to ensnare the Western C. with Arianism, by procuring a sentence of condemnation against Athanasius, and, this failing, his share in the settlement of semi-Arianism in the symbols of the Council of Antioch (341). SEMISCH.*

Eusebius, from 361 to † 379 Bishop of Samosata, on the Euphrates, was under Valens the chief bulwark of the orthodox church in the East against Arianism. After a long dispute the Arians and Nicenists at the Synod of Antioch (361) had united in the choice of Meletius as Patriarch, because each party thought him favorable to their views, and the certificate of election duly signed by both was placed in the hands of E. (THEODORET., H. E., 2, 27). But the first sermon of M. destroyed the hopes of the Arians. He boldly proclaimed in the ears of Constantius his belief in the perfect Godhead of Christ; whereupon an imperial envoy was sent to Samosata to obtain again the certificate. E. refused to part with it, because it would be a breach of covenant so to do, without the consent of all the subscribers. To a second envoy, who threatened, in case of continued refusal, to lop off his right hand, E. stretched out both hands and declared he would rather have them both cut off than surrender the document. This manly firmness had its effect upon Constantius (Theod., 2, 28). After the death of Julian the Apostate, he aided in the passage of a decree reaffirming the Nicene faith at a synod held in Antioch in 363 (SOCRATES, h. e., 3, 25. Mansi, Concil. coll., III., p. 372). The persecutions under Valens, from 364, taxed all his energies for the maintenance of the orthodox party. Disguised as a soldier, he travelled through the dioceses of Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, in order to ordain clergy in congregations deprived of their pastors (Theod., 4, 12). At an election for bishop in Cappadocian Cæsarea (370), where the Arians labored to secure a man of their own views, he raised his voice in favor of Basil. An intimate friendship was the result (BASIL, 58, 69). At length the storm broke over his head (373). The Emperor issued against him a decree of banishment. His first thought was the safety of the messenger. In the silence of the night he departed. The prayers of his people, who hastened after him as far as Zeugma, that he would not leave them defenceless, he answered by reminding them of his duty to obey (Theod., 4, 13). From Thrace, his place of banishment, he kept up an active correspondence with Basil and Gregory Nazianzen concerning all the more important affairs of the Church. After the persecution had subsided on the death of Valens (378), he was empowered by a council held at Antioch (379) to reorganize the shattered dioceses of Syria by the appointment of orthodox bishops. In the execution of this work he reached Doliche, a little town in the province of Comagene, when a stone, cast at him by a woman of the Arian party, put an end to his life. Whilst dying, he exacted a promise from the bystanders not to persecute the murderers (Theod., 5, 4). Except that his name is found among the martyrs on the Roman calendar of saints for June 21, and on the Greek for the day after, Eusebius has almost vanished from the memory of posterity. And yet the Epistles of Basil and Gregory Nazianzen are filled with praises of his wisdom, his piety, his orthodoxy, and the diligence with which he discharged the duties of his office.

SEWISCH. — Porter.

Eusebius, Archbishop of Thessalonica, about the year 600, distinguished himself as a learned antagonist of Monophysitism, whose adherents and conventicles had spread secretly over the diocese of Illyria. The Romish bishop, Gregory the Great, informed of the fact, and concerned for the unstained purity of the Bride of Christ, took occasion, as metropolitan, to enjoin upon E. the duty of completely extirpating the heretics (Epist., 10, 42; 11, 74). But the latter preferred the pen to such severe measures, and provoked by the somewhat petulant attack of Andreas, a monk, wrote 10 books against the error of the Aphthartodocetans. Photius gives us a summary of their contents (cod. 162).

SEWISCH. — Porter.

Eusebius, Bishop of Vercelli, in Piedmont († 371), one of the triumvirate, who, under Constantius in the West endured so many trials and sufferings in behalf of the Nicene orthodoxy, was born in the island of Sardinia, and is said by tradition to have been placed by his mother, Restituta, who settled as a widow in Rome, in the hands of Pope Eusebius to be educated, and that he was baptized and named by this pontiff in 311 (BARON., Annal. ad a. 311, N. 42). For a while a lector in Rome under Pope Sylvester he was unanimously chosen by the people and clergy as Bishop of Vercelli (AMBROS., Epist., 63, 2). From the obscurity of this diocese the necessities of the Church called him to do battle against Arianism. At the request of the Roman bishop, Liberius, he had, along with other papal deputies, persuaded the Emperor Constantius, then in Gaul, to convoke a Synod in Milan (355). The motives on both sides were wholly antagonistic. The Western Catholics wished to redeem the honor of Athanasius, disgracefully condemned by the Council of Arles (353); the Emperor, to have this solemn decision repeated, with the idea, that thus the chief hinderance to the conversion of the West to Arianism would be removed. E., foreseeing the issue, resolved to remain away. But a name of such weight, which could turn the scale on either side, was indispensable to both parties. Orthodox and Arians, and the Emperor himself, sent letters urging him to attend (BARON., Annal. ad a., 355, N. 2, sqq. Mansi, Concil. coll., III., p. 236). At length he yielded. And yet a minority of the Arians resisted his admission for ten whole days. On his proposing that an agreement as to the true faith should precede any action concerning Athanasius, the Emperor, who so far forgot his dignity as to come forward in his own person as the accuser of Athanasius (ATHANAS., hist. Arian. c. 76), tore in pieces the Nicene symbol laid down for signature, with the declaration, that nothing of the kind should be done (HILAR., ad Constant. Aug. Col., 1617, p. 99). Against the Catholic bishops, who replied that it was contrary to ecclesiastical law to condemn any one without a hearing, he thundered out the despotic answer: "What I wish, that shall be the law" (ATHANAS., hist. Arian. c. 33). And when they besought him not to force the Arian heresy upon the Church, reminding him of the limits of civil authority and of the judgment of God, dumb with rage at this unwonted language, he grasped his sword (ATHAN., l. c. c. 34). But such means of terror had no effect upon Eusebius. Whilst hundreds of faint-hearted bishops signed the anti-Nicene edict of Milan, the exhortation of the emperor, to restore peace by compliance, was wasted upon him (BARON., l. c. N. 16; Mansi, l. c., p. 328). Hence, after the first bloody thoughts of the monarch had subsided, he was banished to Scythopolis, in Palestine. Here he was hospitably welcomed by an eminent Jew, Josephus (EPIPHAN., hær., 30, 5). The faithful, far and near, vied with each other in soothing the sorrows of his exile. He was even comforted by an embassy, letters and gifts of affection from Vercelli. Meanwhile, just as the hope of winning him over to a renunciation of his faith by mild measures sunk, the severity against him increased. He was separated from his clergy, his dwelling was broken into and plundered, and he himself dragged naked through the public streets, and thrust into a gloomy dungeon. When even this brutality could not shake his steadfastness, he was transferred to Cappadocia (HIERON., vir. ill., c. 96), and thence to the Thebaid (SOCRAT., H. E., 3, 5; SOZOM., 5, 12). Liberated after the accession of Julian, he went first to Alexandria, in order, by the help of Athanasius and the Alexandrian Synod (362), to labor for the restoration of the Oriental Church. The Synod commissioned him to heal the divisions caused by Miletus at Antioch. He was indeed the right man for the work, but the undue haste of Bishop Lucifer of Cagliari, who, blindly interfering, had ordained the no less eccentric priest, Paulinus, as Bishop of the Eustathians, rendered the breach incurable. E. left Antioch without deciding for either party, and after travelling through the East to the great comfort of many distracted churches, he passed over Illyria (363), and entered the borders of Italy (SOCRAT., 3, 9; SOZOM., 5, 13). On his arrival all Italy, says Jerome, laid off her robes of sorrow. From this time he kept two things chiefly in view. What he saw in the East having strengthened his opinion, that the perfection of the Christian life culminates in monachism, he devoted himself with his parochial clergy to such a cause. Thus he was the first man in the West, who united the ascetism of the cloister with the duties of the priest (AMBROS., Epist., 63, 66, 70), and became a model to Augustine, and the ages after him. His second care was to continue the battle against Arianism. Encouraged by political circumstances, Arianism in Milan had raised its head with new power under Bishop Auxentius (see Art.). In order to assail it in its stronghold, E. appeared suddenly in Milan (364). But an order from the Emperor Valentinian I., who sympathized with Auxentius, drove him back to his diocese. A life of so much self-sacrifice could not fail of the crown of martyrdom. An epitaph praises him as a martyr in acrostic verse. According to tradition he was stoned to death by the Arians. As a martyr, therefore, he has his place in the pantheon of saints. In the older martyrologies the day of his birth into the higher life was Aug. 1; now it is Dec. 16. But of this, neither Ambrose (Epist. 63, 2), who lived so near in time and place, nor Gregory of Tours, who celebrates the praises of the confessors (de glor. confess., c. 3), make the least mention.

Of the writings of E., the epistles extant treat partly of the dogmatic controversies of the century, and partly of his sufferings in prison. They are: 1) ad Constant. Aug. una (MANSI, III., p. 237): 2) ad presbyteros et plebes Italiæ; 3) libellus facti ad Patrophilum, both from Scythopolis; the latter to his jailor, the Arian bishop; 4) ad Gregor. episcop. Spanensem Bäticum, from the Thebaid of the year 359 (in HILAR., fragm., p. 136). Published in GALLAND., bibl. patr., V., p. 78, sq.; bibl. patr. max., V., p. 1227. According to Jerome (adv. Vigilant. epp. 75; vir. ill., c. 96) E. had translated into Latin the Commentary of Eusebius of Cæsarea on the Psalms, with the omission of the heretical passages. Whether the ancient Codex of the Gospels preserved in the Cathedral of Vercelli is from the hand of E., we may at best only believe, but cannot prove. An old, legendary Biography by UGHELLI (Italia sacra, IV., p. 747), may be compared with Acta sancti., Aug. I., p. 340. Some biographical matter occurs also in the panegyrics of MAXIMUS TAURINENSIS (opp. Rom., 1784; homil. 77, sqq.; serm. 81, sq.; and, in addition, Serm. 20-23), in AMBROSIIUS (opp. Bened. serm., 56, sq.; IV., p. 577, sq.), and in MURATORI (anecdol. IV., p. 77, sq.). — Conf. also BARONIUS (Annal. ad a. 355-371); GRUBER (allgem. Encycl., sect. I., vol. XL., p. 444); and MÖHLER (Athanasius der Gr., II., p. 121).

SEMISCH.—Porter.

Eustachius, Martyr and Saint, to whom one of the principal churches in Paris is dedicated. Our accounts of him are derived from the 8th cent.; from these we gather (apart from legends and traditions) that before his baptism he was called Placidus, and, with his wife, Tatiann (afterwards Theopista), embraced Christianity. Under Hadrian (c. 130) they and their two children are said to have suffered martyrdom. Since the 6th cent. his martyrdom was commemorated at Rome, and Celestine III. is said to have built a crypt or chapel, and dedicated it to E. From an account of Philip Augustus, of 1194, it may be concluded that the relics of E. were sent to France under Celest. III., where they were preserved in the abbey of St. Denis, and then given to the church bearing his name. —(See his Acta in COMBEFIS' collection: Illustr. Chr. martyrum lecti triumpho: Paris, 1660, 8vo. Also in the BOLLAND., Oct. 20; comp. Biogr. univers. T. 63). S.*

Eustathius, made by the Synod of Nice, in 325, B. of Antioch, previously B. of Beröa, distinguished himself, both at the above Synod, and by writings, as one of the most zealous opponents of Arianism. In 331 the Arians, who hated him, instituted a Synod at Antioch. Here, on account of some obscure and incautious expressions, he was accused by Eusebius of Nicomedia, who had incited Eusebius of Cæsarea also against him, of Sabellianism, and of having committed carnal sins. The Synod deposed, and the Emperor exiled him to Thrace, where he seems to have died prior to 360. This degradation produced a great excitement in the Church of Antioch; his adherents, called Eustathians, separated from the Arian bishops, and continued as a separate party until the 5th cent. Of the works of E., only one remains: κατὰ Ὀρίγονος διαγνωτικὸς, εἰς τὸ τῆς συλαστικῆς θεωρίας, Crit. Sacr., T. VI., in which he refutes the opinion of Origen, that the witch of Endor (see Art.) had really raised the spirit of Samuel.

E. rejected in general the allegorical exegesis of Origen, and is therefore cited by Neander, C. H., II., 748, as representative of the school of Antioch. Of his lost works, fragments are given by FABRICIUS, bibl. Græc., Vol. VIII.; (see, also, HIERON., Catal. c. 85; SOZOMENUS, II., 19; PHILOSTORGIUS, II., 7; FABRICIUS, l. c.).

Eustathius, after 350 B. of Sebaste, in Armenia, a Cappadocian, was held, on account of his vacillations amid the controversies of his age, in low estimation. He was successively Nicene, Arian, Semiarian, and last, Eunomian. († 380.) He enjoyed for a long time the friendship of Basil the Gr., but afterwards separated from him. He was condemned by several Synods, and lost the confidence of all parties. He merits praise, however, for erecting in Sebaste a hospital for strangers and the sick. He also introduced monasticism into Armenia, Pontus, and Paphlagonia, and gave rise to the fanatical ascetic party of the Eustathians, who maintained that no married person could be saved, and hence would have communion with no priest who had been married before ordination. Touching his relation to Ærius, see Art.—SOCR., H. E., II., 43; SOZOM., H. E., III., 14. H.—Reinecke.

Eustathius.—This celebrated commentator on Homer, long already an important authority in philology, has latterly, by the publication of his minor works (Opusc. e codd. Basil. Paris. Venet. nunc prim. ed. Th. L. F. Tafel. Francof. ad. M., 1832), and later supplements (Tafel. de Thessalonica: Berol., 1839, p. 401), obtained an interesting and respectable position in the theological literature also of the Greek middle ages. He lived during the reign of Manuel Comnenus, Andronicus, Alexis Comnenus, and Isaac Angelus; an age of some pretension to literature, but spiritually impoverished and morally degenerate. He was born at Constantinople, in what year, is uncertain. According to Demetrius Chomatenus (ap. Leunclav. in Jure Gr. Rom., lib. V., p. 317), he was probably a monk in the monastery of the Church of Florus, afterwards deacon in the Church of St. Sophia, at Byzantium, and teacher of rhetoric. His other title, ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν δεήσεων, designates an office at court; of which he seems to have made use, when, during a great scarcity of water, he presented a petition of the citizens to the Emperor (Supplic. Manuelli imp. oblat., Tafel. Thessal., p. 433). His philological works, the commentaries on Homer and Dionys. Periegetes, perhaps also on Aristophanes, belong to this period. In 1174 or 1175, he became Bishop of Myra, in Lycia, an event which he celebrates in a panegyric to the Emperor of historical importance, (Thessal., p. 401). His consecration, however, was not consummated; for the Emperor appointed him Metropolitan of Thessalonica, where he continued till his death, about 1194 (Thessal., p. 368). He was highly admired by his contemporaries. Nicetas Choniates (Hist. ed. Bonn., p. 399) describes him as distinguished for virtues, eloquence, penetration, and experience, and as excelling all others in his knowledge of sacred and profane literature. The letters of Mich. Acominatos, contemporary Archb. of Athens, manifest the greatest admiration of him

(Elissen, M. Acom. v. Chonæ: Gött., 1846, p. 58). In his monody upon the death of E., he calls him a "sun of the priesthood, a king of knowledge, a father of eloquence, a shining example in life and science." The letters of M. Psellus (Thess., p. 361), and the funeral discourse of Euthymius of Neopatra (ib., p. 394), manifest personal friendship and esteem. On several occasions E. took a bold position. When, in 1180, the Emp. Manuel protested, in a lordly manner, against a form, in which the catechumens were required to renounce the god of Mohammed as θεὸς ἀλόγιστος, and caused it to be stricken out as blasphemous, E. opposed him at a Synod, and defended the true meaning of the anathema. The displeasure of the emperor on this occasion (Nicet. Chron., p. 278: see GASS, Gennadius and Pletho, I., p. 140) did not compromise the standing of E. at court, and the latter pronounced a eulogy on the death of Manuel (Opusc., p. 196). Somewhat later, E. was involved in political troubles. The revolt of the Greeks against the tyrant Andronicus, occasioned in 1185 the invasion of the Normans under William II. of Sicily; Thessalonica, also, was given up to the wildest rapine. E. continued faithfully with his congregation, obtained milder measures from the Latin generals, and maintained the Greek worship against the interference of the strangers. In his own work (De Thessal. urbe a Norm. capt. narr., Opusc., p. 267) he describes the sufferings of the city, and his own course (see, also, Nicet. Hist., p. 392). He seems also to have been expelled once from his office: it is certain, at least, that he had to contend with enemies.—Of more account than this is the position of E. in morals and the Church. As monk, bishop, theologian, and author, he showed the spirit of a Byzantine; but he elevated himself above the common form of it: even his Byzantine style is peculiar and refined. He felt both the moral earnestness of Christianity and the diseases of his age, and contended vigorously against the monastic pomp and outward ascetism, which were threatening to change religion and virtue into mere appearance. His excellent work, περὶ ὑποκριτικῆς (Opusc., p. 88), exposes this prevailing vice in all its degrees and forms as a caricature of the most holy things. Especially important is his work: ἐπίκαιρος βίου μορμαχικὸν (Opusc., p. 214—transl. and publ. with comm. by G. L. F. Tafel: Berl., 1847). Though heartily favorable to the "divine and heavenly" monastic state, he chastises its awful degeneracy, its mendacity and sloth, and advises moderation in mortification, in order to restore honesty of purpose. Salutary employment are recommended, and monastic ignorance deprecated. Everywhere he applies most earnestly the idea, which he unfolds from Ps. 49, that within the sphere of this earthly life eternal treasures may be obtained, if, for the hope of the eternal, the flesh is mortified by labor and struggles (Opusc., p. 9).—His works, not above mentioned, consist of sermons and discourses on various occasions, a commentary on Pindar, a dialogue, and letters to various persons. Some of them, as the commentary on John of Damascus, are still in manuscript. See: Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. ed. Harl., XI., p. 222;

Le Quien, Oriens. Christ., II., p. 48; Oudin, Comm., II., p. 1539; Neander, Karakt. des E. v. Th. in seiner reform. Richt. (Abhandl. d. Berl. Akad. d. W., 1841; hist. Abth., auch in Neander's Wissensch. Abhandl., herausg. von Jakobi.: Berl., 1851, p. 6). GASS.—Reinecke.

Euthymius, Zigabenus (rather Zygadenus), belongs to the most notable Byzant. theologians of the 12th cent., whose few excellencies and many infirmities he fully exemplifies. He flourished under Alex. Comnenus, c. 1118, and was monk of a monastery of the B. Virgin, called τῆς περιβλήπτου, near Constantinople. In the sense of his age and associations he was a man of learning and polemical skill (Anna Comm. Alex., XV., 387, Ven., 1729). Of his works a Comm. on the Psalms was publ. in Latin, at Veron., 1530, per Philippum Saulum, and often afterwards, the whole in Gr. and Lat. in l. IV., Opp. omnia Theophyl., Ven., 1754–63. His more important comm. on the Gospels was most carefully ed. by Chr. F. Matthäi, with proleg. showing its great value (Comm. in IV. evgl. Gr. et lat.: Lps., 1702, 4 vols.; cf. Prolegg., p. 38, &c.). Other exeget. works upon the Paul. and Catholic epp. are still in MSS. As a comm. E. may stand next to Theophylact. As a rule, also, he follows the old masters, especially Chrysostom. His explanations of words are often excellent. Sometimes allegorical and mystical hints are borrowed from Maximus et al. The interspersed anthropological and moral observations betray the synergism of R. Simon (II., 1037). His Πανοπλία δογματική (τῆς ὁδοῦ πίστεως ἢ τοῦ ὑπλοῦς δογμάτων), written at the request of Alexius, consists of two parts, and 24 sections, treating of as many heresies. The omissions in the several editions prove that whoever assails too many heresies, will not be altogether welcome to any class. In the older Lat. ed., studio, &c., P. FR. ZINI, Ven., 1555 Par., 1556, Bibl., pp. max. XIX., 1–235), sect. 2 and 13, against the Pope and Italians, are omitted, though Usserius, de symb., p. 25, gives them. The only, and rare Gr. ed. (Tergovist, Vallachia, 1711) lacks sect. 24, against Islamism. PETAVIUS has quoted some passages in his dogmat. theol. It may be considered a continuation of Epiphanius, only in a stiff external form. — (See FABRIC., B. G., VII., 461; CAVE, Hist. lit., II., 198; OUDIN, Comm., II., 979; CHRÖCKH, K.-gesch., XXVIII., 306; Stud. u. Crit., 1833, p. 647). GASS.*

Eutychianism is that form of the ancient Christology, in which the Alexandrian doctrine of a single incarnate nature of the God-logos advances to a docetic magical absorption of the human into the divinity of Christ. It is hence the exact counterpart of Nestorianism (see Art.), just as the Eutychian controversies are essentially a continuation of the Nestorian. The peace of 433, a politic contrivance of the State-church, which, in its deceptive indefiniteness, betrayed itself to be the abortion of both dishonest and short-sighted proceedings; had not reconciled the deep antagonism between the Egyptian and Oriental Church. It had been agreed upon by both parties merely in the hope that the opposite principle had retired to the hostile camp. Cyril of Alex. had the satisfaction of condemning Nestorius, without recalling his anathemas. The Antiochians could interpret the sharply-defined distinction of the two natures as a concession to them. But for this very reason the more rigid of both parties rejected the peace as an unprincipled artifice, or even doctrinal apostasy. The intolerance displayed in forcing it upon the churches of Asia; the expulsion of the recusant bishops, some of whom were honored as ornaments of their churches, and whose places were filled by servile adherents to the court doctrines; the intrigues woven in the East against the orthodoxy of Diodorus and of Theodore of Mopsusta; and the violent measure of the State against all suspected of Nestorianism, kept all minds in a feverish excitement, which, in many dioceses of Asia, produced revolts and schisms. In the doctrinal position of the conflicting parties, nothing had been changed. For if the doctrine of the two natures was charged by the Egyptians with Nestorianism or Photianism, the Alexandrian doctrine was suspected by the Antiochians of Apollinarianism and docetism. After the peace of 433, Cyril, in direct conflict with its very words, had limited the duality of the natures to a difference between the divine and human attributes; and had taught that the distinction, which he could not deny to be founded in the natural difference between the divinity and humanity, was abolished in such a way that, after the incarnation, the two natures could, indeed, be distinguished in thought, but that in reality only the one incarnate nature of the God-logos remained as the psychical unity of the two properties (MANSI, Concil. coll., V., pp. 137, 143, 320). And whilst trying by a strained sophism to reconcile this adherence to his former position with the subscribed confession, he took for granted, with much simplicity that his views and those of the Antiochians were the same. Less cautious adherents exposed the secret of the school by speaking of a mixture or transubstantiation of the two natures, whether of the nature of the God-logos into the flesh, or the destruction of the reality (Isidor. Pelus. ep., I., 496). In their struggles for supremacy, in which the most equivocal measures were employed, the Egyptians leaned upon the favor of the court and the reputation of the monks; whose theology, that of the feelings, was particularly inclined to the mystic-supernatural in the Alexandrian view of Christ. In Dioscurus, Cyril's successor, hierarchical jealousy of the court-bishop entered more largely into the controversy. The Antiochians, being now the vanquished or tolerated party, had to content themselves with written defences of their doctrine, but showed themselves in this superior to their opponents. When, therefore, Theodoret (447), in his Eranistes, defending with talent and learning the Antiochian doctrine of the two natures as held together in Christ in personal unity, but continuing nevertheless in their concrete peculiarity, threw down the glove to the whole party of Cyril, we see in it the consciousness of their spiritual superiority, as also of the injury done them by this long opposition. Thus we find everywhere in the Church the materials for a new outburst of the controversy; the premonitory symptoms of which, the bold intrigues of Dioscurus against Theodoret, the imperial order that Theodoret should remain within his own diocese, and that every one should deliver up his books to be burned, and the conspiracy of Syrian monks and priests against Ibas, B. of Edessa, gave cause for the most serious apprehensions. Filled with hatred of the Antiochian theology, which, by a customary trick, he pronounced identical with Nestorianism, Eutyches, a monk from early youth, for more than 30 years Archimandrite of a monastery near Constantinople, now 70 years old, had often expressed to visitors of his cell opinions concerning the divine human nature of Christ, which gave offence even to those like minded. From all that we know of him he was honest and versed in the Scriptures; but, like other monks of his cast, ignorant and unskilled in logical thinking, and therefore stubbornly adhering to what was learned, and fond of controversy. A nimbus of monastic humility, his connection, as god-child, with Chrysaphius, imperial chamberlain and most potent minister, and his position as head of the wide-spread and firmly organized monk party of Cyril, elevated him in the estimation of his adherents far above his merits. Grown gray, as he himself tells us (MANSI, VI., 641) in battle against the heretics and in confessing the truth, he served in the general Synod of Ephesus already (431) the cause of Cyril most effectually (MANSI, VI., 628, 631). Perhaps he was also one of the leaders of the procession of monks, which passed the palace of the Emperor, Theodosius II., in order to force him to take part for the Alexandrian doctrine (MANSI, VI., 713). His word, listened to with reverence as to a voice from heaven, was at least used to inveigle the conscience of the highest state officers into the same party net (MANSI, V., 989). Dioscurus, too, knew his man. Being soon entirely under the influence of the latter, Eutyches wrote, even previously to 448, in order at first to sow merely the seeds of an indefinite suspicion against the Antiochians, to Leo, B. of Rome, that the Nestorian heresy was, by the efforts of some, again beginning to flourish (Leo ep. 20, in MANSI, V., 1323). It was therefore only a necessary art of defence, that Domnus, Patr. of Antioch, laid before the Emperor, A. D. 448, against these secret machinations, the charge, that Eutyches, who ventured to anathematize such pillars of the truth as Diodorus and Theodoretus, himself renewed the heresy of Apollinarius; that he asserted a mixture in the nature of the Only Begotten, as if his divinity and humanity were melted into one; and that he attributed the salutary passion to the divinity (FACUND., defens. trium capital., 8, 5; comp. 12, 5). This charge sufficiently portrays the leaders of the Syrian Church. But, as might be expected, it produced no results. A more effectual one was soon to follow from the camp of Cyril himself. Eusebius, B. of Doryläum, in Phrygia, intolerant and violently inclined to defend his convictions to the last, moved perhaps by revenge, but honest in his zealotism even; a man whom neither fear nor nobler impulses could subdue, had gained for himself in the Nestorian controversy already a name as a kind of Herostratus of the Church. For once when Nestorius in a sermon, about A. D. 430, denied to Mary the title, θεοτοκος, saying that Mary had not born the God-logos, but the man who was inseparably united with the logos, E. tumultuously interrupted the patriarch, crying out that the eternal logos himself had subjected himself to a second birth (EVAGR., H. E., I., 9; MANSI, VII., 1061). He also soon after denounced at Constantinople the doctrine of Nestorius, by comparing it to the heresy of Samosatianism (MARIUS, Mercat. ed. Garn., II., 18). He filled at this time an inferior State office. His reward for this act of faith was a bishopric, to which, however, he also did honor by his theological learning. If at the Synod of Constantinople (448) he confesses himself warmly to the doctrine of Athanasius, the Gregories, Cyril, and Proclus, it is in the sense that their christology must be defined by the creed of the Syrians — subscribed by Cyril and the basis of the peace of 433 — as an equally true expression of orthodoxy (MANSI, VI., 651, 657). For his theology placed him in the ranks of the Alexandrians, though he had not carried out their Monophysitism to its last consequences. From the character of Eusebius it is improbable that he was used by the Syrians, as accuser of Eutyches, merely to pay back the stroke of their antagonists. That the tract of Theodoret (the Erastianes) is nearly contemporaneous, proves but little for this view. For Eusebius was still an active adherent of Cyril under wholly changed circumstances; since, at the Synod of Chalcedon, he at once consented to the first sketch of a symbol which inclined to the Egyptian doctrine. To labor for the ruin of a man like Eutyches, at a time when the latter enjoyed the entire favor of the court, required a fervor of piety compared with which, as Flavian says of Eusebius, fire itself is cold. An immediate occasion was given to Eusebius, by a visit to the monastery of Eutyches, his old friend. As Eutyches did not hold back his christological excesses, and would listen to no admonitions, Eusebius felt it his duty as champion of the truth to oppose the spread of the new heresy. The matter was expedited by the Home Synod (συνodus ἐνδημοῦσα, 448), which was just in session at Constantinople under patr. Flavian. The accusation was, that Eutyches taught blasphemously and contrary to the fathers concerning the person of Christ (MANSI, VI., 652). Flavian, a moderate Antiochian (MANSI, V., 1352; VI., 425), but who also tried to conciliate the Egyptians by saying, that by means of the union of the two natures Christ was one and the same (MANSI, VI., 541), wished to avoid a discussion, from which he foresaw new and fearful disturbances: for he knew, better than Eusebius, the state of affairs, and Chrysaphius was his personal enemy. He therefore advised a private agreement. But Eusebius, deaf to all conciliation where a question was to be decided which he thought of importance to orthodoxy; conjured the fathers that they would not leave a matter of such moment without investigation. He gained his request. Eutyches was cited, but appeared only after the third summons. A confession of faith, which he had meanwhile circulated among the neighboring monasteries for subscription, was intended perhaps to stir up a tumult of the monks and people. In order to provide for his safety, the State had given him a military guard accompanied by high civil officers and numerous monks. A special imperial commissary was also appointed to attend the sessions, since matters of faith were to be decided. Both these humiliations were greeted by the more than devoted Synod with applause to the highpriest-emperor, the guardian of the faith. Eutyches pressed to his defence, showed no effrontery, but still bore himself as a man who, though threatened, knew who sustained him. He spoke in broken sentences, but more from self-restraint than embarrassment, and sought to avoid the question by pretending that he could not venture an analysis of the divine nature. To the conflicting tradition of the Fathers, he preferred the Scriptures as a more certain source of faith; which did not prevent him, however, from quoting to excess those sayings of the Fathers which favored his views. He denied that he taught that the God-logos had brought his pre-existent body from heaven. Christ became really incarnate from the womb of the virgin, not merely as a docetic phantasm. But since he liked to regard the body of Christ as the body of God, and from this view supposed that this body could not be of the same nature as the body of all other men, he defined the body of Christ to be human in a mediate sense, viz.: that Mary, the mother of God, had a body in all respects perfectly human. That the divine human nature of Christ consisted in the personal union of the two natures, was taught neither in the Scriptures nor the Fathers: that before the union our Lord had, indeed, consisted of two natures; but after the union of one only, viz.: that of the incarnate God. To anathematize this doctrine as heretical, was anathematizing the Fathers also (Mansi, VI., 700, 728, sq.; 741, 744, sq.). In all this Eutyches went beyond Cyril only in denying that the body of Christ was the same in its nature as the body of all other men. But the light in which the transcendental essence of the one incarnate nature was to be viewed; whether as a transformation of the humanity into the divinity of the logos (Theodoret); or as a chemical combination of the divine nature with the human, which still in some manner remained (Dorner); or as a mere co-existence of the human attributes and of the divine substance which comprehended them (Baur); such subtle speculations were beyond the horizon of the unspeculative Eutyches. His contemporaries suspected docetism. The Synod, itself allied to the Antiochian tendency, suspected Valentinianism and Apollinarianism; and excluded the incorrigible Eutyches from the priesthood, his office as archimandrite, and the communion of believers. With this anathema the entire Egyptian party was placed in a state of war: for although the name of Cyril had been prudently spared by the Synod, yet in Eutyches the Alexandrian doctrine was directly condemned. An effort from the opposition was therefore unavoidable. Eutyches, encouraged by Chrysaphius, in his antagonism to Flavian and the Synod, obtained from the Emperor a revision of his trial. The commission appointed for this purpose (449), showed that the proceedings of the Synod had been altogether regular, a few minor points excepted. But Eutyches, and especially Dioscurus, who took the entire matter into his own hands, and by his violent proceedings threw everything into disorder, aimed from the beginning towards an Œcumenical Synod. Eutyches, therefore, wrote a series of letters to the Emperor, to the bishops of Rome, Ravenna, &c., but calculated still more upon the effects of his manifesto, posted at the corners of the streets of Constantinople. Dioscurus, utterly disregarding of all law and order, on his own authority reinstated Eutyches in his office as presbyter. In vain did Flavian and Leo endeavor to prevent the council. Leo, to whom both parties had appealed, issued a mandate, that the controversy should be finally adjusted by a doctrinal epistle of his own. This is the celebrated epistle to Flavian (ep. 28, June 13, 449, in Mansi, V., 1366), in which with caution and tact, though in rather inexact doctrinal formulas, he tries to unfold from the Scriptures the mystery of the incarnate divinity of Christ as the personal union of two natures, unchanged in their substantial attributes, but always operating in harmony with each other. All this was defeated by Dioscurus, who now proceeded to deal his long meditated stroke against the Antiochians. At the Robber Synod of Ephesus (Aug., 449), over which he presided, the canonical restoration of Eutyches and the condemnation of the Antiochians, was carried through by artifice and force. It characterizes the spirit of this Synod that Flavian, the chief aim of their party rancor, died shortly after, either from injuries received during the Synod, or as exile in Lydia. Eusebius of Dorylæum escaped a like fate by a precipitate flight to Rome. Flattery readily obtained the sanction of the resolutions from the weak Theodosius. Dioscurus seemed to have gained his end, and the Egyptian doctrine to be the established orthodoxy. Dioscurus was at liberty to fill the eastern sees with his minions. Leo tried in vain by every effort to have the resolutions of Ephesus annulled. Only the sudden death of Theodosius (450) gave hopes of better things. The general opposition, long suppressed, could now make itself heard before the throne; and the disposition of the new rulers gave assurance that the development of doctrine would return again to its natural channel. The Empress Pulcheria, and her husband, Marcian, both orthodox in the sense of the R. Church, desired first of all to restore the peace of the empire, by establishing a new symbol to reconcile ecclesiastical antagonisms. Hence the thought of a fourth Œcumenical Synod, which was to serve also as a counterpoise to the increasing power of the R. bishop, into whose hands the decision of the whole question seemed ready to fall. But even before the Synod met, the exiled and deposed bishops were restored to their sees; Eusebius alone by the Synod itself. The bishops of the party of Dioscurus obtained pardon on condition of repentance. The majority of them readily veered with the wind which had now set in. The Synod met at Chalcedon, in October, 451. Leo, also, sent delegates, when he saw that it was impossible either to invest his letter with symbolical authority or to bring the Synod to Italy. Dioscurus was condemned without difficulty; for, having exhausted all his artifices, and being overwhelmed by the terrible accusations which the secular and clerical representatives of Alexandria heaped upon him, he absented himself from the sessions of the Synod (MANSI, VI., 1004). In order not to offend the monophysite members of the Synod, he was deposed, not on account of heresy, but on account of his violence at Ephesus, and his contumacy to the Synod. The Emperor banished him to Gangra, where he died soon after. But almost the entire Synod was opposed to the construction of a new symbol: it was thought unnecessary, as the older symbols and the writings of the Fathers were sufficient to decide all questions of faith. The Romans insisted upon the acceptance of the letter of Leo, which a majority of the bishops had already subscribed. After the Synod had nearly wrecked upon the first draft of a formulary containing strong Alexandrian elements, which, though generally acceptable, was strenuously opposed by the Roman and Eastern members, it was resolved that the draft should be modified according to the letter of Leo. The result was the well-known symbol of Chalcedon; which, basing itself upon the old traditional creed as the proper mean between the extremes of Nestorianism and Eutychianism, wished, in its new definitions, also, merely to confirm the one truth, unchangeable from the beginning. Besides the letter of Leo, the two doctrinal letters of Cyril to Nestorius and the Eastern Church also obtained symbolical authority. The chief christological decision was, that in Christ two perfect natures were to be recognized, a divine and a human, but without mixture, change, or separation, both penetrating each other in personal unity, but without destroying their substantial difference, so that each nature retains its own properties (MANSI, VII., 113, 116). The formulary was unanimously accepted as apostolical in authority. The imperial sanction of the decree also forbade future discussions of religious questions. Eutyches, who, previous to the Synod, had been a second time excommunicated by Anatolius, Patr. of Constantinople, and sent away from the capital by Marcian, was not condemned by name. Leo advised that he should be sent to a remote exile, in order to prevent communication with his followers, and the spread of his doctrines (MANSI, VI., 117, 289). Nothing is known of his subsequent fate. It is probable that his great age did not long endure the grief caused by his unexpected calamities. Notwithstanding civil penalties decreed in 452, his party still continued in considerable numbers for some time.

Sources: Synodicon adv. tragöd. Iren. (MANSI, V., 731, sq.); The acts of the Counc. of Chalced. (MANSI, VI., 529, sqq., VII.); Letters of Leo the Gr. (MANSI, V., 1323, sq., VI., 7, sq.); [Gelarii?] brevicul. hist. Eutych. (MANSI, VII., 1060, sq.); Literat. breviar. caus. Nestor. et Eutych. c. 11, sq. (MANSI, IX., 674, sq.)—Treatises: WALCH, Hist. der Ketzereien, VI., p. 3, etc.; SCHRÖCKH, christl. K. G., XVIII., p. 433, etc.: NEANDER, Ch. Hist.; BAUR, Lehre v. d. Dreieinigk., I., p. 800, etc.; DORNER, Lehre v. d. Person Christi., 2d ed., II., p. 99, etc.

SEMISCH.—Reinecke.

Evagrius, Ponticus, son of a presbyter, born at Iberis, on the Black Sea. Basil made him a lector in Cæsarea, and Gregory, of Nyssa, a deacon. He received his theological training chiefly under Greg. of Naz., who, c. 379–80, made him Archdeacon in Constantinople. There he took sides with Origen. He fled from the domestic jealousy of some civil officer there to Jerusalem, c. 385, accompanied by Greg. of Naz., and was led by his predilection for a philosophical life to join the Nitrian monks, where he remained as the pupil of Macarius. Theoph., of Alex., offered him a See which he declined (Soz., VI., 30; Socr., IV., 23; III., 7; CASSIOD., Hist. trip., VIII., 1; PALLAD., Hist. Laus., 86; NICEPH., Call., II., 42). But for his adherence to Origen, E. would have enjoyed the undivided regard of his cotemporaries; for this he was not merely reproached by Jerome (Ep. ad Ctes. c. Pelag.), but condemned by the Church (EVAGR., Schol. Hist. eccl., IV., 38). He was widely acknowledged as a man of learning, judgment, and modesty (GENNAD., De vir. ill., 11). His doctrinal-ascetic bent is to be traced to his Cappadocian teachers (see Socr., IV., 23). His style of thought is related to that of Macarius, but less mystical. The following works, mostly in short sections and sentences, are known to be genuine: 1) Μοναχὸς ἢ περὶ πρακτικῆς, gr. et lat. in Cotel. Monum. Gr., III., 68. — 2) Ἀντιβιβλικὸς περὶ τῶν ὀκτὼ λογισμῶν. PALLAD., Vita Chrys. ed. Bigotius, 349. — 3) Lib. de ver. monachal. ration. Gr. et lat. ap. Cotel., III., 103. — 4) Schol. de tetragramm. Dei nom. Cotel., III., 116. — 5) Στιχηρά, sentent. libri and capitula. SUARES, Opp. Nili, 613, 626. Bibl. Patr. Lugd., T. XXVII. Some others (sermo dogm. de trin. instit. ad monach., are partly mixed up with the works of Nilus or Basil, and partly in fragm. in Maximus and the Cat. patr. Lost: Γνωστικὸς ἢ περὶ τῶν καταξωδίων τῶν γνώσεως.—The only collect. of E.'s works is in GALLANDI, Bibl. Patr., VII., 551–81.—(See OUDIN, Comm., 883. TILLEMONT, Mem. pour l'hist. eccl., X., 368. FABRIC., B. G., VIII., 364, ed. Harl., IX., 284–86; VII., 434; X., 10, 99, 137. FESSLER, Institt. patrol., I., 656).

GASS.*

Evagrius, the Church Historian.—But little is known of his life. According to Valesius he was born at Epiphania, Coelos., c. 536–7, enjoyed a good education, lived mostly in Antioch, as an attorney (hence called Scholasticus), and was intimate with Gregory, whom he aided in writing letters, &c., and defended against the accusations issued from Constantinople. For E.'s professional skill Tiberius made him Quæstor, and Mauricius gave him the δύλτος ἐπάρχων. Some collections of acts, decrees, &c., which he made were early lost (EVAGR., H. E., VI., 24, sub fin.). But his valuable history remains (first publ. by R. STEPHAN.: Par., 1544; Geneva, 1612; improved, with comm. by VALESIIUS: Par., 1673; Fref., 1679; Amstel., 1695; and in Hist. eccl. scriptt. cum notis VALES. et READING: Cantabr., 1720, 3 T.). E. closes the concatenation of authors who carried out the history begun by Eusebius. Taking up the thread with the Council of Ephesus, 431, he pursues it in six books to the 12th year of Mauricius, 594. His work is the main authority for the doctrinal development of that period, describing the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies, &c. Political facts were derived from profane writers, ecclesiastical from many reports and original sources. He is careful, impartial (IV., 30, 32), and fluent, though sometimes diffuse (cf. Phot., cod. 29), and credulous (IV., 26; I., 13; II., 3). His vindication of Constantine against Zosimus is remarkable (III., 40, 41, cum. n. Vales.). Photius, and many others, commend his orthodoxy. And yet he speaks tenderly of those holding different and even antagonistic views, and endeavors to show what good results flowed from the otherwise unhappy distractions of the Church (II., 11).—(See VALESII præf. in Evagr. Fabric. B. G., VI., p. 126, ed. Harl., VII., 432. STAUDLIN, Gesch., &c., d. K.-gesch.—publ. by Hemsen, p. 79, &c.). GASS.*

Evangeliarium, sc. volumen, or Evangelarius, sc. liber s. codex, was, in the ancient C., the book containing the Gospel lessons appointed to be publicly read. The Epistolarium was that containing the selections from the Epp. Both together were called Lectonarium, or Lect. plenarium, though the latter oftener designated all the selections from the O. and N. T. In the Gr. Oriental C. the former was called Εὐαγγέλιον (i. e., codex in quo descripta sunt Evang., quæ primum locum dignitate et officio inter lectiones Missarum occupant. Leo Allat.). The Εὐαγγελοσταβιον was a sort of appended index, &c.—In the ancient C. great care was taken of the church Bibles, and especially the evangelaria. Chrysostom complains that more zeal was displayed in having them splendidly adorned than devoutly read, especially that women and children wore them as phylacteries around their necks instead of studying their contents (cf. JEROME, Comm. in Matt. 23 : 5). Copies were also provided for special occasions (see Ambon. Cf. HAUG, Alterth. d. Chr., Stuttg., 1785, p. 328. AUGUSTI, Denkw., &c., VI., 140, &c., 165, 206; X., 56; XII., 288, &c.). S.*

Evangelical Alliance, the, took its rise in 1846, in England, although the first impulse to the movement was received, not in England, where sects abound, but in Scotland. The original call of Aug. 5, 1845, gives prominence to the necessity of counteracting the spread of Popery and Puseyism. A deeper reason for the movement may be found in the breach between established and free C., which impressed reflecting Christian men with the importance of some bond of union between Evangelical Churches. Blessed schism, which led to a union so important and comprehensive! Upon a constitutional question Evang. Christians had separated, ecclesiastically, from Ev. Christians; but both parties being true Christians, they felt that they could separate only ecclesiastically, not as Christians—that they could extend hands to each other over the walls of external organization.—But this first movement called forth a loud response from various quarters. A number of gentlemen of different denominations in Scotland, issued a call Aug. 5, 1845, for closer fraterniza-tion. The measure found favor in England. A preparatory meeting, held in Liverpool, Oct. 1–3, 1845, was attended by 216 members, of 20 different denominations, and a general meeting was resolved upon. The first general convention was held in Freemason's Hall, London, from Aug. 19 to Sept. 2, 1846. It was composed of 921 delegates from all Christian countries, including 47 from the continent of Europe, and 87 from America. Fifty Ev. communions were represented, many of which, however (as in the case of Reformed and Lutherans) differed only locally. Some colored ministers were present. The meeting was opened with earnest prayers. Sir Cullen Eardly Smith was chosen chairman, and has since stood at the head of this great Ev. league. The Evang. Alliance is not a union, neither does it propose to effect a union of the various denominations, but simply their fraternal co-operation against common foes, and dangers. And the means of doing this is not an official, or semi-official eccl. confederacy, but by the combination of individual Christians—it is “not a league of churches but of Christians.”—This being the case the Ev. Alliance has nothing to do with distinctive denominational confessions, but simply requires agreement in fundamentals. Hence it became necessary to give these fundamentals a definite form. This was done upon the motion of Dr. Bickersteth, and after mature deliberation the following articles were unanimously adopted on the 24th of Aug.:

The parties composing the Alliance shall be such persons only as hold and maintain what are usually understood to be Evangelical views, in regard to the matters of doctrine stated below, as follows:—

1. The Divine Inspiration, Authority, and Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures.
2. The right and duty of private judgment in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.
3. The unity of the Godhead, and the Trinity of the Persons therein.
4. The utter depravity of human nature, in consequence of the fall.
5. The incarnation of the Son of God, his work of atonement for sinners of mankind, and his mediatorial intercession and reign.
6. The justification of sinners by faith alone.
7. The work of the Holy Spirit in the conversion and sanctification of the sinner.
8. The immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, the judgment of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ, with the eternal blessedness of the righteous and the eternal punishment of the wicked.
9. The divine institution of the Christian ministry, and the perpetuity of the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.¹

¹ To these articles were added the following declarations: 1) “That this brief summary is not to be regarded, in any formal or ecclesiastical sense, as a creed or confession, nor the adoption of it as involving an assumption of the right authoritatively to define the limits of Christian brotherhood, but simply as an indication of the class of persons whom it is desirable to embrace within the Alliance; and that the selection of certain tenets, with the omission of others, is not to be held as implying that the former constitute the whole body of important truth, or that the latter are unimportant.—2) That this Alliance is not to be considered

On Sept. 2, the Alliance was organized. The organization of branches in the following districts was recommended: the 1st, Great Britain and Ireland; 2d, the United States of N. A.; 3d, France, Belgium, and French Switzerland; 4th, North Germany; 5th, S. Germany and German Switzerland; 6th, British N. America; 7th, the W. Indies. All these were subsequently formed.

It has been strangely objected to this Alliance, that it has no practical aim. This objection has been chiefly pressed by those (especially in Germany) who have been very energetically aiming at the reverse of what is contemplated by the Alliance, viz.: to keep the several denominations as far apart as possible, to emphasize their points of difference, to effect an approximation to Rome, and to establish a theology of the Bible as expounded for Christians, and not to be expounded by them. Had the Alliance no further object than to counteract this disease of insular and continental Puseyism, its efforts would be practical enough. But there is reason for devout gratitude that still other practical objects have been aimed at and secured. Eminent servants of the Lord have become acquainted with each other, and formed lasting Christian friendships. A more general and accurate knowledge of the outward and inward condition of the various denominations represented has been secured. By the publication of the periodical by the British Branch-Alliance—EVANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM, its state and prospects (London, Partridge and Oakey, Paternoster Row)—an important statistical organ, in the highest sense, has been established. Besides these there have been specific single ends gained, as through the influence of the action of the Alliance upon the subject of slavery, the spread of the Gospel in Rom. Cath. countries, the an alliance of denominations or branches of the Church, but of individual Christians, each acting on his own responsibility.—3) That in this Alliance, it is also distinctly declared, that no compromise of the views of any member, or sanction of those of others, on the points wherein they differ, is either required or expected; but that all are held as free as before to maintain or advocate their religious conviction with due forbearance and brotherly love.—4) That it is not contemplated that this Alliance should assume or aim at the character of a new ecclesiastical organization, claiming and exercising the functions of a Christian Church. Its simple and comprehensive object, it is strongly felt, may be successfully promoted without interfering with, or disturbing the order of, any branch of the Christian Church to which its members respectively belong.—5) That while the formation of this Alliance is regarded as an important step toward the increase of Christian union, it is acknowledged as a duty incumbent on all its members, carefully to abstain from pronouncing any uncharitable judgment upon those who do not feel themselves in a condition to give it their sanction."

The objects of the Alliance are thus stated in the resolutions of the IVth division of the official report: 1) (This resolution expresses a deep sense of the general neglect of our Lord's new commandment—"to love one another").—2) "That the great object of the Evangelical Alliance be, to aid in manifesting, as far as practicable, the unity which exists among the true disciples of Christ; to promote their union by fraternal and devotional intercourse; to discourage all envyings, strifes, and divisions; to impress upon Christians a deeper sense of the great duty of obeying their Lord's command, to "love one another;" and to seek the full accomplishment of his prayer: "That they all may be energetic and efficient aid extended to persons persecuted for Religion's sake (as in the case of the Madiai), &c. — (See Conference on Christian Union. Narrative of the Proceedings of the meetings held at Liverpool, Oct., 1845: London, Nisbet, 1845. Evang. Alliance. Report of the Proceedings of the Conference held at Freemasons' Hall, London, from Aug. 19 to Sept. 2, 1846. Published by order of the Conference: London, Partridge and Oakey, Patern. Row, 1847. Dr. MASSIE, The Ev. Alliance, its Origin and Development: London, John Snow, 1847).

DR. EBBARD.*

Evangelical Church-Conference, the German, is a periodical convention of delegates of the Ev. churches of Germany, "for the free discussion of questions most nearly affecting the true life of the Church, for the settlement of some bond of unity, and to promote their common interests." The first movement in this direction was made in 1845, almost simultaneously with that in Scotland, which led to the formation of the Ev. Alliance, and originated with King William of Würtemberg; and pursuant to an invitation issued from Berlin, in connection with Stuttgart, to the eccl. authorities of S. Germany, and in connection with Hanover to those of N. Germany, the first conference was held in Berlin, in Jan, 1846, at which all the chief churches of Ev. Germany were represented, excepting those of Austria, Bavaria, Oldenburg, and the free cities. The deliberations then extended to questions concerning management and business of subsequent conferences, a confession, liturgy, hymn-book, and Church constitution; but as one government desired the proceedings to be kept secret, they were not officially published; and became known, in an unreliable way, through a North German one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."—3) That in furtherance of this object, the Alliance shall receive such information respecting the progress of vital religion in all parts of the world as Christian brethren may be disposed to communicate; and that a correspondence be opened and maintained with Christian brethren in different parts of the world, especially with those who may be engaged, amidst peculiar difficulties and opposition, in the cause of the Gospel, in order to afford them all suitable encouragement and sympathy, and to diffuse an interest in their welfare.—4) That, in subserviency to the same great object, the Alliance will endeavor to exert a beneficial influence on the advancement of Evangelical Protestantism, and on the counteraction of infidelity, of Romanism, and of such other forms of superstition, error, and profaneness, as are most prominently opposed to it, especially the desecration of the Lord's day; it being understood that the different organizations of the Alliance be left to adopt such methods of prosecuting these great ends, as may to them appear most in accordance with their respective circumstances, all at the same time pursuing them in the spirit of tender compassion and love.—5) In promoting these and similar objects, the Alliance contemplates chiefly the stimulating of Christians to such efforts as the exigencies of the case may demand, by publishing its views in regard to them, rather than accomplishing these views by any general organization of its own.—6) That reports, minutes, and other documents, in promotion of the above objects, be published by the Alliance at the time of its meetings, or by its order afterwards; and that similar documents may be issued from time to time by its various organizations, on their own responsibility.

journal. In 1846 it was determined to hold a second conference in Stuttgart, in 1848. The Revolution of that year interfered, but served to expose fully the religious and moral necessities of the times, and to demonstrate the importance of a general understanding among all Ev. churches. At the Stuttgart Church Diet of 1850, the eccl. officers of the different countries were convinced, upon consultation, that the idea of the Berlin Conf. should be revived, and conferred upon the best method of doing it. The matter was again confidentially discussed at the Diet of Frankfurt, 1851. A programme was then drawn up and submitted to other eccl. authorities, on the basis of which propositions were prepared during the Elberfeld Church-Diet, Sept., 1851, by twelve members of German Ev. Church establishments, for a connection between the highest authorities of the different Ev. State-churches of Germany, and especially for the institution of a central organ for the interchange of their respective eccl. regulations. These were submitted to the several eccl. authorities, and approved by nearly all of them. In accordance with these propositions the German Ev. C-conference met in Eisenach, June, 1852, and during the same year was started the "Allgemeine Kirchenblatt für das ev. Deutschland," edited by Prelate v. Moser, of Würtemb., and published by J. G. Cotta, Stuttgart. The first fruits of this Conference was a general Ev. Hymn-book. The consultations had upon the necessity of reforms in public worship led to the liturgical conference of Dresden, composed of delegates from the Lutheran churches of Saxony, Bavaria, &c., which took action upon matters of importance, and has furthered, what was deemed impracticable, a harmonizing of the divers confessions of that denomination. — (See the "Allg. Kirchenblatt," &c.). GRÜNEISEN.*

Evaristus, St., of Antioch, who succeeded Clemens as B. of the Church in Rome, c. 100, is honored as a martyr by the Romish C., although there is no historical account of his martyrdom. Trajan issued no decree for the persecution or extermination of Christians as such, but only insisted upon prohibiting secret associations. Hence the leaders of such societies would be likely to meet with opposition, and even at times suffer the penalties of the law, or violence of the populace, though without bodily harm. — The ecclesiastical division of Rome into parishes is traced to E. (?). He died c. 109. The letters ascribed to him are spurious. S.*

Eve, עֵוָה, Eua, the name of the first woman.

According to Gen. 2 : 20, God desired to provide a help meet for man. The Hebrew עֵוָה, however, means: suited to a place before him, i. e., not simply to be at hand, as an outward assistant, but to be about him in bodily and spiritual fellowship. While Adam was sleeping, therefore, God took a rib from him (see HOFFMANN, Weiss. u. Erfüll., I., 65. BAUMGARTEN, Comm. z. Pentat., I., 47. DELITZSCH, Genesis, 2 ed., p. 152. NAGELSBACH, d. Gottmensch, I., 287. Upon similar profane accounts. KLEUKER, Zendavesta, I., 20; III., 83. PLATO, Sympos., 189, &c.). Adam called the woman, whom God brought to him, חַוָּה, which is her generic name as distinguished from man, as vira from vir in FESTUS (ed. O. Müller, p. 261), and ἀνδρίς from ἀνρ in SYMMACHUS (Jerome supposes: quæst. Hebr. in Gen. ad h. l., that S. desired to retain in Gr. the etymology IS and ISSA). As חַוָּה has no feminine form, it is used of both Adam and Eve (so homo, ἀνδρῶν). But Adam called the woman Eve to designate her relationship to the race. It is, therefore, not an appellative, but her proper name, and has not merely a natural, but a historical signification, connected with the history of redemption, for Adam gave it to her immediately after the curse was pronounced, as a new additional name (Gen. 2 : 23. SYMN. renders ζωόνομος). Delitzsch properly pronounces this an act of faith on Adam's part. From the words of the curse: "in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children," A. derives the consolation that the curse of death should not prevent new life and salvation from issuing from the womb of Eve. — (See BAUMGARTEN, l. c. 61, &c. Upon the various Gnostic-Jewish fables connected with the name of Eve: FABRICIUS, Cod. pseudepigr., V. T., 95–104). NAGELSBACH.*

Evilmerodach succeeded (B. C. 561) his father Nebuchadnezzar, upon the Chaldean throne, but, on account of his voluptuousness and tyranny, was murdered (559) by his brother-in-law, Neriglissar (BEROS., ap. Joseph. c. Ap. 1, 20. EUSEB., præp. ev., 9, 40). How Jos., Ant. 10, 11, 2, can assign to his reign 18 years, or ALEX., Polyhist. (ap. Eus. chr. arm., p. 21), 12 years, is inexplicable, and must be an error, as the fixed chronology of later Chaldean princes allows of only 2 years for E. What Jerome says, on Is. 14 : 19, of E.'s regency of 7 years during his father's insanity, and of his subsequent imprisonment, during which he formed a friendship with the captive Jehoiachin of Judah, whom he subsequently released, &c., is a rabbinical invention woven out of the statements made in Daniel 4. (Cf. 2 Kings 25 : 27, &c.; Jer. 52 : 31). The name of E. is variously written. Its Hebrew form points to the Chald. god Merodach = Mars (see Chaldeans and BELSHAZZAR). DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth., I., 475). RÜTERSCH.*

Exactions (tallie) are extraordinary assessments or taxes, being either entirely new levies, or an increase of old ones (c. 13, X.; III., 39; c. 15, X., h. t.). Such taxes were per se illegal (3d Council of Toledo, 589, c. 6, Can. X., qu. III., Leo IV., c. 62, Can. XVI., qu. I., 853). Hence Alex. III. reiterates the principle at the Lat. Council, 1179: Prohibemus, ne ab abbatibus vel episcopis, aliisve praelatis novi census imponantur eccl., nec veteres augeantur, nec partem reddituum suis usibus appropriare presument (c. 7, X., de censibus. c. eod., &c.). Still they were sometime allowed upon valid reason being given (c. 6, X., de cens.; Clem. I., de magistris, V., 1; Conc. Trident., s. V., cap. 1, de ref. See Collections). JACOBSON.*

Exclusiva is the right pertaining to some Roman Cath. powers, of excluding an obnoxious Cardinal from nomination for the papacy. The Emperors of Rome early acquired great influence upon the choice of an incumbent for that See — and this less through their own love of power than ambition and contentions in eccl. parties and aspirants. This interference, at first incidental, gradually acquired the force of a prerogative, and became the subject of various official transactions between Emperors, Popes, and Councils. (See STAUDENMAIER, Gesch. d. Bishofswahlen: Tüb., 1830. The decree of Honorius, 420, c. 8, dist. LXXIX., and c. 1, 2, dist. XCVII. The decree of a Rom. Synod under Symmachus, 502, c. 1; § 7, dist. XCVI., c. 23, Can. XVI., qu. VII. ANASTASIUS, biblioth. in vita Agathonis, c. 21, dist. LXIII. LIBER DIURNIS, c. II., ed. Garnerii: Par., 1680, 4to.; and in C. G. HOFFMANN, coll. nova scriptt., &c., T. II.: Lps., 1733, 4to.). This same prerogative was exercised by the Frankish and German Emperors (STENGEL, Gesch. d. fränk. Kaiser I., 102, &c. STAUDENMAIER). But Hildebrand (Greg. VII.) persuaded Nicholas II., 1059, to confer the right of electing a Pope upon the College of Cardinals, "salvo debito honore et reverentia dilecti filii nostri Henrici" (IV.) etc., (c. 1, dist. XXIII.). Thenceforth the Emperor possessed simply the right of confirmation; and even this was not long retained. For the Lat. Conc. of 1179, under Alex. III. (c. 6, X., de elect., I., 6) conferred the election of a Pope unconditionally upon the Cardinals. But then national party interests began to appear in the College of Cardinals, and thus the choice of a Pope to depend upon national politics. As the Pope was claimed to be the supreme civil potentate, also, no appeal could well be any longer made to temporal rulers, to decide when the elective college could not agree. Hence the right of exclusion, exercised by the Cardinals themselves was substituted in place of the earlier imperial prerogative of confirmation. When this right was first exercised is unknown; no existing regulations for the election of a Pope show any trace of it (cf. Constit. Greg. XV.: Æterni patris, of Nov. 15, 1621, found in P. J. a. RIEGGER Corp. jur. eccl. noviss.: Viennæ, 1725, p. 361. PÜTTER, Literatur d. Staatsrecht, III., 864-5. HAMMER, de jure principis cathol., &c.: Bamberg, 1744. SCHMIDT, thes. jur. eccl., III., 685, &c. G. L. BÖHMER, principia jur. can., ed. VII., § 495).

JACOBSON.*

Exegetical Collections. — From the beginning, the teachers of the Christian Church devoted themselves to the interpretation of the SS. The N. T. soon took its place beside the Old, and both were diligently studied. In this way a fund of exegetical matter was soon created, although very much scattered. After the extraordinary literary activity of Origen and the Greek Church until its golden age in the middle of the 5th cent. — after the labors of Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerome in the West, it accumulated to such a degree that it became necessary to epitomize, sift, and arrange in the manner of the ancient scholiasts. The collections, which thus arose were called, by the Greeks, ἐπιτομαὶ (συλλογαὶ, συναγωγαὶ) ἐρμηνειῶν, ἐρμηνεῖαι συνερωνισθεῖσαι, ἐξηγήσεις συλλεγεῖσαι, and the like; by the Latins, simply glossæ, postillæ. The commentaries which bear the name of catenæ (chains, expositions arranged after each other chain-wise) are of later origin. The first of them are usually ascribed to Cassiodorus in the West at the close of the 5th cent., and Procopius, of Gaza, in the East, in the 6th cent. But this is incorrect, for the works of these men did not possess the proper character of catenæ, which are so constructed, that the exposition either stands on the margin beside the text, or more commonly, follows after detached verses or short passages. The exposition itself is merely an extract from some exegete, whose name is added. The compiler allows himself no judgment in the case, and only occasionally hazards the insertion of a brief remark. His work is simply to collect and arrange — having liberty to abridge or alter only where necessity requires. The choice of the Fathers, from whom extracts were made, was accidental — a matter of taste; of course, the more eminent were preferred — Origen, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Cyril, in the East, and before all, Augustine in the West. Heretics were also used, but with a word of caution. From these catenæ proper are to be distinguished those exegetical works, in which the author chooses one or more authorities, whom he epitomizes with more or less freedom, exercising his own judgment and adding his own thoughts. Such are the writings of Procopius, Cassiodorus, Primasius, Florus Magister, Bede, Rhabanus Maurus, and others, which no doubt form the link of transition to the catenæ proper, whose antiquity we cannot place later than the 9th cent. The preparation and transcription of catenæ continued through the whole of the Middle Ages, and far into the 16th cent. Hence their number is great and only a small portion have been printed (see J. A. FABRICII, biblioth. gr. cur. Harl. VIII., p. 637; J. A. NOESSELT, De catenis patr. gr. in N. T. in his Opuscul. ad hist. eccles. fasc., III.: Hal., 1817, 8vo., p. 321). Few are independent works, most of them being copies with capricious variations and numerous blunders.

The value of the catenæ is no longer exegetical, but literary and historical. They are not only important as monuments of the age in which they flourished, but they convey to us also treasures from the ancient Church. The extracts given from works, which we possess through other channels, serve the ends of criticism. Besides this, they contain fragments of lost works, especially of the Greek Fathers, and in such abundance that some of them have thus in a great part been recovered. And here lies the chief value of the catenæ. Of late years Cardinal Mai has accomplished much in this almost unbroken field. The use of the catenæ, however, demands the utmost caution, not because of any intentional falsification, but because the names of authors are here and there omitted, or put in the wrong place, and since they are generally abbreviated, different men of the same name, as Gregorius, Eusebius, Theodorus, Heyschius, or of similar names, as Severus and Severianus, are confounded with each other. The text also is frequently very corrupt through negligence.

For the reason before given, the Latin catenæ are of minor value; but the Greek, hitherto published, are too important to be passed over with-

at notice. For the Octateuch, we possess a very copious one (edited by the Greek Nicephorus: Lips., 1772, 73, 2 T., fol.); for the Ps. (Gr. et Lat. d. BALTH. CORDERIUS: Antw., 1643-46, 3 T., fol.); for Job (Gr. et Lat. Patr. ed., JUNIUS: Lond., 637, fol.); for Canticles (J. MEURSIUS: Lugd., 1617, 4to.); for Jerem., Lam., and Bar. (Gr. et Lat., MICH. GHISLERIUS, as a suppl. to his Comment.: Lugd., 1633, fol.); and one for Daniel, by AUG. MAI: Scriptur. vett. nova collect., T. I. On the N. T. have appeared two catenæ for Matthew (Gr. et Lat., edited by Petr. Possinus: Colon., 1646, fol., and by Balth. Cord.: Antw., 1647); and two for Mark (one, Gr. et Lat., published by Petr. Possinus: Romæ, 1673, fol.; the other by Ch. F. Matthæi: Mosqu., 1775, 1 T., 8). The commentary published under the name of Titus Bostrensis, in the Auctar. biblioth. patr. ed. Fronto Ducaes: T. II., and in the Bibl. Patr., Paris, T. XIII., is a catena; for similar passages from another for Luke, see Aug. Mai: Scriptor. vett. nov. coll., T. IX. For John, BALTH. CORD. published one (Gr. and Lat., Antw., 1630, fol.), and CH. F. MATTHÆI Rigæ., 1782, 8vo), for the Catholic Epistles. This literature has been greatly enriched of late by J. A. CRAMER, who by using various MSS., has issued catenæ on the entire N. T.: Oxon., 1838-44, 8 T., 8. The exegetical work on the Acts and Epp., usually ascribed to CECUMENIUS, Bish. of Tricca, is only an epitomized catena, with which he had nothing to do.

With the vast accumulation of material after the revival of the 16th cent., new collections appeared. They were of two kinds; those which contained the remarks of select commentators, revised but unabridged, or those in which a greater number of expositors were epitomized. The most important works of the former class are: Biblia magna ed. J. DE LA HAYE: Par., 1643, 5 T., fol.; Biblia maxima: Par., 1660, 19 T., fol. (Catholic); Annot. upon all the books of the O. and N. T.: Lond., 1645, 3d ed. 1657, 2 vols., fol. (English); and Critici sacri s. clariss. viror. in Biblia annot. atque tract.: Lond., 1660, 9 T., fol., ed. by J. PEARSON, et al.; ed. II. correctior (by NIC. GÜRTLER), Francof. ad M., 1695-1701 (Amstel., 1698), 9 T., fol. (both Catholic and Reformed). To the other class belong Synopsis criticor. aliorumque scr. s. interpretum et commentatorum by MATTH. POLUS: Lond., 1669, sq. 5 T., fol.; Francof. ad M., 1678, sq., ed. rec., 1712, Ultraj. (ex. rec. J. LEUSDENII), 1684, sq., 5 T., fol. The Apocrypha is omitted. Here too belongs CHRISTOPH. STARCKE: Synop. biblioth. exeget. O. T.: Leipz., 1741, sq., 6 vol. 4to. (Apocrypha omitted); N. T., 1733, sq., 4 ed., 1758, &c., 3 vols. 4to., and the compilations of the English exegetes: the O. and N. T. from the French (Hague, 1742, sq. 4), with copious notes by ROM. TELLER, J. A. DIETELMAIER, and J. BRÜCKER: Leipz., 1749-70, 19 vols., 4to. Many modern commentaries contain a mass of exegetical matter, heaped together with almost no elaboration, so that they bear the character of catenæ. This is particularly true of those produced by Catholics, as, for example, the works of FRANC. HARREUS, JAC. TIRINUS, COM. A LAPIDE, J. St. MENOCHIVS, and AUG. CALMET, on the whole

Bible, and many commentaries on particular books.

O. F. FRITZSCHE.—Porter.

Exemption is the setting aside of the proper jurisdiction over a person or case, and subjecting them to another, especially a superior court. Instances of substituting a forum exemptum for a f. competens, early occurred; indeed eccl. jurisdiction properly rests upon an exemption of the Church from that of civil judges. Each exemption seems an exception, to be justified, like all departures from the rule, upon special grounds, although sufficient justification was not always given. The constitution of the Church involves the union of individual members with their bishop, and of the several congregations with each other, and of all under common spiritual rulers. This principle was early recognized, and schisms were accordingly forbidden (see Schisms, Dismissorials). The first example of formal exemption is that of monasteries from episcopal jurisdiction (THOMASSIN, vet. ac nov. eccl. discipl. circa beneficia, P. I., lib. III., c. XXVI., &c.). The Council of Chalcedon, 451 (in Can. IV., c. 12; Can. XVI., qu. I., c. 10; Can. XVIII., qu. III.), expressly decreed the subjection of monks to episcopal authority; and subsequent eccl., as well as civil, enactments confirmed this (Nov. 123, c. 21 of JUSTIN.: 546). But when the bishops became oppressive the monasteries sought protection from their tyranny, of Synods (Conc. Nerdense, a. 546, c. 3, c. 34, Can. XVI., qu. I.), Roman bishops (Greg. I., a. 601, in c. 5, Can. XVIII., qu. II.), and kings (Roth, Gesch. d. Beneficialwesens. Erlang., 1850, pp. 262-3). In the last named case some became monast. regalia, and obtained, usually, the free choice of their abbots, and control of their property; in matters of discipline the bishops were required to adhere strictly to the canons (WALTER, corp. jur. Germ. I., 287, &c., 531, &c.; MARCULFI, formulae, lib. I., f. 1, &c.). But when the bishops tried to bring the monasteries into greater dependence again by corrupting the original records (ROTH, l. c. 259, 451, &c.), these sought more complete freedom from the authority of the bishops, and, in some instances, the Pope exempted whole orders (see Cistercians; Clugny). The superior of such, therefore, became prælati nullius dioceseos, prælati cum jurid. episc. vel quasi, over the territory of their monasteries (see Tit. de regularibus, X., III., 31; Lib. VI., III., 14; Clem., III., 9, &c.). This led to complaints from the bishops which resulted in the abolition of some of these exemption rights (as by Martin V., at Costnitz, 1418; and Leo X., at the Lat. C. of 1515; see J. H. BOEHMER, jus eccl. Prot., l. III., tit. XXXV., § 34, 35). The evil, however, was not fully remedied, and the commission of Cardinals appointed, 1538, by Paul III., was occasioned especially by exemption abuses still existing (LE PLAT, monumenta ad hist. Conc. Trid. amplissima, T. II., 601). Hence also the action of the Council of Trent upon the subject (SARPI [P. Soave Polano], hist. Conc. Trid., ed. 1622, l. VIII., pp. 886-7; Conc. Trid., s. XXV. c. 12, 13, de regular.; s. XXXIII., c. 15, de ref.; s. XXIV., c. 4, de ref.; s. V., c. 1, 2, de ref.; s. VI., c. 3, 4, de ref.; s. XXII., decr.

de observ. in celebr. missæ, in fine; XXV., c. 14, de ref.). But most of the exempted monasteries were afterwards dissolved in consequence of their secularization. Besides these regular exemptions, special ex. were obtained by secular clergy (but see Conc. Trid., s. VII., c. 14, de ref.), bishops, and even laymen.

Exemptions could be granted only for good reasons. They rest upon a papal privilege (c. 10, de priv., in VI^o, V., 7; Bonif., VIII.), but this not conveyed by an ordination performed by the Pope (c. 7, X., de majoritate et obedientia, I., 33; Innoc. III., a. 1206), or upon a prescription of 40 years, presuming a titular right (c. 15, 18, X., de præscr., II., 26; Innoc. III., a. 1202, 1208; c. 7, de privil., in VI^o, V., 7; Bonif., VIII.), or without a title and irrespective of prescription. In recent times, however, civil governments have required the approval of the State.

In the Protestant C., the only occasion for exemptions arose from the relations sustained to the Romish C. According to the principle: quidquid est in parochia est etiam de parochia (Tit. X., III., 29), priests were allowed to exercise eccl. jurisdiction over Protestants within their parish. It required long struggles to get this abolished; indeed the Rom. C. has never surrendered the principle, and in some cases the independence of Protestants has been only recently secured.—(Cf. Art. Consistorial Constitution).

JACOBSON.*

Exorcism, ἐξορκισμός—the formal expulsion of evil spirits from persons or things. From Luke 11: 19, 20, it appears that persons possessed of such spirits were common among the Jews at the time of Christ. According to Matth. 10: 8; Luke 9: 1; 10: 17, 19, power was given to the disciples “to cast out devils,” although they sometimes failed (Matth. 17: 19; Luke 9: 40). On the other hand, we are told (Luke 9: 49) of one who cast out devils in the name of Jesus, without belonging to his disciples; and a similar case occurs in Acts 19: 13. If now the name of Jesus had such power with unbelievers, how much more with believers! Hence Tertullian (Apologet., c. 23) declares it certain that one possessed “a quolibet Christiano loqui jussus,” must obey the command and that every Christian as such, has power over demons. Likewise, ORIGEN (Contra Celsum, VII., 334) mentions it as a well-known fact, that not a few Christians, without any knowledge of the formulas of exorcism, being in general a plain, unlettered people (ἰδιώται), cured demoniacs by prayer alone, and simple adjuration. This gift of healing, therefore, was esteemed a charisma, which, though pledged to bishops and teachers, was bestowed also on particular persons out of their ranks. Hence these persons, who, though not ordained to the work by the laying on of the bishops’ hands, yet needed his approval, were styled (Constit., VIII., 26) exorcistæ per gratiam, to distinguish them from those per ordinem, who were received by ordination into the ranks of the clergy, as we find it in the West as early as the middle of the 3d cent. Bishop Cornelius of Rome (251), at least, expressly names exorcists as one of the four inferiores ordines ecclesiæ. Room was made for them in connection with the rite of baptism. As he who had not Christ for his Lord belonged to the devil, every catechumen was required publicly and solemnly to renounce the devil, before baptism. For those to be baptized on Easter, the Sunday Oculi was appointed for this “ab renuntiatio,” hence called Exorcism-Sunday, and with reference to this ancient Christian custom, the Gospels for the first three Sundays in Lent are chosen, that they all refer to the superiority of Christ over the devil. Even in the case of children, such a form of renunciation could not be laid aside, since, on account of original sin, they were regarded as the property of the devil until baptized; and it seemed also right and proper for the priest, or the assisting exorcist, to drive out the impure spirit of sin from the infant by the breath (exsufflatio), and by a second breathing upon it (insufflatio), to symbolize the entrance of the Spirit, as is still the practice of the Rom. Church. “Sacerdos,” so it stands in the Ritual, “exsufflat ter in faciem Catechumeni, semel dicens: Exi ab eo (ea), spiritus imunde, et da locum Spiritui Sancto Paraclito. Illic in modum crucis halet in faciem ipsius et dicat: Accipe Spiritum bonum per istam insufflationem, et Dei benedictionem. † Pax tibi.” Besides this, in ancient times, the so-called energumens (ἐνεργούμενοι sc. ὑπὸ πνευμάτων ἀκαθάρτων), were intrusted to the care of the exorcists, and whilst the bishop or priest at every public service offered the prayer prescribed for these unhappy creatures, the former laid their hands on them daily with prayer. (Cons. the 4th Conc. of Carthage (398), c. 90, Omni die exorcistæ energumenis manus imponant). Although these energumens, in the course of time, became more and more rare, and baptismal exorcism, especially in smaller churches with only one priest, fell upon the officiating priest, yet the Roman Church never gave up the order of exorcist. To this day every clergyman, before he is ordained as a priest, receives the consecration of the four lower ordines, i. e., he is ordained first as ostiarius, then as lector, then as exorcist, and then as acolyth. Touching that of exorcist, the 4th Conc. of Carthage (can. 9), decrees: Exorcista, quum ordinatur, accipiat de manu episcopi libellum, in quo scripti sunt exorcismi—at present it is generally a missal, which the ordaining bishop hands to each of the candidates to touch—dicens sibi episcopo: Accipe et commenda memoria, et habeto potestatem imponendi manus super energumenum, sive baptizatum sive catechumenum. As cases of possession rarely occur now-a-days, this general authority does not suffice. It is the duty of the priest to prepare himself specially by fasting, prayer, confession, and the eucharist, for his work, which is to be performed in the church, the sacristy, the house of the priest, or if need be, in that of the sick man, yet always in the presence of witnesses. Here, arrayed in robe, cope, and a blue stole, he first sprinkles the subject with holy water, and, kneeling down, prays the All Saints’ litany, the Lord’s prayer, and Ps. 53, Deus in nomine tuo (in our vers. Ps. 54); then two prayers in which, making the sign of the cross over the patient, he commands the evil spirit to depart, by virtue of the mysteries of the incarnation, the suffering and death, the resurrection and ascension of Christ, the sending of the Spirit, and the coming again to judgment. Thereupon follows the lesson from John 1. In principio erat Verbum, with Mark 6: 15-18, and Luke 10: 17-19. Then he lays both hands upon the head of the energumen, saying: Ecce crucem Domini: fugite partes adversæ: vicit leo de tribu Juda, and the prayer follows, with the proper formula of exorcism: Exorcizo te, immunde spiritus," the priest meanwhile making three crosses, in the name of the Trinity, on the brow and breast of the energumen. If the evil spirit does not depart, all these ceremonies must be repeated. In regard to the exorcism of things, the view of St. Paul, that every creature of God, used with thanksgiving, is good, stands true at all times. But in consequence of the curse, which the first sin brought upon all nature, it seemed necessary to exorcise beforehand things designed for sacred use, such as the water and salt, required for holy water. Beasts also, horses, fields and fruits are so treated, more frequently in the Greek Church than in the Roman. In Russia there is a special festival for the consecration of fruits by the priest, and before that day no one durst eat; after, he may devour ripe and unripe indiscriminately, and if any one becomes dead-drunk he has the consolation of knowing that it was not caused by demoniacal influences.

In the Evangelical Church, the question, whether exorcism should be retained or not, was discussed, only however in its connection with baptism. Since Zwingli and Calvin (Instit., IV., c. 15, 19) were decidedly adverse, it soon disappeared among the Reformed. There is no trace of it either in the Augsburg Agenda of 1537 and 1545, the Strassburg Church Discipline of 1543 and 1598, that of the Palatinate, or that of Swabian Halle, 1543.

On the other hand, Luther and Melancthon had approved of it, and their example was followed by the other Lutheran theologians. First in 1583 Heshuss ventured to take ground against it, but was answered by Just. Menius. It thus became a point of difference between the two churches, and any one among the Lutherans, who spoke in favor of setting it aside, was accused of "Calvinism." Hence, when the Prussian K. O. of 1558 dropped it, the estates complained bitterly that a new baptismal office was forced upon them which could only lead to Calvinism. The controversy grew still more violent when Nic. Krell, the privy counsellor of the Elector Christian I. of Saxony, a decided friend of the "Philippists," who were suspected of Crypto-Calvinism, ordered (1591) the Saxon preachers to omit it in baptism; but the elector died soon after, when K. was condemned to ten years' imprisonment, and peace restored through the revival of exorcism by a Diet held at Torgau in 1592. Of later theologians, Gerhard, Quenstedt, and Hollaz, declared its use or disuse a matter of indifference; Baier and Baumgarten favored its abolition, as also Reinhard and his school still more strongly. Since that time it has gradually fallen into disuse in the Lutheran Church.

II. A.—Porter.

Exsuperius, Bishop of Toulouse, c. 390-410. Jerome, who dedicated his Comm. on Zachar.

to E. especially commends his beneficence, a virtue for the exercise of which that age of rapine, perpetrated by Vandals, Alani, and Suevi, afforded ample opportunity. He imitated, says Jer., the widow of Sarepta, feeding others whilst fasting himself. To aid the destitute he sold, not only all his own goods, but the sacred vessels, also, carrying the body of Christ in a wooden tray, and the blood of Christ in a glass vessel. He also assisted, pecuniarily, the numerous monks of Palestine, Egypt, and Lybia. He is said to have completed the basilica of St. Saturnine begun by his predecessor Silvius. — (BOLLAND. ad 28, Sept., de s. Exsuperio, Tillemont Mem., X., p. 617 et 825). P.*

Ezekiel, the Prophet.—I. His name signifies "God strengthens," referring not merely to him whom God strengthens, but rather to him whose being is a personal proof of the strength of God. Ezekiel was the son of Busi and belonged to the sacerdotal family (Ezek. 1: 3; cf. 1 Chron. 24: 16). His abode during the whole period of his activity as a sacerdotal prophet, was at the river Chebar (LXX., Χοβάρ) among the captives (1: 1). This was doubtless the Chobaras which took its rise in Mt. Masius, and, after receiving the Mygdonius near Circesium, empties into the Euphrates. It is altogether probable that he was among the eminent Jews taken captive to Babylon with King Jehoiachim (1: 2; 26: 1; 30: 20; 31: 1; 32: 1: 40: 1; 2 Kings 24: 14-16). He calls the locality a part of the Babylonian empire (1: 3). Here we find him settled with his own family (3: 24; 24: 18). As he was first called to the prophetic office in the 5th year of the captivity of Jehoiachim (1: 2), internal probability favors the statement of Josephus (Ant. 10, 6, 3) that E. was removed from Jerusalem to Chebar in his youth. His official labors seem to have lasted 23 years, viz., from the 5th to the 27th year of the captivity (29: 17). Beyond this we have no account of him. For the opinion that E. was carried away to Chebar with exiles of Israel, before the captivity of Jehoiachim (Winer, Lex.; Hävernick, Comm. on Ez.) is unfounded.

II. Ezekiel was called to the prophetic office under circumstances which render his case altogether peculiar. For although those of his contemporary Jeremiah somewhat resemble Ezekiel's, still Jeremiah prophesied in Jerusalem and within the limits of the Holy Land, whilst E.'s sphere was in a foreign country. In this respect Daniel comes nearest to him, of whom also E. had knowledge (14: 14; 28: 3). But Daniel was properly, a world-prophet, not a prophet of Israel (see Art.). Between Ezra and Ezekiel, furthermore, there was this difference, that Ezra was a learned scribe who derived his knowledge from the study of the law of Moses, whilst E. was prophetically illumined by the Spirit. And there is a striking significance in this peculiarity of Ezekiel, that God should raise up such a prophet out of the midst of a captivity which has continued to the present day, and will last until the general conversion of Israel. It was E.'s mission to furnish his people with a prophecy adapted to these circumstances from first to last. And the manner in which he was called to the office corresponds with the nature of his mission (1 : 33 ; 11 : 22, 23). How clearly this indicates, that God now began a new mode of revelation to his people, one which demonstrated that he could carry forward his purposes concerning them, independently of the temple and its priests! (Comp. 11 : 16-23). In fact E.'s prophetic position and activity, seem to be a new beginning of internal development: he appears to be a religious and spiritual central point, around which those captives who had hitherto rejected all guidance, gather for counsel and comfort (8 : 1 ; 11 : 25 ; 13 : 24 ; 14 : 1 ; 20 : 1 ; 24 : 19 ; 33 : 31, 32). This was the sacred and the divine beginning of that development of religious life in Israel which has been more or less maintained in the services of the synagogues to the present day, and will continue until Israel has experienced in heart what it confesses with the mouth in the usages and formularies of the synagogues (see VITRINGA, De synag. vet., 332, &c.). To start this was no easy work, which any one might have successfully undertaken, but we see in advance the centuries of God-opposing obstinacy and deadness, which has ever combined with this apparent life among the dispersed of Israel; and the prophet everywhere anticipated and counteracts this opposition to the plans of God (12 : 21-28 ; 13 : 10, 16-23. Comp. Jer. 6 : 14 ; 29 : 8, 9, 15). But although the prophet's mission was a difficult one, in view of the perverseness of the people, he was confirmed in it, by the fulfilment of his prophecies against the temple (9 : 6), Jerusalem (chapt. 4), the people of Israel (c. 5) and the holy Mt. (c. 6). Naturally, the day of such fulfilments was a notable one for the prophet (24 : 1, 2), for it would dissipate the delusion of the people, and awaken deeper respect for the prophet. We may assume that the events exerted a still more salutary and wide-spread influence upon those who survived; for soon after the exile the Jews finally renounced idolatry, and they have persevered in this until the present day. But this beginning of the conversion of Israel (Zach. 1 : 6), being mistaken for the completion of that conversion, became the occasion of an evil more dangerous than open idolatry had been. They imagined that because they now shunned all the abominations of idolatry, they had attained to the purity and holiness required, and thus fell into the snare of self-righteousness and hypocrisy, which would once show itself in blasphemies and persecutions against the Son of God, and his anointed messengers. Hence E.'s denunciation of this evil (12 : 2 ; 14 : 1-3 ; 20 : 3 ; 33 : 31, 32 ; comp. Is. 6 : 10), and call for a new heart and a new spirit (18 : 5-9, 30, 33) ; comp. 11 : 14 ; 36 : 26). In these passages we discern essentially the same tone of doctrine and exhortation met with in our Lord's sermon on the Mt., and in the Ep. of James—all intended to work proper humility in the self-righteous, self-deceived Israelites.—Having such difficulties to meet we can readily perceive why he needed a forehead like adamant (3 : 8, 9), by which, however, is not meant insensibility to the miseries of the people, but invincible firmness of spirit (9 : 4, 8 ; 10 : 13 ; 21 : 11, 12 ; 24 : 17-27 ; 32 : 18 ; 2 : 5, 7 ; 3 : 11, 27). Hence he ranks with

Isaiah and Jeremiah as one of the three great prophets of Israel. For as it was Isaiah's mission to proclaim the word of the Lord to Israel at the moment when the necessity of the judgment of the captivity became most apparent, and Jeremiah's to prophecy when the judgment fell upon the city of Jerusalem and the house of David, so it was Ezekiel's mission to lead the rebellious house of Israel into the wilderness of the heathen, for its long probation. And notwithstanding the hardness of their hearts and their obstinacy, they could not, in their captivity, wholly resist the impression which E.'s divine mission and authority made upon them. They not only rallied around him as their spiritual centre and refuge, but his name and reputation rose high among them (comp. Wisdom 49 : 10, 11), and to this day they honor his supposed sepulchre (Hortinger, Thes. phil., 475; Ausland, 1853, No. 40, p. 957).

III. Although E., as a prophet, exerted immediate influence upon the people, his work was intended to reach beyond his own age and relations. His prophecies therefore were committed to writing, to be handed down to more appreciating generations, not only in the succession of Israel, but among the Gentiles. This was intimated even in the manner in which the first portions of his prophecy were set before him (2 : 9 ; 3 : 3). And the Synagogue seems to have apprehended this more extensive design of the book, for it was forbidden to be read by persons under 30 y. of age (ZUNZ, l. c., 163). Hence the duty of the Gentile Church, upon which the spirit of understanding prophecy has fallen, to search into the meaning of this book, and unfold it to the blinded Jews. This is especially claimed by the last third of the book, containing the prophecies concerning the Mis. and house of Israel (c. 36, 37), concerning Gog and Magog (c. 38, 39), and concerning the new sanctuary and city of Jehovah (c. 40-48).—(Besides the standard commentaries, see HESS, Briefe über d. Offenb. Johannes, 131-136).

BAUMGARTEN.*

Ezion-geber, is mentioned as one of the last stations of Israel on the journey through the desert, whence they journeyed towards Moab (Numb. 33 : 35, &c. ; Deut. 2 : 8). It was near Elath, in Edom. Solomon's fleet started for Ophir from E., and there Jehoshaphat's ships were broken (1 Kings 9 : 26 ; 22 : 49). It was, consequently, a harbor, but its precise locality has not yet been ascertained, although strong probabilities favor Ewald's suggestion (Gesch. Isr., III., 1, p. 77), that it was only the harbor of Elath.—(See WELLSTED, Travels in Arabia; SCHUBERT, Reise, II., 379 ; BURCKHARDT's Reisen v. Gesenius, II., 831 ; RÜPPELL, Reise in Nubien, &c., 251, &c. ; RITTER's Erdbk., XIV., 53, 167, 229, 284, 366, &c. ; ROBINSON's Palest.).

RÜTSCHE.*

Ezra and Nehemiah.—The book of Ezra consists of the following parts: I. Chpts. 1-6 : 22, embracing the period preceding Ezra's time (subdivisions: 1-4 : 7 (Hebrew) ; 4 : 8 ; 6 : 18 (Chaldaic) ; 6 : 19-22 (Hebrew.)) II. Chpts. 7-10 : 44, embracing the time of Ezra (subd., 7 : 1-11 (Hebrew) ; 7 : 12-26 (Chaldaic) ; 7 : 27-10 : 44 (Hebrew)).—In determining the author-

hip, date, and integrity of the book, everything depends upon the question whether Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah were not the production of one person (see Art. Chronicles).—The following are the most conclusive reasons against the unity of the three books. Neh. 1:1, clearly announces a new book, distinct in its authorship from the Chronicles. And why, but on this supposition, would 1 Chron. 9, be repeated in Neh. 11, where the list more properly belongs? If Ezra and Nehemiah were not, written long prior to the Chronicles, it cannot be conceived why these should not have been taken up into the canon before those. Ezra 2 (comp. Neh. 7) was derived by the author from an original document at hand; so 4:8–6:18, from an Aramaic document discovered by the author. The latter section was written by an eye-witness (5:4, which is not contradicted by 6:14). All, therefore, in P. I. which is not copied from primitive sources, was written by one author (even including 6:19–22). In P. II., 7:26–9:15, is certainly by Ezra; and although in 7:1–11, and chapt. 10, the author speaks in the third person, this does not prove another origin (see KEIL, apolog. Versuch, 124).—Concerning E. himself, our chief source of information is the book bearing his name. Of sacerdotal descent, he was closely related to the high-priest Joshua. He was highly esteemed by Artaxerxes Longim. (7:12–26). Having conducted the return of the Jews to Jerusalem, in the exercise of his official functions, he banished the foreign wives (7:6, 14, 25; Neh. 8:9; Ezra 9, 10). Foremost in studying the law he made it a point to reduce it also to practice (7:10). When in exile, the Jews felt the necessity of a thorough acquaintance with the law as never before, and Ezra, as their representative, became the model of a priest mighty in Scripture. Gathering round him such of the priests and Levites as sympathized with him (Neh. 8:7–9; 10:29), they explained the sacred Word to the people. Now for the first time do we find a pulpit (Neh. 8:4). Great was the anxiety of the Jews to hear these instructions (9:3). E. may be called the Reformer of Israel.—Tradition speaks of him as the president of the Synagoga magna and collector of the canon, a work loudly demanded by the necessities of this period. He gathered the 24 books of the O. T., but, as we cannot tell whether he died before or after the last prophet, and he could not be certain whether God would not send another ἀνὴρ θεόπνευστος, it cannot be said that he finished the canon. (Touching his labors, in this department, which tradition exaggerates, see the Church Fathers in FABRIC. Cod. Pseudepigr. V. T., p. 1158; cf. EUSEB., H. E., V., 8; IREN., adv. hæc., III., 25 (21, 2 ed. Stieren); TERTULL., de habit. mul., I. C., 3; BASIL. ep. ad Philonem., Clem., Strom., I., c. 22, § 149, ed. Klotz; HIERON., adv. Helois; ISIDOR., libr. III., Etymol.).—He is also said to have introduced the square letter (Talm. Sanhedr. C. 2; HIERON. in prol. galeat.), the points and the Masora. To him are ascribed 10 legal precepts (comp. WOLFF, bibl. hebr., p. 943; Orho, lex rabb. phil., p. 174). Two apocryphal writings bear his name: the so-called third book of Ezra (in Cod. Alex. δ' ἐσπεύς, in Vet. Lat. Syrus), and LXX. Ezra I. (in ISIDOR., Orig., 6, 2, Ezra II.). Comp. FABRIC., bibl. græca L. III., p. 746; EICHHORN, Einl. in apokr. Schrift. d. A. T., Lpzg., 1795, p. 335.—On the prophetic-apocalyptic fourth book of Ezra, see FABR., Cod. apocr. N. T., p. 936. LÜCKE, Einl. in die Offenb. Joh., p. 80. Ersch and Gruber, Art. Ezra by Rödiger. —On an autograph of Ezra's, viz., the Codex of the Pentateuch, written by his own hand, see FABR., l. c., p. 1147.—Concerning his death we have only fables. According to Jos. (Ant. XI., 5, 5) he died and was buried in Jerusalem; according to others, on a journey to Persia in the 120th year of his age. His grave is pointed out on the Tigris (according to Benjamin v. Tudela, I., p. 73, ed. Ascher).

The book of Neh. may be divided into three parts: I. chapt. 1–7; II. c. 8–10; III. c. 11–13. Clearest and most connected of all are the first six chapters, which, it is admitted, were written by Nehemiah. The section, chapter 8–10—according to Khinert (Dürpt. Beitr., I., p. 131), and Hävernick (Einl. II., p. 305)—was composed by Ezra, but transcribed verbatim by Nehemiah; according to Keil (Einl., p. 522), by Neh. himself; whilst De Wette (Einl., p. 291) regards it as an interpolation, and Ewald, as the production of the author of all three works. It must be believed, however, that it was written by some one who lived in the time of Neh.—whether by Ezra, or Neh., or some one else, is of small account. Of the following chapt., the authorship of 12:1–26, and 12:44–13:3, is denied to Neh. (See Jos. Ant. XI., 7, 8; DE WETTE, Einl., p. 293; VITRINGA, Observ. ss., VI., p. 337; RAMBACH, Annot. in libr. Neh. in den uberr. Annot. in Hagiogr., Vol. III., ad b. 1; KEIL, l. c., p. 86, and Art. Darius).—The son of Hachaliah (1:1), N. was the cup-bearer of Artaxerxes Longim., who highly esteemed him. In the year 445 B. C., clothed with royal authority he came to Jerusalem, and stood in a relation to the civil and political life of the Jews similar to that occupied by Ezra in regard to their religion. It is worthy of remark that Neh. bore a double title: Pacha, or Pascha, and Thirsatha. The former seems to have been his proper official title (see 3:7; 5:14, 18; comp. v. 15, and 3:11; 7:11); the latter was merely honorary (8:9; 10:2; 7:65, 70; Ezra 2:63). In 433 B. C., he went back to the court, but got permission to return (Neh. 13:6). Concerning the duration of his absence, see Prideaux's Connexions. Of his death, nothing is known. Jos. Ant., XI., 5, 8, says that he died an εὖ γῆρας ἀφαιρόμενος. See the beautiful sketch of his life by Ewald, Gesch. d. V. Isr. III., 2, p. 166.—(Comp. V. STRIGEL, Schol. in libr. Esræ: Lps., 1571. The same, Schol. in Nehem.: ib., 1575. J. H. MICHAELI's Annot. in libr. Esr. (in uberr. Annot. in Hagiogr., Vol. III.). J. J. RAMBACH, Annot. in libr. Nehem. (also in uberr. Annot. in Hagiogr., Vol. III.). BERTHEAU has announced a Comm. on Ezra, Neh., and Esther).

NÄGELSBACH — Ermentrout.

F.

Faber, John Augustanus, born at Freiburg, Switzerland. He joined the Dominicans at Augsburg, and became their prior. In 1516 he taught (probably theology) at Bologna, and was afterwards appointed court-preacher and confessor of Maxim. I., whose funeral sermon he preached Jan. 16, 1519. Some other honors and offices were also conferred upon him. (ERASM., ep. XVI., 16 ed. Basil). Charles V. made F. his court-preacher, 1520-21, at the recommendation of Erasmus, who describes him as a learned, eloquent, and affable man. At the same time F. projected measures of conciliation in regard to the Lutherans, counselling, quite in the spirit of Erasmus, the appointment of a tribunal, conjointly by the Pope, the Emperor, the Christian Kings, and the German Electors, by which existing dissensions might be settled. He communicated this plan orally (at Cologne, Nov. 2, 1520) to the Elector of Mayence, and afterwards in writing. Subsequently he and Erasmus differed more and more in their views of Luther.—F. died about 1531. It is not known that he left any unpublished writings. He is often confounded with John F., of Vienna, or with F. of Heilbronn.—(See SECKENDORF, hist. Luth., 1521. ECHARD ET QUÉTIF, Scr. O. Præd., II., 80).

WAGENMANN.*

Faber, John (Fabri), Bishop of Vienna, born in Leutkirch, Suabia, in 1478, early joined the Dominicans, studied theology at Freiburg, Breisgau, where he was made Mag. art., then Dr. jur. canon. or theol. Talented and studious he was soon chosen vicar of Lindau and Leutkirch, and then episcopal official in Basel, and canon of the principal church there. In 1518 Hugo, B. of Landenberg, appointed F. his Vicar-general in Constance, and Leo X. conferred on him the title of papal prothonotary.—At first F. sustained friendly relations with members of the Reformed party (as Erasmus, Zwingli, Oecolamp., Melanch., Vadian, &c.), and kept up intimate correspondence with Zwingli, especially. But in 1521 he underwent a total change, apparently occasioned by a visit to Rome, and the liberality of the Pope. Thenceforth he opposed the new movement most virulently and indefatigably, with his pen, and from the pulpit, seeking every opportunity of showing his zeal. His devotion to the Papacy, and his arduous labors were richly rewarded. Successive offices of emolument, and posts of honor, were bestowed upon him, until, in 1530-31, he was raised to the See of Vienna. He died May 21, 1541. He bequeathed his library to the theol. institution he had founded in Vienna, and several valuable legacies, for benevolent objects, to Leutkirch.—His controversial works were numerous, but of no permanent value.—(See ECHARD ET QUÉTIF, scr. O. Præd., II., 111, &c. KLEIN, Gesch. d. Christenth. in Oestr., IV. KETNER, diss. de J. Fabri vita et scr.: Lps., 1735, 4to.).

WAGENMANN.*

Faber, (Favre) Peter Francis, a Swiss priest, attended F. de la Baume, B. of Halicarnassus, as secretary and confessor, on his tour of visitation to Cochinchina, 1740, an animated account of which he afterwards published: "Lettres édiifiantes et curieuses sur la visite apostol." &c. In this work F. exposed the misdeeds of the Jesuits in China in a manner which greatly incensed them. They bought up all the copies of his work they could find, and destroyed them. He died in his 80th year. SIMLER gives full abstracts from F.'s letters in his "Samml. alter u. neuer Urkunden zur Beleuchtung d. K. gesch.," I., 159-256.

PRESSL.*

Fabian, the supposed name of the 19th B. of Rome, 236-50; but both his name and the time of his episcopate are in dispute. The Greeks call him Fabius; the Alexandrian Chron. (p. 630) Flavian. Eusebius (H. E., I., 6, c. 29) says that, though a layman, he was chosen in consequence of a dove having perched upon his head during the meeting of the people and clergy for the election of a new bishop. Cyprian highly commends him (Epp. 4, 31). The Pontificale of Bucherius (p. 271) says he appointed 7 deacons over the 14 eccl. districts into which Rome was then divided. Later Pontificalia ascribe to him the appointment of 7 sub-deacons, as aids to the 7 persons who wrote the acts and sayings of the martyrs by order of Pope Clement. Baronius and Bollandus claim for F. the conversion of the Emperor Philip and his son; but this, apart from their conversion reflecting no great credit on the instrument of it, is doubtful. F.'s work against the heretic Privatus is lost. Other works have been falsely ascribed to him.—(See Acta Sanct., II., Jan., p. 252. TILLEMONT, Mémoir. III., 362. Bower's Hist. of the Popes).

PRESSL.*

Fabricius, John, the successor of Calixtus, not only in office, but in irenical theology, in which, however, he went to extremes. For four generations his ancestors had served the Church of Nuremberg, in the spirit of moderate Melancthonianism. The founder of the family, John F., successor of Osiander at St. Lorenz, Nuremberg, was a personal friend of Melancthon; his son, John Baptist, born 1532, † 1578, studied under M. in Wittenberg, and was pastor in Nuremb. and Fürth; John Baptist's son John, born 1560, † 1637, pastor of St. Sebald, was renowned as pacis et concordiae studiosus; and his son John, born 1618, † 1676, who was educated by G. Calixtus and Horneius, in Helmstädt, became Prof. of Theol. at Altorf, and then, for 25 years, pastor of St. Mary's in Nuremb., was the father of the subject of this sketch, who was born at Altorf, Feb. 11, 1644. After an admirable course of study, he travelled, 1670–77, through Germany and Italy. During this period he was chosen pastor of a congregation of evangelical merchants in Venice. From 1677–97 he was Professor of Theology at Altorf. In 1697 he was called as Professor to Helmstädt. He had a high reputation for acute and varied scholarship, and was especially familiar with points involved in the Romish controversy. He died Jan. 29, 1729.—(See his Amoenitates theol. varii et selecti argumenti: Helmst., 1699, 4to.; and his Historia Biblioth. Fabricianæ: Wolfenbüttel, 1717–24, 6 vols. 4to. Also CHRYSANDER's Diptycha professorum theol., &c. WILL's nürnb. Gelehrtenlex., I., 376, &c.; V., 308, &c. W. HÖCK, Anton Ulrich u. Elis. Christine v. Braunschweig: Wolfenb., 1845, p. 80–136).

HENKE.*

Faculties, ecclesiastical, are powers to exercise certain prerogatives granted by the proper official to another person. Such powers can be delegated only by superiors having regular jurisdiction, and their limit is regulated by the deed of investiture. The most important are papal and episcopal faculties, and especially those referring to dispensations. Popes early granted to missionaries, and the heads of monastic orders, general faculties for dispensations, ex causa longissimæ absentiæ a Romana Curia. (See MEYER's d. Propaganda, I., 38, &c.: Göttingen, 1852). Subsequently papal nuncios granted them, particularly to carry out the decrees of Trent (see GIESLER, Eccl. Hist.); for as special officers their authority was superior, in some things, to that of the regular Bishops (see Dispensations). In consequence of difficulties growing out of this collision, the system of quinquennial faculties arose.—The faculties granted by Bishops relate partly to prerogatives properly belonging to them, partly to matters of privilege. Hence they may empower auctoritate ordinaria (propria) or apostolica, vicar-generals, officials, deans, priests, to perform acts which they could not otherwise perform.

H. F. JACOBSON.*

Facundus, B. of Hermiane, in the African province of Byzacena, a native of Africa, of the 6th cent., dwelt chiefly in Constantinople, as a representative of the African Church. He was prominent in the controversy concerning the Three Chapters (see Art.). After a thorough examination of the subject he wrote (547) his pro defensione trium capitulorum, in 12 books (publ. by J. Sirmond: Paris, 1629, and in Sirmond's Works, II., 297–586, ed. Venet.), in which he sought to persuade Justinian to revoke his edict. He denounces in general the common tendency of the age to theological controversies. In other arts and occupations, only the skilful had a voice, but every one felt at liberty to dabble in theological disputes. He also reproaches the pliancy of the Bishops towards the Emperor, and recommends the example of Ambrose. He defends Ibas of Edessa, and Theodore of Mopsueste against the accusations of their opponents, showing that their views coincide with the faith of the Church. Concerning councils he says: Neque enim est alia conciliorum faciendæ utilitas, quam ut quod intellectu non capimus, ex auctoritate credamus.

—He was also the author of Liber c. Mucianum Schol. (SIRMOND, 587–98), a defence of the African Bishops who had broken fellowship with Vigilius of Rome; and Epist. fidei cathol., in favor of the Three Chapters. It is said he died in exile, c. 570.—(See BARON., ad ann., 546. CAVE, Scriptor. eccl., I., 520. OELRICHS, Script. eccl. lat., p. 361. NEANDER, Ch. Hist.).

HAGENBACH.*

Fagius (Büchlein) Paul, born 1504, at Rhein-zabern, in the Palatinate, studied at Heidelberg (from 1515) under J. Brenz, &c., from 1522 taught in Strassburg, where he learned Hebrew with W. Capito, and became acquainted with Bucer, Hedio, Zell, &c. In 1527 he went to Isny as rector of a school, and was subsequently sent by the Council of Isny to study theology at Strassburg. After that he was minister at Isny from 1537–43. Here he diligently prosecuted the study of Hebrew under the Jew, Elias Levita, and was aided by Councillor Peter Buffer in establishing there a Hebrew press. After Capito's death, F. was chosen his successor at Strassburg. Before taking that post (1544), he spent two years at Constance in regulating Evangelical Church matters there. In 1546 Frederick III. called him to aid in organizing the Reformation in the city and University of Heidelberg. His views, based on Melancthon's advice, were opposed by the majority of the Professors, who still adhered to the mediæval method. His labors at Strassburg were also brought to an end by the Interim, the introduction of which had been resisted by F. and Bucer (see Art.). In 1549 F., with Bucer, went to England at Cranmer's invitation. They reached England Apr. 25. F. became Professor of Hebrew at Cambridge; where he died the same year, Nov. 25. The bloody Mary had his bones exhumed, 1556, and burned with those of Bucer. On July 30, 1560, however, Elizabeth honorably restored the memory of both.—Martin Crusius describes F. as tall of stature, with an earnest but kind expression of countenance, an able preacher, and superior Hebrew scholar. His writings consist of expositions of the O. T., and works on Hebrew philology. In doctrine he held the mediating views of Bucer and the Strassburg theologians.—(See CRUSIUS, schwäb. Chron. for 1549, &c. MELCH. ADAM, Vita theol., p. 204. HÄUSSER, Gesch. d. Pfalz., I., 612).

WAGENMANN.*

Faith, πίστις.—In order to ascertain the absolute religious significance of faith, we must first settle the import of the term as applied to common subjects.—Faith is the basis of all social intercourse. Men regard each other only as they believe in their mutual natural or moral excellence. We love those, only, in whose real affinity with ourselves, whether of blood or of spirit, we believe. Faith binds different persons together, by convincing them of their objective and subjective worth. This law holds absolutely in the case of man's relation to God. There are two degrees of the soul's communion with God: that of holy fear, and that of spontaneous love. Both presuppose faith as the receptive faculty. The former springs from a believing recognition of the majesty of the infinite power and holiness in which God reveals himself to the soul. The latter is kindled by a believing contemplation of the love and goodness of God, as the source of those blessings by which every necessity of our being is satisfied, and responsive gratitude and confidence are called forth. Hence it is by faith that we are enabled to apprehend the revelation of God's love, and to enter into that full communion with him which is the highest end of our development. Man is made for faith, and in every stage of his life faith is the subjective principle of his spiritual development. Even when faith becomes sight, its form only will be changed; essentially it will still be the bond uniting humanity to God.

Considered as to its form, faith is not a mere intellectual belief based upon an objective reality, as distinguished from a recognition of the subjective character of the grounds of such belief (James 2 : 14-26). The former is called fides historica as distinct from fides salvifica. Faith is a matter of the heart (Rom. 10 : 9, 10), of our inmost personality; a grasping of the sacred object with the deepest powers of the soul. And as all man's faculties are germinally included in the central power of the soul, they all become simultaneously involved in the exercise of faith. The believer not only thinks and supposes; he knows in whom he believes (2 Tim. 1 : 12); knowledge is essentially immanent in faith (Eph. 3 : 18). The soul is, likewise, filled with a feeling of holy joy, which soon changes into a cordial approval of the object of delight; and as, by a decided act of the will, it appropriates the blessings of faith, the soul attains to a certainty and confidence which become a firm foundation of desire and hope (Heb. 11 : 1; 1 Pet. 1 : 7). Thus, according to evangelical theology, faith comprehends: Notitia, assensus, and fiducia; neither of these must be wanting, though the measure of each may vary (Mark 9 : 24; Rom. 8 : 38, 39). Fides est non tantum notitia in intellectu, sed etiam fiducia in voluntate, hoc est, est velle et accipere hoc, quod in promissione offertur, videlicet, reconciliationem et remissionem peccatorum (ap. conf. III., 183).

The object of faith cannot be seen either by the natural eye, or the carnal reason; it belongs to the sphere of invisible things; especially of what is spiritual and divine. It is not absolutely incognizable, however, but manifests itself to the inner man. The proper object of faith is the revelation of God to man, comprehensively called, in the Bible, "the name of God." This revelation, however, issues from his being, and merely discloses that God is a spirit, and the life of a spirit is love, the operation of which presupposes, as to the nature of God, his absolute power, and as to his person, infinite holiness. The love of God is the inmost fountain and substance of the divine revelation, and remains such even towards the sinner, only that in his case it develops itself in the antithesis of anger and grace. The height of this grace was reached in the incarnation of the Son of God, to which the O. T. revelations constantly pointed. All these, in which the love of God is exhibited in degrees and forms suited to man's capacity, are objects of faith (Luke 24 : 25, 26); but pre-eminently Jesus Christ, in whom all were consummated (John 3 : 16; 17 : 21; 20 : 31; Gal. 2 : 16; 1 John 3 : 23). And whereas faith embraces him, the personal fountain of our salvation, in the spirit, and does this with the mind (that is with the central faculty of man's life), faith, in its highest sense, is a personal, spiritual, union with Christ—a receptive act of the soul, by which it fully appropriates the grace of Christ, and rises into a life of love with him.—This life, however, cannot be produced by man's effort (John 6 : 29; 1 Cor. 2 : 5), but must be wrought by the Holy Ghost, who uses the means of grace to this end (Rom. 10 : 17; 1 Cor. 1 : 21; cfr. Form. Conc., III., 11. Especially the Heidelb. Cat. q., 21). At the same time the soul must be duly prepared for it (John 5 : 44) by previous repentance, in which reliance upon self and the world is abandoned (Mark 1 : 15). This, also, is the work of the prevenient grace of God (John 6 : 44). When man yields to the influences of this grace, which also constrains him to a corresponding confession of Christ (2 Cor. 4 : 13), there will be a free surrender of himself to the Spirit of Christ, in and to whom he will thenceforth live. The necessary fruit of such faith is love (1 Tim. 1 : 5; 1 John 4 : 19).

Translated thus out of the dominion of a false selfishness into the grace and fellowship of Christ, who thenceforth lives and reigns in his heart (Eph. 3 : 17), and in whom he has become a new creature, (regenerated), the believer is no longer spiritually poor and empty, but filled with the fulness of Christ, and becomes participant in all the blessings of grace of which the person of Christ is the fountain—the pardon of sin (Acts 26 : 18), justification (Rom. 3 : 26; 5 : 1) without the works of the law (Acts 13 : 29; Rom. 3 : 28, &c.). For as we become incorporated with Christ by faith, we stand before God in him, as his members, and thus become just (δίκαιοι) before God in the righteousness of Christ (Rom. 1 : 17, &c.). Our faith is thus reckoned for righteousness, and we live by faith (Rom. 4 : 5; Hab. 2 : 4). He that believeth on the Son is not condemned (John 3 : 18), but is saved through faith, adopted, and assured of the resurrection unto life (Rom. 1 : 16; Gal. 3 : 26; John 5 : 24; 11 : 25, 26). Especially does faith, as the bond of union with Christ, qualify us to receive every spiritual gift, and form the conditional basis for the working of miracles, and effectual prayer (Matt. 9 : 22; 17 : 20; 21 : 22; and James 5 : 15). What St. James says upon the relation of faith and works is only in seeming contradiction to the above statements. In his epistle δικαιοσύνη does not mean "to be justified," but to show and prove ourselves to be righteous. Moreover the faith of which he speaks is merely intellectual faith (James 1 : 6, 18). Consequently, in order to prove one's self really righteous, we must exhibit those fruits of piety (not merely outward conformity to the moral law) which prove that we are really in Christ.—The Romish C. takes the opposite view, and contends that faith is limited to the sphere of knowledge, but, as certain knowledge, operates upon the feeling, and thus upon the will—also that faith is but the starting-point of justification, with which last he identifies regeneration. (Conc. Trid., s. VI., 6, 8).

But in addition to the gifts of grace, man also becomes participant, through faith, in the personal life of Jesus Christ. For Christ does not let himself be divided; whoever receives him by faith, receives him entire, by the Spirit (Gal. 3: 14; Eph. 1: 13; John 7: 38). The first work of the Spirit (who is the Spirit of Christ), is to illumine the heart by faith, so that we learn to know the mysteries of God in Christ (John 1: 69; Eph. 3: 8-21). There is indeed a knowledge of divine things which precedes faith. This consists, primarily, in the innate consciousness of God, implanted in the very ground of our personal being, and which no one can ignore; this forms the inner basis of all faith. It consists, also, in the knowledge of the particular object of faith; for before we can believe we must know what we are required to believe. Nevertheless, the proper insight into the true nature of the divine revelation is conditioned, objectively, by the Holy Ghost who has given it, and, subjectively, by faith, by which we inwardly embrace it, and experience its power; for without such experience there can be no real knowledge of divine things. But faith constrains us to such experimental knowledge, inasmuch as the love which animates faith, impels the spirit to seek more intimate knowledge of the object of faith; and thus the Holy Spirit, who searches all the depths of the Godhead, leads us into all truth, as hidden in Christ (1 Cor. 2: 7-16). Hence faith is the subjective principle of illumination.—But it is no less the principle of sanctification. Whoever believes in Christ is born of God, and overcomes the world (1 John 5: 1, 4). Faith is not only our mightiest weapon and strongest shield against the powers of darkness (Eph. 6: 16; 1 Tim. 6: 12; 1 Pet. 5: 9), but our victory over the world (1 John 5: 4). Faith, also, as a new life, produces love, which proves that we are partakers of the nature of God, which is love. And love, in connection with other spiritual affections, is the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5: 22), and exhibits its power by works of righteousness (Gal. 5: 6; 1 Pet. 1: 5-7).—The importance of this doctrine of faith is obvious. It humbles man by showing him that he is and has nothing, in himself, to render him worthy to stand before God, directs him to God as the only source of salvation, and builds his salvation upon a firm objective basis; it sets him inwardly free from himself, places him in living fellowship with God in Christ, and finally furnishes a specific spiritual principle of Christian morality, to which it prompts men by the purest motive—leads, in a word, to spiritual perfection.—The term faith is also used in an objective sense (see Articles of Faith: cfr. Justification; the various systems of theology—especially: CHR. F. SCHMID, bibl. theol. d. N. Test. SARTORIUS, Lehre v. d. heil. Liebe. SCHÖBERLEIN, Grundlehre d. Heils).

SCHÖBERLEIN.*

Family.—This term was used by the ancient Romans to designate: 1) domestics, or servants held as property; 2) a race, lineage, or progeny; 3) a sect, as f. Stoicorum. In the sphere of Christianity, however, the family is a communion based upon religious and moral relations, the intimacy and manifold bearings of which place it far above all other human relationships and associations (see Christianity). It is the image of the highest and most perfect of all unions: that of Christ with the Church. For Christianity—the ideal family in which Christ exerts his creative power in begetting, through the Spirit and the word, many children of faith unto God, children who mutually serve each other with their individual gifts—reflects itself in the natural family. It is true, the natural family is but a carnal reflection of the union of the Church, since even the life of a Christian family still holds in the flesh (Gal. 2: 20); but it is also a real reflection, because its bond of union is spiritual, it is held together by the Spirit of Christ.—The formal basis of the Christian family is marriage (see Art.), monogamy, the deepest ground and true consecration of which are found in the consciousness of mutual fellowship in Christ. In marriage, as in Christian friendship, there is the bond of reciprocal affection, but with this difference, that the former involves the exclusive fellowship of two persons of different sexes, whose union completes their personality, and hence is a life-union. Those thus united lay the groundwork of the Christian family, indeed are the family in an undeveloped, incomplete form, and contemplate the birth of children, as the proper and desirable fruit of their union. The natural desires for such issue, however, and their gratification, are ever cherished and indulged in subordination to the divinely ordered end of this sacred union, and to the will of God, and a sense of dependence on his blessing. And in order that this higher end of the family may be duly attained, and merely carnal passions be kept subdued, it will be necessary that the husband and wife endeavor, in all their social intercourse, to prove complementary helps to each others' moral and spiritual perfection; also, that if blessed with children, they faithfully co-operate in the proper training of these, under the influence of their harmoniously combined individual dispositions, the sternness of the father being softened by the gentleness of the mother, and the tenderness of the mother sustained by the firmness and authority of the father. Especially must the early consecration of the children to God in Holy Baptism, and their religious training engage earnest parental attention, so that through their earthly, temporal life, as a medium, they may be made meet for the family of the first-born in heaven. In this respect nature, as divinely arranged, gives to the mother a priority of opportunity, and therefore of duty, by placing the children bodily so near to her, in their early dependence upon her for maternal nourishment and care. And yet even during this early period of their life, the father may lend efficient help by his encouragement and counsel. Subsequently both parents will find opportunity to take equal part in managing the moral and spiritual interests of the household, yet with this difference that the influence of the father will be more directly exerted upon the sons, that of the mother upon the daughters of the family.

To maintain a healthy life in a Christian family, the education of the children must inculcate unconditional subjection to parental authority, as of divine origin; and this in order to form proper independence of character in them. They must be so taught the Word of God, habitual communion with the Lord, submission to the inner discipline of the Holy Spirit, that the doctrines and duties of the Gospel shall become an essential part of their spiritual life, and render them gradually more independent of parental admonition and support. This true Christian independence, rooted in the fear and love of God, and consequently in pious reverence also for earthly authority under God, will not be prejudicial to proper regard for parents, but elevate the nature of this regard, by making it a part of true piety. Hence even when apparent collisions occur, between the divine and parental authority, the higher regard paid to the former will be combined with due deference to the latter.—In this development of personal character the sons and daughters of a family will gradually enter into a relation of friendship to their parents; a higher mutual confidence between them will spring up, without injury to feelings of pious regard. This is a really advanced stage in the life of a Christian family, in which the older brothers and sisters quietly participate in the management and training of the younger members of the household, and thus become practically prepared for their own future destiny.—Should the marriage-relation be without natural issue, the lack of children may properly be supplied by the adoption of such as may be destitute, towards whom parental Christian duties may be piously and successfully performed.

The Christian family, ordinarily, also includes servants, or persons employed to labor. Whether these sustain a life relation, as personal property, or are but temporarily employed, they should be treated, as it is their duty to act, in a manner consistent with the spirit of the Gospel. Those who employ them should not merely be intent on obtaining a certain amount of service, but rather aim at making the relation subservient to the promotion of their higher spiritual interests. Care should, indeed, be taken not to encourage in such a temper of self-exaltation and perverseness. But the best means, usually, of preventing this will be to treat domestics in a Christian way, to have them participate in the religious services of the household, and show them tender sympathy in case of sickness, and treat them with the kindness due to members of the household—in a word, to aim at securing their true welfare for time and eternity.—To such, also, as may visit, or tarry in the household as friends, will the influence of a Christian family extend, so that these may likewise share in the benefits of the piety maintained in its midst.—The entire life of the Christian family will be continual acts of worship, in the higher sense, in which respect it must exhibit constant improvement, as well in its ordinary toils, as in its seasons of rest and social enjoyment: all must be done in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and to the glory of God. All this, however, will centre in, and be confirmed by, family worship in the stricter sense, in which the presence and influence of the Word and Spirit of Christ, will be confessed and cherished, as the living moral force of the household, and the public worship of the congregation be daily perpetuated. This service will be conducted by the husband or father, as the priest of his house, and be participated in by all the other members of the family. It will properly include singing, the reading together of the Scriptures, and prayer. Around this common altar the whole family will stately gather, morning, and evening, and obtain there ever new life and grace, by which their whole being may become more and more inflamed with holy love to God and each other, better fitted for the toils and trials of life, and made more meet for eternal reunion in heaven.—A family animated with such a spirit, and conducted upon such principles, will extend its happy influence into the wider spheres of society, the school, the Church, the State, and even to the world at large. It belongs to the highest and holiest developments of Christian humanity.—(See ROTHE, Ethik, III., 2, p. 605, &c. Also the works on Ethics, by Reinhard, Flatt, Daub, Marheinecke, Harless, Schleiermacher, and THIERSCHE, Christl. Familienleben).

KLING *

Familists, a sect started by Henry Nicholas, or Nicolai, a native of Münster, who spent some time in Holland, then went to England, about the close of the reign of Edward VI., and there gathered a society called familia charitatis. His tenets were said to agree with those of David Joris, with whom he was familiar, and with those of the Anabaptists in general. His society, however, published (1575) a confession of faith, and an apology, in which they sought to prove their agreement with the three general Christian creeds. The fundamental characteristic of the sect was their tendency to a mystical self-absorption in God, or deification of themselves, which they held to be attainable through love. Nicholas was charged with saying, that Moses preached hope, Christ faith, but he, love; and in the title of a work styles himself "one deified with God, in the Spirit of his love." Hence the Familists were charged with denying the personality of Christ, and even with representing him as being only a communicating "condition" of divinity; and also with teaching that there was no other deity but that with which man might become fully identified. In their Apology, however, they avow belief in the doctrine of Christ's atonement, and simply demand an appropriation of the life manifested in him. They were said to be perfectionists, but in their apology they merely affirm the possibility of keeping the law of God with all the heart. They recognised infant baptism, and further differed from Anabaptists in not assailing the predominant Churches.—Nicholas was an illiterate man, but at first attracted some theologians and persons of rank. In 1580 Elizabeth issued a proclamation against them, ordering an investigation of their tenets. They were accused of horrid crimes. But the proclamation does not allude to such. After that they are lost in other sects. James I., in his Βασιλικὸν δῶρον, calls them an "infamem anabaptistarum sectam, quæ familia amoris vocatur." Among the last of the sect was one Etherington, 1627. — (See Böhmen's acht Bücher v. d. Ref. d. Kirchen in England, 1734, pp. 541–73. Walch, Religionstreit. ausserh. d. Luth. K., IV., 840–53. Arnold, Kirchen- u. Ketzergesch. Th., II., B. 16, K. 20, § 36). KÖSTLIN.*

Fanaticism, from fanaticus, fanum, a temple, or place where the deity reveals himself. The derivation may refer: 1) to heathen oracles, as that at Delphi, where the will of the divinity was supposed to be communicated through dreams, or the fanatic ecstasy of the priestesses, so that a fanatic would be a person who imagined himself divinely possessed or inspired (hence Plato derives μανία from μανία); or 2) fanaticism designates an extreme prominence given to some particular facts of pretended or real revelation. In both cases the term points to a divine revelation; the former, and more likely case, lays chief stress upon the manner, the other upon the matter of the revelation. According to the former, fanaticism is the limitation of religion to the operations of fancy, and is the most dangerous of all the perversions of faith, whether it consumes itself, or madly turns against others of different belief, and persecutes them. According to the latter, fanaticism is the overestimating of some particular fact or facts of revelation. It disregards or renounces not only the understanding, but the most sacred reason of men, and substitutes fancy for knowledge, and passion for true feeling. The conception of exclusiveness, as a feature of fanaticism, involved in these definitions, may readily be traced to the fact that fanum was a strictly defined locality, distinguished by the manifestations of some particular god. So that f. is blind, one-sided, and exclusive. The fanatic, therefore, 1) shuts his eyes against the light of reason, and loves to be the toy of wild fancies, and of dark and confused feelings, and 2) is apt to cherish some fixed idea, which usually wears a sensual hue, or outward dress, which may possibly be clearly apprehended by the fanatic, but is not seen in its proper relation to other ideas and facts. He may, therefore, hold some truth, but is incapable of recognizing any other truth held by others. His mind is contracted for lack of culture, his heart narrow for want of love. He cannot conceive that the one bright ray of truth may be refracted into various colors, in passing through the spiritual eye of mankind, and that all these colors must be taken together, in order to obtain the unity of truth. Hence he is also 3) exclusive, inimical, persecuting, towards all who differ from him, and especially towards dissenting brethren, according to the psychological fact that family feuds are the fiercest. Thus fanaticism often becomes a blind self-consuming mania, rather than yield one iota of its assumptions. — Such fanaticism finds a place in every sphere of life, but prevails most in politics and religion, and becomes most dangerous when both these are combinedly under its influence. And here it may animate diametrically opposite tendencies. There are fanatics of political quietness at any price, and of revolution at any sacrifice; fanatics of progress and of retrogression; of liberty and of despotism; of cosmopolitanism, and nationalism; of utopian schemes of philanthropy and of obscurantism; of rationalistic illumination, which denounces every learned opponent as a blockhead or knave, and of orthodoxy, who would be popes, but for lack of authority and power, and whose appropriate means of furthering their creed would be the inquisition, the rack, and the stake. The mournful illustrations of these varieties, furnished especially by the past history of religion, need not be all cited; illustrations found, not only along the Ganges, or among Musselmén, but even within the pale of the Christian Church. (Cf. Luke 9:54; John 16:2). It was fanaticism which excited the persecution of the Jews in the middle ages, and again in modern times; which established the Inquisition, and reared the stake, pleading Luke 14:23, and Tit. 3:10 as its apology; which preached the sanguinary crusade against the Albigenses; which prompted regicides, and instigated Gregory XIII. to order a Te Deum to be sung for the St. Bartholomew's massacre. But it was no less fanaticism which incited the iconoclasts, and the anabaptists of Münster, the crypto-Calvinistic controversies, the wrath of the Wittenbergers and Königsbergers against Calixtus, the hostility of the orthodox party of Calov against the pietists of Halle, and the Puritans to behead Charles I.—Nor have more recent times been wanting in exhibitions of the same unholy spirit. There are, even now, tendencies showing themselves within some portions of the Protestant Church, which betray its influence, in the angry opposition with which Christian toleration, and an evangelical union among Christians upon the broad basis of Gospel principles, are resisted, and in the bigoted claim sometimes urged: extra (hanc visibilem) ecclesiam nulla salus. Indifference, in religious matters, may be a blighting winter frost, whilst toleration is like the reviving breath of spring; but fanaticism is a consuming simoom. Indifference is like the pale cold light of the moon; fanaticism like a devouring conflagration; but genuine Christian toleration like a genial sun, whose rays at once give light and warmth, and life. CARL BECK.*

Farel, William, one of the most distinguished Reformers of France and Roman Switzerland; born 1489, at Gap, of noble descent. At first he zealously adhered to the faith of his fathers (his parents firmly believed in the miraculous virtue of a cross near Gap); he gradually attained to purer views of truth by reading the Scriptures. He studied at Paris, and then became Professor at the College of Cardinal le Moine. Briçonnet, B. of Meaux, a friend of the Gospel, called F. into his service. It is unknown how much he did there to spread the Reform. Persecution soon compelled him, with others, to leave France. He went to Basel, and found a friend in Æcolampadius. There, encouraged by Æc., he issued his 13 theses declaring that the rules of life given by Christ are, alone, binding, denouncing justification by works, and rejecting the mass (see Herzog's Leben Oekol., I., 251). The University tried to prevent a disputation, but the Council ordered one to be held. It occurred on Feb. 15, 1524.

The result was propitious. But Farel had to quit Basel. Starting for Wittenberg, he reached Strassburg and met Bucer and Capito. It is doubtful whether he got to Wittenberg. In compliance with an invitation he went to Montbeliard, where Ulrich of Wurtemberg had taken refuge, to preach, though not yet ordained. His success there exasperated the enemies of Reform. His zeal was not always moderate. In the spring of 1525 he returned to Strassburg. Late in 1526 he became preacher at Aigle, under the assumed name of Ursinus. There, also, the clergy and monks violently opposed him. After the triumphant issue of the Berne disputation, the government directed Farel to preach the Word throughout the entire canton. He prosecuted the mission with energy. In the fall of 1530 the Reformation was established in Neufchatel. Thence it spread into all the adjacent districts. Farel was often in danger of violence. Shortly before his death Zwingli advised him to greater prudence and moderation. — In company with Anton Saunier, Farel visited the Waldenses in 1531, and during that and later visits, had great influence in their Church affairs. On their return they came to Geneva, then distracted with political and Church strifes (see Calvin). At first he held private meetings in his own house. But he was soon discovered. The Council summoned him; he showed his Berne credentials. Then he and his comrades were cited to appear before the episcopal vicar, Amadé des Gingsins, Abbot of Bonmont, where the other clergy of the Bishop were assembled. They were received with vituperations. Farel nobly defended himself. When he left the place a rifle was fired at him. Farel turning around coolly replied: "Your shots do not alarm me." He was sentenced to quit the city within three hours. The canons called him a servant of the devil; two of them struck him in the face and kicked him. He and his companions barely escaped assassination. F. fled to Orbe, whence he sent Antoine Froment to Geneva to further the Reformation. Late in 1533 F. returned to Geneva. The opponents had called a Dominican, Furbity, a Sorbonne doctor, to vindicate the old system. A conference was held before a deputation from the Council of Berne, on Jan. 29, 1534, which led to new collisions, but proved favorable to the Reformation. Its friends increased. Farel, wonderfully protected by Providence against the plots of foes, preached in many of the churches, declaring that the Reform, as God's work, must prevail. In spite of the authorities, the people opened St. Peter's to F. The Council of 200 convened. F. defended himself with great effect. The majority decided in favor of F. and the Reformation; his enemies yielded the field. The Bishop transferred his See to Gex. The religious edict of Aug. 27, 1535, concluded the first period of the Genevan Reformation, in which F. was, doubtless, the chief actor. It devolved upon him, also, to remodel the rules and order of worship for the church there. The first Easter communion was largely attended, and made a deep impression. A strict discipline was introduced, extending even to matters of dress. Meanwhile F. stood almost alone, until Calvin appeared. Humanly speaking, it was F.'s energetic and solemn appeal which led Calvin to lay hold of the work. Blind Corault, an Augustine, now joined them. Thenceforth F.'s labors in Geneva were intimately interwoven with Calvin's (see Art.) history. F. prepared the Genevan Confession. — Difficulties arising F. went to Neufchatel, where, also, he had severe contentions. The severe moral discipline of the Reformed Church was very unpopular; and many hoped that their former pleasures would be allowed them, if only the Censor could be expelled. An occasion of expulsion soon occurred. A lady of some distinction had caused scandal by abandoning her husband. Other means of remedying the evil having failed, Farel referred to the matter from his pulpit. The populace soon after assembled and decided against F.; although the better portion defended him. The avoyer v. Watteville claimed the right of dismissing him. But F. held his post in fidelity to Christ who had called him to it. Even during a plague which broke forth, he remained with his flock. After various mediations peace was restored. In Sept. 1541, Calvin was honorably recalled to Geneva, and F. also soon returned thither. In 1542 F. went to Metz, to aid the Reformation begun there. He preached his first sermon on the Dominican cemetery. The monks rang the bells to drown his voice; but the voice of the preacher rose above the noise of the bells. The next day 3000 persons flocked to hear him. Both his sermon, and his simple baptismal service caused great excitement. He was summoned before the Council, which forbade attendance on his preaching. Still he ministered to those smitten with the plague. He also preached in Gorze. Once he publicly contradicted a Franciscan who was declaiming upon the perpetual virginity of Mary. The women present fell upon him with hands and nails, and he barely escaped with his beard. Against numerous slanders F. defended himself in a letter to the Duke. At the instigation of the Cardinal of Lorraine an armed band fell upon the evangelicals whilst celebrating the Easter communion. Many were killed, the rest fled, and some were drowned. Count William and F. (wounded) took refuge in the Castle, whence F. was sent to Strassburg. Meanwhile Dr. Caroli, who followed F. like an evil shadow, tried to sow tares among the wheat at Metz; he also assailed F. in writing. Farel maintained correspondence with his friends in Metz, and his old congregation in Montbeliard. He visited Geneva, also, several times, sharing with Calvin and Viret the joys and sorrows of their office. In the various conflicts of the Swiss Church, and the interests of the Protestant movement at large he actively participated. In the sacramental controversy he was an unionist. He considered election among the most difficult theological questions, which only the Spirit could solve. He sided with Calvin against Servetus, and it fell to his lot to attend S. at his execution. The Libertines he boldly opposed. He rejoiced in the progress of the good cause in Geneva, and often said he would rather be the last in G. than the first elsewhere. Nothing but fidelity to the flock in Neufchatel kept him there. From all sides his counsel was sought, and he was ever prompt in aiding his brethren. — In his 69th year he married a believing widow who had fled from Rouen. Even his friends disapproved of this step. A son by this marriage did not long survive him. After visiting the Valdians again, he accepted an invitation to visit Gap, in Nov., 1561, and preached there to a vast crowd. He did the same in Grenoble. Returning to Neufchatel he had to endure many trials. Calvin's death especially dejected him. In 1565 he once more visited Metz, and was cordially received by the elders of the congregation. On the day following his arrival he preached with the ardor of youth. On returning home he was taken ill. He died Sept. 13, 1565.—Farel's true greatness did not consist in scientific attainments, but in his practical talent, and honest zeal. Among his few works we may mention: Sommaire, c'est une brève declaration d'aucuns lieux fort nécessaires à un chacun chrétien pour mettre sa confiance en Dieu et à ayder son prochain. (The 1st ed. is extinct). — Traité du purgatoire, 1543, 12mo. La très sainte oraison, que N. seigneur J. C. a baillé à ses Apôtres, les enseignant comme ils et tous vrais chrétiens doivent être, &c.: Gen., 1543, 12mo. probably a revision of his tract de oratione Rom., 1524. — La Glaive de la parole véritable, tirée contre le Bouclier de defense: du quel un ordelier Libertin s'est voulu servir pour approuver ses fausses et damnables opinions: Gen. 1550 (important as an exposure of the Libertines). — Traité de la Cène, publ. by du Moulin, 1555. — Du vrai usage de la croix de Jésus Christ, et de l'abus et idolatrie commise autour d'icelle: et de l'autorité de la parole de Dieu et des traditions humaine (with an app. by Viret), 1540. — (The first biogr. of F. was anonymous probably by Ol. Perrot, see Haller, Biblioth. d. schweizergesch., III., No. 781). Cfr. ANCILLON, Vie de Guill. F.: Amst., 1691. BAYLE, Dict. GÉNÉRIER, hist. litt. de Gen.: Gen., 1786. D'AUGER, Hist. of the Ref. HENRY's Life of Calvin. M. KIRCHHOFFER's Leben F. aus d. Quellen, &c., 2 Bde.: Zürich, 1831–33. CH. SCHMIDT, Études sur Farel: Strassb., 1834).

HAGENBACH.*

Fasting among the Jews.—The O. T. represents fasting as an act of humiliation, like weeping, rending the garments, &c. (Joel 2 : 12, 13; Zach. 7 : 3). And although one of the words, צום, used to designate the act, signifies abstinence, the other expression (Levit. 16 : 29, 31, &c., or more fully, Ps. 35 : 13) refers to deep self-abasement. Hence the LXX. renders it ἀσχεῖν τῆς ψυχῆς. — In this sense it was enjoined on the great day of atonement (Levit. 16 : 27, 32, &c.). It was, also, sometimes, voluntarily observed in seasons of special distress, or in commemoration of such seasons (Judges 20 : 26, &c.; 1 Sam. 31 : 13, &c.).—As a Mosaic ordinance, however, we find it nowhere prescribed but for the day of Atonement, and imply alluded to in connection with vows (Numb. 30 : 11–16). Even the fast enjoined was to continue only from one evening to another (Levit. 23 : 32), and did not explicitly require total abstinence from nourishment. The mildness of the precept of fasting is the more remarkable, as it was given during the 40 days in which he received the law on Mt. Sinai, and during which the Rabbins (but not the Bible) say he ate nothing. This peculiarity finds a counterpart in the fact that whilst our Lord also fasted 40 days, he does not make his example binding upon his disciples. With all this the conduct and declarations of the prophets fully agree (comp. Joel 2 : 12, 13; Zach. 7 : 5; 8 : 19, and especially Is. 58 : 4). — This view of fasting, however, underwent a considerable change, immediately after the cessation of prophecy. Not only were fasts multiplied, but considered meritorious (comp. Zach. 7 : 5, &c., with Wisdom 34 : 28, 31; Tobit 12 : 9). This tendency was most fully developed in the Pharisees, between whom and their extreme opposites the Sadducees, stood the Essenes, who fasted often (never ate meat or wine, but lived on bread, vegetables, and water), but merely thereby to gain the mastery over the flesh. The Pharisees, in the hope of gaining moral merit, kept Monday and Thursday as fasts (Luke 18 : 12) because tradition said that Moses ascended Mt. Sinai on Thursday, and came down with the two tables of the law on Monday, and also that the first temple was destroyed upon one of these days. A controversy between the parties of Hillel and Shamai, was settled by appointing an additional fast. In the Talmud the Pharisaic fasts are systematized (see 9th sect. of the 2d part of the Mishnah). The system included mainly 4 points: 1) the fast of the Atonement day, the manner, &c., of observing which is most minutely prescribed (as the age at which Jewish children must begin to keep it, viz., girls when 12 years and 1 day old, boys when 13 years and 1 day;—obstacles to its observance, as pregnancy, sickness, &c.). 2) The national fasts of the 4th month (see Zach. 7 and 8, and Jer. 52 : 6, 7), of the 5th month in commemoration of 2 Kings 25 : 8, &c.; Jer. 52 : 12, of the 7th month referring to 2 Kings 25 : 25, &c.; Jer. 41 : 1, &c., and of the 10th month referring to 2 Kings 25 : 1, &c.; Zach. 8 : 19—besides the fast at the feast of Purim in commemoration of the peril and deliverance of the nation under Ahasuerus. 3) Fasts to avert certain evils, particularly drought, specially ordered by the Rabbins. 4) The fasts of the so-called 24 stations (see 1 Chron 25 : 26) requiring the priests and Levites of each station to fast 4 days during their service-week, viz., on Monday for people at sea, on Tuesday for those travelling through deserts, on Wednesday for children, that they may escape the croup, on Thursday for pregnant women and sucking children. — Most of the public fasts have been dropped, excepting that on the day of Atonement, on the Purim feast, and in the month Ab. Of private fasts we name only that of the first-born on Passover eve, and that kept on the anniversary of the death of friends. — At the fast observed on the day of Atonement they wore (and still wear) their white shrouds, and caps—hence this is called the white fast, the others, the black fasts.

PRESSER.*

Fasting in the Christian Church, consists, in general, in abstaining from food during a specified period, more particularly in a jejunium, an entire denial of food a vespera ad vesperam, or in abstinentiam (semijejuniam) abstinence from flesh. The ancient Church held strictly to the idea of a jejunium, hence the later declaration: "qui nullatenus jejunare credendi sunt; si ante manducaverint, quam vespertinum celebretur officium" (c. 50 dist. I., de consecr. Theodulphus Aurel. a. 797). Whilst some kept up the fast beyond the day (see DU FRESNE, s. v. superpositio; BINGHAM, origin. eccl., l. XXI., c. I., § 25), others curtailed it, or kept it but partially (SOCR., hist. eccl., V., 22, &c.). The Romish C. subsequently approved of the custom of the 13th cent., terminating the fast at 3 P. M., or, since the 14th cent., at 12 M., allowing a dinner, and a light evening meal (FERRARIS, bibl. canon. s. v. jejunium, Art. I., nro. 16 sqq.). — The fasts observed in the Christian Church were partly transferred from the Synagogue. Fasting was an expression of sorrow connected with other acts of repentance (2 Sam. 12: 16; Daniel 10: 3; Ezra 9: 3; 10: 6; Matt. 6: 16, &c.), and was used as a means of spiritual elevation, and preparation for important religious duties (Matt. 4: 2), and soon, according to Apostolic precedents (Acts 13: 2; 14: 23; 27: 9, &c.), was strictly enjoined. Abuses condemned in the O. T. (Is. 58: 4, &c.; Jer. 14: 11, &c. &c.), were revived. The practice, however, was specially promoted by the Montanists, and through monasticism (see TERTULL., de jejun. adv. psychicos, &c.), and the idea advocated that it was an effectual means of obtaining the pardon of sin. Numerous fasts were instituted, differing in the various churches. We shall notice only such as are still generally observed.

The chief of these, are the Quadragesimal fasts, referring, by Apostolic tradition, to the fasts of Moses (Ex. 34: 28), and to the 40 hours during which our Lord lay in the grave. The original 40 hours fast before Easter, were gradually extended, and acquired canonical sanction (c. 5, Conc. Nic. a. 325 in c. 3, dist. XVIII., c. 50, Conc. Laodic. [after 347] in c. 8, dist. III., de consecr., &c. Comp. can. 65, 68, Apostolorum). In the 4th cent. the fasts before Easter lasted for three weeks; in Illyria, Achaia, Alexandria, &c., seven weeks (EUSEB., H. E., V., 24. SOCR., V., 21. SOZOM., VII., 19). Subsequently seven weeks were kept in Rome also (cfr. JEROME, ep. 27 [al. 54] ad Marcellam, and LEO I., sermo 43 de quadrig. 6). But as they did not fast on Sunday (c. 7, dist. 30, Concil. Gangrense [c. 365] c. 15, dist. 3, de consecr. Conc. Cæsaraugust, a. 380, &c.), there were but 36 actual fast-days; hence the fast was made to begin on the Wednesday of the preceding week (Ash-Wednesday) as a caput jejunii (c. 16, dist. 5, de consecr. cit.). This became the rule, although some commenced the fast with Septuagesima week (DU FRESNE, s. h. v. RANKE, d. kirchl. Perikopensystem.: Berlin, 1847, p. 293). In imitation of the Quadrig. before Easter, a similar fast was for a time observed before Christmas (Quadrig. Martini), and before St. John the Baptist's day (DU FRESNE, l. c. See especially BURCHARD, of Worms († 1025) Decr. lib. 19, c. 5).

The custom of fasting on certain days of the week is very ancient (Luke 18: 12; see preceding Art.), especially on Wednesday and Friday, the days of our Lord's betrayal and crucifixion (see TERTULL., de jejun. c. 2). These were called dies stationum, by comparing the life of a Christian with that of a soldier watching at his post (TERTULL., de orat., c. 14). We find later allusions, also, to these days (as in c. 16, dist. 3, de consecr., from RUFIN., † 410. PHILOSTROCH., hist. l., 10, c. 12). But fasting on Sabbath, in case of a superpositio, was customary in the 4th cent., and formally allowed in Spain (c. 26, Concil. Eliberit., a. 305, ed. Bruns II., 5). It was practised even in Rome under Innocent I., 416 (c. 13, dist. 3, de consecr.). Wednesday was now dropped as a fast day. The Greek C. always disapproved of it. The usage of the West was confirmed by Greg. VII., 1078 (c. 31 dist. 5, de consecr.), and his successors (see Bened. XVI., de Synod. dioces. l., 11, c. 5). — In further imitation of the Jews (see preced. Art.) four special annual fasts were instituted (tradition says first by the Roman B. Callistus, † 223, at least for the 4th, 7th, and 10th months). In the time of Leo I. (after 440) these were assigned to the 1st, 4th, 7th, and 10th months. Thus originated the ember days, fixed upon the Wednesdays following Ash-Wednesday, Whitsuntide, the feast of the Holy Cross, and St. Lucia's day (see HARTZHEIM, Conc. Germ., I., 74, and Capit. I., a. 769, c. 11). — The vigilia (see Art.) were also fast days.

There were also extraordinary fasts, appointed for special occasions, and voluntary fasts jejunia votiva. They might also be public or private. (Cfr. c. 4, 5, Cod. Theod. de quæst. [IX. 25], and c. 6, Cod. Just. de feriis [III. 12]). — Abstinence consisted in not eating meat, or any strong food (c. 6, § 2, dist. 4, Greg. I.). The mode of its observance rests upon special custom (FERRARIS, l. c.), upon dispensations, or upon the annual orders of Bishops. (See KOPP, d. kathol. Kirche im 19ten. Jahrh.: Mainz., 1830). Abstinence becomes obligatory after the 7th year, fasting after the 21st (FERRARIS, l. c., Art. II.), unless special vows have been made. Aged and feeble persons, and such as would be disqualified for their duties, are not bound to strict fasting. Other good works may be substituted for fasting (FERRAR., l. c., and c. 24, dist. 5, de consecr. Regula monach. ex Hieron. exc.). It is allowed to casuistry to accommodate the rules to peculiar circumstances. And yet the Council of Trent urged the strict enforcement of all rules for the mortification of the flesh (§ 25, in the decr. de delectu ciborum, &c.).

The Romish C. exercises leniency in enforcing fasts upon its Oriental members, but rejects the regulations of the Greek C., as this does those of Rome. The Greek C. and its various divisions have rules for fasting differing from each other; but all are strictly obeyed. The ancient dies stationum are retained, excepting between Christmas and the Epiphany, during the third week after the Epiphany (in opposition to the Armenians), and in the weeks following Easter and Whitsuntide. But its principal fasts are: 1) ἡ τεσσαρακοστή, before Easter, based on Matt. 4: 2; — 2) a like term before Christmas (from Nov. 15 to Dec. 24), based on Ex. 34: 28; — 3) the fast of Mary (ἡ νηστεία τῆς δεοράου from Aug. 1 to 15; — 4) the Apostles' fast, from the day after Whitsuntide to June 29, old style. Besides these there are vigilia and some extraordinary fasts (see FERRARIS, l. c.; v. MURALT, Briefe über d. Gottesdienst d. morgenl. Kirche. Lpz. 1838).

The Reformers were by no means averse to fasts, but simply restored the original conception of them, and rejected the notion of their being meritorious (see LUTHER's Comm. on Matt. 6: 16. CALVIN's Instit. l. 4, c. 12, § 14, &c. Augsb. Conf., art. 26, and Apol. art. 8; Schmalcald. art. 3, 15; Conf. Helv., II., art. 24; Bohem. art. 18; Galic. art. 24, &c.). The history of the Reformation, especially that of the "Churches under the Cross," furnishes evidence that prayer and fasting are among the best means to strengthen Christians for seasons of tribulation. In the 16th cent. general fasts were regularly ordered by the evangelical Synods of the Lower Rhine, Holland, and France (see ARMON, tous les synodes nationaux: à la Haye, 1710, 4to. T. I., p. 6). Subsequently they occurred more rarely, and were commonly combined with days of humiliation and prayer. In some churches the pulpit and altar were draped in black during the Quadragesima, and no marriages allowed, except by special privilege.—(See J. H. BOEHMER, de jure circa jejunantes, abstinentes et jejunos: Ulmæ, 1722, 4to., and his jus eccl. Protest. l. 3, tit. 46. AUGUSTI, Denkwürdigk., &c., X., 311–420. BINTERIM, Denkwürdigk., &c., II., 2, 589–632; V., 2, 3–168. HELFERT, Darstellung d. Rechte welche in Anschauung d. heil. Handlungen stattfinden., § 87–95. ALT, d. christ. Cultus, p. 518, &c.). H. F. JACOBSON.*

Fastidius, Priscus, a native of Britain, according to Gennadius, a British Bishop, some even say a Metropolitan of London, lived at the beginning of the 5th cent. His work, ad Fatalium de vita Christiana et viduitate colenda, occupies a prominent rank among the few literary remains of the ancient British Church. It may be found, anonymously, among Augustin's works, Vol. 9, p. 888, and was published with F.'s name, by L. Holstenius, Rome, 1653, by Gennadius in 2 Books, by Baleus in 4: (1) de vita chr.; 2) de doctrina spiritus; 3) de viduitate servanda; 4) admonitiones piarum). The Benedictines, and Tillemont (Mém. XV., 16), blamed it for the tendency in Britain to Pelagianism. Tillem. says that though somewhat defective in style and language, the work was rather well written. F. did not write the Chron. Sclorum.—(See CAVE, hist. lit., I., 401). PRESSER.*

Fatalism, from Fatum, what is irrevocably decreed, is the belief in the Omnipotence of blindly-ruling destiny. In Latin it has the passive form, what is allotted; expressed in Greek by ἑμαρμένη. The word Μοῖρα, though like ἄἴσα denoting originally a passive sense, has also an active meaning. Thus considered Moira is the last monotheistic expression of the Pagan-Greek view of the world, and indicates the unity that binds together the various members of the Greek Olympus. With Homer, however, the word has a double signification, as being sometimes superior to Zeus (according to the partial view of Harless, Müller, Bernhardt, Ulrici), and sometimes inferior (according to the equally partial view of Lange, Nitzsch, Göttling, Schmalfeld). This two-foldness of meaning is rightfully explained by Nägelsbach, who says that, whilst Homer did not place the monarchical will of Zeus in direct opposition to that of the other gods, there was at work in heathenism a tendency which sought to subject its heavenly hierarchy to the influence of a single power, and that, in order to make this of practical avail, Homer identified it with the highest god. As the Greeks progressed in philosophy they denoted by Μοῖρα the single supreme power in the government of the world, as in Herod. I, 91, τὴν πεπωμένην μοῖραν ἀδυνατῆσαι ἀποφυγεῖν καὶ θεῶν, and in Schiller's Ring of Polykr. the το δεῖον φθονερὸν. As heathenism was not able to sunder the connection that obtains between human life and higher powers, whether good or bad, it was led to spiritualize the idea of fate, as may be seen in Anaxagoras, who regards the Νοῦς as the ruler of the world, the divine energy of Plato, particularly in Philebus (31, 4, ἐν τῇ τε Διὶ φύσει βασιλικὴν μὲν ψυχὴν, βασιλικὸν δὲ νῦν ἐγγίγνεσθαι), and in Timæus, and in the contemporaneous tragedians of whom Sophocles is worthy of special mention, in whose Oedipus rex, though fore-ordination is ascribed to fate, human responsibility is not destroyed nor human guilt effaced. From the time of Soph. when the Greek view of the world had attained its zenith, the two conceptions embodied in Μοῖρα were sundered, and developed in extremes. On the one hand, from Euripides to the Epicureans, there existed a tendency which, subjecting the idea of fate to the caprices and whims of mortals, put in its stead a blind chance, whilst, on the other, the philosophy of the stoics reduced everything divine to the boldest, most frigid naturalism which taught that wisdom consisted in resignation to the inevitable course of nature.—Two thoughts lie at the basis of every system of fatalism: 1) Destiny is a dead, blind force; 2) Human freedom is an absolute nullity. Mohammedanism combines them both, and they have found more or less favor among the advocates of Christianity. Leaving out of view the doctrine of extreme predestination which, with its absolutum decretum (Luther in his de servo arbitrio, also Calvin, comp. Verf. Abhandl. über Prädest. in Ullmann's u. Umbrechts Studien, 1847, 1, 2), approximates the Pagan notion of Fatum, we may say that fatalism, in its common sense, has its basis 1) in the Pantheistic view of the world which, destroying the freedom of man, makes his thinking and acting the thinking and acting of God through him, and so passes over 2) to the Determinism of Deism which admits nothing higher, in the world's government, than the laws of nature, and to that materialism which regards thought as a secretion of the brain. In direct opposition to all such Fatalism, Christianity (see Art.) teaches 1) that God is not blind chance, or dead fate, or a dark power of nature, but a Spirit, a living Being, the Father of love, and that he has, therefore, invested man, made in his image, with freedom in the exercise of which he is to aid in the realization of the Divine councils and the re-establishment of God's kingdom on earth.

Nägelsbach, homerische Theol., 1840. Preller, Art. Fatum in Pauly's Encyclop., Gruppe, Ariadne, 1834, C. L. Roth, Rede am Geburtsfest des Königs., 1852, im Correspondenzbl. für die gel. Schulen Württembergs.

CARL BECK. — Ermentrout.

Faustinus, Presbyter and Luciferian at Rome in the 4th cent. From Migne's Patrologia, T. XIII., p. 38–108, who published his entire works, we learn that, after the decease of Pope Liberius (352–366), having espoused the cause of Ursinus he met with the tragical fate that overtook his adherents. Gennadius (de cir. illustr., c. 11) informs us that he wrote seven books against the Arians and the Macedonians. Tillemont first vindicated in favor of T. the authorship of the work attributed to Gregorius Bäticus. His Fides, dedicated to the Emp. Theodosius, was composed, according to Mabillon, between 379 and 381. His libellus precum, in which he attacks the Romish bishops, Hilarius and Damasus, was written in defence of his party between 383 and 384; dedicated to Emp. Valentinian and Arcadius. In his first treatise, de trinitate sive de fide contra Arianos, whilst pointing out the deviation of the Arians from the orthodox faith, he combats their assertion that the Son was created out of nothing, ascribes to the Son omnipotence and unchangeableness, and affirms, in conclusion, that the Holy Ghost is no creature. In his Fides he thus details the creed of his party: "We believe in one Father, who is not the Son, but has begotten—not created—the Son from eternity; in one Son who is not the Father, but from whom he is begotten, not created; in one Holy Ghost, who is in fact the Spirit of God. We confess at the same time to one substance of the Divine Trinity." He was equally opposed to the Apollinarians. In answer to the request in his libellus precum, that persecution might cease, Theodosius issued a rescript granting toleration to the Luciferian Bishops, Gregorius and Heraclidus, and affirming: Sciant cuncti id sedere animis nostris, ut cultores omnipotentis dei non aliud nisi catholicos esse credamus.

PRESSEL. — Ermentrout.

Faustus, the Manichean, born at Mileve, in Numidia, Bishop of the African Manicheans, and contemporary of Augustine, was a man of great natural talent, address, and eloquence, and, though pluming himself on his wisdom, was possessed of some natural candor and benevolence. One of the chiefs of his party, and regarded by the sect generally as an oracle, he was sought out by Augustine himself, who, entertaining a high opinion of his merits, desired from him a solution of the doubts that troubled his spirit. A nearer acquaintance soon convinced him that his knowledge was neither extensive nor profound, and that his facility of speech did but serve to conceal the superficiality of his acquirements. In reply to F., who wrote a treatise in defence of Manicheism, and against the dogmas and institutions of the Church, particularly the Bible, Augustine undertook its refutation in his 33 books, contra Faustum (written 400) which are specially important, as they contain complete sections of F.'s work. See August., Conf. V., 3, 5, 6, 7, de Civ., D. XV., Retract., II., 7, c. Faust. l. XXXIII., ed. Paris, Tom. VIII., and Schröckh, K.-Gesch., XI., p. 289; Neander, Ch. Hist.; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. and Art. Manicheism.

WAGENMANN. — Ermentrout.

Faustus of Rhegium (Reji, Rhiez, Regiensis, Rejensis), one of the chief defenders of Semipelagianism, was born in Britain (early in the 5th cent.), studied philosophy and rhetoric. He was a monk at Lerinum, and Abbot in 434, Bishop of Reji, or Rhegium, in Provence, 454 or 455, banished 481, by the West. Gothic King, Eurich, returned in 484, and died at an advanced age (about 493).—In the troubled period of the migration of nations, and a dominant Arianism, he labored not only for the spread of Christianity and ascetic piety, but composed treatises against the Monophysites, the Arians, and Macedonians, and on various practical and dogmatic questions, such as repentance on a death-bed, the condition of the soul after death, the nature of the soul, also homilies, or sermones ad monachos.—The presbyter Lucidus having, in 474, publ. an extreme representation of the Augustinian doctrine of grace, freedom, and fore-ordination, Faustus called upon him to retract. L. having fully done this at (or after) the Synod of Arles, 476 (see Mansi, T. VII., p. 1007; Rössler, Bibl. d. K. V., X., p. 326), F. further developed in his de gratia Dei et humanæ mentis libero arbitrio, libr. II., the ideas he had presented in his epistola ad Lucidum.—Desirous of avoiding extreme views, both in anthropology and christology, he combatted alike the doctrine of Pelagius and the so-called Predestinarians. Whilst entering a decided protest against absolute predestination which he regarded as Pagan fatalism, he distinguished (according to Scripture) in de vocatione gentium between the gratia generalis, i. e., the religious nature given originally to man and not destroyed by sin, and the gratia specialis, i. e., the effect of Christianity. Though grace in general precedes human merit, its operation is conditioned by the action of the human will and the use of the Divine means, and, indeed, the human will, "Deo ita ordinante gratias speciales præcedit," so that it may often begin the work of salvation.—Though this treatise obtained considerable favor in Southern France, its views (Semipelagian) were condemned by the Synods of Orange and Valence and the Romish bishops.—(No complete edit. of F.'s works: to be found—text rather incorrect—in the Greek, Patrist. Coll. e. g. Biblioth. Patr. Magna T., V. P. III., p. 500, sqq. Bibl. Lugdun., VIII., 525, sqq.; Extracts in Rössler, Bibl. d. K. V., X., p. 280. Comp. CELIER, hist. générale des auteurs sacr. et eccl., T. XV., p. 157, sqq.; Hist. liter. de la France par de relig. Bened., T. II., p. 585; NEANDER, Ch. Hist.; WIGGERS, Augusti and Pelag., II., p. 224, 238. Comp. Art. Semipelagianism).

WAGENMANN. — Ermentrout.

Fear of God.—The fact that no mention is made of this religious affection until immediately after the fall (Gen. 3: 10), is decisive of its true import. From this fact it seems to be intimately associated with conscience (see Appendix to Vol. II.), and the O. T. economy is the scene of its chief activity. The first relation of man to God is that of fear, based upon a sense of dependence (see Art.) connected with a consciousness of sin. Man knows that the God upon whom he is wholly dependent, whose power is unlimited, whose eye seeth in secret, who trieth the heart and the reins, hates sin, and will punish it, as a jealous God, unto the third and fourth generation. This fear, therefore, is urged as a proper motive to piety (Ex. 1 : 17 ; Deut. 6 : 2 ; Prov. 3 : 7 ; 14 : 2), and piety is its synonym. (Prov. 1 : 7 ; Job 28 : 28 ; Ps. 19 : 9), whilst the simple term "fear" is used to designate the entire feeling of "fear of God" (Job 15 : 4). Hence the common belief that if any one should see the thrice Holy God he would die (Ex. 33 : 20, &c.). And yet the piety of the O. T. involved a filial confidence in God, delight in God, in his law and worship, as many Psalms prove. In the O. T., also, we find the law of love (Deut. 6 : 5). The fear of God was also balanced by the hope of a future redemption (Jer. 31 : 31-34). Thus the original stand-point of O. T. piety was wholly transcended. Fear was combined with filial confidence, supreme love, and inspiring hope, until the relation of sonship was attained (Deut. 32 : 6 ; Hos. 11 : 1 ; Is. 1 : 3 ; 63 : 16 ; 64 : 8). But as this relation was based not in a consciousness of the atonement, but upon the covenant relationship of God to his people, and inasmuch as this filial relation was chiefly employed to exhibit the sin of the people in its fearfulness, the sense of it did not carry the people beyond the spirit of fear; and this becomes more evident as the law of love is seen to have remained a mere injunction. — First under the N. T. economy of the atonement is fear found to yield to affectionate confidence. There are passages which seem to use the term in the O. T. sense. Thus in Acts 9 : 31. But even there the writer adds the explanatory words: καὶ τῇ παρακλήσει τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος ἐκλήθοντο. So far as sin may still appear in the life of the redeemed, and danger of forfeiting grace exists, fear maintains its place (2 Cor. 5 : 11 ; 7 : 1, &c. ; Heb. 12 : 28, 29 ; cfr. Matt. 10 : 28). But the more the spirit of bondage yields in the heart to the consciousness of adoption — the more love to God who first loved us predominates — the more will fear give way to filial reverence (Rom. 8 : 15 ; 2 Tim. 1 : 7 ; 1 John 4 : 18). That which wrought naturally in primeval man, before the fall, operates in a moral religious manner in the sphere of redemption. On the other hand, some Christians who were only outwardly converted, fell back into the O. T., and even pagan sphere of religion. The natural man, although nominally Christianized, could not reach the high ground of Gospel grace. This is seen most clearly in the saint-worship of the Romish C. (see Eck). Hence that Church has lowered the Eucharist, emphatically a feast of love — to a mysterium tremendum. FROMMÜLLER.*

Feeling. — It is the design of this article to furnish a historical sketch of the import and conception of feeling within the sphere of religion. We define feeling to be the immediate consciousness of the soul of itself and its activities. When this consciousness pertains to the mere state or condition of the soul the feeling is subjective; when it pertains to its spiritual activities the feeling is objective. — In the ancient Greek classics αἰσθησις designates every kind of perception, sensuous and spiritual, mediate and immediate, as well as what we call feeling. The recognition of an objective feeling is involved especially in the Platonic doctrine of the philosophical Ἔρως; what he desires is a clear perception, which, however, he must already dimly possess, in order to understand it. Plato also knew of a sensuous spiritual feeling, though he does not thus designate it, for he makes the νοῦς participate in ἐπιθυμητικόν, and the seat of this participation is the liver, whence proceed μαρτεία and ἐνδοκασμός. With this is connected the Platonic doctrine that virtue cannot be taught (ep. 7, p. 460, ed. Becker). — The broad use of the Latin sensus likewise comprehends natural moral feeling, sensus communis, sensus hominum.

The LXX. often uses αἰσθησις in the sense of "insight" (Prov. 1 : 4, and 7, where Symmachus has γνῶσις, Wisdom 20 : 17). It occurs but once in the N. T., Phil. 1 : 9, and there with ἐπίγνωσις. — In the patristic age the usus loq. was not psychologically fixed, but commonly αἰσθησις and sensus were employed where we speak of knowledge obtained through feeling (Orig., c. Cels. 1, 48 ; 7, 34. CLEM., Strom. IV., p. 333, ed. Potter. EUSEB., præp. ev., p. 788, D.). The feeling accompanying will was also expressed by κρίσις (THEOD., H. E., 1, 8. GREG. NYSS., c. Eunom., I., p. 6. JUSTIN., Apol., I., 36. EUSEB., H. E., 5, 13). — The Latin Fathers were anticipated by the prevailing us. loq. of the term sensus. Thus Tertullian speaks of the publicus sensus, quo duce anima Deum datorem suum novit, by which the soul, naturally, has knowledge of eternal truth (de anima, c. 2). Augustine, using a term which had become predominant in the mystical system, speaks of an INTERIOR sensus (de civ. Dei, XI., 27). The mysticism of the West was developed on the basis of Augustine's. It includes subjective and objective feeling under the terms, sensus, sentimentum, affectus, gustus. Bernhard says affectus is spontanea quædam ac dulcis ipsius animi ad Deum inclinatio. Gustus, which is identified with sensus, also mediately involves an impulse, but yet properly designates only feeling as related to itself and its contents, which is, therefore, also called a modus cognoscendi, as is likewise the case with amor. (GERSON, de monte contempl., c. 10: Este sapor seu GUSTUS vel AFFECTUS aut spirituale illud SENTIMENTUM potest dici fore unus modus cognoscendi, quia amor ipse cognitio est). The complete directness of this sensus far transcends rational insight (Hugo St. V., f. 378, c. 1, 2 ed.: Par., 1526). And because mystical theology rests in feeling it differs from all other sciences (GERSON, de myst. Theol. præl., cons. 8). Not only mystical theology, but theology and faith in general, rest, according to THOMAS (but not Scotus) in a pia affectio, since a motus voluntatis ad primam veritatem et summum bonum, which begets assensus, is essential to faith (Summ. theol., II., 2, 9, 4, 5).

The German mediæval mysticism, in its practical way, speaks of feeling as a subjective consciousness, and demands its renunciation. (Thus ECKARD in Tauler's Predigten, 1826, I., p. 100). As Abraham was required to forsake his kindred, so must the spiritual man tear loose from all emotions, from joy, sorrow, &c. (Tauler, l. c., 93). This done he can penetrate the depths of the Godhead, and "enjoy fully the presence of God, and thoughts of eternity" (III., 71). Hence the objective feeling of the nearness of the God, who is above all creatures, is the last result of the renunciation of the subjective feeling of creature existence. — The Reformers, who were familiar with the mystics, could not have been unacquainted with the significance of the sphere of feeling for religion. LUTHER sometimes uses "fühlen" of spiritual feeling (as of sin, Is. 59: 12). He often uses the term synonymously with "Empfindung" (as on 1 Cor. 15). He makes the witness of the Spirit to flow through personal experience, and this to consist in feeling (Walch, XII., 1046). MELANCHTHON, on Rom. 8: 10, explains the obsignatio spiritus as, fiducia et lætitia in corde prælucente voce evangelii (see also QUENSTEDT, theol. dogm., III., 572). Very clearly does MELCHIORIS (a Reformed theologian of the 17th cent.), express himself upon this point: Judicium pendet a conscientia a spir. s. excitata, directa, veritatisque amore imbuta, cui se revelata veritas ipsa probat rationibus, quas illa ad se ipsum attendens certas habere potest, atque indubitatas (Opp. de demonstratione, II., 554). — Pietism, like Mysticism, laid special stress upon feeling, because its unutterableness was thought a proof of its purity. Thus SPENER on Rom. 8: 16: "dies Zeugniß ist nun das Fundament des höchsten Tröstes, aber hievon kann wenig geredet werden, denn Niemand verstehet es, als wer es fühlt." This made the orthodox party more suspicious of feeling in religion, and it seems, according to WERNSDORF (disput. II., 253), to have been wholly rejected.

Since the pietistic period many find the surest evidence of regeneration in a sweet experience of the grace of God, which Spener denies in his "letzten Bedenken" (I., 231, 192). But the religious significance of feeling was recognized even outside of pietistic circles, at the beginning of the 18th cent. Thus M. PFAFF, in an appendix to his institut. theol. et moral., treats of the sensus or gustus spiritualis, and does not hesitate to call it, with the Quakers, a lumen spirituale (§ 3). — About 1750, however, Moralism and Utilitarianism acquired influence. In proportion as confidence in the truth of religious thinking vanished, that in the objective contents of feeling also disappeared (see MOSHEIM, Sittenlehre, V., 556). Utilitarianism regarded the discovery of a recipe to keep moths out of carpets, as more valuable than the metaphysics of Leibnitz. The only remaining category for feeling was that of obscure fancies. MENDELSON upon Sensation (Verm. Schr., I., 9) says: "Wir fühlen nicht mehr, sobald wir denken; der Affect verschwindet, sobald die Begriffe aufgeklärt werden" (comp. PLATTNER, Neue Anthropol., § 608. EBERHARD, allg. Theorie d. Denkens, &c. SPALDING's Gedanken über d. Werth d. Gefühle, 1761).

Philosophy opened the way for a better appreciation of the subject. Until Wolf philosophy recognized only two powers of the soul:

the reason and will or desire. TERRENS added feeling as "the inner sense for the agreeable and disagreeable." Thus also KANT, in his Kritik d. Urtheilskraft, s. XXII., says: "Alle Seelenvermögen können auf die dreie zurückgeführt werden, welche sich nicht ferner aus einem gemeinschaftlichen Grund ableiten lassen, das Erkenntnisvermögen, das Gefühl der Lust u. Unlust, und das Begehrungsvermögen." But Kant also directed attention to the fact that in the sphere of aesthetics we discover a relation of feeling to the ideal, hence an objective feeling. FRIES laid hold of this point and affirmed that the aesthetic religious contemplation of creation is based upon feeling, and says: "Von Erkenntnis wissen wir, an das wahre Wesen der Dinge glauben wir, Ahnung lässt uns die Ewigkeit in der Erscheinung erkennen." — Rationalism was constructed under the influence of this doctrine of feeling. It is an error to consider it merely as a system of ratiocination. Some of Wolf's disciples indeed adhered to demonstrative knowledge. But the most prominent representatives of Rationalism — apart from decided adherents of Kant — occupy the stand-point of Fries and Jacobi. It is true they inconsistently affirm that reason must accompany faith, but deny to reason the power to demonstrate supersensuous things. One of the most acute older Rationalists, GÄBLER, defined Religion to be "the feeling of dependence upon the eternal." WEGSCHEIDER also (institut. § 2) contends for a fides religiosa as a sensus quidam necessitatis, and calls this fides the basis of religion; though he likewise pleads for a recta ratio along with the fides. — It was de Wette who introduced Fries' and Jacobi's philosophy of feeling into theology, and he adhered to it through his entire, fertile, literary course. He also cleared up the relation of feeling and will to religion, but made the latter to consist in the aesthetic contemplation of creation, thus confounding religion with art. — Such diverse factors as the spirit of the Moravians, Spinoza, and Jacobi of whom Schleiermacher confesses he learned much, combined to produce S.'s doctrine of feeling, the influence of which still operates in otherwise opposite systems of theology. What S. meant by feeling was often misrepresented by theologians (see WEISSENBORN, Vorlesungen über S.'s Dogmatik, &c., 1847). S. did not make feeling consist merely in the antithesis of pleasure and dislike, in a mere subjective affection, since this involves only a sensuous antithetical self-consciousness. S. indeed expressly denies that immediate self-consciousness is objective, but in doing this merely disputes that any thing may become an object of self-consciousness by an act of reflection. He affirms, rather, that "in jedem Selbstbewusstseyn sind zwei Elemente, ein Seyn und ein Irgendwiegewordenseyn; das letzte also setzt für jedes Selbstbewusstseyn ausser dem Ich noch etwas Andres voraus, woher die Bestimmtheit desselben ist, und ohne welches das Selbstbewusstseyn nicht gerade dieses seyn würde." Now in our self-consciousness we find a feeling of direct dependence, and that to which our reflection traces this dependence we call God. Thus through feeling we acquire our first realization of God (Glan- benslehre, I., § 4), "Vermittelst des religiösen Gefühls ist der Urgrund ebenso in uns gesetzt, wie in der Wahrnehmung die Dinge in uns gesetzt sind" (Dialektik, p. 430).—This theory was vindicated and further developed by Twisten, and especially NITZSCH. Nitzsch shows (System d. chr. Lehre, § 10) that notwithstanding Hegel's violent assault upon the theory of S., there are points of contact between the two systems.

THELUCK.*

Felicissimus.—Some of the clergy having been dissatisfied with the selection of Cyprian as Bishop of Carthage, there soon sprang up a contentious rivalry between the presbyter-system represented by them and the episcopal authority exercised by Cyprian. The presbyter Novatus having, without any understanding with the Bishop, nominated Felicissimus Deacon in his church, C. regarded such conduct as an invasion of his rights, but acquiesced in it. During the Decian persecution, and whilst the Bishop was away from Carthage, some of the presbyters received into Church-communion the lapsos on the strength of the libellos pacis of the martyrs. Having sent a commission to Carth. which had to do with the conduct of the lapsi and the obtaining of some church-money, Fel. regarding the administration of the treasury as one of the functions of the diaconate, protested against C.'s action, and refused communion to any who might appear before the commission. Five Presbyters and a large portion of the confessors espoused his views. On C.'s return, 251, Fel., with his clerical adherents, was excommunicated. The controversy, however, did not end. F.'s party elected Fortunatus Bishop, and dispatched him to Rome to secure the support of Bishop Cornelius. In no long time, however, the strife ceased, and the Episcopal element came off conqueror.—Comp. die ausführlichen Untersuch. bei Walch, Ketzerhist., II., 288–310. Neander, Ch. Hist. Rettberg, Cyprian, 89–138. KLAIBER.—Ermentrout.

Felix, the Manichean, an Elder of his sect, was a contemporary of Augustine, and a shrewd, though illiterate man. He came to Hippo to spread his errors there. Augustine disputed with him in the church for the space of two days before the congregation. The proceedings, taken down by notaries, are given in detail in two books (August. Opp.: Par., 1688; Benedict. ed., Tom. VIII., lib. 2; comp. Retract., 2, 8). The day before, F. had publicly declared that he was willing to be burned along with his books, if anything wrong could be found in them, but during the disputation showed himself timid, weak, vacillating, and ready for flight. He could look, indeed, for no favorable issue, when his books were taken from him and placed under the public seal. Augustine addresses him calmly and without passion, but caused him to feel his dialectic skill and superiority. The contest centered in the famous Epistle of Mani, in which he styles himself an apostle of Jesus Christ. The proof which F. brought to support the claim, that M. was the religious reformer promised by Christ, is singular: "M. has come and shown us, by his preaching, the beginning, the middle, and the end. He has taught us concerning the formation of the world, why it was created, of what, and by whom; he has taught us the cause of day and night; instructed us concerning the course of the sun and the moon. Because we have nothing of this in Paul, and the writings of the other Apostles, we believe that Mani is the Paraclete." Augustine replied thus: "We read nowhere in the Gospel, that the Lord has said, 'I send you the Paraclete to instruct you concerning the course of the sun and moon.' He would have us Christians, not mathematicians. It is enough, if men know as much about these things, as they learn in the schools. Christ has promised that the Paraclete will come to lead us into all truth, but he says nothing about beginning, middle, and end—nothing about the course of the sun and the moon. Or, if you indeed believe, that this doctrine belongs to the truth, which Christ has promised through the Holy Ghost, then I ask you: How many stars are there in heaven? If you have received that Spirit, which is said to teach such things, you must answer to the point."—In like manner he met other objections, and so pressed upon his antagonist, that overpowered by the learning and episcopal dignity of the celebrated Church-doctor, and influenced perhaps also by a fear of the civil law, F. at length gave way and cried out: "Say what you wish, and I will do it." Augustine demanded the anathema, and at the request of F. first pronounced it over Mani, whereupon the vanquished heretic declared in presence of the people: "I, who have hitherto believed in Mani, curse him and the deluding spirit, which was in him, and said, that God had mingled a part of his substance with the kingdom of darkness. All this and the other blasphemies of M. I curse." The protocol was immediately signed by both parties. Possidius in his life of Augustine says, that after the third meeting F. perceived the error of his sect and was converted to the faith of the Church. Consult C. W. F. Walch, Entw. einer vollständigen Hist. d. Ketzereien, I., 802. Neander, Ch. Hist. Gfrörer, allg. K.-G., I., 481. FRONMÜLLER.—Porter.

Felix, the Martyr, and his companion in suffering, Regula, were honored at Zurich as the first proclaimers of Christianity there, and hence as the patron-saints of the city and the two ministers. Their history is highly colored in the legends. It is said they were put to death by order of Decius, the viceroy of the tyrant Maximian. After undergoing horrible tortures, so the story runs, they were beheaded, but immediately rose up and taking their heads into their hands, ascended the hill to the Minster Church; whence they are so represented in the seal of the two minsters and the city of Zurich. In the 13th cent. a third patron was added in the person of Exsuperantius. They have also been associated with the Theban legion, but the connection is doubtful. Consult Rettberg, K.-Gesch. Deutschlands, 1, p. 110, also Proceedings of the Antiquarian Society of Zurich, 1841, v. 1 and 2. DR. PRESSEL.—Porter.

Felix I., a Roman by birth, appears to have occupied the episcopal chair at Rome from about 269–274, although accounts vary. He is said to have ordered annual masses to be celebrated on the graves of the martyrs, a custom, however, which had grown up by degrees of itself. Still, during the persecutions under the cruel Aurelian, he supported with burning zeal the confessors of Christ; according to the legends he buried, in his own person, 342 martyrs. If his name is rightly chronicled in the martyrology of the Roman Church (his day is May 30), he died also in the midst of the same persecution. The law concerning the consecration of churches is more justly referred to Felix III. A fragment of his letter to Bishop Maximus, of Alexandria, contained in the Apologeticus of Cyril, in which he expresses himself against the doctrine of Paul of Samosata, concerning the incarnation of the Logos, is also called in question. The letters ascribed to him in the pseudo-Isidorian collection are certainly not genuine. Life of Anastasius, Platina; Acta Sanct. (Bolland.), April, Pt. 1. Dr. G. Voigt.—Porter.

Felix II. (?).—When, under the Emperor Constantius, the Roman Bishop, Liberius, was driven into exile, because he refused to sign the sentence of condemnation against Athanasius, F., hitherto a deacon in the congregation at Rome, was appointed in his stead, through the influence of the Arian party in the court, but without the consent of the clergy and the people. Nevertheless, he found considerable support among the clergy, even after the return of Liberius, for the latter, weary of banishment, conformed to the will of the Emperor, and coming back Aug. 2, 358, induced his rival to retire after a pontificate of three years. The supposition that both, at the desire of the Emperor, shared for a time the episcopal chair, is untenable. The further fortunes of F. are very variously told; according to Jerome, he made use of the dissatisfaction of his party with the wretched subserviency of Liberius, to regain his seat by force; according to Sozomen, he was formally banished by the Emperor; according to others, he lived till Nov. 22, 365, in retirement at Porto. The Acta Martyrum, which assign to him a saint's day (July 29) cannot be reconciled with the better Church-historians. Hence the annalists and canonists have been compelled to invent for him the strangest subterfuges. The confirmation of his saintly character by Gregory XIII., 1582, is remarkable, because Baronius had spoken very decidedly against his claims. Indeed it is doubtful, whether he should be counted in the line of Roman Bishops, or regarded only as an antipope. Baronius, l. c.; Fleury, Historia ecclesiast. liv. XIII.; Bower's History of the Popes.

Dr. G. Voigt.—Porter.

Felix III. was elected Pope through the influence of Odoacer, in March, 483. He boldly seized the opportunity of acting as umpire in the controversies of the Oriental Church. The Constantinopolitan Emperor had, by the advice of his patriarch, Acacius, attempted to reconcile and win over the Monophysites by an act of union (henoticon). The Roman Bishop headed the zealous opposers of this measure. In a convocation of 67 bishops he solemnly deposed and excommunicated Acacius, and rejected also the offers of compromise from the successors of that patriarch, as long as his name stood on the books of the Church. This was the occasion of the first schism, of 34 years, between the Latin and Greek churches. F. died Feb. 25, 492.—Acta Sanct., Febr. T. III. (Feb. 25); Bower, III., 85.

Dr. G. Voigt.—Porter.

Felix IV., consecrated July 12, 526, died Sept., 530. Little is known of him. His elevation to the apostolic chair occurred after a vacancy of almost 2 months, and at a time when party-epirit threatened to overthrow St. Peter's chair. The Arian, Theodoric the Great, regarding it as an extraordinary circumstance, restored the right of choice to the clergy and people, reserving only to the civil power the authority to ratify.—Baron., Annal. eccl.; Pagi, Crit. in Annal. Baronii.

Dr. G. Voigt.—Porter.

Felix V., Amadeus (of Savoy), as Pope. After the fruitless attempts of the Councils of Pisa and Constance to carry out a thorough reformation of the Church, a new one was called at Basel under Eugenius IV., which, because it took a very decided stand against him, was summoned to Ferrara in 1438. The members, believing themselves absolved from their allegiance by this act, deposed the Pope because he had put them under the ban for contumacy, and elected, in 1439, Amadeus VIII., Duke of Savoy, under the name of Felix V. A son of Count Amadeus VII., born Sept. 4, 1383, and carefully educated by his grandmother, who was regent, he had married, in his 18th year, Maria of Burgundy, and, in a tumultuous and bloody age, soon acquired the reputation of a wise, just, and mild prince. Emperor Sigismund raised his earldom (Grafschaft) into a duchy. By envoy he took part in the Council of Constance, and shared (1422) in the crusade against the Hussites. He became no less celebrated by what he did in favor of trade and the administration of justice, than by his preference for a life of religious contemplation. Strengthened in this tendency by various misfortunes, especially the death of his wife, he built, in 1430, a hermitage at Ripaille, on Lake Lemán, and divided his time between the business of State and solitary devotion. In Nov., 1434, he placed the reins of government in the hands of his son Louis, and assumed the garb of an anchorite. In Nov., 1439, the Council of Basel, although he had repeatedly protested against the deposition of Eugenius IV., elected him Pope, trusting that so just and wise a prince would put an end to the confusion. Only the wish to restore peace to the Church overcame his scruples and induced him to accept the dignity. He adopted the title of Felix V., and entered Basel on the 24th of June, 1440, with great splendor. For the space of three years, from Lausanne and Geneva, he conducted, by his cardinals, the Council of Basel, and was acknowledged as Pope by many countries and princes, as France, Spain, Switzerland, Austria, Hungary, Bohemia, Savoy, and Piedmont, whilst the Emperor Frederic, the electoral princes and others remained neutral, and only in 1447 sided with Eugenius, won over by the grant of certain privileges. The successor of Eugenius, Nicolas V., was just as little inclined to yield. At length Felix consented to withdraw, on condition that the bulls issued by Eugenius and Nicolas against his followers should be revoked, and the measures pursued by him confirmed. Nicolas accepted these terms. Having thus ended the schism, and restored peace to the Church by resigning the papal dignity, he retired to his beloved hermitage at Ripaille, with the rank of Cardinal-legate and permanent Vicar-general of the Papal See in Savoy, Basel, Strassburg, and some other places. He died at Geneva, Jan. 7, 1451, justly styled by his contemporaries, the peacemaker, the Solomon of his age. — Guichenon, histoire geneal. de la roy. maison de Savoye, 1660. Ferrerii, reg. Sabaudæ domus arbor. 1702. Aen. Sylvii, commentar. de gestis Concil. : Basil, 1577. HARTMANN. — Porter.

Felix (in TACIT. Hist., V., 9, Antonius Felix, in SUIDAS, Claudius F., in JOSEPH. and TACIT. Ann. XII., 54, simply Felix), was the freedman of Emperor Claudius (Suet., Claud., 28), who appointed him about 52 or 53 A. D., procurator of Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and Perea. His predecessor was Vent. Cumanus, whom Claudius banished (Jos. B. J., II., 12, 6, 7). Tacitus, whose minute accounts seem reliable, says (Ann., l. c.) he was previously associated with Cumanus as governor of Samaria. This will explain the "many years" in Acts 24 : 10. Felix was the brother of Pallas, a man of great influence at the court of Claudius, and for a time under Nero (Jos. B. J., II., 12, 8; XX., 7, 1; Tac., Ann. XIV., 65). Probably Pallas secured F.'s continuance in office under Nero. F. was a reckless and cruel ruler (Ann. XII., 54; Hist. V., 9), although Tertullus flattered him (Acts 24 : 3). His energy was chiefly directed against the robbers and seditious Jews (Jos. B. J., II., 13, 3, 6; Ant. XX., 8, 5). By "robbers" Jos. means also the seditious Jewish patriots of that period, of whom he crucified hundreds. The seditious prophets of that day also gave F. trouble, especially one from Egypt, who had many followers, and even threatened to take Jerusalem. F. put four hundred of his adherents to death. But even F.'s severity failed to quell rebellion (Tac., Ann. XII., 54; Jos. B. J., II., 13, 6).—Paul was brought before Felix (Acts 23 : 24, 25; see Drusilla), and unjustly imprisoned by him for two years. When Porcius Festus was appointed F.'s successor, the Jews accused Felix before Nero, who, however, allowed him to escape for his brother's sake. — The Magician Simon, a Jew of Cyprus, is called by Jos. Ant., XX., 7, 2, a friend of Felix.—(See Comm. de Fel. Judææ procur., quam præc., C. G. F. Walchio disquisitioni subjecit resp. J. D. Claudius: Jena, 1747, 4to.). H. PARET.*

Felix of Nola, Confessor, lived and labored in N. (noted as the city where Augustus died, and where church bells were invented), where he was born, and served the Church as a presbyter about the time of the Decian persecution. After being deprived of his possessions, he supported himself by husbandry. During the persecution he hid himself in an opening of an old wall, over which a spider wove a web, and so concealed him from his pursuers. As early as the 5th cent. pilgrims visited his shrine, at which wonders were said to be wrought. Even Augustine sent ecclesiastics to it, from Africa, to make their vow of purity. REUCHLIN.*

Fénélon.—Francis de Salignac de La Motte Fénélon, a younger son of the Marquis de Féné-

lon, was born Aug. 6, 1651, at the castle Fénélon in Perigord (the present dep. Dordogne). He received a plain Christian education, and was trained to act conscientiously and upon principle. His parents were pious and upright, and reared him accordingly, so that his natural talents and noble heart were early improved by the practice of self-denial and humility. In his quiet rural home he was taught the ancient classics. Early destined for the Church, he was sent, in his twelfth year, to the neighboring University of Cahors, where he pursued his studies with great success. At eighteen he finished his academic course, and returned home. His uncle Anthony, Marquis de Fénélon, an able statesman, invited him to Paris, where the young Abbé, only nineteen years old, preached several times with extraordinary acceptance. His prudent uncle, perceiving the temptation to which the youth was thus exposed, induced him to enter St. Sulpice, a seminary for educating priests, where he earnestly and devoutly performed the duties assigned him by the superior, the Abbé Tronson, for five years. In his 24th year he was consecrated priest. Thenceforth he labored with humble zeal in the parish of St. Sulpice. From this post the Archbishop of Paris called him to the office of superior of the "Nouvelles Catholiques," a society of young women of rank who devoted themselves to the instruction of the daughters of Protestants in Rom. Cath. doctrines. He was admirably adapted for this service, and made many proselytes. The results of his experience here, he published in his treatise: De l'éducation des filles, in which he ably develops the principles, &c., of a Christian education. — During this period F. sought to improve his scientific attainments by making Bossuet's acquaintance. Though much younger than B., they became warm friends. F.'s activity as superior attracted notice, his catechetical lectures were largely attended, and his eloquence filled his hearers with admiration. Louis XIV. resolved to use F.'s talents for the accomplishment of his scheme of uniting France in one faith. He offered F. the mission of converting the Reformed of Poitou, with the aid of a military corps. Fénélon accepted the mission, but only on condition that he should go without the soldiers; he desired no other arms but the apostolic weapons, the sword of the Spirit, and the power of grace. This point was yielded; F., with four attendants, among whom was Fleury, went to Poitou, labored indefatigably, though with mildness, and won the sincere respect of the Reformed, if he did not succeed in inducing many to renounce their faith. On returning from this mission he resumed his superiorship, but immediately fell under the suspicion of Protestant tendencies. He quietly pursued his duties, merely publishing his polemical treatise: Sur le ministère des pasteurs, in which he denies the divine authority of the Protestant ministry, because the right of appointment to the office does not belong to the people, and because Protestant clergy are not in the line of episcopal succession. The argument is skilfully managed, but upon entirely Romish principles.

In 1689 Louis XIV. appointed F. tutor of his grandsons, of Louis, Duke of Burgundy (born Aug. 6, 1682), the Duke of Anjou (afterwards King of Spain), and the Duke de Berry, whilst his friend, Duke de Beauvilliers, was appointed governor of the princes, and other distinguished men (including Fleury) were employed as teachers. F. was the soul of this college. He realized the responsibility of his trust, carefully studied the character of his pupils, sought to win their confidence, especially that of the heir-presumptive, and properly to mould his moral character. Nor did he labor in vain.—Although surrounded by the pride and gaieties of the royal court, he shunned its vices and lived in the strict observance of his devotional duties. As a proof of his humility and disinterestedness we find that whilst public opinion assigned to him each eccl. dignity that became vacant, he was passed by, and almost forgotten by the King, until the Abbey of St. Valerius, and then (1694) the Archb. of Cambrai were conferred upon him. On receiving the latter dignity, he resigned the Abbey, to Louis' surprise.—But with this elevation came a series of conflicts and humiliations. He became acquainted with Madame Guyon (see Art.) in 1687, and gradually a sincere, pure friendship was formed between them. When Madame G.'s writings were subjected to a theological censorship, F. was put on the committee of examination, and at the close urged by Bossuet to sign his Instruction sur les états d'oraison, directed against her views. F. conscientiously refused, and this so displeased Bossuet that he not only broke friendship with F., but bitterly persecuted him. F. had never fully approved of Madame Guyon's views, but merely vindicated her motives. In 1697 he published his Maximes des Saintes, in which he showed: 1) that love to God is to love him for his own sake, apart from any happiness found in him; 2) that in the life of the most advanced Christian, love excels, animates, and controls all other virtues. The doctrine of quietism was, however, found lurking in the book. Two parties arose regarding it in Paris, Bossuet, as the leader of a powerful party, violently assailed it. F. exercised forbearance and meekness upon the Scriptural rule: "in quietness shall be your strength." Still he was firm. Louis was swayed by Bossuet, and F. was asked to retire from the court to his See. About the same time his palace at Cambrai was burned down, and many valuable papers, with his library, destroyed. "I would rather," said he, "see my palace consumed than the hovel of one of my poor parishioners."—What most grieved F. was that his best friends had to suffer for him, and that suspicions were excited against his moral character. But he endured the trial with patience and resignation. The entire nation sympathized with him; only at Versailles, and in Paris, there were some who rejoiced over his humiliation. At Cambrai he was received with joy. He began to devote himself earnestly to his episcopal duties, seeking in every way to promote the spiritual interests of his diocese. He removed the seminary for priests from near Valenciennes to Cambrai, that he might have personal supervision over it. His sermons were not the product of hard study, but of meditation and prayer, and flowed with evangelical simplicity from a full heart. His life corresponded with his preaching. He was severe towards himself, mild towards others. He appropriated nearly all his income to beneficent purposes. And notwithstanding his manifold official labors, he lived a life of faith, hid with Christ in God.—The only interruptions to his peaceful life sprang from the controversy which drove him from the court, and which was kept up between Bossuet and himself. Much was written by both, and with ever growing severity. F. referred the matter to the Pope. Bossuet, with the Archb. of Paris, Cardinal Noailles, and the B. of Chartres, laid a declaration concerning the "Maximes," &c., before the Papal Nuncio, in which F. was heavily accused. Deductions were drawn from the Maximes of which F. had not thought. But he answered every objection.—Whilst the Maximes were under examination at Rome, an unexpected blow was inflicted on F. in Paris. The Sorbonne issued a censure of twelve theses derived from the Maximes.—In 1698 Bossuet wrote a full history of the controversy: Relation du quietisme. F. published a successful Réponse. In 1699 F. was stricken from the list of the household of his princely pupil. But the more indignities were heaped upon him, the higher he rose in public estimation.

At length, in 1699, Rome decided against him, but not until powerful influences had been brought to bear upon the case, from Versailles. A papal breve was issued condemning the Maximes on account of 35 errors (not heresies) found in the book. Fénelon keenly felt the humiliation, but submitted at once to the decision. He publicly executed the condemnation of his own book, after having (to preserve the Gallican prerogative) obtained the King's permission. He ordered all copies of the book to be brought to his palace that he might set fire to them with his own hand. Although this course cannot be approved of on evangelical principles, one cannot but admire the complete self-control which it exhibits; and submission to what F. regarded as the supreme authority. Even Bossuet seemed to be assuaged, whilst F. avowed his regard for the spirit and merits of Bossuet. Thus ended the controversy, and history of the Maximes des Saints.

The leisure which he could seize from his official duties, F. devoted to correspondence with his pupil, reminding him of the principles of rectitude and piety. For the same purpose he now collected the fragments of Telemachus, which had been his text-book, arranged and revised the whole, and sent a carefully written copy to the Duke of Burgundy. The copyist fraudulently wrote a duplicate, which found its way to Paris, and was secretly printed, but at once suppressed by the King, appeared however in Holland in June, 1699. The book was soon multiplied by innumerable editions in all European languages, and was read with avidity by all classes. It established his continental reputation, but debarred him forever from the royal court. The work was supposed to contain allusions to Louis XIV., and reproaches upon his reign. That some of F.'s thoughts and delineations were modified by surrounding circumstances is very likely, but it was unjust to charge him with having designed a covered attack upon the King.¹—These literary labors were never allowed to interfere with his official duties, which he ever promptly and faithfully discharged. He showed his spirit, especially in his conduct towards Protestants. For whilst he openly and zealously opposed whatever he thought an error, he was free from all bigotry and bitterness.—In the Jansenist controversies he took an active part, not simply by authoritative interference, but by instruction and argument. He translated and commented upon Augustine's de gratia, and wrote much upon the subject in other forms. By his persuasive earnestness and kindness, he acquired almost equal influence with both parties. When the Unigenitus of 1713 was issued, Louis XIV. asked his opinion as to the best manner of treating the bull; and his publication of it was considered a master-piece, so that even Clement XI. communicated to F. his great satisfaction with it.—F.'s conception of episcopal duties may be gathered, also, from his letter to the Archb. of Rouen, who contemplated the erection of magnificent edifices in Rouen. F. warns him against indulging a spirit of display at variance with the poverty and lowliness of Jesus Christ.—The excellence of F.'s character was most strikingly displayed during the Spanish war of the succession (1701–13) of which his diocese was frequently the scene. He faithfully counselled the Duke of Burgundy to exert himself for the amelioration of the horrors of war. The episcopal palace was thrown open to the people driven from their homes, to the sick and wounded, and in 1709 he supplied the army with food. His pious beneficence and services excited general admiration. And yet all this cost him no severe effort, for the love of God prompted him.—Meanwhile he was afflicted with successive bereavements. First his true and faithful friend, the Abbé de Langeron, died in his arms, in 1710. Shortly afterwards the father of the Duke of Burgundy died, then his wife. Finally the Duke himself was called off. "My bonds are all broken," cried F., "now nothing holds me longer to the earth." After this blow his health failed. He desired to be released from his official responsibilities, and appointed a successor. Suddenly he was seized with a violent sickness, and after suffering six days he fell asleep, whilst some around him were repeating the Lord's prayer in Gethsemane, on Jan. 7, 1715.

There is no complete edition of F.'s works. Some years before the first French revolution an edition was begun, and 9 vols. 4to. (1787–92, Paris) published, but many of F.'s writings were left out. The ed. of 1810, Paris, 10 vols. 8vo.,

¹ The principal of F.'s works are: Dialogues des morts, 1712, and Directions pour la conscience d'un Roi (publ. Holland, 1734; France, 1774), both designed for his pupil. Démonstr. de l'existence de Dieu, tirée de la connaissance de la nature, 1713. Dialogues sur l'éloquence, and Lettre à l'Académie française, both on rhetoric, and valuable, publ. 1718. He says, among other things, that every properly constructed discourse must: 1) prove, 2) delineate, 3) persuade.

is a reprint of that. The Toulouse ed., 1809–11, 19 vols. 12mo., is more complete. The ed. of Lefèvre, 1835, does not contain all F.'s correspondence.—The first biography of F. was written by one of his converts from Protestantism, Ramsay, an Englishman, who spent several years with F.: Vie de Fénelon, 1725, 12mo., 2d ed. 1729. The 1787 ed. of F.'s works is prefaced with a biography by the editor, Abbé QUERBEUF, of which an abstract is found in the ed. of 1810. In 1808, Bausset, former B. of Alais, publ. a Histoire de Fénelon, 3 vols. 8vo.; 2d ed. 1809.—(Comp. TABARAUD, Suppl. aux hist. de Bossuet et de Fénelon: Paris, 1822, 8vo.).

LECHLER.*

Ferarra-Florence, Synod of.—Amurath II. having already subjugated almost all the provinces of the Greek empire, also threatened the capital. The Emperor, John Palæologos, having exhausted all his own means, turned to the West, hoping that, as in former centuries, a pious zeal would reanimate, and a second Peter summon the Western Christians to a new crusade. Pope Eugene, artful and ambitious, and still powerful, was the only proper person for this purpose. To him John applied, and he in turn promised to raise up all Europe against the Turks, provided the Greeks, after an impartial and mutual examination of doctrines, would unite with the Roman Catholic Church. The Emperor consulted the Patriarch, and, Amurath still approaching, all scruples suggested by the deep-rooted aversion of the Greeks against the Latins, vanished. It was resolved to hold an eighth general council in Italy, in which all Christian princes of Europe should unite and constitute one only Christian Church. The Greek Emperor and Patriarch, and 700 men and clergy of Greece, learned and wise, attended. The Grand Duke of Russia permitted his metropolitan, Isidore, to attend, declaring, however, that neither their fathers nor he wished the union of both churches; that Isidore might attend the Council, but he with his bishops would adopt no change, either in the dogmas or in the liturgy, which the Council might propose. He also charged Isidore to maintain the purity of their faith. On the 18th of September, 1437, the Pope transferred the Council from Basel to Ferarra, where he opened it in person, on the 8th of January, 1438. The Council of Basel in turn suspended Eugene on the 24th of January, 1438, and deposed him on the 25th of June, 1439, as a Simonist, heretic and disturber, and, four months later, elected Felix V. The Council was attended by all the Basel Fathers who were not schismatically inclined, and by many other Western prelates. In February of the same year, the Greeks, with their Emperor and Patriarchs, arrived. On the 18th of August Isidore followed, who, as head of the Russian Church, a man of profound learning and the friend of Eugene, was received with great honors, the Greeks also including him among the defenders of their own against the Romish Church. Neither the Western princes, nor the remaining Basel Fathers appearing in Ferarra, and the four months appointed for waiting on them having uselessly passed away, Eugene declared: "Where I am with the Emperor and the Patriarch, all Christendom is assembled, especially as all the Patriarchs and Cardinals are here." The first public session was held on the 8th of October, 1438. The Greek Cardinal, Bessarion, opened it with a discourse, demonstrating the desirableness of a union for both parties. At the second session Andrew, of Rhodes, spoke in the same conciliatory spirit; and the dialectical method of discussion was determined on. The Greeks, allowed to choose the position of opponents, or of defenders, chose the former. A certain Nicholas, a Greek by birth, was appointed the mutual interpreter. Marcus, Bishop of Ephesus, demanded that the definitions and forms of the old Councils should first be read, it having also been done at the seventh Council, and being indispensable to the nature of an œcumenical Synod. Accordingly, the Nicene Creed, various decrees and definitions of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh general councils, citations from the epistles of Pope Cœlestin to John of Antioch, Vigilius to Eutychius, of Agatho to the Emperors, and from the Acclamation of the Patriarch John of Constantinople to the fifth Council, were read. The first subject of discussion, dogmatically the most important point of dispute between the two churches, was: The relation of the Holy Ghost to the other persons of the Trinity. The discussion was, at first, only formal, involving the right of the Latins to add the word "filiouque" to the symbol. The Greeks maintained that the addition, "filiouque," was made, not ab intrinsecus, but ab extrinsecus. The Latins replied, that "filiouque" was not an addition (προθήκη, proposition), but much more a declaratio (ἀναρτυξίς, explanation), and therefore allowable, as in the second symbol some things were already added to the first for explanation, that the decision of Ephesus only forbid the addition of contraria, but not declaratoria, as the creeds of Charisius and others, though containing more than the symbol, had also been approved by the same Council. Bessarion answered: If even the addition were true, it were unauthorized, much else, in itself true, not having been added; and that from the position of the Latins, additions to the Holy Scriptures, such as ὁμοούσιον = same essence, etc., must have been allowed, since, according to the Fathers, the symbol had equal authority.

With these purely formal transactions, the Synod of Ferrara drew to a close. Consistency was evidently with the Latins, for, the Son and the Father once admitted to be equal in essence, and only distinguished by the peculiar predicates of the Father and the Son, the participation of the Son in the sending of the Spirit must also be acknowledged. Hence, a material examination of the dogma of the Latins being at last determined on, an agreement did not seem difficult. Still, a public discussion of this point was at first prudently avoided, and each party chose twelve Fathers for a private discussion. Before this arrangement was consummated, the Emperor communicated a message from the Pope, removing the Synod from Ferrara to Florence, the plague having appeared in the former place. The Greeks disliked the transfer, and at first demanded that the proposed private discussion should still take place in Ferrara. The Pope, however, declaring, that in Ferrara he could not furnish funds for their subsistence, they were compelled to remove to Florence, insisting, nevertheless, that the Synod should not continue beyond four months longer. To appease their consciences, it was said to be incumbent upon the Pope to remove or dissolve the Synod, before its close, on account of the plague! On the 13th of February the Patriarch and suite entered Florence, and three days later the Emperor was received in the most solemn manner. The Patriarch again taking sick, the first session in Florence could not be held before the 26th of February. At the 18th session, on the 2d of March, two great theologians, the provincial of the Dominicans, John (of Schwarzenberg), an exceedingly skilful dialectician, and Marcus of Ephesus, stood arrayed against each other on the dogmatical arena. The Greeks gave striking evidence of having already lost all true conception of the doctrine of the Trinity, seeming to see in the doctrine of the Western Church, of the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, a plurality of divine causes (πολυαρχία). John gained the day, therefore, proving successively from the Church Fathers and the Scriptures, the truth of the addition, "filiouque." Among the former, he appealed to a manuscript of St. Basil against Eunomius, dating prior to the commencement of the Greek schism, which Nicholas of Cusa had brought from Constantinople, and in which Basil distinctly taught, that the Holy Ghost proceeded not from the Father alone, but also from the Son. The Greeks declared the passage a later addition, and the Latins in turn reproached them with having unauthoritatively erased it. Marcus, the Greek, admits at last, that the Holy Ghost had indeed received from the Father existence, and from the Son manifestation to men, but these being essentially different, the addition, "filiouque," was wrong. On the other hand, John, appealing to the Scriptures and to the Church Fathers, established the Romish dogma, saying, that the Father was the one cause of the Son and Spirit, and that all who taught two principles, or primeval causes in the consubstantial Trinity, were to be condemned; that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and from the Son, by eternal procession — not from two principles, or spirations, but from one. This explanation having removed all suspicion of a πολυαρχία in the Romish dogma, a union seemed now possible. Bessarion, whom Eugene afterwards raised to the dignity of a Cardinal, chiefly assumed its consummation. In an exceedingly elegant address to his countrymen, he spoke, first, of the causes of the schism, as in its time indeed entirely justifiable in the Greeks, but that now, after an œcumenical Synod, they could no longer stand separated from the Latins, unless these were unfaithful to the truth. That this was not so, he endeavored, further, to demonstrate in his discourse, as between the two churches there was, in general, no contradiction, the Orientals saying: spiritum procedere ex patri per filium, and the Occidentals, ex patri et filio. This, he said, was no antithesis, the prepositions per, ἐκ, as well as ex or is, equally indicated the mediating cause. Hence, in conclusion, he exhorted most impressively to a union. Thus the Emperor and Bessarion; but the stricter party of the Greeks, led by the metropolitan Marcus, declared that the Latins were schismatics and heretics, and therefore they would rather die than Latinizare (Latinize). Still a majority of the Greeks were influenced, more by their well known interests than by all the arguments of the Latins. With the 25th session the public discussion closed. Committees conferred in regard to a form of union, and in the committees of the Greeks a regard to political embarrassments prevailed over dogmatical scruples. It was agreed, 1) That the procession of the Holy Ghost is a dogma; 2) That the addition of the Latins is its proper explanation; 3) That the Greeks even believing the procession of the Spirit from the Son, should not be required to incorporate "filioque" into their symbol. It was added, apologetically, that the Greeks never intended to exclude the Son, but rejected the additions, believing that the Latins holding it deduced the Spirit from two principles and inspirations. This form of union adopted, the Orient and Occident exchanged, on the 8th of June, 1439, the kiss of peace. On the following day tidings of the death of the Patriarch John, of Constantinople, were received; death was said to have arrested him whilst preparing a document in which he declared himself willing to subscribe to, and sanction all things which the Catholic and Apostolical Church of Christ in Rome teaches and dogmatically establishes.

The other differences between the two churches were more easily arranged. Respecting the sacraments, not only the ritual differences between the Greeks and Latins in the use of leavened and unleavened bread were left free, but even was for the first time ecclesiastically acknowledged as the number of the sacraments. Respecting departed souls it was established as the doctrine of the Church, that the souls of those who, though dying in grace, have not yet offered the equivalent of repentance over their sins, will after death be purified by the punishments of purgatory. The intercessions of the faithful, masses, prayers and alms, and other pious works, will alleviate these punishments. The souls of those not sinning again after baptism, or cleansing themselves again from sin, will be immediately taken up into heaven and behold the Triune God more or less clearly, according to their peculiar merits. Finally, the souls of those dying in any mortal sin go at once to hell, there to suffer various punishments. Concerning the Primacy of the Roman Pontiff, it was at last established, that he rules over the whole earth, is the successor of St. Peter, the true vicegerent of Christ, the father and teacher of all Christians, Christ himself having imparted to him plenary authority to feed, guide, and govern the whole Church as its head. After him the Patriarch of Constantinople shall be second; of Alexandria, third; of Antioch, fourth; and of Jerusalem, fifth in rank. Upon these grounds the decree of union was established on the 6th of July, 1439, according to which all in the Greek Church remained unaltered and only the oneness was to be acknowledged. The Emperor and the Greeks subscribed the decretum unionis; only Marcus of Ephesus steadfastly refused his assent. Five original copies of this document were prepared and subscribed; later, ten were shown at various places, nine of which are, however, certainly only copies (comp. Mémoire sur les exemplaires originaux de décret d'union in the Mémoires de l'Académie des inscriptions, T. 43, p. 287, sqq.).

Bishops and princes left the Council with high hopes, but John found in his empire a universal tumult among the ecclesiastics, opposing the union and boisterously accusing the bishops in attendance upon the Council with unfaithfulness and bribery. This party, led by Marcus, of Ephesus, prevailed, and the hatred of the Greeks against the Romans burned with increased violence. The universal indignation induced many bishops to withdraw their signatures. The great number of Greeks already living under Turkish rule determinately opposed all Latinizers. The unhappy Emperor to stay his tottering throne, sustained the union, which, however, hastened more than retarded the coming destruction. The Emperor promoted the election of Theophanes as Patriarch of Constantinople, who, a devotee to Rome, acted imprudently toward the refractory bishops and ecclesiastics. He endeavoring to force Latinizing bishops into Asia Minor, the three Patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, issued, A. D. 1443, a synodical letter, very strongly declaring themselves against the συνάροπσις ἐν Φλωρεντίᾳ μιαρὰν συνόδον (the impious Synod of Florence), deposing all Latinizing ecclesiastics, threatening excommunication against the refractory, and charging the metropolitan of Cæsarea, Cappadocia, as ἐπαρχὸν πασης ἀνατολῆς (exarch of all the East), to execute this decision in his diocese. Simultaneously they addressed an energetic letter to the Emperor, threatening him with all the censures of the Church and the wrath of God, should he not separate from the Latins. The Russian Grand Duke learning the true nature of the union, as that of the Greeks with the Latins and not the reverse, and as the work of political influences, commanded Isidore to be removed from the metropolitan residence into the cloister to do penance. Isidore, true to his principles, passed nearly two years in the cloister, escaping at last to Rome, where the Pope gave him the title of Patriarch of Constantinople, and of Dean of the College of Cardinals, and the bishoprics of Sabina, Corfu, and Nicasia. The metropolitan See of South Russia was now completely separated from that of the North, the See of Kiew submitting to Rome and accepting the union, but henceforth continually renewing its attempts at union with various Russian Eparchies. The attempted union was an entire failure, and remained such notwithstanding the Emperor's appointment of new religious disputations in Constantinople. Speedily ripening for destruction, the Byzantine empire was subdued by Mohammed, not by Rome.

The Greeks having left Florence, the Synod continued full six years longer, during which five sessions were held in Florence, and two after its transfer to Rome. At the first session (Sept. 4, 1439) the schismatics of Basel and their opposition Pope were excommunicated. On the heels of the union with the Greeks, was to follow with easily foreseen inefficiency the vain spectacle of re-union with the Armenians. These, at length, ostensibly renounced their Eutychian errors, and promised, adopting the same days as the Latins, to sing the symbol of the first Constantinopolitan Council on all Sundays and prominent festivals, and to acknowledge the Synod of Chalcedon, held against the Nestorians and Eutyches, and all the subsequent Synods. The same was done with the Jacobites represented by Andrew, Abbot of St. Anthony. The Council being finally, in 1442, transferred to the Lateran, delegates successively appeared from all the Oriental churches, seeking union through papal decrees with Rome. This semblance of an universal union under papal rule was evidently designed to regain for the Pope the affections of the West, and to intimidate into submission the adherents of the Council of Basel. The Jacobitish Ethiopians, the Syrians, differing on the dogma of the procession, the Nestorianized Chaldeans and the monothelitic Maronites, were all furnished with special decrees of union.

Of the proceedings of the Council, two reports, one in Greek, the other in Latin, are extant, the latter by Horatius Justinianus, in the collection of Reports of Councils, in that of Labbeus et Cossart, T. XIII., in that of Harduin, T. VIII. In behalf of the Greeks has been written: "Vera historia unionis non veræ inter Græcos et Latinos, sive Concilii Florentini exactissima narratio græce scripta per Sylvestrum Sguropulum (should be Syropulum), magnum Ecclesiarcham, qui Concilio interfuit, transtulit in sermonem latinum, ROB. CREYGHTON: Hagæ Com., 1660, fol. Comp. also LEONIS ALLATII, de eccl. occid. atque orient. perpetua consensione, libri tres.

DR. PRESSEL. — J. H. Derr.

Ferdinand III., St., King of Leon and Castile, son of Alphonso IX., of Leon, was born 1198, and in 1204 recognised by the Cortes as successor of his father, although the Pope had declared the marriage of his parents void on account of their consanguinity. In 1217 his mother, Berengaria, transferred to him the crown of Castile. On Nov. 30, 1219, he married Beatrice, daughter of the Hohenstauffen Philip. After his father's death, 1230, he ascended the throne, but was resisted by the friends of his step-sisters by his father's first marriage, who had the right of succession by Alphonso's will. Through his mother's prudent mediation, however, war was prevented, and the contest peacefully adjusted. — In 1224 F. opened the campaign against the Moors, and by 1250 succeeded in making the Moorish Kings of Valencia, Baeza, Murcia, and Granada, vassals. His siege of Sevilla was considered one of the greatest martial achievements of the middle ages. The city surrendered Nov. 23, 1248. The 300,000 Mohammedans were allowed to leave the city. F. then entered it with great solemnities, went to the chief mosque, and after complete purifications, celebrated a mass. — He died May 30, 1252. Four hundred years afterwards he was canonized by Clem. X. In every relation he proved himself a man of noble Christian principles, and excellent character, according to the best standard of his age. His chief merit consists in his conquest of the Moors. Throughout he was a most obedient son of the Church. His son, Alphonso X., succeeded him. PRESSEL.*

Fermentarii (also Fermentarii, Prozymites), a term of reproach applied to Greek Christians by the Latins, because they used leavened bread in the Lord's Supper; the Greeks in turn calling the Latins Azymites (see Art. and Cæcilius). — In earlier times the Latin Church also called the Lord's Supper fermentum, a proof that it likewise used unleavened bread. — (See J. G. HERRMANN, Hist. Concertationum de pane azymo et fermentato in cæna Domini: Lipsæ, 1737, 8vo. AUGUSTI, Archæol., VIII., 257, &c. MARHEINEKE, das Brod im heil. Abendmahl: Berlin, 1817).

HAGENBACH.*

Festivals, of the ancient Hebrews. — The hallowing of the course of time is accomplished in general, according to the order of the Old Test., by the morning and evening sacrifice, by which every day is consecrated to God (Num. 28: 3–8; Ex. 29: 38, sq.). Notwithstanding this, however, special times were set apart and were made specially holy. The Pentateuch determines the following as such holy times: 1) the seventh day of the week or the Sabbath; 2) the new moons, as the first-born among the days of the month, but otherwise of subordinate significance with the exception of the seventh new-moon, which is called יוֹם תְּרוּעָה, day of the trumpets' sound; 3) the three pilgrimage-festivals, on which the whole congregation was to assemble itself at the holy place, namely, a) the Passover; b) the feast of weeks (Whitsuntide); c) the feast of tabernacles; 4) the day of Atonement. Besides, 5) every seventh year was hallowed as a Sabbath-year, and every fiftieth year as a year of Jubilee. — The legal regulations concerning the holy times in general are given in Ex. 23: 10–17; Lev. 23, 25; Num. 28, 29; Deut. 16. — The most general designation of the holy times would be according to the fundamental meaning of the word מוֹעֵד יְהוָה. But this expression, even in its widest sense, is used only of such holy days (including the Sabbath), on which holy assemblies מִקְרָא קֹדֶשׁ, and consequently a meeting of Jehovah with the congregation, took place (according to the meaning of the word in מוֹעֵד יְהוָה, Ex. 29: 42; Num. 17: 19), therefore Ezek. 46: 11 (see Hitzig in loco.) also of the new-moons, for these, according to the prophecy, Ezek. 46: 3 (comp. Isa. 66: 23), were to become days of holy assembly, what they are not in the Pentateuch. More frequently, however, the expression referred only to the assembly-days of the annual festivals, excluding the Sabbaths and new-moons. Lev. 23: 4; Ezek. 46: 9; 2 Chron. 8: 13; 31: 3. — Still narrower is the meaning of the word מִקְרָא, which is the common name of the three pilgrimage-festivals as the jubilees of the year. The word means revolving, and seems to be taken from the joyful dances which accom-

anied these festivals (Judges 21 : 19-21; Ex. 2 : 5, with 19).—The number seven constitutes the fundamental type for the order of the holy times. The succession of the holy days has a reference to the natural revolution of time, with the exception of the day of atonement. The weekly Sabbath is connected with the course of the moon, for the week of seven days is probably to be derived from the synodical month. But here is a distinct reference to the lunar phases in the setting apart of the new moons. Moreover, it is to be observed, that the Passover was celebrated at the vernal, and the feast of tabernacles at the autumnal equinox. But it is quite a mistake, to derive the significance of the times of worship of the O. T. from these cosmical relations. The Old Test. looks upon the signs of the heavens, which the God who rules over the stars has ordered, merely as chronometers for the theocratic institutions (see Gen. 1 : 14; Ps. 104 : 19; comp. Bähr, Symbolik des mos. Kultus, II., 546). Among the chronological festivals, as George (die älteren jüdischen Feste, 1835, p. 193, sq.) designates the first class of O. T. times of worship, belong at the most only the new moons; yet just these have subordinate significance throughout the Pentateuch; and throughout the whole O. T., there is no trace that the seventh new-moon was observed as the civil new-year's festival. The Sabbath, however, has its religious significance by virtue of a special divine appointment, as the sign of the covenant between God and his people (Ex. 31 : 13), as the practical evidence, that among the people whom God has consecrated to himself, human life should manifest itself in labor and rest according to the image of the divine life (vide the Art. Sabbath).—That which makes the festivals of the O. T. to be festivals, is by no means a human choice connecting itself with the life of nature, but the appointment of the God of the covenant, who by these festivals, on the one hand, preserved the great facts of the deliverance and guidance of his people in living remembrance (comp. Ex. 13 : 9; Lev. 23 : 42. sq. etc.), on the other, admonished the people to regard their earthly calling and mission as constantly dependent upon the giver of all blessings.

Concerning the observance of the festivals, not to anticipate the special articles, we will only observe the following:—1) Besides the sacrifices prescribed for every day, special public sacrifices were made, which, however, varied according to the character of the separate holy days (Num. 28 : 29).—2) As upon the weekly Sabbath, so also upon the seven festival-days (the first and seventh day of unleavened bread, the day of the feast of weeks, the new-moon Sabbath, the day of atonement, the first and the last day of the feast of tabernacles) rest from labor was commanded. At the same time, however, the difference existed, that whilst on the weekly Sabbath and the day of atonement all labor (פְּלִמְלָאָה) was forbidden (Lev. 23 : 2, 31; comp. Num. 29 : 7) on the remaining days above-mentioned, according to Lev. 23 : 7, 8, 21, 25, 35, 36; comp. Num. 28 : 18, only מְלָאָה עֲבֹדָה (vulg. servile opus), was forbidden, which, as appears from Ex. 12 : 16, did not exclude the preparation of food (vide Gusset, lex hebr., ed. II., p. 817, sq., 1583).—3) The positive side of the celebration of the Sabbath and the above-named festivals, is contained in the regularly recurring formula, Lev. 23; Num. 28, that upon them shall take place קָדַשׁ מִקְדָּא. This expression is to be translated holy assembly (Hengstenberg, über den Tag des Herrn, p. 32, sq.), and means that, as in Ezek. 46 : 3, 9, the people shall come to the holy place to worship. Besides, there existed a formal obligation to appear at the holy place only on the three pilgrimage-festivals, and this only for the males (Ex. 23 : 14, 17; Deut. 16 : 16). 4) Those who come to the festivals shall not appear empty before the Lord (Ex. 23 : 15; comp. 34 : 20; Deut. 16 : 16); namely, as the latter passage adds, "every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God which he hath given thee."—(Comp. Riehm, die Gesetzgebung Moses in Lande Moab, p. 52, sq. Jos. Ant., III., 10, 6, fin.).—In the historical books of the O. T. there are but few notices of the festivals. Even in Joshua (5 : 10, sq.) mention is only made of the first passover celebrated in the land of Canaan. This being so with regard to this book, which is so closely connected with the Pentateuch, certainly nothing positive can be inferred against the non-existence of them from the silence of the following books. That the distraction of the theocratic life under the Judges exerted an important influence upon the observance of festivals, is to be presupposed. Yet mention is made, Judges 21 : 19; 1 Sam. 1 : 3, of a yearly festival, when the people went to the house of God. From the time of Solomon the feast of tabernacles is first mentioned. The passages, 1 Kings 8 : 2, 65; comp. 2 Chron. 5 : 3; 7 : 9, 10, are to be understood, that from the 8-14 of the seventh month the consecration of the temple took place, from the 15-21 the feast of tabernacles was celebrated, then, according to 1 Kings, on the eighth, according to 2 Chron., on the ninth day after, consequently on the 23d of the month, the people were dismissed. For further notice, vide 1 Kings 9 : 25; 2 Kings 23 : 22; Neh. 8 : 17; Isa. 29 : 1; 1 Kings 12 : 32; Amos 5 : 21; 8 : 10; Hosea 2 : 13; 5 : 7; 9 : 5. Comp. also, Bertheau on 2 Chron. 30 : 27; Keil, apologet. Versuch über Chron., p. 399. Oehler. — Beck.

Festivals, of the later Jews.—During the post-exile period several new festivals were added to those appointed in the Pentateuch. Here belong already the days of mourning celebrated with fasting mentioned in Zech. 7 : 3, 5; 8 : 19, namely, 1) on the ninth of the fourth month, because on this day (2 Kings 25 : 3; Jer. 52 : 6, 7) the Chaldeans forced an entrance into Jerusalem; 2) on the 10th of the fifth month, in remembrance of the destruction of the city and temple (Jer. 52 : 12); 3) in the 7th month in commemoration of the assassination of Gedaliah (2 Kings 25 : 25; Jer. 41 : 1); besides 4) a fast was observed on the 10th day of the tenth month, because on this day (2 Kings 25 : 1; Jer. 52 : 4) the siege of Jerusalem began.—Further, the conversion of the seventh new-moon to the civil new-year's festival falls within the post-exile period. The origin of this festival cannot be certainly fixed. Comp. Jos. Ant., I., 3, 3; Hupfeld (de primitiva et vera fest. ap. Hebr. ratione, II., p. 14); Hitzig, Comm. on Isaiah, p. 335; Hävernicks on Ezek. 40:1; Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, p. 346. — Of the Jewish festivals which arose during the next succeeding centuries, the first place belongs to the Purim (פּוּרִים) — concerning the significance of this name, vide Esther 9:24–26; comp. 3:7 — ἡ Μαρδοχαίων ἡμέρα, 2 Macc. 15:36). The historical occasion of the festival is related in the book of Esther. It was not a temple-festival, but was celebrated in the synagogues by the reading of the book of Esther (the Megilla), in the houses by banquets and other amusements, the giving of alms, etc. The festival occurred on the 14th and 15th of Adar, just one month before the Passover. Concerning the celebration of the festival in leap-years, see Wieseler's chronolog. Synopse der Ev., p. 207, sq. — Another festival, from the time of the Maccabees, is the festival of the consecration of the temple Πῆλιν, τὰ ἑξαίτια, John 10:22, fuller αἱ ἡμέραι ἑξαίτιας τῆς θυσιαστηρίου, 1 Macc. 4:59). It was appointed by Judas Maccabee, because he succeeded (A. C. 164) in capturing Jerusalem, purifying the temple, and restoring the worship of Jehovah. It extended through eight days, probably in imitation of the feast of tabernacles, comp. 2 Macc. 1:18; 10:6, sq. The festival was not at first confined to Jerusalem; it was celebrated by illuminating the synagogues and houses, whence without doubt the name phœra in Jos. Ant., XII., 7, 7; comp. Buxtorf, synag. jud. c. 28; Lightfoot on John 10:22; Schröder, Satzungen und Gebräuche des talmudisch-rabb. Judenthums, p. 161, sq.; Ewald, Gesch. Isr., III., 2, p. 357; Lund, Heilighümer, p. 1069.

Finally, to this period belongs the festival of the conquered citadel, which, according to 1 Macc. 13:50–52, was appointed in commemoration of the recovery and purification of Acre on the 23d of the second month, A. C. 141.

From the period before the destruction of Jerusalem are yet to be mentioned: 1) the Herod-festival, in commemoration of the death of Herod, celebrated about the time of the Passover; 2) the wood-festival (ξύλοποιον ἑορτή, Jos. b. jud., II., 17, 6), vide Lund, Heiligh., p. 1067, sq. — The basket-festival, mentioned by Philo in the treatise de septen., is not a regular festival, but refers to the presentation of the first-fruits commanded in Deut. 26, which were brought to Jerusalem by festive processions. See the particulars in tract. Mischna Biccurem, c. 3.

The destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple by the Romans, gave a new significance to two of the above-named days of mourning. Titus took the city by storm, in the same month (the fourth, Thammuz), in which the Chaldeans captured it; and as this should have happened on the 17th, the fasting was transferred to this day. Besides, the Romans destroyed the temple in the same month (the fifth, Ab), in which the Chaldeans had destroyed it, according to the Talmud on the 9th, which, on this account, is celebrated as the day of the burning of the temple. The Jewish days of mourning culminate in the commemoration day of the destruction of the temple. The Lamentations of Jeremiah are read in the synagogues.

The modifications of the older festivals, which have taken place during the later history of Judaism, will be more particularly noticed in the separate articles on these festivals, which may be consulted. In elucidation of the present Jewish order of festivals, we add yet the following. — 1) Connected with the eight-day feast of tabernacles, probably with reference to Chron. 7:10, was the festival of the joy of the Law, on the 23d of Tisri. The age of this festival cannot be definitely fixed (vide Zunz, die gottesdienstl. Vorträge der Juden, p. 37). — 2) Instead of the Sabbatic days of the Old Test. festival-seasons, there appear among the later Jews two holidays for each (except the day of atonement). Accordingly, Pentecost and New-Year are not only celebrated during two days, but at the Passover, the first and seventh holiday are doubled, so that the whole festival continues eight days, and labor is allowed only on four intermediate days, and this with limitations. Likewise the feast of tabernacles begins with a double holiday, which is followed by five half holidays (see Tabernacles). Concerning the origin of this double celebration of festivals consult Mischna, rosch haschana, 2, 5, sq.; 3, 1; 2, 2, sqq.; 1, 3; Ideler, Handb. der Chronol., I., p. 512, sq.; Grätz, Geschichte der Juden vom Untergang des jüdischen Staats, 1853, pp. 82, 397. Saalschütz, mos. Recht, p. 409. Schröder, l. c., p. 232. — 3) By the calendar of Hillel, the months alternately consisted of 30 and 29 days, if the year was regular (Ideler, l. c., I., p. 340, sq.). By this arrangement a double new-moon festival was celebrated in the months of the first-class (30 days). Concerning the celebration of new-moons in the synagogues, vide Buxtorf, l. c., p. 473; Schröder, p. 83. Concerning the festival calendar of the Jews generally, consult Schröder, p. 90, sq.; Johnson, die Lehren der mosaischen Religion, 3 Ausg., 1829, p. 189, sq.

OEHLER. — Beck.

Festivals, ecclesiastical. — A festival holiday (festus dies, feria or feriæ) is a day on which the ordinary worldly occupations are abstained from, and religious exercises substituted in their place. The necessity of such a change from work to festival days existing in the nature of man, receives, however, special stimulus and gratification in connection with other festivals relating to the development of the nation. All events, which have had an influence upon the founding, advancement or retardment of the nation, it recalls to remembrance from time to time, to express joy or sorrow; this celebration becomes regular and constitutes itself into a formal festival-cycle. The history of all nations demonstrates this origin of festivals; we find it also among the Israelites, whose entire development is based on a series of events, in which the government of divine grace is most prominent. But what was only shadow and type in Judaism became perfected truth by the appearance of our Lord, and is designed to make itself known as reality to entire humanity. The rigid antithesis of the Old Test. between festival and non-festival days must cease in the new covenant. In the spirit of the Redeemer (Matt. 12 : 8; Mark 2 : 27) and of his Apostles (Gal. 4 : 9-11; Col. 2 : 16, 17; Rom. 12 : 1; 14 : 5, 6, etc.), the ancient fathers also declared against this antithesis. So Clemens Alexandr., Strom. lib. VII., cap. 7; Origenes, contra Celsum lib. VIII., cap. 21-23; Jerome on Galatians, 4 cit., and others. Agreeing with these, Augustine (ep. 118, 130, etc.) says: "Observatione Sabbati, quæ observatione unius diei figurabatur, ablata, perpetuum sabbatum observat, qui spe futuræ quietis sanctis est operibus intentus." This idea, that every day is a day devoted to God, either with or without the usual worldly occupations, was acknowledged much earlier; for the Jews not only called the last day of the week, but the entire week τὰ σαββάτα, and the single days, μία, δευτέρα τῶν σαββάτων, etc. (Levit. 23 : 15; Deut. 16 : 9; Matt. 28 : 1; Acts 20 : 7; 1 Cor. 16 : 2). Since the seven-days week was retained in the Church, the designation of feria, prima, secunda, etc., also passed over to the single days of the week. We find this certainly already in the second century (vide Tertullian, de jejuniis, c. II.; comp. Art. Fasts). Accordingly, by degrees, the entire year could be regarded as a connected series of festivals. The Church was concerned, also, to appropriate to each day its peculiar festival reference, and thereby yearly renew and repeat her holy history.

It is not the design of this article to consider in extenso all the festivals of the Church (for this belongs to the articles on the single festivals), but only to give a condensed view of them and of the more general canonical principles concerning holidays.

All the festivals of the Church divide into two sections, the one devoted to the commemoration of the author (semestre Domini), the other to the commemoration of the advancement of the Church (semestre Ecclesiæ). The filling up of the whole Church year did not take place until later; for originally only the Jewish festivals were celebrated, with a changed spirit and design however, and to these were added new ones. First of all, on the part of Jewish Christians, the Sabbath was observed as the last day of the week, to which, however, Sunday was added, as the day of the resurrection (ἡμέρα τοῦ κυρίου—κυριακή, dies dominica, Rev. 1 : 10). The latter soon became more general in the gentile-Christian congregations, and after the destruction of Jerusalem gradually took the place of the Sabbath (Chr. Ludw. Franke, de diei dominici apud veteres Christianos celebratione: Hales, 1826. John Utr. Oschwald, die christl. Sonntagsfeier: Leipzig, 1850; vide the Art. Sunday). Moreover, the Passover (Easter) was borrowed from the Jews, since, in the stead of the Jewish sacrificial lamb the sacrifice of our Lord was celebrated (1 Cor. 5 : 7, 8); likewise also the feast of the weeks, fifty days after Easter, πεντηκοστή, Whitsuntide (Acts 2 : 1), since in the stead of the first harvest and the commemoration of the promulgation of the law, the establishment of the Church by the outpouring of the Holy Ghost was celebrated (vide the Arts. Easter and Whitsuntide). Only later, as it appears, in the third century, Christmas was added, the festival of the birth of our Lord (vide Art.). Connected with these chief festivals was a certain preparatory and subsequent celebration, and thus arose the three great festival circles, which constitute the semestre Domini. The Christmas-cycle comprises the four Advent-Sundays (see the Art.), Christmas itself, with which is connected St. Stephen's day, St. John the Evangelist's day, and the Innocents' day; likewise eight days after the celebration of the birth of our Lord follows the festival of the circumcision (festum circumcisionis et nominis Jesu), first made a universal festival in 1244 (c. 1, dist. III., de consecr.), and later everywhere acknowledged as the beginning of the civil year, and again six days after this the festival of the manifestation of our Lord (Epiphany), then follow the Epiphany Sundays to the commencement of the Easter-cycle. The number of Epiphany-Sundays varies from one to six, according to the time when Easter occurs, which is a changeable festival. (Concerning the Christmas-cycle see Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der christlichen Archäologie, Bd. I; Ranke, das kirchliche Pericopensystem: Berlin, 1847, p. 370, sq.).

The great fasts (see the Art.) served as preparation for the commemoration of the death of our Lord, and extended formerly to Sunday Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima. The proper fast-Sunday (carnis privium) is the last, called also Estomihi, according to Ps. 31 : 2. The Sundays belonging to Lent are Quadragesima prima to sexta, or Invocavit (Ps. 91 : 15), Reminiscere (Ps. 25 : 6), Oculi (Ps. 25 : 15), Lætare (Isa. 54 : 1; 56 : 1, mid-lent, dominica de panibus, refectionis), Judica (Ps. 43 : 1, dominica mediana, nigra), Palmarum (Matt. 21, dominica indulgentiæ). Then follows the hebdomas magna (sancta, muta), passion-week, in which Maundy-Thursday (dies viridum, Ps. 23 : 2, cæna domini), Good-Friday (πάσχα στυγνόςμιον) and the sabbatum sanctum, the Lord's day of rest, are the most important. The festival of the resurrection (πάσχα ἀναστάσιμον), Easter, was early regarded by the Church as corona et caput omnium festivitatum, and she began with it a celebration which transferred the pre-eminences of Sunday to all the days until Whitsuntide (quinquagesima lætitiæ), until since the fourth century restrictions were imposed (Conc. Eliberitan., a. 305, can. 43), Ascension-day (ἐορτή ἀναλήψεως ἐπισωζωμένη) having been raised to a proper festival. Whitsuntide existed already independent of this, as a peculiar festival. The ten days from Ascension to the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, were regarded, later, as a preparatory celebration of Whitsuntide, and this festival was closed with the following Sunday, Trinity-Sunday (Augusti, l. c., Bd. II.; Ranke, l. c., p. 286, sq., 360). Easter-week was followed by the Whit-week, beginning with the dominica in albis (Quasimodogeniti, 1 Pet. 2 : 2), because those who were baptized on Easter appeared in their white baptismal garments. Then followed the Sundays Misericordias Domini (Ps. 89 : 1), Jubilate (Ps. 66 : 1), Cantate (Ps. 98 : 1) Roga' jucunditatis, Isa. 48 : 20), Exaudi (Ps. 27 : 7). The festival of Trinity, which was received into the series of ecclesiastical holidays before the 14th century, closed generally the solemn festival-cycle; the Rom. Cath. Church, however, celebrates in addition, on the feria V., Corpus-Christi-day (festum corporis Christi, Urban IV., 1264; Transitus (Bullar. Magnum, I., 121, 122), c. un. Clem. de reliquiis, III., 16, 1311). Conc. Trid. sess., XIII., de SS. Eucharistiæ sacram., cap. 5). The number of Trinity Sundays, being dependent on the earlier or later occurrence of Easter, varies from 22 to 27.

Within these festival-cycles occur also a large number of separate festival-days. The most important of these are the Lady-days (Conception, Dec. 8; Nativity, Sept. 8; Presentation, Nov. 21; Espousal, Jan. 23; Annunciation, March 25; Visitation, July 2; Purification, Feb. 2; Ascension, Aug. 25); St. John's-days (Conception, Sept. 24; Nativity, June 24; Beheading, Aug. 29); Apostles'-days (Matthias, Feb. 24 (in the East, Aug. 9); Philip and James, the son of Alphaeus, May 1; Peter and Paul, June 29; James, the son of Zebedee, July 25 (in the East, April 16); Bartholomew, Aug. 24 (in Rome on the 25th); Matthew, Sept. 21 (in the Greek C., Nov. 16); Simon and Judas, Oct. 28; Andrew, Nov. 30; Thomas, Dec. 21; John, Dec. 27; Barnabas, June 11); the Evangelists' days (Matthew, John (see above); Mark, April 25; Luke, Oct. 18); the Cross-festivals (finding of the Cross, May 3; Exaltation of the Cross, Sept. 14); the Martyr-days (the Maccabees, Aug. 1; Stephen, Dec. 26; the Innocents, Dec. 28); the festival of the archangel, Michael, Sept. 29; All-Saints', Nov. 1, etc. In the single countries, dioceses, and even parishes, there were added yet special festivals, as for Church-consecrations, etc. The manifoldness of these festivals in the German bishoprics appears from the Synodal regulations and other decrees, a summary of which Hartzheim gives in his Concilia Germaniæ, Index, Tom. XI., fol. 217, sub v. festa. From them it appears also, that the immense number of holidays early occasioned complaints, and called forth a desire to have them lessened on account of the injury resulting from them to civil life. Since the middle of the 15th century this was discussed more earnestly, because Peter, of Alliac, demanded at Constance: ut, præterquam diebus dominicis et in majoribus festis ab Ecclesia institutis, liceret operari post auditum officium: cum quia in festis sæpe magis multiplicantur peccata in tabernis, in choreis et aliis lasciviis, quas docet otiositas, tum quia dies operabiles vix sufficiunt pauperibus ad vitæ necessaria procuranda (in Gerson., opera ed. du Pin, II., 911). These complaints, often afterwards reiterated, could remain the less unnoticed, inasmuch as the Reformation also exerted a great influence on this subject of discipline (Kopp, die katholische Kirche im 19. Jahrhundert: Mainz, 1830, p. 321). Many festivals which had been retained to this time were forthwith abolished. Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin desired only to retain Sunday (comp. Luther's Werke von Walch, X., 1630; Zwingli, Erkl. der Art. XXV.; Calvin, institut. lib. II., cap. 8). Later Luther declared, that in addition to Sunday other festivals might be observed (Werke Walch, X., 1647). In some dioceses of the Rom. Cath. Church the number was now lessened (vide the Synod of Treves, 1549, c. 10, de moderandis feriis, in Hartzheim's Concilia Germaniæ, Tom. VI., fol. 601), more general reductions, however, were made first by Urban VIII., Dec. 22, 1642, Universa per orbem (Bullarium, Tom. V., fol. 378), by Benedict XIV., 1742-45 (vide his treatise de synodo diocesana, lib. XIII., cap. XVIII., nro. X., sq.; Kopp, l. c., p. 327-8), Clemens XIV., 1772, and others, but mostly with reference to particular countries. Inasmuch as this is an ecclesiastical matter, which, however, has, at the same time, special interest for the State, the papal chair has generally made the regulation of festivals according to the proposition of the State, as in Prussia by the decree of Benedict XIV., Jan. 28 1754; Clemens XIV., June 24, 1772; Pius VI., April 19, 1788; Pius VII., June 17, 1819; Leo XII., Dec. 2, 1828 (vide Piper's Kirchenrechnung: Berlin, 1841, 4to., p. 65-6). A similar diminution of festivals was made in Austria, Bavaria, etc., especially since Clemens XIV. In the Protestant Church on account of ancient customs, according to Luther's counsel, many of the festivals of the ancient Church were retained, until about the middle of the past century, when reductions were commenced. In Prussia this took place by the royal edict of March 12, 1754; Feb. 13, 1755; Jan. 28, 1773 (Piper, l. c., p. 69, sq.). By this edict the third holidays of the high-festivals, three fast-days, Maundy-Thurs-day, and Ascension-day, were particularly abolished, the latter, however, was restored March 4, 1789. Similar legislation followed only later in other countries, as in Hanover, Jan. 25, 1822; Nov. 15, 1830; in Saxe-Weimar, Nov. 11, 1823; in the electorate of Hessa, Dec. 17, 1826; Saxony, Jan. 13, and 19, 1831, etc. On the other hand, however, other festival-days have been introduced, as a Harvest-festival (Prussia, 1773, 1836), a Church-festival in remembrance of those who have died during the year, on the last Sunday of the Church-year (in Prussia by government-order of April 24, 1816, and ordinance of Nov. 25, same year; in Russia by law for the evangelical Lutheran Church, of Dec. 28, 1832; in Saxony, by the ordinance of Oct. 28, 1840, etc.); the festival of the Reformation on Oct. 31, or the next following Sunday (Piper, l. c., p. 82-4). To these must be added also festivals of a casual character, as missionary-festivals, etc. (Piper, l. c., p. 85, sq.; Ranke, l. c., p. 285). The authority to appoint, to remove, and to abolish festivals, belongs in the Romish Church to the bishop for each diocese (Concil. Trid. sess. XXV., cap. 2, de regularibus), to the Pope for the whole Church. In the Protestant Church this authority belongs to those invested with the government of the Church, therefore especially to the ruler of the country. It has also been acknowledged by the Church, that it belongs to the State generally to appoint, &c., thanksgiving festivals, on special occasions (vide the Bavarian Concordat and the edict of May 26, 1818, § 55; Prussian common-law, Th. II., Tit. XI., § 34, 35, etc.).

Ecclesiastical festivals are divided into ordi-

ary (feriæ statutz), which belong permanently to the Church year and regularly return, either on the same day of the month (feriæ immobiles), or on another day (feriæ mobiles), and extraordinary (feriæ indictæ), which are appointed for special occasions. The occurrence of the movable festivals always depends upon Easter, which may fall between the 22d of March and the 25th of April. The festivals are whole (feriæ integræ), if they are observed with the regular morning and afternoon service, half (feriæ intercisæ), if only the first takes place. From these are distinguished yet dies liturgici, week-day services with a morning sermon, prayer-meeting, etc. As regards the solemnities, the Romish Church distinguishes between festæ simplicita and duplicita. Double festivals are those which rest on two religious facts, or are dedicated to the commemoration of two persons, as James and Philip, May 1; Peter and Paul, June 29. This is also specially the case, when a festival-day is transferred to the following Sunday and observed together with it. But the Church also celebrates simple as well as double festivals, when she permits the responses, antiphonies, and verses, which are sung at high-mass, to be repeated by two choristers alternately. If this takes place only in part, the festival is called semiduplex. The Protestant Church distinguishes above all others the three high-festivals Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, besides these also Good-Friday, which properly is no festival-day in the Romish Church on account of the omission of mass. The festivals are feriæ mere ecclesiasticæ or publicæ, according as they are observed only by the Church, or at the same time are also acknowledged by the State, by the suspension of business and labor. Purely ecclesiastical festivals are celebrated only in the Church, in choro, whilst the others exert an influence also in foro. To the first class belong especially festivals which have been in part abolished, on which the priests are obliged to hold mass pro populo. (Decision of the Congregatio pro interpretat. Conc. Trid., Sept. 28, 1852; vide Heuser, die Verpflichtung der Pfarrer für die Gemeinde zu appliciren: Düsseldorf, 1850; verb. mit der Tübinger theologischen Quartalschrift, 1853; Hft. II., p. 312, sq.). From an agreement between the State and the Church, the manner and mode, according to which the festivals are to be observed, have been determined. The older regulations are found in Tit. de feriis, Cod. Theodos. lib. II., tit. 8; Digestor. lib. II., tit. 12; Cod. Justin. lib. II., tit. 12. — Decret. can. XV., qu. IV.; dist. III., de consecrat. — Tit. X., de feriis lib. II., tit. 1. Later ones in John Conr. Irmischer's Staats- und Kirchenrechnungen über die christliche Sonntagsfeier: Erlangen, 1839-40. Piper, Kirchenrechnung, etc. Whilst in the Apostolic Church the strict legal observance of the Sabbath was abandoned, a spiritualistic apprehension of it (Tertullian, et al.), as also monkish asceticism, led back here and there to the Jewish principle, although it was modified by a legislation expressing the spirit of the Gospel. With right it was insisted, that ordinary worldly traffic, especially the administration of justice, should cease, that public labors be suspended, etc. But, inasmuch as the observance of festivals was regarded as a special means of grace, the Protestant Church found it necessary to restore their proper significance (vide Luther, in den Werken von Walch, VI., 2257, verb. X., 56, X., 1947; comp. Augsburg Conf. Art. 26, 28; Apologie der Conf., Art. 4, 8; Concordienformel, Art. 10; Conf. Helvetica, II., Art. 24). From time to time, the State also found it necessary to renew the regulations concerning the ecclesiastical observance of the festivals, and to threaten the manifold violations and abuses with punishment. This has become specially urgent lately, inasmuch as the requirement to observe Sunday and other festivals was mistakenly regarded as intolerance, and the abolition of the same was presupposed in connection with the restoration of religious freedom.—Literature: AUGUSTI, Denkwürdigkeiten, Bd. I.-III. BINTERIM, Denkwürdigkeiten, &c., Bd. V., Hft. 1, p. 119-560. H. F. JACOBSON. — Beck.

Ferrer, Vincentius, born Jan. 23, 1357, in Valencia, of pious parents, was early destined for the Dominican order, which he entered Feb. 5, 1374. He practised the severest mortifications of the flesh. But he equally distinguished himself by his literary labors. He spent from 1380-84 in the Universities of Barcelona and Lerida. As a result of his studies he wrote: Tract. de moderno Eccl. schismate compilatus ad christ. princ. D. Petrum, regem Aragonum, in which he advocated the claims of Clem. VII. For this he obtained the D. D. from Lerida, in 1384. At the close of 1384 he returned to Valencia, and there lectured upon theology, and preached until 1391. Then Peter de Luna induced him to travel through France, and he spent some time at the royal court. Probably during this period he wrote his Tract. valde utilis et consolatorius in tentationibus circa fidem, and Tract. de vita spirituali, and possibly his treatise de sacrificio Missæ atque ejus ceremoniis (originally written in Spanish). Returning to Valencia King John I., of Aragon, appointed him one of his councillors, and confessor of the Queen. In 1395 Bened. XIII. (Peter de Luna) called him to Avignon as Magister sacri palatii. After serving in this capacity for two years, F. resolved to execute the long cherished purpose of going forth as a public preacher of repentance and conversion, among the people of that degenerate age. The extreme wickedness of the times was calculated to stir the heart of such a man as F., and loudly demanded some special checks. F. was not content with enduring mere private mortification. He desired to be an instrument in raising up his fellowmen from their moral and social degradation. He determined, accordingly, to go forth; Benedict XIII. sought to dissuade him; but failing, he finally appointed him Apostolic preacher, with the title of special legate, and invested him with large powers. In 1397 F. began his apostolic labors, and devoted to them the rest of his life. Soon a crowd of admirers followed him, who were formed into a congregation with prescribed rules and usages. Self-castigation was their first law. On their processions through towns and villages they sang hymns composed by F. Not only laymen, but clergy joined their ranks

F. often preached three times a day with great earnestness and effect. His sermons were less theological than moral, and full of allegorical interpretations of Scripture. In this way he visited Spain, France, Italy, England, Scotland, and Ireland. Even Bishops and noblemen thronged to hear him. The people regarded him as a saint, and almost worshipped him. On one of his tours he died suddenly at Vannes, Brittany, April 5, 1419. John V., Duke of Brittany, helped to carry his coffin; his wife, a daughter of Charles V. of France, had washed his corpse. — He was canonized June 29, 1455, by Calixtus III., though the bull of canonization was first published by Pius II., Oct. 1, 1458. — (See Act. Sanct. Antw. April., T. I., 5; Apr., p. 479, &c. A. BZOVII, Ann. Eccl. Colon. Agripp., 1622, T. XV. O. RAYNALDI, Ann. Ecc. Ed. c. nott. J. D. MANSI, Lucæ, 1747–56, T. VIII. HELLER's Leben F.: Berlin, 1830. HELLER.*

Festus, M. Porcius, succeeded Felix, under Nero, as procurator of Palestine. When the case of Paul, whom Felix had left a prisoner, was brought before Festus, he would have discharged him but for Paul's appeal to the Emperor. Josephus reports (Ant. 20, 8, 9; B. J., 2, 14, 1) that Festus, like Felix, was greatly occupied with quelling the robber-hordes (Sicarii) which then infested Palestine, but pursued a more equitable course with them. He appears to have served as procurator from c. 60–62 A. D. For Jos., l. c., says he assumed the office whilst Pallas was still in favor with Nero; but Tacit. ann., 14, 65, says Pallas was poisoned in a. 62. The precise date of his term of office must be ascertained by determining those of his predecessors and successors. (See WINER's Lex. Festus and Paul; ANGER, de temporum in actis apost. ratione, 99, &c.; NEANDER's Planting, &c.; WIESELER, Chronol. d. Apostelgesch., 89–99).

KLAIBER.*

Fetichism is the lowest form of religion, the rudest kind of idolatry. It is found only among the most degraded tribes of Africa, Northern Asia, N. America, and the cannibals of Oceania. It forms the first step of human beings whose life differs but little from that of brutes, towards specifically human religious consciousness. Mere self-consciousness (which, in one view, is only the highest form of that concentrated self-feeling found even among brutes) cannot rise, essentially, above animal life, until it acquires a presentiment of the existence of divine powers ruling over men and the world. In Fetichism we discover the obscure working of such a presentiment. The Fetichist is, as already stated, in a state of deep moral and intellectual debasement; he neither knows himself nor nature; his soul is simply crowded with confused sensuous impressions. His will is under the control of desires and passions. Surrounding objects are viewed not as they stand, but as they are useful or hurtful to him. In such a person the religious instinct, in its dreamy operations, will regard the object fixing its attention (God) merely in its practical relations to man, in spite of the efforts of that instinct to rise to higher conceptions; it cannot get beyond separate sensuous objects. It confounds, therefore, the highest ideas it can form with the lowest embodiment of them; that which is most general, with the minutest outward forms. The feeling after God makes its first faint attempt to spread its wings, and soar aloft, but then the fearful bondage of the sensual world is fully revealed. Desiring to find God man grasps the nearest object which seems best to him, the image of which is prominent amid the chaos of his soul, and transfers to it his sense of dependence; he regards it as the source of his happiness, the power by which he is protected from all evil. — This serves to explain why such persons do not select objects of worship which might commend themselves aesthetically, by their beauty, their greatness, magnificence, &c. (as the sun, moon, stars, the sea, &c.), but some single thing which suddenly presents itself, as manifestly and immediately beneficial or injurious. The enormous absurdity of such a transfer of the idea of God to insignificant single objects of this sort, must become obvious to the worshipper, if he shall not wholly cease to be a man, and must gradually correct itself. This is done, partly, by multiplying these objects of worship, and assigning different times to the worship of each. If we further consider that people of this grade have only what is sensuously near to them, and outwardly in their profession, and that they, therefore, desire to have these representatives of deity, or parts of deity in immediate proximity to themselves; moreover, that they, according to the degraded condition of their will, regard these deifications only as means by which (in a magical incomprehensible manner) some good is secured, or some evil is prevented, — we have a complete conception of Fetichism. — Let us now look at these deified objects themselves, and then at the form of the relation religiously sustained to them.

The term Fetich was introduced by de Brosses through his treatise, du culte des dieux Fétiches, 1760. He obtained it from French merchants, who used it as a corruption of the Portuguese Fetisso, from facere, in the sense of pretending to do something, to bewitch; hence a fetich was something which could bewitch persons. Some fetiches are worshipped by an entire tribe, as the tiger in N. Guinea and Dahomey, the serpent by the Whydah negroes; and even their own shadow by those of Benin. But each village, also, each family, and individual, has a particular fetich. A piece of wood or a stone, against which a negro strikes his foot, a tree or an animal, perhaps something about which he dreamed the night before, becomes his private fetich (Obi, Kisseey, &c.). Some one may have a fetich which is supposed to possess extraordinary power to injure others. In such cases no pains or cost will be spared to get it from the owner. Large collections of fetiches are highly prized. A traveller on the coast of Guinea found 20,000 in one negro's house. — The fetiches are either natural (an animal, reptile, &c.) or artificial, as a tuft of hair, a skin, horn, claw, or a head of a beast fastened on a pole, as a representation of the beast itself and the power supposed to dwell in it. Sometimes the fetich is a fanciful unmeaning combination of objects in some frightful form. But even such monstrous combinations indicate the awakening consciousoss that the divine being is something above and beyond any sensible objects (see CRUIKSHANK'S Gold Coast of Africa: London, 1854). These fetiches were not, primarily, instruments of sorcery (though now used as such), but real idols. Offerings of water, milk, &c., are laid before them morning and evening, and they are always approached with religious fear. Their favor is propitiated by fasting and celibacy. They are besought for protection against lightning, wild beasts, poison, and murder, against sickness and all accidents. Before going to battle their aid is invoked, and after a victory sacrifices are offered to them. They guard property; a figure resembling a scarecrow in our cornfields, standing upon the field of a negro, would serve as a security against thefts. They are called upon to attest oaths; and in their dim presentiments of a future life, the negroes think they must give an account of themselves to their respective fetiches. But the really slight moral hold which these fetiches have upon their worshippers is apparent from their being cast away (or even broken up and burned) as soon as they seem no longer to serve the desires of their devotees. In such cases they seem to have been considered mere means of sorcery. The priests or fetich-men, especially, use them thus. Here we observe a resemblance between Fetichism and the Shahmanism of the Buddhists.—From the preceding sketch we see that Fetichism is pantheism in its rudest form. It lacks the first conditions of a mythical religion. And yet two facts must be kept in view: 1) that even among nations which worship fetiches, there are some movements towards a higher grade of religion, as among the Gallas. Some seem to have the idea of the unity of the supreme deity; others (the Congos) hold to a sort of dualism, of a supreme good and evil principle. 2) Conversely, also, some higher forms of religion appear in some respects to sink to the level of F.; as the animal-worship of the Egyptians; and the ἑῶνα of the early Greek tribes, were probably fetiches (Schleiermacher, Glaubensl., I., § 8). Fetichism also reminds one of such punishments of the gods as that inflicted upon the Hellespont by Xerxes (HERODOT., VII., 34, &c.), of the conduct of the ancient Romans when certain mischances befel them (SUTTON., Aug. 16; Calig. 5), of the maltreatment of patron saints by modern Christian Romans, and even of the vulgar belief in witchcraft everywhere found.—(See MERNERS' Allgem. krit. Gesch. d. Religionen, 2 Bde.: Hanover, 1806. RITTERS Erdk. I. Dr. WETZ., Vorles. über die Religion, &c.: Berlin, 1827, pp. 197–241).

H. PARET.*

Feuillants, a branch of the Cistercian order, so called from the abbey of Feuillans (about 18 miles from Toulouse) which was subject to Cîteaux. They owe their existence to Jean de la Barrière, who became abbot of Feuillans in 1574, and endeavored to reform the abuses which had crept in, and restore the earlier discipline of the order. He was violently opposed by the monks at Cîteaux, but was sustained by a decree of the Pope, 1586–87, who not only forbid the Cistercians to disturb the Feuillants, but allowed the latter to found other monasteries of monks, and of nuns, upon their reformed plan, and desired a number of their monks to be sent to Rome, where two monasteries were assigned to them. Henry III., of France, also requested sixty to be sent to Paris, and furnished them with a new and handsome edifice in the Rue St. Honoré. The successor of Barrière obtained the title of vicar-general of the congregation, its release from amenability to Cîteaux, and in fact the elevation of the Feuillants to an independent order. They spread rapidly, both in Italy and France, and continued to flourish until the French revolution. Henry IV. and Pope Urban VIII. conferred some special privileges upon it. Among its distinguished members were Charles de St. Paul, an ecclesiastical writer, Cardinal Bona, and Joseph Morotio the historian of his own and other orders. (See Ersch and Gruber, Encycl. Bd. 43). S.*

Ficinus, Marsilius, an enthusiastic Platonist, was born at Florence, Oct. 19, 1433, the same year in which Cosmo de Medicis was driven from that city, and fled to Venice. The reading of Cicero early directed F.'s attention to Plato. After the return of Cosmo to Florence the father of F. introduced the youth to Cosmo, who encouraged him to translate Plato's works, and took him into his own house to afford him a better opportunity of pursuing his philosophical studies. The sons of Cosmo became F.'s pupils, and a warm friendship grew up between him and them. F. dedicated all his works to the family. He remained twelve years in the house of Cosmo. In five years he laid his 4 books institutionum ad Platoniam disciplinam, before Cosmo. Though highly approving of his production, he was advised to defer publication until he had mastered the Greek language, and studied Plato in the original. At the suggestion of Cosmo F. prepared a Latin version of all Plato's works. This was finished in 1468, about which time he seems first to have delivered public lectures. His new doctrines were eagerly listened to, and whoever heard him became his and Plato's friend. Reuchlin, it is said, caught the spirit of Orientalism from F. during his visit to Rome. Plato began to be regarded with veneration, as the founder of a new religion. F. was charged with keeping a light continually burning in his room, before an image of Plato, the only one he kept there. He saw in the life of Socrates many points corresponding with those which marked that of Jesus Christ. He called his associates "Brothers in Plato." In his Theologia Platonica and de Religione Christiana he endeavored to prove the agreement between both. In 1477 he was consecrated a priest and obtained the charge of two churches. In 1484 he obtained a canonry in the cathedral at Florence, and preached with great acceptance. Then he translated the Enneads of Plotinus, and a number of Neo-platonic writers. From 1492–99 he labored at new commentaries on Plato, and lectured upon Paul's epistles, which death (Oct. 1, 1499) prevented him from completing. He was small in person, and sickly, but very temperate, laborious, and patient, and a faithful friend. His complete works were publ.: Venice, 1516; Basel, 1561; Paris, 1641.—Besides the works named he wrote An Exposition of Paul's Ep. to the Romans;

six Discourses; a Treatise upon God; a Dialogue between Paul and the Soul, to show that we can come to God only through God; an Address of Christians to Sixtus IV.; a Treatise upon the Divine character of Christian Ethics; upon love, &c.—(RITTER, Gesch. d. chr. Philos., V., 272–91. SIEVEKING, Gesch. d. platon. Akademie zu Florenz: Göttingen, 1812).

DR. PRESSEL.*

Finns, Conversion of the.—About the middle of the 12th century, Christianity first penetrated into Finland. No other European country is so divided by creeks, rivers, and marshes, and hence also no people was more difficult to train to uniformity of doctrine and worship. Their language even, it is said, lacks appropriate words for church, altar, and priest. Finn, in the middle ages, was synonymous with sorcerer, all surrounding nations so generally believing their black arts. Their old religion reveals a profounder view of nature than that of any other northern people. Their worship strikingly authenticates its affinity to the other religions of northern nations by constantly and prominently revealing a Trinity. An obstinate race, Christianity met with peculiar difficulties among them. Hence, also, long after their conversion, heathen and Christian worship, superstition and faith were most strangely blended among them. Although the northern apostle, Ansgar, had received authority from Gregory IV., over Finland, as over the whole North, no priest, unless Erick, who is said to have been slain, had ventured among the Finns. They continued in the blindest heathenism, had little or no conception of Christianity, and, like the heathen Esthen, followed the worthy profession of the old North—piracy, incessantly annoying the shores of Sweden. Furnished thus with a welcome pretext, Erich IX., the Holy, King of Sweden, uniting with himself a very zealous oppressor, Bishop Henry, of Upsala, of English nativity, and brought to Sweden by Cardinal Nicholas, waged war against the Finns. Sweden, since A. D. 1008, had Christian kings. King Inge, 1075, prohibited all idolatry, subdued the rebelling heathen and secured the full triumph of Christianity in Sweden. Bishop Henry had taken to heart the papal bull, encouraging all princes to convert the heathen with fire and sword. Punishments and violence, Rome's frequent resort in the Christianization of the North, were now also almost exclusively to convert the Finns. The Bishop himself, seizing the sword, followed the war. Before setting out, Erich sent an embassy, declaring war against the Finns, should they not freely submit and accept the Christian faith. They insolently refusing, the King, landing where Abo now lies, smote the Finns in a bloody engagement, compelling them thus to accept laws from their conquerors. Although believing to be doing God service, Erich was sorrowful, especially since so many souls had to be sacrificed before learning to know Christ. To compensate the living for this harm, he caused Bishop Henry to baptize the greater portion of the Finns in the fountain of Upsala, afterwards St. Henry's fountain. He built a church at Rendamecki, where he erected a bishopric, extending also over Esthland, and which was removed, A. D. 1300, to Abo. Here Rolof, a visigoth, was the first Bishop. Folquin, Julius and the Englishman Thomas, succeeded him. The King returning to Sweden, Bishop Henry remained in Finland. Entering into a nobleman's house in his absence, he procured food for himself by force. Balli, the nobleman, whom he had disciplined, soon afterwards returning, followed him and slew him on the ice, on the Kiulo marsh, in the beginning of 1158. He cut off the Bishop's fingers and appropriated the rings to himself. The place of his death was said to have been distinguished by numerous miracles. The Pope canonized him, declaring him to be the patron saint of Sweden and Finland, and ordering a yearly fast in his honor, on the 19th of January. His image, in full bishop's attire, with a battle-axe at his side and the murderer at his feet, was erected in the Finnish churches for universal veneration; the cathedral of Abo was afterwards erected in honor of him. After its completion, in 1300, his remains were removed into it as its most precious treasure. The Russians settling, A. D. 1174, in Wätka, Christianity was thus introduced into this northern territory among the Finns (comp. Stahl, Gesch. der russ. Kirche, I., p. 172). All these pretended conversions were evidently only conquests, producing at most only a hypocritical worship, without effecting a real change of moral character. The Tavasts, especially, remained the sworn enemies of Christianity and its messengers. Hence Jarl Birger, in the spring of 1248, led a large army against them. He conquered, compelled the Finns to be baptized, and built the castle at Tavastehus, that its strong garrison might keep the people in subjection. To establish the Swedish dominion and, ostensibly, Christianity in Finland, a third and long contemplated invasion was accomplished in 1293, during the minority of King Birger, by his guardian, Torkel Knutson, regent of the kingdom. The Pope approved this, granting the participating knights and warriors the same indulgences as to the knights of the cross. The regent led the army in person, subdued the refractory Finns and caused his companion, Bishop Peter, of Westerås, everywhere to preach to and baptize them. As baptism and masses alone would not hold the Finns in subjection, he built the strong castle of Wiborg. In 1300 the Pope appointed a jubilee for all Christendom. Torkel Knutson celebrated this in Finland, the bishop's See being now also removed from Rendamecki to Abo. Zealous and moderate he introduced law and order among the peasantry. Christian morals and education gradually advanced under the subsequent rulers of Finland. Heathenism was continually repressed, finding adherents only in the remotest regions of Tavastland, Oesterbotten, and Sawolax. The Bishop of Abo and his chapter rose to great influence, and worship was there celebrated with great pomp. Churches increased, and towards the close of the 15th century, the wooden churches were more and more exchanged for stone ones. The cathedral school of Abo was very numerously attended. Six cloisters were gradually established, the oldest of which was the Dominican cloister of Abo. The ecclesiastics received their tithes and surplice fees mostly in ermine and other costly furs. In the upland regions, however, removed from the sea, heathenism still existed for a long time by the side of Christianity, and only later did the measurably excusable hatred of the Finns against those who endeavored to urge the gospel of peace upon them by open force, disappear. — (Comp. Olof Dalin's Geschichte Schwedens, Bd. II. Fr. Rueh's Finland und seine Bewohner: Leipzig, 1809).

DR. PRESSEL. — Derr.

Firmilianus, B. of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, c. 250, was one of the most respected Asiatic bishops, and a special friend of Origen (EUSEB., VI., 27), who spent some time with F. after his banishment from Alexandria. F. was somewhat prominent in the controversy of Cyprian with Stephan about heretical baptism (see Art.). Stephan had previously broken fellowship with the bishops of Asia Minor and their churches. At the beginning of the controversy Cyprian, accordingly wrote to F. upon the subject, and received in reply an assurance that he and his churches agreed with Cyprian, not only in regard to the nullity of heretical baptism, but the arrogance of the Romish Bishop. This letter, the only production of F. extant, is preserved in a literal Latin translation in Cyprian's letters (CYPR., ep., 75), and is one of the most valuable documents in the controversy. On account of its opposition to the pretensions of the Roman See, Romanists endeavored to suppress it (hence it is not found in the ed. of Erasmus and Minutius), and then to prove it to be spurious. Its genuineness, however, has been fully vindicated. — (See RETTBERG, Cyprian, 189. WALCH, Ketzerhist., II., 321, &c.). KLAIBER.*

First-born the, both of man and animals, were to be sacred to the Lord, according to the Mosaic law (Ex. 13 : 2, 15; 22 : 28; 34 : 19; Numb. 3 : 12, 13; 8 : 16; 18 : 15; Luke 2 : 23), and sacred as the first-born, to the exclusion of every other consideration (Levit. 27 : 26). The following difference in the mode of consecration was prescribed. The first-born of men were not to be slain, but devoted to the service of the temple. The tradition, therefore, in support of which Onkelos quotes Ex. 24 : 5 (Mischn. Sebach. 14, 4; Targ. hieros., 49, 3), that primitively the offering of sacrifices devolved upon the first-born sons of the tribes of Israel, is quite probable (comp. Ex. 19 : 22). This rule was subsequently changed by the law of Sinai, which assigned public sanctuary services to the tribe of Levi (Numb. 3 : 12), so that thenceforth the first-born of the other tribes were merely to be presented in the temple a month after their birth (i. e., after the 33 days of the mother's purification, Lev. 12 : 4), and to be redeemed at the estimation of the priest, the sum to be regulated according to the seeming vigor of the child, and to the wealth of the parent, but not to exceed five shekels (Ex. 13 : 13; Numb. 18 : 16; Luke 2 : 22, 27; Mischn. Bechoroth, 8, 8; PHILO, opp. II., 234). This rule is still retained. When his first-born son is 31 days old, the orthodox Jew invites ten friends, with the Rabbin, to his house, lays the infant with a fixed sum (from 2 to 8 florins) upon a table, and on being asked,

"Would you rather give up your first-born, the first child of his mother, to the Lord, or redeem it with five shekels, after the shekels of the sanctuary, which is twenty gerahs?" answers, that he will redeem him. The Rabbin takes the money, swings it around the head of the child in token of his vicarious authority, and closes the ceremony with benedictions. Should the father die before the child is 31 days old, the mother is not bound to attend to his redemption, but must fasten a tablet of metal or parchment around his neck, with this inscription: "This first-born son is not yet redeemed;" thus he is bound, at a proper age to redeem himself (BUXTORF, Synag.). At present it is customary, also, for all male first-born to fast on the pass-over-eve. The redemption of the first-born of animals seems to have wholly ceased. — As the first-born of unclean animals could not be offered in sacrifice, they were also redeemed, a sheep or some other unclean animal, with one-fifth of their value, being substituted for them (Ex. 34 : 19, 20; Numb. 18 : 15; Levit. 27 : 27). — But the first-born of clean animals (εὖν χερσαίων, ὅσα πρὸς ὑγιεινότητος καὶ χρησὶν ἀνθρώπων, Philo), if physically perfect, had to be sacrificed within a year after it was eight days old (Numb. 18 : 17, 18). If it had a blemish it was to be eaten within the owner's gate (Deut. 15 : 19–23). The assumption of MICHAELIS and others (Mos. Recht, § 193, IV., 85; JAHN, III., 415; ROSEN-MÜLLER, Schol., II., 519), of a so-called "second-first-born" offering, cannot be proven, much less the substitution of the female for the male, which were against Deut. 15 : 19.

In this entire arrangement, and the consideration on which it was based, the Israelites stood alone. For although other nations offered first-fruits to their deities, in acknowledgment of the source of all mercies, none thus devoted the first-born of mankind or animals, excepting the Phoenicians, Carthaginians, and some cognate tribes, who sometimes offered their first-born sons, especially only sons, 1) on extraordinary occasions; 2) by an actual sacrificing of them; 3) as propitiatory sacrifices to the gods, or 4) as voluntary sacrifices (MOYERS, Phoen.). — In accordance with the custom and laws of most other nations, the Jews conferred special prerogatives upon first-born sons. The first-born son by his father's first marriage not only enjoyed the special respect of the household, but had right to a double portion of the estate (Deut. 21 : 17; see Talmud restrictions in Bechoroth, 8, 9), was recorded in the genealogical register as the first-born (Gen. 22 : 21, &c.; Numb. 3 : 2; 1 Sam. 8 : 2), represented his unmarried sisters, was called "the head," and, if his father was a prince, followed him as "chief in the kingdom," and even as high-priest (Gen. 49 : 3; 2 Chron. 21 : 3; cfr. HEROD., 6, 52; ROSEN., Morgld. III., 263). A father was expressly forbidden to transfer the rights of primogeniture to a younger son (Deut. 21 : 15–17), excepting in the way of punishment of the first-born (Gen. 49 : 3, &c.; 1 Kings 1 : 1, &c.). Whether a voluntary bartering of a birthright was allowed cannot be determined; the only case in the Bible is that of Esau (Gen. 25 : 29, &c.). First-born daughters enjoyed no other advantage than that of being first given in marriage (Gen. 29 : 26).—Already in the O. T. we find the conception of the individual first-born applied to the entire people of Israel (Ex. 4 : 22 ; 19 : 6 ; Jer. 31 : 9, 20). In the N. T. both the duties and rights, the sacrificing and priesthood of the first-born are represented as being combined and perfected in Christ (Rom. 8 : 29 ; Heb. 1 : 6 ; 12 : 23 ; Col. 1 : 18 ; James 1 : 18 ; Apoc. 14 : 4).

DR. PRESSER.*

First-fruits.—The religious custom of offering the first and best fruits of the season to the deity, as an expression of a sense of his superior claims (cf. Jer. 2 : 3) existed among most ancient nations, and may be traced back to Gen. 4 : 3, &c. In the Hebrew branch of the Shemites it became an established law. The law distinguishes two kinds of first-fruit gifts (at least as far as the distinction was applicable): 1) the solemn offering of first-fruits which the whole nation presented, 2) those first-fruits which each one was to consecrate to the Lord. Of the former kind two were offered: 1) the sheaf of first-fruits (doubtless of the earliest barley) for the solemn opening of the harvest (see Art.) on the second day of the passover, the 16th of Nisan. This sheaf was waved before the Lord by a priest, and combined with a burnt-offering, a meat-offering, and a drink-offering (Levit. 23 : 10–13); 2) the first-fruits of the two wave-loaves, seven weeks later, on Pentecost, which was properly the feast of the harvest (Levit. 23 : 15, &c.).—Besides these two great official first-fruits-offerings, each Israelite was to present a basketful of every kind of produce of the earth, as each successively ripened (Ex. 23 : 19 ; Deut. 26 : 2, &c. ; Numb. 18 : 12, &c. ; Neh. 10 : 38 ; Prov. 3 : 9). Some of these (as the fruits of trees) were brought in their natural state; others, as oil, wine, &c., in a prepared form, but before any person had tasted thereof. The first gatherings of wool (Deut. 18 : 4) and honey, at least once (2 Chron. 31 : 5 ; comp. Deut. 8 : 8), were also offered to the Lord. Of young trees no fruits should be taken until the fourth year, when their products were offered unto the Lord. After that their fruits might be eaten (Levit. 19 : 23, &c. ; cf. Jos. Ant., 4, 8, 19). This sort of first-fruits were not placed upon the altar, but went to the support of the priests (Ezek. 44 : 30, &c. ; cf. 2 Kings 4 : 42 ; Philo, opp. II., 233, sq. M.). Hence store-rooms were subsequently provided in the temple for these offerings and the tithes, and placed under a special keeper (2 Chron. 31 : 11, &c. ; Neh. 12 : 44 ; 13 : 5 ; Mal. 3 : 10). But this sort of first-fruits were often combined with meat-offerings (Levit. 2 : 14, &c. ; Numb. 15 : 17, &c. ; Josh. 5 : 11, &c.) ; and although private individuals preferred to bring their free-will-offerings along with the official first-fruit-offerings at the Passover and at Pentecost, as far as this was possible, Ewald goes too far in entirely combining the two kinds of first-fruit-offerings (see Passover).

As the law left the amount of these gifts to the good-will of the individual (Deut. 16 : 10 ; comp. 26 : 2), opportunity was had to make special subsequent regulations. The talmudist tracts Biccurim and Therumoth contain many such. The smallest amount allowed was $\frac{1}{4}$ of the prepared first-fruits. The particular products of which the first-fruits were to be offered, were specified. All had to grow in the holy land. Those mentioned in Deut. 8 : 8 were required, excepting dates instead of honey. Those living far away from the temple, might present their first-fruits dried; they were not to offer them before the Pentecost, nor after the feast of the Dedication. Prepared (as distinct from natural) first-fruits of Jewish districts beyond Palestine were also required, but they were mostly converted into money, and thus sent to the temple (Jos. Ant., 16, 6, 7 ; Philo, II., 568, 578, 592 ; cf. Tobit 1 : 7). There were also regulations for the use of these first-fruits by the priests, and penalties inflicted upon the people who partook of them (Levit. 22 : 6, &c. ; Numb. 18 : 11, &c.—See Winer's Lexicon ; SAALSCHÜTZ, mos. Recht, p. 343, &c. ; 416, &c. ; EWALD, Alterth., p. 226 ; 316, &c.). RÜETSCHL.*

Fish IXΘΥΣ, an ancient Christian symbol, referring sometimes to Christ himself, sometimes to Christians; to Christ, as the letters of ΙΧΘΥΣ are the initials of the formula $\text{Ιησοῦς Χριστός Θεοῦ Υἱός Σωτήρ}$ (Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour); to Christians, because Jesus called the apostles fishers of men (Matt. 4 : 18). The Talmudists also call the Messiah יֵשׁוּעַ , and associate him with the sign of the fish; and the miraculous fish in Tobit 6 : 1–8, is referred to the Redeemer (OPTAT. MILEV., contra Parmenian, III., 2).—As fish live in water, the water of baptism was considered the proper life-element of Christians, and hence baptisteries were called piscinæ. Heretics, on the contrary, are serpents and frogs, which live in marshes and filthy ponds. Often a fish with the monogram of Christ was engraved on signet-rings, on grave-lamps, or on tombstones. Clem. of Alex. calls Christ the fisher of mortals, who catches the clean, and rejects the others (so TERTULLIAN, de baptismo. See MÜNTER, Sinnbilder, &c., d. alten Chr.: Altona, 1825. AUGUSTI, Archæol. XII., 367, &c.). HAGENBACH.*

Fish and fishing among the ancient Hebrews.—The fish is a character in the Hebrew alphabet, though with the Syrian name Nun; as a numeral it denotes 50. As fish abounded in Egypt the Israelites became accustomed to their use (hence Numb. 11 : 5). Man was appointed to rule over them (Gen. 1 : 26 ; 9 : 2 ; Ps. 8 : 9). Moses allowed such as had fins and scales to be eaten, but not to be offered in sacrifice (Levit. 11 : 9–12). They are named as food in Matt. 7 : 10, &c., &c. Hence the dying of fish is considered a divine judgment (Is. 50 : 2 ; Hos. 4 : 3, &c.). They were caught in baskets or by striking them with a hatchet, or with harpoons, but chiefly in nets, during the night, or at early dawn. The fish-gate was on the west side of Jerusalem, and probably received its name from the fish-market there. Nehemiah (13 : 16) had to contend against the Tyrians selling fish on the Sabbath.—There are no fish in the Dead Sea, excepting at the mouth of the Jordan, although Ezek. 46 predicts the removal of this curse, a prophecy which is explained spiritually. The sea of Gennesareth abounds in fish (Jos.

2. J., III., 10, 7). Hasselquist found, in 1750, the silurus, mugil, and sparus Galilæus there. The distinguished comparative anatomist, v. Lapp, obtained a fish, through Dr. Barth, from the sea of Genn., which proved to be the chromis niloticus of Cuvier, or the labrus nilot. of Hasselquist (the ancient coracinus).—These fish are also found in the Nile, and in the waters near Alexandria; hence the opinion that there was some connection between the waters of Samaria and Galilee, and those of Egypt. REUCHLIN.*

Fisher, John, Bishop of Rochester, was born at Beverley, Yorkshire, A. D. 1453, 1455, or 1459. Already advantageously distinguished at Cambridge as an earnest student, he was, early in life, appointed Chancellor of the University. After entering the ministry he devoted himself with great zeal to the pastoral work, filling the office of Confessor to Margaret of Beauford, widowed Countess of Richmond, and mother of Henry VII. Influenced by him, the Countess established Christ and John's College, Cambridge, endowing and furnishing the first with approved teachers, and leaving means and instructions for the second in the hands of her executors, the Bishops of Rochester and Winchester. Henry VII. expressed unlimited confidence in Fisher by conferring upon him, 1504, the See of Rochester. Here Fisher manifested rare zeal and faithfulness, and, honored by the nation and King, and inseparably attached to a people almost adoring him, he reached a happy old age. The youthful Henry VIII., who ascended the throne in 1509, also declared, that in all his journeys he knew no man who, for learning and worth of character, could be compared to the Bishop of Rochester. Against Luther, Fisher faithfully assisted his King, and, to say the least, decidedly exercised the greatest influence upon the king's book, de septem sacramentis. The folio collection of Fisher's writings, shows him to have been one of the most zealous, though not shrewdest, defenders of the Catholic Church. (Volumen, quo Lutheri errores refutavit; aliud, in quo sacri sacerdotii auctoritatem defendit; homiliæ ad plebem adversus 41 Lutheri articulos: Würzburg, 1594, written at first in English, but afterwards translated by Paines into Latin; de veritate corporis et sanguinis Christi in eucharistia lib. 5 adversus Ecolampadium; de septem sacramentis; meditationes in septem psalmos Davidicos penitentiales; contra captivitatem Babylonicam Lutheri; de matrimonio regis Angliæ; precationum liber; pro Lutheri damnatione liber; tract. de charitate). His tragical end as a martyr to the freedom of the Church, gained him greater renown, than these literary labors. For this, the King's guilty passion for Anne Boleyn furnished the occasion. All the Bishops united in declaring Henry's first marriage invalid, Fisher alone refusing. Incensed at this, Henry gladly seized the opportunity to humble and punish the troublesome and refractory counsellor. In Addington, Kent, was a pretended and somewhat notorious prophetess, Elizabeth Barton. A certain Deering declaring, in a special book, her revelations to be silly stuff, she attracted no further notice at court, until the divorce question and separation from Rome agitated men's minds. Being now brought forward and instructed by the opposing party, she enjoined the King to concede the rights of the Pope; exterminate the new faith; and retain his rightful spouse, likewise declaring that, should he marry Anne Boleyn, he would not retain his throne beyond a month, and die a disgraceful death. Among others, Bishop Fisher was weak enough to encourage her. Arrested and brought to trial, she acknowledged her deception, remarking truly, that her learned assistants were more censurable than she, an ignorant maid. She was found guilty of treason and executed. Fisher was accused of collusion with her. Cromwell intimated the possibility of pardon, by seeking the royal clemency. Fisher refused; and, confined by age and frailty, addressed a written defence and justification to the Lords, alleging "it could be no transgression of the law, to have held Miss Barton, upon the evidence of worthy and learned men, for a moral person, and, with this preconceived opinion, to have conversed with her and heard from her, that the King would not long survive the divorce; that he was no conspirator, and could affirm before the throne of Christ, his ignorance of any crime or maliciousness, which any one on earth might contemplate against the royal majesty." Still, Fisher was fined 300 pounds redemption money for his personal property. Fourteen days after the condemnation of Miss Barton, the Council required from the Bishop and More the oath of allegiance to the proposed succession. Both were willing, without reserve, excepting only that part of the form declaring the King's first marriage invalid. Both were cast into the Tower, and deprived of their revenues for life. Fisher was more than twelve months in prison, want compelling him to entreat the tyrant for clothing to cover his nakedness. About this time, Paul III. made Fisher a cardinal. The King was annoyed. Fisher already on the brink of eternity, said: "Were the red hat lying at my feet, I would not stoop to pick it up." The King in turn declared: "Paul may send him the hat, but he shall have no head for it." Hence (June 17) he was tried before the Chancellor, judges, and several peers, for denying the King's spiritual supremacy, and condemned to a traitor's death. The King of France vainly interceded for him. He was executed, June 22, 1535, aged 78 years. Carefully dressing himself the same morning, his servant reminded him, that after two hours he would forever lay aside these things. He replied: "What then? Remember you not that this is my wedding day?" Frail in body, he was borne to execution in a chair. Opening, at random, the New Testament in his hand, at John 17: 3-4, he read this, closed the book and said: "Here is wisdom enough for me to my life's end." Reaching the scaffold, he cast away his staff, calling out, "Courage feet; doubtless ye can yet travel the little way still before you." Ascending the scaffold unassisted, he briefly addressed the spectators, declaring that he came to die for the faith of the holy Catholic Church of Christ; after which praying, he laid his head patiently upon the block. With one stroke it was severed from his body. Thus died this reverend, upright, and pious prelate, a martyr to freedom of conscience. Soon after, More shared his fate. The King's wrath still insatiate, Fisher's head was put up on a spear near London Bridge, and his naked body exposed, during several hours, to public gaze, and afterwards buried without shroud or coffin. His numerous manuscripts found in prison were burned. All were deeply pained at the end of this worthy and great man, but not one in England dared denounce this horrid murder. Hence the martyr's image beams more resplendently in the judgment of posterity; and even the Protestant Church, whose violent opponent he was in life, crowns his head, felled by the tyrant's sword, with esteem and love. PRESSEL.—Derr.

Fistula (also canna, cannula, calamus, arundo, pugillare, siphon, pipa) was a hollow reed used in the Western Church from the 8th to the 13th centuries, in drinking the wine of the Lord's Supper, to prevent spilling any of it. The Greek C. use a spoon.—(See J. Voort, hist. fistula eucharist.: Bremæ, 1740. SPITTLER, Gesch. d. Kelche im Abendm.: Lemgo, 1780. AUGUSTI, Archæol., VIII., 485).

HAGENBACH.*

Flacius, Matthias (Flacich), sometimes surnamed Illyricus from his native country, was one of the most remarkable characters of the second period of the Reformation, distinguished for the persevering energy with which he contended for the pure Lutheran doctrine, and a mode of worship and form of organization agreeing therewith, and for the tragical issue of his sincere, albeit passionate, zeal in the cause he espoused.—F. was born in Albona, which then belonged to Venice, where, after his father's death, he obtained his further education. As a youth of 17 years he was fired with love for religion and the Bible, and a desire to serve both with his heart and pen. Accordingly he applied to a relative, Lupetinus, provincial of the Minorites, for admission into that order, in the hope of being sent to Padua or Bologna, and promised in compensation the half of his inheritance. But Lupetinus, a pious and learned man, who afterwards died a martyr to the truth, advised him otherwise, told him of Luther, of Luther's writings, and that he might learn a better theology in Germany than in the monasteries of Italy. F. first went to Basel, where Dr. Grynæus kindly received him, thence (1540) to Tübingen. There his countryman, Matthias Illyricus, gave him a home, and he soon found a friend in Leonard Fuchs. In 1541 he went to Wittenberg, where he sustained himself by giving private lessons in Greek and Hebrew, and became intimate with Dr. Eber and others. During the next three years he was tortured with the most terrible spiritual conflicts, so that he often longed for death. At length he was led to Luther, whose own, similar, temptations qualified him to minister to such afflicted souls. This explains F.'s glowing zeal for Luther's views. They were not merely a matter of theory with him, but of lively experience.—Simultaneously with this happy change in the state of his mind his temporal circumstances improved; he was appointed Professor of O. T. Literature, and married, Luther attending his wedding.

But this did not last long. New troubles broke in upon him, and the rest of his life was a concatenation of trials. The sad issue of the Smalcald war (1547) drove him from Wittenberg. He went to Braunschweig and taught school. It is true Prince Moritz recalled him to W., but his days of peace were past. Intestine eccl. agitations succeeded the wars without. The Emperor was bent upon carrying through the Augsburg Interim, and Moritz, who was greatly indebted to him, would have assented to this, but for the opposition of his subjects. The work of adjusting this difficulty fell upon Melanchthon (see Art.). The result of M.'s efforts was the Leipsc Interim (see Adiaphora), the concessions of which gave offence to many. Among these F. was prominent. With untiring zeal he employed every means to avert what he considered the danger threatening the truth; but unavailingly. The new order of things was put into execution. F. could no longer stay in Wittenberg. Committing his lectures to another person, and leaving his wife behind, he went to Hamburg, where he found friends of his own views. By their advice he returned to Magdeburg, from that point to contend against the evil. He addressed a letter in vindication of his course to the Wittenbergers, and offered to return if promised a free and safe avowal of his views. Receiving no answer, he published his letter. Stricter measures having been used to enforce the Interim, he published several writings against it. And although in these he earnestly denounced what he thought wrong, it must be acknowledged that he avoided all harsh personalities, and was prompted not by ambition, but by an all-absorbing zeal for views which he deemed essential to the safety of the Church.—In Magdeburg F. shared the dangers of the besieged city. He encouraged the citizens in their resistance, although the enemy threatened to hang him. But he escaped; for in the last extremity of the city Moritz raised the siege, turned his army against the Emperor, and espoused the evangelical cause.—As a proof that F. was not controlled by mere party spirit, we find that in the Osiandrian controversy he took Melanchthon's part, although the Duke of Prussia offered him a large reward if he would sustain Osiander, and the Wittenbergers were then insisting upon his being expelled from Köthen.—During the following years he was engaged in a series of theological controversies with G. Major, in defence of the pure doctrine of justification by faith; V. Strigel, in defence of man's natural inability to good; Schwenkfeld in defence of the efficacy of the means of grace, especially the sacraments.—He found time also for other labors. The want of a defence of the truth against some plausible Romish objections led him to prepare a catalogus testium veritatis, the object of which was to show that in every age of the Church there had been faithful witnesses for the truths advocated by the evangelical party. But he rendered still greater service by projecting the "Magdeburg Centuries" (see Art.), of which great work he was the animating spirit. Soon after commencing it (1557) he was appointed Professor at the new University of Jena, which became the citadel of rigid Lutheranism. It was the aim of this party, at whose head stood Flacius, to maintain what they deemed the pure doctrines, by unambiguous definitions of them, and the explicit exclusion of errors. By their advice the "Sächsische Confutationsschrift" was drawn up, which all the churches and schoolmasters were bound to observe, and which was to be publicly read in the churches every Sunday. The strict enforcement of this measure led to F.'s downfall. It threatened the prosperity of the University. The Duke began to think it best to check clerical authority. He instituted a consistory to which all the theologians, even, were to submit their writings for censorship. F. and his colleagues remonstrated, and came into collision with the court. At the close of 1561 F. and his associates were deprived of their offices. F. spent five years in Regensburg, then accepted a call to Antwerp, where he tried to dissuade his friends from all violent insurrection against the civil powers, and when they were driven from A. he went to Frankfort, where his large family had arrived before him. After one year he had to quit this refuge also. He went to Strassburg. There he hoped to be employed in the High-school, but was disappointed. His domestic circumstances pressed him sorely. But in the midst of all he commenced another great work, which the necessities of the times seemed loudly to demand: Clavis Scripturæ Sacræ, a kind of Biblical Dictionary. This was followed by his Glossary (or short commentary) of the N. T. An opinion maintained in the Clavis, that original sin was not something accidental, but the very substance of the natural man, subjected him to violent assaults.—He had to leave Strassburg; went to Frankfort, and died in the hospital there in his 55th year. — For an unfavorable account of F. see PLANCK, Gesch. d. prot. Lehrbegriffs. In his vindication: DR. A. TWESTEN, M. Flacius Illyricus, eine Vorlesung. Mit autobiograph. Beilagen, &c., von Hermann Roszel: Berlin, bei G. Bethge, 1844). KLING.*

Flagellants (flagellantes), verberantes, crucifratres, cruciferi, acephali (because they tore loose from the Rom. hierarchy), albi, fratres in albis, bianchi, are the names of diseased forms of religious life which appeared from the 13th to the 15th cent., and the causes of which must be sought in the character of Romish piety, in the laxity of Church discipline, the degeneracy of the prevalent eccl. means of grace, and the peculiarities of the age. — As P. Damiani's (see Art.) mode of scourging spread, true penitence assumed more degraded forms. The whole system of fastings and penances was an externalization of religion, based upon an extreme judaizing overvaluation of works. But the evil was magnified by the system of indulgences, which encouraged the hope that the offended justice of God could be satisfied by frivolous penances, performed without regard to inner feelings. However earnestly the Rom. C. declared priests to be God's vicars in pardoning sin, the levity with which such pardon was granted, awakened an unanswerable prejudice against its validity, in all deeply convicted persons. And this prejudice was aggravated by the frivolous readiness of the Church in dispensing laws and excommunications, in numbers proportioned to the unworthiness of those who exercised eccl. authority. Hence, on the one hand, heresies multiplied and spread, especially such as enjoined the severest asceticism, and, on the other, the common people, who remained externally faithful to the Church, were ready to enter any road of error which might open.

The earliest flagellants arose under Anthony of Padua (1195–1231). In Perugia, also, after the terrible wars between the Guelphs and Ghibellines (1261), many citizens, of all classes and ages, were powerfully seized with a spirit of penitent sorrow, and began to go in pairs through the streets, scourging themselves with leather thongs, until blood flowed down their backs. From Perugia they spread even to Rome; and as the practice was followed by actual moral improvement, the Pope protected them, especially as he favored the Guelphs. The Ghibellines, however, forbid them to enter their districts. When this phenomena disappeared from Italy, and previous immoralities returned with increased force, similar movements arose beyond the Alps. Indeed, in 1261, large companies of flagellants marched through Carniola, Carinthia, Austria, Moravia, Bohemia, even reaching to Hungary and Poland. They marched two or three abreast, with the upper part of their bodies bare, faces veiled, carrying crosses, or banners, and scourged themselves for 33 days, twice a day, singing hymns under the operation, all in commemoration of the 33 years of the Saviour's life. Women scourged themselves privately. At first priests joined them; but they soon withdrew, and charged the flagellants with contempt for the hierarchy. They were denounced, and persecuted, and by the end of 1261 already had almost disappeared from Germany.

The 14th cent. was properly the period of these flagellant pilgrimages. The fanaticism first appeared, again, in Italy, but there excited only two small movements, the chief, that under the Dominican Venturinus, of Bergamus. The mightiest occasion for this fanaticism was furnished by the plague, which, beginning in China, was brought by merchant vessels, 1347, from the Levant to Italy, and swept through Europe. It was most fatal in Italy. In Florence 60,000, in Venice 100,000 souls perished. In Germany it carried off 1,200,000 persons, though it raged there less than in France and Italy. Of Barefooted monks 124,434 perished; a proof, probably, of their zeal in ministering to the suffering. This fearful visitation seemed to loosen all social and civil bonds. Some despaired, many abandoned themselves to sensual pleasures. — On April 17, 1349, in Easter-week, the first Flagellant society came to Magdeburg from Pirna; another entered Würzburg on May 2; about the middle of June 200 reached Spire from Suabia, whose example was so contagious that 200 boys, of 12 years, formed a society. Thus the fanaticism spread through Germany, to Denmark, and England. Many women joined the processions. These companies were organized with the following rules: the person joining had to confess, to forgive his enemies, to obtain his wife's consent, and have a certain amount for his maintenance (at least 11 shillings and 4 pence, i. e., 4d per day), as begging was forbidden; obedience to the leaders was especially enjoined. All intercourse with women was prohibited under penalties. When a company approached a town they formed themselves into a regular procession. The candles, crosses, and banners were borne in front, then followed the penitents, two and two, wearing a red cross on their clothes. One of the company commenced singing, and all joined in. As they entered the town the bells were rung. On coming before the church all kneeled, and as certain lines were sung, they prostrated themselves on the ground with outstretched arms, forming a cross, and remained thus until the leader gave them a hint to rise. This was done thrice, after which the residents invited them to a meal. — Whenever they did penance, scourged themselves, they went to an open place, a graveyard or woods, took off their shoes, and upper garments, formed a circle, put on an apron, and laid themselves down in a posture which indicated the besetting sin. The leader then touched one of the brothers with the scourge, saying —

"Stant af durch der reinen martel ere und huete dich vor den sünden mere,"

and thus passed around to the last one; but each one when touched rose and going over the rest touched them also. When all were up the scourging began, the company going round the circle, two and two, and striking themselves over the shoulders until the blood flowed. The scourge was of three knotted thongs having four iron nails through them. During the scourging they sang. When the hymn was sung they paused, all fell to the earth again, then rose to their knees, smote their breasts, sprang to their feet and commenced another round. The scourging over, a collection was taken from the bystanders. Then one of the penitents stood upon an elevation, and read a letter professedly received from Christ, and laid by an angel on the altar of St. Peter's in Jerusalem, which said that God was greatly displeased with the sins of Christians, and was about to punish them severely, but had delayed the penalty through the intercession of the Virgin Mary and the angel. It was added that the angel recommended a flagellant procession of 34 days, to propitiate God's favor. — After this the penitents returned to the town, and started on their march on the following day. Their hymns were new, emotional, in popular style, and rehearsed the character and popularity of the flagellants. And indeed the movement was exceedingly popular. Crowds thronged to witness, and weep over their scourging, and it was thought an honor to entertain them. Woe to the priests who dared to speak against them, or question the authenticity of that angelic letter! But the tide of their popularity soon ebbed. Their maintenance became burthensome. The people of Strassburg were wearied by the 9000 who had visited their city in three months. Now the clergy could speak out. In six months the excitement had died in S. In France the King and University denounced the movement. The bull of Clem. VI.,

Oct. 20, 1349, ordered its suppression. — Some Crypto-flagellants appeared in Thuringia early in the 15th cent., but they were soon checked. The last trace of them in Germany is met with in the trial of a flagellant in Anhalt, in 1481.

Of another character were the societies which appeared, c. 1395, in Italy, France, and Spain, whose obscure origin is also referred to a special command of God. It was said that Christ and Mary appeared to a peasant, and revealed Christ's purpose to destroy the world, but delayed to do so at Mary's intercession. The peasant asked how the evil might be averted, and was told by instituting flagellant-processions. They were to march around for nine days, veiled in white linen, and during that time neither fully clothe themselves, nor sleep on enclosed ground, nor enter a house. They were daily to visit three churches, to hear one mass, to fast, go barefooted, and sing the stabat mater, and other hymns. The sins of all places they should enter, would be forgiven. Accordingly, in 1398, large companies of such penitents sprung up in Genoa, and the vicinity, scourging themselves. Priests and bishops joined them; whoever refused was suspected of heresy. But when they reached Rome, and Boniface IX., 1399, ordered one of the leaders to be executed, the fanaticism soon disappeared. It is possible that Ferrer (see Art.) participated in this movement. — In France the penitent fraternities of the 16th cent. also practised scourging. Henry III. used them for political purposes; Henry IV. prohibited them. They continued, however, in South France to recent times. — (See FÜRSTEMANN, d. chr. Geisslergeseselsch.: Halle, 1828. Also Bd. I., d. Bibliothek d. liter. Vereins in Stuttgart, 1842).

HERZOG.*

Flavian, Patriarch of Antioch, near the close of the 4th cent., sprang from one of the first families of Antioch, and, as a layman even, was one of the most zealous opponents of Arianism. In connection with his countryman Diodorus (B. of Tarsus), he withstood the spread of that heresy, and even compelled Bishop Leontius to depose Aetius (see Art.). When Meletius, the Patriarch, was banished by Valens for his orthodoxy, Flavian and Diodorus, previously ordained priests, remained in Antioch in charge of the shepherdless flocks. — About the close of 381 Flavian was chosen Bishop. He had accompanied Meletius (who had returned to Antioch under Julian) to the Council at Constantinople, where M. presided — and died. The orthodox party in Antioch had long been divided among themselves — one party recognised Meletius, another Paulinus, as Bishop. To settle this it was agreed that whichever survived the other should be acknowledged by both parties. But upon M.'s death his party elected Flavian. His election was confirmed by the Synod of Bishops at Constantinople, despite the opposition of Gregory of Nazianzen. The Western Bishops, however, led by Damasus of Rome, declared in favor of Paulinus, and refused all fellowship with Flavian. This not only perpetuated the schism in Antioch, but widened the breach between the Eastern and Western churches. Flavian was accused of perjury (Soz., H. E., VII.,

1, 15; Socr., H. E., V., 15); but Paulinus ever seconded this charge. Paulinus, however, maintained his position until his death, and even nominated Evagrius his successor. But Flavian by his prudence, succeeded in preventing the appointment of a successor to Evarius, and in 398 was acknowledged by Innocent I. of Rome. The schism in Antioch, however, was not completely healed until after F.'s death in 404. — In 388 F. rendered Antioch an important service by going to Constantinople and averting the Emperor's displeasure, occasioned by an insurrection in Antioch. His address is said to have moved the Emperor to tears. — F.'s treatment of the Messalians (see Art.) cannot be commended. S.*

Flavian, successor (447) of Proclus as B. of Constantinople, at once showed himself a brave and upright man by opposing the wishes of the powerful favorite of Theodosius II. At the first Synod (particular) of Constantinople at which he presided (Nov. 8, 448), at which complaints were made against certain bishops by their metropolitan Florentinus, of Sardis, Flavian permitted Eusebius of Dorylæum, as the representative of the Christology of Antioch, to accuse Eutyches (see Art.). Eutyches was deposed, but Dioscurus, of Alexandria, received him into church fellowship, and thus became F.'s opponent. Leo of Rome, also, wrote to F. expressing his dissatisfaction at not having been consulted in regard to the deposition of Eutyches; he likewise complained to the Emperor of F.'s neglect. Meanwhile the party of Dioscurus seems to have excited suspicion at court against the Synod, and awakened some sympathy for Eutyches. F. was required to draw up a statement of his belief for comparison with the views of Eutyches. He felt himself compelled also to write to Leo of Rome, to whom he sent the proceedings of the Synod. In a second letter (March, 449) to Leo, after stating again the errors of Eutyches, he informed him that the Emperor was taking sides with E., and begged his approval of E.'s deposition, since the restoration of peace depended upon his decision. Leo, flattered by this implied recognition of his ecclesiastical precedence, now saw the heresy in Eutychianism (see Art.), and approved of its condemnation in a letter of June 13, 449. A general Council (the Robber Synod) was convoked in Ephesus (see Art.), at which Flavian was accused of being an agitator, and on his protesting against the decisions of the Synod was so violently maltreated that he died in consequence, if not in three days, at least during the following year. But his memory was soon avenged. Marcian (450) changed the theology of the court. Flavian's remains were brought to Constantinople and deposited with great solemnities in the Church of the Apostles, and his name was enrolled among the saints. — (BARON., Martyrol. rom., Feb. 18. Acta Sanct., T. III., Feb. 3). S.*

Flesh, as a biblical term, occurs in various senses both in the O. and N. T. In the former it is used exclusively in a physical and metaphysical sense; in the latter in an ethical sense, specially by St. Paul. — In the O. T. it designates, primarily, the literal flesh of beasts and men (Gen. 2 : 21, &c. &c.), and is then extended to the entire body (Ps. 16 : 9, &c.), in distinction from the heart or soul, but still of the living body (Levit. 17 : 11; Job 12 : 10). Hence it is used of all living creatures that have flesh (Gen. 6 : 12, 13), and often involves the idea of perishableness, weakness. Thus it occurs as a predicate, particularly in contrasting the weakness of the creature with the strength of God, or of the spirit (2 Chron. 32 : 8; Is. 31 : 3, &c.; comp. Gen. 6 : 3). — The softness of the flesh (compared with the bones) is applied figuratively to the heart (Ezek. 11 : 19). — When the phrase, "my flesh" designates relationship (Judges 9 : 2, &c.), the sense is derived from the bodily relationship existing between members of the same family, tribe, or nation. — This O. T. use of the term is found, with various modifications, in the N. T. As a designation of the body, the outward manifestation of man's life, the term is readily used to express external appearances in general, in antithesis to what is inward and spiritual; outward circumstances, &c., in contrast with inner truth and reality (John 8 : 15; Philip 3 : 3, &c.; 2 Cor. 5 : 16, &c.; Rom. 4 : 1). — In instances referring to "works" (as Rom. 4 : 1, &c.) the ethical idea occurs; for in these "flesh" designates the moral impotence of man when left to himself, his inability to act in a way acceptable to God (comp. Rom. 6 : 19; Matt. 16 : 17; 26 : 41). This weakness is to be traced to the dwelling of sin in the flesh (Rom. 7 : 17, 18, 20), which has caused enmity between man and God, and even set man against himself (Rom. 7 : 7-25; 8 : 3). Hence "to be in the flesh" denotes such an activity of sinful affections (παθήματα ἀμαρτιῶν) in the human organism (ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν) as brings fruit unto death (Rom. 7 : 5; 8 : 8, 9). So "to live after the flesh," &c., is to live in sin; carnal-mindedness is enmity against God (Rom. 7 : 12; 8 : 4, 5, 7, 12). Fleshly wisdom is a perverted, ungodly wisdom (1 Cor. 1 : 19-26). Thus, also, of fleshly boasting, striving, &c. (2 Cor. 1 : 17; 10 : 2; 11 : 18). The lust, the will, the works of the flesh, are all set in opposition to holiness (Gal. 5 : 16, &c.; Eph. 2 : 3). To "sow to the flesh" is opposed, in like manner, to "sowing to the Spirit" (Gal. 6 : 8). To "crucify the flesh," and "mortify the deeds of the body," is the proper work of the Christian, carried on by the help of the Spirit dwelling in him (Gal. 5 : 25; Rom. 8 : 13). — St. John's use of the term corresponds with Paul's (1 John 2 : 16). But both use it, also, to designate the physical nature of man, without including the idea of enmity to the will or Spirit of God (Rom. 1 : 3; 9 : 5; 1 Tim. 3 : 16; 1 John 4 : 2; John 1 : 14). — Thus we see how the import of the word was extended from its original, narrower, physical sense, to a metaphysical and then a deep ethical signification. But there is nothing in the biblical uses of the term to justify the opinion that the flesh (σὰρξ) is in itself evil, or necessarily productive of sin. It is the body in its living animate state, hence as including the soul; or it is the organism of the outer and inner senses, which, by virtue of its union with the Spirit, comprehends in itself the faculties of the soul, with their functions, and which, in its normal condition, is wholly under the control of the spirit, insofar as this holds proper communion with God, from whom it springs, and is controlled by God. But sin, which interrupted this communion of the spirit with God, also broke the power of the spirit over the flesh. The physical-corporeal life of man, with its centre, I, departed from the life of God, and isolated itself; and being no longer sustained, and attracted by the powers of the world above, is drawn downwards, its tendency becomes earthly, worldly, and all its functions partake of this character. The spirit, under the influence of divine Revelation, attempts to regain its dominion, but fails. As an approving or condemning conscience it may sometimes prevail, but it cannot succeed in bringing the flesh truly to deny self and the world, and place itself under the control of divine love. All man's intellectual and affectional functions are impotent of good, and wholly perverted. And it is only by an immediate act of God, by which the flesh, withdrawn from its connection with the development of sin, is made the organ of the pattern man who has entered into historical union with humanity, that the original, right, relation between the flesh and the spirit, may be restored in man, the lost power regained, and the flesh brought back to its normal condition (the Word, became flesh, dwelt among us, full of grace and truth).

The origin of sin in man, therefore, can neither be found in the human spirit nor in the flesh, but in the heart, the centre of man's personality, where all influences, divine and ungodly or satanical, meet, and where a personal decision for the one or the other is made. If the heart yield to satanic influences, so as to doubt the truth of God, his love or his goodness, —and allow self to be exalted above God (Gen. 3), all loving communion between God and man is destroyed. Then the inner man loses its control over the physical-bodily life (the σὰρξ). This life in all its functions (its thinking, desiring, willing) becomes inimical to the divine government, becomes sinful; and this sinfulness, originating thus in the heart, consists in a perversion of man's personality, in an independence and self-willedness of the I, both in reference to God, the absolute personality, and to his fellow-men. Thus the individual self is made the centre and end of all things, and assumes a position of hostility to whatever opposes it. But along with this, the individual also falls under captivity to earthly things, over which he should rule, and becomes subject to carnal appetites and passions. That both egotism and sensual passions have their seat in the σὰρξ, and impress their peculiar character upon its functions is clear from Gal. 5 : 13, 19, &c. ; 2 : 20 ; Rom. 14 : 7, &c. ; 15 : 1, 2 ; 2 Cor. 5 : 15, &c. —Which of the two is chiefly meant, must be determined, in each case, by the connection, and on examination it will be found that sometimes both are taken together, sometimes one or the other predominates, or is exclusively meant. —It may be important to add one more remark. On the one hand it is easy to suppose that man was more readily exposed to temptation, with his physical-bodily organism (flesh), because his manifold dependence through the flesh was in such strong contrast with his consciousness of possessing the image of God. On the other hand, however, we find in this very dependence a limitation to sin in man, which restrains him from demoniacal wickedness, and renders him susceptible of redemption. In this view, also, we see the significance of the fact that the flesh was chosen as the organ for the redemptive revelation and communication of God the Son. — (See THOLUCK, Theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1855, 3. STIRM, Tüb. Ztschr., 1834. NEANDER'S Planting and training, &c. SCHMID, Bibl. Theol. d. N. T. II., 264, &c. ROTHE, Ethik II., 183. J. MÜLLER, Doctrine of Sin. HOFMANN, d. Schriftbeweis, I., 470. BECK, Umriss d. bibl. Seelenlehre, p. 17, &c. ; d. chr. Lehrwissenschaft, 276, &c. DR. MEYER, Exeget. Handb.).

KLING.*

Flesh, the eating of, among the Hebrews. — Animal food has always been prized by the Israelites. The patriarchs, who led a pastoral life, like the modern Bedouins, by no means confined themselves, like these, to sour milk, dates, unleavened bread, but frequently slew of their flocks. In Genesis man is described as having received authority over animals, to use them not only for labor but for food; and the law of Moses even required the eating of flesh. Only the more wealthy, of course, could freely indulge in such diet (cfr. 1 Kings 4 : 22, 23 ; Neh. 5 : 18) ; but the promised land was so well adapted to pasturage, that it was rich in herds and flocks, and afforded abundant supplies for religious uses. Game and fish were also plenty, and were highly esteemed. — The use of animal food, however, was subject to the following limitations: — 1) the flesh of all unclean animals was forbidden (Levit. 11 : 1-31, 46, &c. ; Deut. 14 : 1-19). The reason of this prohibition is found in sanitary considerations, in agricultural circumstances, in relations sustained to surrounding heathen nations and their consecration of certain animals to idols, and in a natural aversion to certain animals. — 2) The flesh of all strangled animals, their blood, their fat, and the flesh of animals offered to idols (Levit. 22 : 30 ; Levit. 17 : 15 ; Deut. 14 : 21 ; Ezek. 4 : 14) ; also the flesh of animals touched by the carcass of strangled or torn beasts. The penalty of eating flesh with the blood in it, or fat pieces, was extreme (Levit. 3 : 14-17 ; 7 : 25, &c. ; 17 : 10-14 ; Deut. 12 : 16, 23 ; Ezek. 33 : 25 ; 1 Sam. 14 : 32, &c.). — 3) According to Gen. 32 : 32, the Jews do not to this day eat the sinew of the thigh, although the law is silent in reference to this point. Ex. 23 : 19 ; 34 : 26 ; Deut. 14 : 21, forbid the seething of a kid in its mother's milk ; but the Rabbins have interpreted this to imply a prohibition of the use of any milk with flesh, lest the law might be inadvertently violated ; indeed they have gone so far as to enjoin the use of different vessels for milk and flesh. This is daily practised in Israelitish families.

W. PRESSEL.*

Fleury, Claude, (born Dec. 6, 1640, in Paris ; † July 14, 1723), the talented son of a Rouen advocate, received a thorough education at the renowned Jesuit College at Clermont. Aesthetics, history, and jurisprudence were his favorite studies. At 18 he became a counsellor of the Parliament, and for nine years continued in the profession. But he was destined for the clerical office. After taking priest's orders he became (1672) tutor of the princes of Conti, the playmates of the Dauphin; then the Duke of Vermandois, a natural son of Louis XIV.; the Duke died in 1683. Louis XIV. then gave F. the Cistercian abbey of Loc-Dieu. In 1689 he was appointed Sous-Précepteur of the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry. In 1696 he was chosen a member of the Academy. After completing the education of the princes, the King gave him the Abbey of Argenteuil, which, however, he did not keep. Thenceforward he devoted himself wholly to literature. After the death of Louis XIV., he was recalled to the court as confessor to the young King. The prince is said to have declared to F.: "I choose you because you are neither a Jansenist, nor a Molinist, nor an Ultramontanist." In 1722 he resigned this office, on account of old age. Lemaitre de Claville says, "No man was more learned or simple, more humble or exalted. He was kind, affable, true, even doing more than he thought himself capable of doing. He ever spoke courteously, ever acted virtuously."—As a writer he produced several able works: Catéchisme historique: Paris, 1679; "Manners of the Israelites," 1681; "Manners of the Christians," 1682; Histoire eccles., 20 vols., coming down to 1414, written, as he says in the preface, for intelligent laymen, and in vindication of Christianity. He considered Ch. Hist. the history of true philosophy; and regarded the first six centuries as the happiest period of the Church.—In his canon law he vindicates episcopal authority. As early as 1682, at the Synod of Paris, he zealously defended the liberty of the Church.—His Ch. Hist. has been both unduly praised and condemned. He left behind in MS. a sketch of Eccl. Hist. from 1414–1517. After his death was publ. his Discours sur les libertés de l'Eglise gallicane.—(See REICHLIN MELDEGG, Gesch. d. Christenth.; DUPIN, nouvelle biblioth., Vol. 18).

DR. PRESSEL.*

Fleury, a city with a renowned Abbey, Floriacum, or St. Benedict, on the right bank of the Loire, near Sully, in the diocese of Orleans. The monastery was founded by Leodebod, abbot of St. Anian, 638–657, under Chlodwig II. The monks lived under the rule of St. Benedict; the first abbot was Mummolus, who had the relics of St. B. brought from Monte Cassino to Fleury (653). These relics made F., as Leo VII. says: caput ac primas omnium cœnobiorum. Many rare wonders were wrought by them, the account of which filled 4 vols. (cfr. Floriacensis vetus bibliotheca Benedictina, etc., Op. Joannis a Bosco: Lugd., 1605). The reputation of F. was increased by a "hospitale nobilium" and a "h. pauperum," erected by Louis the Pious, by the addition of relics from St. Denis, and by an annual festival in honor of St. D., and one of St. B., Dec. 4, which was celebrated throughout France. At the invasion of the Normans the monks fled from F., taking with them their wealth, and the relics of St. B.; the empty cloister was burnt down by the barbarians. In 878 the Normans again marched against F., but were defeated by the brave abbot Hugo. They subsequently made a third attempt. Reinald entered the cloister, and lodged there; but during the night St. B. revealed to him in a dream that he would soon die under fearful circumstances. The prediction was verified, and thenceforward the Normans feared St. B. above all the saints of France. Meanwhile the monks of F., grown rich and powerful, had cast off the earlier piety of the monastery, and many irregularities were practised. Count Elisiard, deploring this state of things, obtained authority from King Raul to restore the discipline of F. Elisiard took Odo, two other counts and two bishops with him. But the monks resisted. After three days ineffectual conference, Odo rode quite alone up to the monastery, and so astonished the monks by his bravery, that they cast away their arms and fell penitently at his feet. Odo remained some time at F., and soon restored such order there that the monks of F. were invited not only to different parts of France, but to England, as moral reformers and instructors. The school of the monastery became one of the most renowned, numbering at times 5000 pupils, each of whom, on leaving, gave the library (which the monks zealously sought to improve) two MSS. The celebrity of this school was owing mainly to Abbo (see Art.). But F. produced few authors. Its extensive collection of MSS. was greatly reduced by the religious wars. After these F. could not regain its ancient glory, and became annexed to the congregation of St. Maurus, one of the most faithful disciples of St. Benedict. The Fleurensians must be distinguished from the Floriacensians (see Art.).

DR. PRESSEL.*

Flodoard, or Frodoard, a presbyter and canon of the See of Rheims, was variously implicated in the events of the diocese for a time, lost his office, and even his liberty, in consequence of devotion to his Archb., was twice chosen bishop, but in vain, and died in 966. He was one of the best chroniclers of the history of his own and antecedent times. His Chronica for 919–966 are sources for the history of France, Italy, and Germany. His Hist. eccl. Rhemensis is remarkably accurate, though somewhat partisan. The Chronica may be found in DUCHESNE, Scriptor. vet. hist. Normann., II., 590–622. The Hist. eccl. R. was first published by SIRMOND: Paris, 1611, 8vo.; then by PITHOËUS, in Script. XII., cœtaneis. II., 109, sq.—(See FABRICII, Bibl. med. et inf. latinit. s. v. SCHRÖCKH, K.-gesch., XXI., 154).

HUNDESHAGEN.*

Florentius, a name frequently met with in the middle ages, especially in Martyrologies. One of them was Bishop of Vienne, and is said to have suffered martyrdom in 258; his anniversary is Jan. 3. Another suffered in 259, in Numidia; his anniversary is April 30. Another perished under Decius, and is commemorated in Perugia, June 1. Another, St. F., commemorated in Sevilla, Feb. 23, suffered there in 485. An African Bishop of this name, a zealous opponent of Arianism, was banished, c. 500, by Hunnerich to Corsica, whence he went to Trevigo in Italy, and there died. Another came to Elsass, after 650, and succeeded Arbogast as B. of Strassburg, 663, where he died in 675. An English abbot, F. wrote the life of St. Joyce, son of an English King, and martyr of the 7th cent. Another, presbyter at Aouste in the Dauphiny, wrote the life of St. Rusticula or Marcia († 632). — More distinguished than any of these, is the English Chronicler F. surnamed Bavonius, a monk of Worcester, who improved the work of Marianus Scotus by various additions, bringing it down to 1118, when F. died. It was published in London, 1592, 4to.; a transl. with notes has been published in Bohn's Antiquarian series, London. — (See PERTZ, Monum. Germ., VII., 495, &c. LAPPENBERG, Gesch. v. England, I., 58, &c.; II., 210, 294).

DR. PRESSEL.*

Florensiensians, or the order of Flore, also called Floriensians, Floriacensians. The founder of this congregation was Joachim, the prophet, abbot of Flora or Floris in Calabria (born 1111 or 1130; † 1202). After leaving school the talented youth, in his 14th year, was placed at the court of Roger II., of Naples. He soon grew weary of the vanities of the world, and went to Palestine, against his father's will. On his way he was about to repent of his purpose, but at Constantinople was so terrified by the prevalence of the plague that he renounced the world, changed his costly garments for a hermit's garb, and proceeded barefoot on his journey. Having reached Palestine, he passed the whole of Lent on Mt. Tabor, in devout meditations. For this, it is said, God rewarded him on Easter with the knowledge of all sciences, and the darkest mysteries of the Bible. But this seems to be in conflict with the condemnation of his work against the Magister Sententiarum, by the Lateran Council of 1215; though this sentence was only against his writings. — Having returned to Calabria, he remained for some time in the monastery Sambuca, as janitor, and then went to Corazzo, and joined the Cistercians. After the death of their abbot he was chosen prior. After three years (1183) he retired to a desert, and there wrote some of his works. Meanwhile two or three of his pupils joined him, and he went with them to Flore, where they built small huts. The number of followers increasing, he laid the foundation of the renowned monastery, Flore, which rapidly gathered members. Joachim drew up rules which Coelestine III. confirmed. It was enriched by large gifts. Affiliated monasteries were founded in Naples, and both Calabrias. Still the order was opposed on account of the suspected heresy of Joachim. Hence J. drew up (1200) a declaration of his faith, in which he enumerated his writings, apologized for the haste with which he had composed them, requested his followers to submit all to the judgment of the Pope, and declared that he condemned whatever in them was contrary to the Romish faith. He died March 30, 1202, in his monastery, St. Martin de Canale. Some years later his remains were removed to Flore, and many wonders were said to be wrought at his grave. His successor, Mathæus, was in such favor with the Pope that in 1224 the See of Cerenza was bestowed on him. In a short time the order had 34 monasteries, including nunneries, the chief that at St. Helena near Amalfi.

All recognized the abbot of Flore as their general. In 1227 Greg. IX. commanded the Cistercians to forbid the Florensiensians passing over to them, the rules of the F. being more strict. This excited the envy of the former, who, thenceforth, did not rest until the F. were dissolved. Still Flore was upheld as long as regular abbots ruled it. But after 1470 it fell into the hands of worldly men, and speedily declined. In 1505 most of the affiliated monasteries in Calabria and Basilicata passed over to the Cistercians; others were incorporated with the Carthusians and Dominicans. Flore itself united with the congregation of Calabria. — The Florensiensians wore a coarse white dress, similar in form to that of the Cistercians. They went barefoot. — (See HELYOT, Klosterorden, V., 454–464).

DR. PRESSEL.*

Fontevraux, order of (Ordo fontis Ebraudi), founded c. 1047, by a man of humble origin, Robert of Arbrissel (now Arbresec), in the forest of Craon. Fontevraux became the seat of the chief monastery. There were departments for men and women. Silence was one of the first rules. The order rapidly increased. At Robert's death (1125) there were 3000 nuns in F. alone, and in 1150, 5000. F. became a favorite of several English kings, of the house of Plantagenet, some of whom were buried there. The order never spread much, however, beyond France. The last abbess died at Paris in 1799, in great poverty. The French revolution abolished the order, and turned the monastery of F. into a prison; as such it is still used.

DR. PRESSEL.*

Foot-washing. — The use of sandals, the character of the climate, social custom, and religious purifications, tended to promote the Oriental washing of the feet. It was an act of hospitality, and a proof of respect for strangers (Gen. 18 : 4; 19 : 2; 1 Sam. 25 : 41). Hence the reproof of Simon (Luke 7 : 38–44). — At the last supper of our Lord with his disciples, he washed their feet (John 13 : 4, &c.). This was a symbol and example. Symbolically he desired to show them : 1) that only they who permitted the Lamb of God to cleanse them of their sins, had part in him; 2) that whoever were once purified in his blood, needed only to have their feet washed, but these repeatedly, as long as they wandered in this filthy world. Those once justified would continually need forgiveness unto sanctification. — The fact that Jesus performed this symbolical act in connection with the institution of the Supper, readily suggests that the "often" applied to the one, should be likewise associated with the other. At the same time the example of humility thus set by the Saviour, should be remembered afresh at every holy communion. His followers should anew imbibe the spirit of a fraternal willingness to perform the meanest service for each other. — It could hardly fail that in post-apostolic times (1 Tim. 5 : 10 refers only to an act of hospitality), not merely the spirit, but form of the Saviour's act, would be perpetuated as a command to be literally observed (see BINGHAM, Ant., IV., 394). Augustine attests the existence of the rite (Ep. 118, ad Jan.), and also the uncertainty of the day of its observance. The Synod of Toledo, 694, c fixed Thursday the 14th of Nisan, as that on which it was instituted by Christ. The Greek considered foot-washing a sacrament. Bernard of Clairvaux urged its observance as sacramentum remissionis peccatorum quotidianorum. But the rite never became a general, eccl. service. At the seats of princes and bishops it was often observed during the middle ages. In Greek monasteries, and at the imperial court of Russia it is still performed with great solemnity (LEO ALLAT., de dom. et hebdom. græc., 21). In the Vatican, at the courts of Vienna, Munich, Madrid, Lisbon (Paris), in Rom. cathedrals and monasteries, the rite is also still performed by the Pope, Emperor, King, and prior, usually upon 12 poor old men, who then receive a small gift, or upon 12 secular and regular clergy. In Rome these representatives of the Apostles wear white woollen cowls, and sit in the Clementine chapel; the Pope also wearing a single whiteunic, sprinkles a few drops of water upon the right foot of each one, wipes it and kisses it. At the commencement of the ceremony the antiphony mandatum novum de vobis is sung; hence the rite (pedilavium) is also called mandatum. After the ceremony the 12 go and take a supper in St. Paul's church, at which the Pope, assisted by his chamberlains, serves them. After the meal the honored guests take all the articles used, with the fragments left, along with them excepting the silver cups used for drinking).—At the Reformation the proper conception of this rite was revived. Instead of a formal and hypocritical act of humiliation, the duty of imitating the true import of the example was urged. —The Anglican C. at first held to a literal observance of the rite, and instead of it, as many poor men and women as there were years in the king's reign, were furnished with garments, and pieces of money, in the chapel near Whitehall. —The Anabaptists insisted upon the strict observance of the rite, as literally enjoined. Among the Anabaptists in the United States, "the Church of God" (Winebrennarians), Mennoites, and River Brethren practice foot-washing. The United Brethren in Christ leave its observance optional with individual members.—(See ALT., d. chr. Cultus, 1851). M. MERZ.*

Formosus, Pope, successor of Stephan V. (or VI.), had filled important eccl. offices prior to his election. Under John VIII. he was excommunicated for participation in a conspiracy against Charles the Bald and the Pope, and to obtain peace he had to swear that he would never again enter Rome, nor arrogate the episcopal dignity, but rest content with lay privileges. In 883, however, Pope Martin released him of this oath, declared him innocent, and restored him to the See of Porto. The wave of political partizanism which had caused his fall, now raised him to the papal chair (891). Serius was chosen antipope, but could not maintain his ground. —Soon after his elevation ambassadors came from Constantinople to settle the disputes which arose out of the excommunication of the clergy ordained by the Patriarch Photius. But their mission was fruitless. The breach between the Eastern and Western churches widened. —F.'s entire reign was one of political agitations. He died in 896. S.*

Fortifications and sieges among the Hebrews. Although all ancient Hebrew towns, in distinction from villages, were more or less fortified, walled (1 Sam. 6 : 18), proper military fortifications are to be distinguished from these ordinary means of defence (2 Chron. 8 : 5; Ps. 31 : 22; 60 : 11). In the stricter sense Jerusalem was among the chief fortified cities of Palestine, and David continued to his death to strengthen its works (2 Sam. 5 : 7, 9; 2 Chron. 32 : 5). But Solomon fortified other places (1 Kings 9 : 15, 17, &c., &c.), and others were subsequently built, as circumstances required them, as at Ramah, Geba (1 Kings 15 : 17, 22; 2 Chron. 11 : 5, &c.), especially after the exile (1 Macc. 1 : 33; 4 : 60, &c. Jos. Ant., 13, 16, 3; 14, 3, 4).—These fortified places were at first surrounded by one or more walls, very thick, surmounted with engines (2 Chron. 26 : 15, &c.), and towers (Ezek. 26 : 4; 27 : 11, &c.). Over the gates, which were overlaid with brass and iron, and barred with metal bolts (Is. 45 : 2; HEBOD., 1, 179; Deut. 3 : 5, &c.), were raised watchtowers (2 Sam. 18 : 24, 33; 2 Kings 9 : 17, &c.); the walls were also surrounded with trenches, and mounds (2 Sam. 20 : 15; Is. 26 : 1, &c.).—In addition to these general fortifications, there were separate towers and citadels, as Millo, Antonio, in Jerusalem (see Art. and Judges 8 : 9, &c.), forts (1 Chron. 11 : 7; Jer. 48 : 41, &c.), and watchtowers in forests and in the open fields (2 Kings 17 : 9; 18 : 8, &c.). Caves and cliffs were also used for military purposes (Judges 6 : 2; 1 Sam. 13 : 6; Jos. Ant., 14, 6, 2).—If such a fortified town refused, in war, to surrender when summoned, a regular siege was commenced (Deut. 20 : 10; 2 Kings 18 : 17, &c.; Ezek. 4 : 2, 7, &c.). First a line of circumvallation was formed of wood, or piles, to cut off all access to the town (Deut. 20 : 20; Micah 4 : 14). Movable towers, were also used (2 Kings 25 : 1; Jer. 52 : 4; Ezek. 4 : 2; 17 : 17). On this basis of operation the enemy attempted to approach nearer to the fortifications, raising at each point higher mounds (2 Sam. 20 : 15, &c.). If possible the supplies of water were cut off (hence 2 Chron. 32 : 2, &c.). As soon as the walls were reached, battering rams and other engines were brought against them, to force openings (Ezek. 21 : 27, &c.; Jos. B. J., 3, 7, 19; Jer. 33 : 4, &c.); or the walls were undermined (cf. LXX., Jer. 51 : 58; Jos. B. J., 2, 17, 8); or attempts were made to fire the towers. At length the walls were scaled with ladders. Meanwhile the besieged used all means to drive the enemy away, either by building the walls higher, by raising new ones, by making sallies from the gates, and setting fire to the enemy's works, by hurling javelins, stones, and beams at them, pouring boiling oil upon them, &c. (Is. 22 : 10; 1 Macc. 6 : 31; 2 Sam. 11 : 21, &c.; Jos. B. J., 3, 7, 28; 2 Chron. 26 : 15). The siege of well-defended cities lasted, sometimes, many years (see Ashdod, 2 Kings 17 : 5; 25 : 1, &c.). The besieged were often reduced to the last extremities of hunger (2 Kings 6 : 25; 18 : 27; Lam. 4 : 10; Jos. Ant., 13, 10, 2; B. J., 5, 10, 3).—In a siege the Israelites were required to spare fruit-trees (Deut. 20 : 19, &c.; cf. 2 Kings 3 : 25). Towns taken by

were demolished, rased, and the ground strewn over with salt, and thus devoted to perpetual barrenness (Judges 9:45, &c.). Its inhabitants were put to death, or led off as slaves (2 Macc. 5:13, &c.). Towns which capitulated were treated less severely (Deut. 20:11, &c.). Fortifications which have never been taken are appropriately called "virgins" by the Orientals. The Chaldeans were celebrated as besiegers (Is. 23:13; Hab. 1:10).—(See LAYARD'S Nineveh. BOTTA u. FLANDIN, I., 49, 52, 55, 68, 69, 70, 77; II., 85, 86, 89, 90, &c. PAULY'S Real-encycl., I., 1050, &c.). RÜRSCHL.*

Fortunatus, Venantius, Honorius Clementianus, Bishop of Poitiers, an author of some reputation for his age, was born near Ceneda, in northern Italy. At Ravenna he devoted himself to grammar, rhetoric, poetry, and jurisprudence—but gave special attention to elocution and poetry—hence his surname "Scholasticissimus." From Italy he went, for unknown reasons, to France, where he soon gained favor as a poet, at the court of Sigbert, King of Austrasia. At Poitiers he found patronesses in Queen Radegunde, and her sister, Agnes, abbess of the convent there. He took priest's orders, and became their confessor. Meanwhile he zealously prosecuted philosophical and theological studies, sustained intimate relations with Gregory of Tours, and other eccl. dignitaries, to whom Radegunde had warmly commended him. In 599 he was chosen B. of Poitiers; he died c. 609. The church of Poitiers observes Dec. 14 as his anniversary.—Among his works we mention: eleven books of poetry; hymns, some of which are used in churches; letters; small poems upon his patronesses; the life of St. Martin, an epic poem; an exposition of the Lord's prayer,—his best production; numerous biographies of saints, &c.—A careful, but not complete edition of his works was published by the Jesuit, Chr. Brower, 4to.: Fulda, 1603; 2d ed., Mayence, 1617, which is followed in the 3d vol. of Magna Biblioth. Patr. Lugdunum, 1677. The best ed. of his works is that of the Benedictine M. A. Luschy: Rome, 1785, 2 vols. 4to.—(See Biogr. univers., Paris, Michaud, T. 15). S.*

Fortunatus, Patriarch of Grado, Istria.—In consequence of the political relations of Istria to the East Roman empire, and that of Charlemagne, his position was a difficult one. Having become involved in these relations (whether innocently or not we are not told) he spent the greater part of his patriarchate in agitations, and away from his See in the home-province of Charlemagne, whose party he had joined in opposition to the court of Constantinople. After some time he returned to Grado; but on the approach of a Greek army he fled. He had hardly regained his chair, when he was accused before Louis the Pious (821). He again fled, and fell into the hands of the Emperor Michael. In 824 he returned, and was sent by Louis, before whom he personally appeared, to the Pope, to have his case investigated. Soon after this he died among the Franks. S.*

Forum Appii, Ἀππίου φόρον, Acts 28:15, a place in the midst of the Pontine marshes, founded by Appius Claudius. It is near the modern St. Donatus. On account of the bad water, and the immoralities of the sailors, the place was in evil repute. Horace says of it (Sat. I., 5, 4): Forum Appii differtum nautis, campibus atque malignis. Hence travellers usually hastened through it to put up at the "Three Taverns" (CICERO, Att. 2, 10), situated on the Appian way, some 10 miles nearer Rome. There are said to be remains of the taberna decursoria still there. It was there that Paul was met by his brethren from Rome. DR. PRESSER.*

Fragments, the Wolfenbüttel, were treatises published by Lessing during the last century, which set all the theologians of Europe in commotion. It has been satisfactorily proven that the author of these MSS. was Hermann Samuel Reimarus, then a professor in Hamburg. They were to be entitled: "Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes." The author seems to have been aware of the injury his work might do, and kept it concealed. It was thought, however, that if any fanatics should attempt to foist the errors of Popery upon mankind, these papers should be published.—The MS. in the Hamburg city library consists of two large quarto volumes of 972 and 1072 pages, exclusive of an extensive register. The chirography is plain and not crowded. The entire work was skeptical in its character, and an assault upon the orthodox faith of the Christian Church. And yet the work possesses value for the history of the theology of the period during which it was composed, 1747–68. On this account part of it was recently published in Niedner's Zeitschrift. W. KLOSS.*

Francis (Franciscus) of Assisi, and the order of Franciscans.—Francesco Bernardone was born, 1182, in Assisi, of Spoleto. His free and easy life as a youth disappointed the expectations of his father, Pietro Bernardone, a rich merchant who expended both pains and money in the education of his son, and, when grown up, made him a partner in business. His ambition, which had hurried him into a war waged by Assisi against Perugia, was considerably cooled by an imprisonment of one year's duration. On his return home a severe sickness despoiled the world of its charms, and in the loneliness of a retreat he invoked the aid of his Maker. At Rome, whither he had made a pilgrimage, while in the act of prayer he heard a voice commanding him to work for the re-establishment of the Divine Kingdom. He forthwith sold some goods belonging to his father, and his own horse, and gave the proceeds to a priest. After his return to Assisi a sermon on Matt. 10:9–10 so powerfully impressed him, that, laying aside shoes, staff, and purse, and putting on, instead of a girdle, a rope, he began to preach repentance. By the year 1210 he numbered eleven followers. It being his object to lift his countrymen out of the mire of sin, he drew up a method of life. His disciples were to preach repentance, not only by word of mouth, but also by the force of example, and, utterly regardless of human respect, to look to God for their reward. Poverty was to be their delight, and, renouncing the comforts of life, they were to depend on alms. Their bodies were to be brought under by fasting. They were to yield implicit obedience to their superiors, and no one was to undertake a mission to the Saracens and heathen without their consent. To preserve chastity, they were forbidden to speak alone with women. The rigor of their lives was to be softened by the exercises of brotherly love and all Pharisaic moroseness eschewed, whilst a merry, confiding spirit was to reign and rule over them. Special attention was to be shown to the sick. Francis named their society "Fratres minores," and placed over it a minister generalis, before whom were to appear once a year all the brethren living in Italy, and those beyond the Alps and the sea once in three years. — Having obtained from Pope Innocent III. a verbal authorization of his plans, F. returned to Assisi and devoted himself with his followers to the rigor of an ascetic life. Clara Sciffi, distinguished for her beauty and the wealth of her family, now joined his society, and became, 1212, the foundress of the Order of Clarissima which gradually extended itself to other countries. The Pope gave them the rule of life drawn up by Benedict; in 1224 they obtained one from Francis, which was confirmed by the Popes, and invested with general authority by Greg. IX. (1253). After her death (1253), Clara was canonized by Alexander IV. — In 1212 F. sent his disciples two-by-two into the different countries of Italy; he himself went to Toscana where Count von Casentius gave him the mountain Alverna; he made disciples in Perugia; established his first cloister in Cortona; whilst in Pisa and other cities monasteries were formed. Having obtained adherents in Florence, he returned to Assisi and sent six brothers to Maraco, who obtained the crown of martyrdom. Resolving to go to Africa (1213), he went through Piedmont to Spain, where a sickness interrupted his journey. Meanwhile the order flourished in Italy. In 1216 convened the first general assembly of the Franciscans, which determined that missionaries should be dispatched to every country. They established cloisters in Lisbon and other places; in France they were welcomed, but made no progress in Germany. — Though as yet unsanctioned in a formal way by the Pope, the order grew amazingly, there having been according to one account (no doubt exaggerated) 5000 brothers present at the general chapter of 1219, which resolved to send missionaries to Spain, Egypt, Africa, Greece, Germany, England, and Hungary. Cäsarius of Spire succeeded in planting the order in that town. Francis went to Ptolemais, where a captive of the Saracens he essayed the conversion of the Sultan and obtained his liberty. Elias, to whom F. had entrusted the management of the order during his absence, having undertaken some alteration in its original rule, F. returned to Italy. — In 1223 followed the formal recognition of the order by Honorius III. Francis died Oct. 4, 1224, at Assisi, and was canonized (1228) by Greg. IX. Twenty-four years after his decease, his society numbered 8000 cloisters and 200,000 monks in 23 provinces. The unprecedented growth of the order was owing in great part to the favors and indulgences the Popes lavished upon it.

While on the mountain Alverna (1224) — so the account runs — with the intention of fasting 40 days, as he was engaged in earnest prayer on the day of the elevation of the Cross, and meditating on the sufferings of our Saviour, Christ appeared to him as a seraph and impressed upon his body the marks of his wounds. The veneration, accordingly, entertained for his memory waxed stronger and stronger. It is said that Francis himself related this occurrence, that the Franciscan Leo, who frequently bound up the wounds, was present when it happened, and that Pope Alexander IV., the sainted Clara, and many inhabitants of Assisi saw them. Greg. IX. confirmed the truth of these miracles in three bulls, Nicholas III. assented, and Benedict XII. allowed a festival in honor of them. Bartholomäus de Pisis Albrizzi († 1401), an Italian Franciscan, in his liber conformitatum points out 40 resemblances between Francis and Christ, and declares that O. T. prophecies spoke of him, that he performed miracles and foretold the future, that he was crucified and placed above the angels.¹

The sun of prosperity, however, began to wilt the fair flowers the order had cultured. It lost the simplicity and humility upon which it was originally based. Matthew Paris, an English Benedictine († 1259), in the second part of his Hist. of England (historia major, 1243) narrates that the Dominicans and Franciscans in England erected magnificent buildings, amassed immense wealth, interfered with the wills of the rich and noble, acted for kings as counsellors, chamberlains, treasurers, and orators, adapted their preaching to circumstances, despised the older orders, brought priests into contempt, and recommended themselves as confessors to the great and their wives. Such seems to have been the case in other countries. The commands of Popes Innocent IV. and Alexander IV. opened the way for their elevation as Professors in Universities. Thus, in 1257 the Dominican, Thomas Aquinas, and the Franciscan, Bonaventura, became Doctors of Theol. in the University of Paris (see Art.). The latter though defending his order against the attacks of William of St. Amour, was not blind to the abuses that had crept in, but in several treatises (de non frequentandis quæstibus cavendisque discursibus, and de reformandis fratribus) sharply rebuked them, and insisted on their removal. The favors which the Popes continued to grant the mendicant orders led to frequent collisions between them and the University. Boniface VIII. (1295 and 1296) freed the Franciscans from the judicial authority of the Bishops; John XXII. and Alexander V. confirmed all their earlier privileges. To obviate the bull issued by the last-mentioned Pope, the University obtained a royal decree which forbade the Franciscans and Augustines the right of preaching and bearing confessions in its churches, and Gerson discoursed against it from the pulpit (1409). And when Eugene IV. released the monks from the observance of important precepts drawn up by the theological faculty of the University, the faculty excluded them altogether (1441). Eugene having been overpowered by the Basle Synod, was temporarily suspended. — A vain ambition after pre-eminence, in the course of time, engendered disputes between the two mendicant orders. While the Dominicans plumed themselves on a higher antiquity, their pleasing dress and the Apostolic merit of their preachers, the Franciscans boasted of their superior humility and rigor. As regards doctrine, the former claimed to be Nominalists and Augustines, whilst they regarded the latter as Realists and Semipelagians. Besides, the Franciscans advocated the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, and the Dominicans combatted it. — In addition to these disorders, two parties now contended for the mastery in the Franciscan order. At the head of one stood Elias—the one above-mentioned — a worldly-minded, vindictive man who had previously attempted to soften the severe asceticism of the order, and now that he was called upon by Greg. IX. to erect a new church in honor of St. Francis, ordered contrary to the rule, collections in all the churches of the order. At the head of the other stood Antony, of Padua (see Art.), whose object was to preserve intact the ancient rigor of the order. After experiencing a series of fortunes and misfortunes, the election of Elias as superior by the gen.-chap. of 1236, was confirmed by the Pope. The rigoristic party selected as their superior John of Parent. The princes and prelates acknowledged Elias. The severity with which he, aided by the Pope, treated the adherents of his chief opponent Cæsarius, of Spire, induced Greg. IX. to depose him (1239). The strict party gained the ascendancy in the person of his successor, Albert of Pisa, and with the election of Crescentius de Jesu (1244) E.'s influence was finally destroyed. His party, however, still remained, and Innocent IV. encouraged it by modifying the rule (1245), and decreeing that the Franciscans might possess property providing it was subject to the authority of the papal chair. Even Crescentius, who was deposed 1247, inclined to the milder party. His successor, John of Parma, accused of heresy, voluntarily resigned, and Bonaventura, who favored the rigorists, was chosen. His three successors followed in the footsteps of B., who, though the changes introduced by Innocent III., were confirmed by the Pope, still insisted on the observance of the original rule. — Nicholas III. effected a new modification of the rule. He decreed that the Franciscans were simply bound by the evangelical counsels; that they might use—not actually possess—the Pope being the real owner—whatever was necessary to their support; that they should have nothing superfluous, nor borrow aught; that those who were engaged in study, or in Divine service, should not be obligated to manual labor; and that no Franciscan should preach in a diocese without permission from its bishop, nor any enter a nunnery without leave of the Pope. Against the bull of N. rose up in opposition the rigoristic party, Peter John, of Oliva, at its head, and fought against the mild policy of the superior, Matthias of Aquas Spartas (1287). Banished by the Inquisitor of Naples (1307), its adherents fled to Avignon. — Election to Clemens V. at Avignon. Unwilling to abide the order of the Pope, who wished to effect a compromise by a conference between both parties, they elected a superior, and Clemens (1314) decided against them. After his death, they endeavored to make themselves independent in France, seized the cloisters Narbonne and Beziers, and simplified their dress. The majority of them succumbed to John XXII.; the refractory were punished, and some of them burned. Against their Tertiaries John XXII. issued a bull in which they are called fratricelli, fratres de paupere vita, Bizochi, Beguini, and aimed at the extinction of strife by referring points of difference to the superiors. The obstinacy of the rigorists called forth the power of the Inquisition, and many of them were burnt. — In 1321 the question: Whether Christ and his Apostles owned any property, divided the Franciscans and Dominicans, the former denying and the latter affirming. The Pope invoked the opinion (1322) of the distinguished Ubertinus of Casale, a Franciscan of the strictest sort, who affirmed that the apostles as prelates of the Church had a common treasury for the support of the poor and the servants of the Church, but that as individuals they possessed no worldly goods. Christ and his apostles, however, had by the law of nature what was necessary for their temporal needs, but no superfluities. — A temporary peace ensued, but in 1322 war again broke out. The Franciscans having, at a general chapter in Perugia, given an affirmative answer to the question propounded by the Pope to the prelates and doctors of theology, whether it were heresy obstinately to affirm that Christ and his apostles owned no property either as individuals or as a community, the Pope declared (1322) that it was unorthodox to teach the negative; that they used, sold, presented, and exchanged their goods according to their own good pleasure; that no difference obtained between the usus facti and actual property; and forbade the Franciscans to receive syndicos et procuratores in the name of the papal chair for the regulation of its revenues. The controversy waxed warm. The superior Michael, of Cesena, appealed from the decision of the Pope. The papal legate in vain attempted his deposition at Bologna (1328). The Gen. Chapter assembled in that city having renewed his election, the Pope deposed him, and he appealed the third time to the Catholic Church and a future Council, declaring that a general Council alone, to which the Pope himself was subject in matters of dogmas, could decide a charge of heresy. In 1329 terminated the bickerings between the F. and the Pope, and the true meaning of the bull of Nich. III., which had also been a bone of contention, was adjusted by a compromise. During the reigns of Benedict XII. and Clemens VI. the division in the order became extinct, and its different parties united in opposition to the Fratricelli and the Beghards who had been excommunicated by the Church. — Within the order itself, however, were now to be found the Observanti and the Conventuals; the former adhering pertinaciously to the rigorism of the ancient rule; the latter inclining to a milder interpretation and use of it.

¹ Erasmus Alber († 1553) publ. in German an extract from this book, with the title, "der Barfüßermönche Eulenspiegel oder Alkoran," and Conr. Badius, of Geneva, 1556, one in French, entitled: l'Alcoran des Cordeliers.

Of the stricter Franciscan congregations the

Clarenines were the first established: in the district Ancona, 1302-17, by Angelus, a Celestine hermit († 1340). A second (about 1336) by John des Vallées, who built a cloister in the unhealthy Bruliano, near Foligno († 1351). His successor, Gentile of Spoleto, erected four cloisters, and had permission to receive monks and novices. The envious Franciscans accused them of hospitality towards heretics, and Innocent VI. annulled (1355) the bull Clemens VI. had granted in their favor. — Paolucci, of Foligno, aided the foundation of the Observanti, 1368, in the wilderness of Bruliano, the members of which, as they wore wooden sandals (zoccoli) were called Zoccolanti. His associates practised the most extreme poverty. The energy with which Paol. in a public conference with the Fratricelli, insisted on the duty of obedience to the Pope, induced the inhabitants of Perugia to expel them from their country. The name Observanti was first confirmed by the Synod of Constanz (fratres de observantia, fratres regularis observantie)¹ during its ninth session (1415). Between the milder party — Conventuals, and the Observanti, there were frequent collisions. Though Martin V. espoused the cause of the former, yet, influenced (1430) by the celebrated Observ., John of Capistrano, he convened a gen. chap. at Assisi for the purpose of effecting a compromise between them. A reconciliation was brought to pass, and, though the Conv. continued to persecute the Observ., the latter grew in strength so that in the 16th cent. they had nearly 1400 cloisters in fifty-four provinces, and four custodia in Palestine. — From the time when Leo X., failing in his design to unite all the Franciscans in one Observance, gave to the milder party the name of Conventuals, there sprang up a marked separation between the two sections of the order. Both had their own superior, called minister-generalis among the Observanti, who took precedence of the min.-gen. of the Conventuals. The Convent. gradually lost ground in Spain, Portugal, Germany, France, and Belgium. — The Council of Trent having granted permission to all regular orders (the fratres minores de observantia and Capuchins excepted) to possess some property in common, a gen. chap. of Conventuals (1565) obtained a confirmation of their privileges from Pius IV. (1565). The milder policy of many of the Conventuals having rendered the observance of them

¹ At a Gen. Chap. of the order, in Rome, Leo X. gave the Observ. and the different reformed Franciscan congregations, the exclusive right of electing a superior on condition of their assuming the common name of fratres minores de observantia regulari. Of this character were the congregation of the above-mentioned Clarenines, that established by Paolucci — called Saccolanti, Observantini et Cordeliers; the Minorites of the Ref. of Villacrezes, established at the end of the 14th century; the Colettanerins, by Abbess Nicolette of Corleni, in Picardy; the Amadeists, by Amadeus, a Portuguese; the Neutri, or Neutres, an order standing between the Conventuals and the Observanti, and the Caperolani. — The Spanish Count, Juan de la Puebla († 1493), established a congregation for the strictest observance of the ancient rule. His disciple, John of Guadalupe, founded the society of the "Barefooted;" they wore coats of rough, ash-coloured stuff, cowls of the form of a bishop's mantle, and walked either without shoes, or with wooden or linen sandals.

impossible, Pius V. (1566) revoked their earlier rights, and ordered that no superior should eat outside of the refectory, or own a room besides the dormitory, or dispense the goods of the cloisters, and that no monk should possess any property. — Boniface VIII. (1300), in case bishops refused the mendicant orders the privilege of preaching and hearing confessions in their dioceses, had himself given them the right, and also that of burying in their churches, providing they presented the priests with the fourth part of the income thus obtained. Clement V. (1311) confirmed this. As the people crowded to the indulgenced churches of the M. O., the Synod of Vienne attempted the abrogation of their exemptions, but without success. Urban VI. deprived them of the right (1384) of preaching and hearing confessions at will, and confirmed the prerogatives of bishops and priests. His successors, however, granted them favors. — Among the Franciscans the most influential were the Tertiarii. As many husbands and wives, moved by the preaching of Francis, declared their willingness to leave all and follow him, he advised them to remain true to their domestic obligations and to practise the Christian virtues, and drew up, accordingly, a rule of life for them. Thus originated the so-called third order of St. Francis. The Florentines built a house for women who desired to quit the world and exercise themselves in Christian practices. Their regulations were as follows: — None but faithful Catholics were to be received as members; neither the dissolute; nor any married person without the consent of his partner. One year's novitiate over, a vow was made to keep the Divine commands, never to leave the order except to become monks or nuns, and, three months after their profession, to make a will. Their clothing was to be of coarse cloth, neither quite white nor quite black; forbidden to attend theatres, balls and dances, and commanded to abstain from meat on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, and to fast from Martin-mass to Christmas, and from Quinquagesima to Easter, also every Friday, except when Christmas came on that day; to prepare but two meals a day (cases of sickness excepted), to say the prescribed prayers, daily to hear mass, to confess on Christmas eve, Easter, and Whitsuntide, to take an oath only in case of necessity, to keep the peace with every man, and to avoid litigation. The ministri, or mothers, were to visit the sick, and exhort them to repentance. All were to attend the festival of a departed brother or sister, and the priest to say mass for the soul of the deceased. An annual visitation was to be made, and the incorrigible excommunicated. — Honorius III., Greg. IV., and Nich. IV. (1289) sanctioned this rule, the last mentioned with some alterations. Frederick II. persecuted them, and, as the heretical Fratricelli and Beghards had insinuated themselves into their ranks, John XXII. found it necessary by means of a bull to distinguish the genuine Tertiarii from them. Congregations of Tert. were formed in divers countries: in Spain (1403), Portugal (1444), Lombardy (1447), France (1289 and 1594). — The cloistered women of this third order claim as their foundress, St. Elizabeth of Thuringia (1229); in Foligno were established (1342) the Tert. living in seclusion (reclusæ), and the female Hospitaliers (sœurs grises) were contemporary with the order itself. These last were divided into sisters of the cells, who lived off alms and served the sick promiscuously, the sœurs de la faulle, and the sœurs grises proper. In 1567 were established in Madrid the Hospital-brothers of the third order of St. Francis, sometimes called Obregoni from their founder, Bernhard of Obregon, and the Penitent Brothers by five mechanics of Armentieres, in Flanders (1615), called Bons-Fieux.—In our day have been published, in German, some poems written by Franciscans, e. g., the cantico de la creature, and that commencing: In fuoco amor mi mise, by St. Francis; the Dies iræ, by Thomas, of Celano; and the Stabat mater, by Giacomone da Todi.

It must be admitted that the Franciscan Order sprang from a sincere desire to improve the moral condition of the age in which its founder lived. Sincere and honest in his intentions, while F. rigidly adhered to the faith and discipline of the Romish Church, he aimed at reducing them to practice in the lives and manners of his contemporaries. To accomplish this object, he established an order, and, imposing on its members the rule of poverty, commanded them to go forth and preach penance to a corrupt world.¹ ENGELHARDT.—Ermentrout.

Francis, of St. Paula, founder of the order of Minims, which aimed at surpassing the austerities of the Minorites, was born, 1416, at St. Paula, Naples, in answer to the prayers of his childless parents. He early showed an inclination to seclusive asceticism. In his 12th year he entered the Franciscan monastery of San Marco, in Calabria, and excited admiration by his severe self-discipline. Having returned to St. Paula, he betook himself to a grotto near the sea, and there practised his devotions and lived on herbs and the gifts of pious people. Scarcely 20 years old, some persons, attracted by his example, came and erected a cell and chapel near his grotto, and placed themselves under his direction. The number of these soon multiplied, and the Archb. of Cosenza gave them permission to build a monastery and church. In 1436 these buildings could accommodate a numerous corporation. This is, properly, the date of the foundation of the order; they called themselves "Eremites of St. Francis." To the three usual vows they added another of continual fasting, i. e., entire abstinence from all flesh, eggs, butter, cheese, milk, and food prepared with any of these articles; except in severe illness they allowed only bread, oil, and water. F. himself slept on a hard floor, never ate till after sunset, &c.; in a word, endeavored to outdo F. of Assisi. Still the order grew; a number of houses were established in Naples and Sicily. Paul III. sent, 1469, a chamberlain to investigate the truth of the wonders said to be wrought by F. The Archb. of Cosenza testified that F. was an extraordinary man, raised up by God to display his power. The chamberlain, however, made objections to Francis's extreme austerities, who then took glowing coals into his hands without being burned. The chamberlain went away convinced in F.'s favor, and reported accordingly, and Sixtus IV. confirmed the order (May 23, 1474), made F. superior-general, allowed him to found as many colonies as he could, and granted exemption from episcopal jurisdiction. Afterwards the statutes were renewed, with some modifications, by Innoc. VIII., Alex. VI., and Julius II. Alex. VI. changed their name to Minims.—The biographers of F. report many wonders as wrought by him—similar to the miracles performed by Jesus Christ. Louis XI., of France, sent for him, on his death-bed, and begged F. to pray that his life might be prolonged. F. counselled him, however, rather to be resigned to the will of God. Charles VIII., Louis' successor, retained F. at his court as a counsellor, and allowed him to build two monasteries in France, one in the park of Plessis-les-tours, where F. died. In 1519 Leo X. canonized him. The order spread over Italy, France, Spain, and Germany. At the beginning of the last cent. it numbered 450 monasteries, including 14 nunneries. Now there are but a few in Italy. Their dress is a long black woollen coat reaching to the heels, and a cowl of the same material.—(See HILARION DE COSTE, le portrait de S. Fr. de Paul, &c.: Paris, 1655).

KL.*

Francis, St. de Sales, was born, Aug. 21, 1567, at the castle of the Count de Sales, 9 miles from Annecy, in the diocese of Geneva. He received a careful education, studied law and theology in Paris, where he took the vow of chastity in the church of St. Stephen de Grez, and Padua, where the Jesuit Possevin impressed him with the necessity of combining piety with learning, in order effectually to resist Protestantism. He travelled through Italy; the catacombs roused his devotional sentiments. In 1593 he returned home, and became an advocate. His father had planned a marriage for him, but the scheme was frustrated. He was appointed cathedral provost of Geneva, and the expelled B. of Geneva ordained him a priest. Immediately he adopted measures to regain for Rome what it had lost through the Reformation. Thus Chablais was recovered. His chief residence was at Thonon. As soon as he gained a footing, he urged the imprisonment and banishment of the supporters of the Reformation (cf. St. BEUVE, hist. de Port Royal, Vol. I.). With the Pope's knowledge he promised Beza a cardinal's-hat if he would recant.—His success in producing a reaction in favor of Rome in several districts, led the B. of Geneva to appoint F. his coadjutor (1599). F. zealously improved the invasion of the French, by establishing 35 priests in the diocese. Gex having fallen over to France, F. went to Paris to arrange the affairs of that portion of the diocese of Geneva. He preached there with such effect that 72,000 "conversions" were attributed to his instrumentality. His reputation was further raised by he report that the Protestants had tried to poison him. After the death of Claudius de Granier, F. was consecrated Bishop (1602). He soon announced that he would not tolerate ignorant priests. He thoroughly reformed the monasteries — although a mendicant monk reproached him for allowing the people to dance. By the aid of Francisca of Chantal he founded the mild order of the Visitation (Salesianesses). He also effected an intimate relation between Chantal and Port Royal, over which, from 1619, he had great influence. To Angelica he confided his most secret grief at the immoralities of the priests and monks, of whom he often spoke also in ridicule. St. Charles Borromeo was his ideal of an ecclesiastic.—F. died Dec. 28, 1622, at Lyons, and was canonized in 1665. His anniversary is Jan. 29. His works, chiefly ascetic, were collected: Oeuvres compl. de S. Fr. de S. Paris et Lyon, chez. Gruyot, 1830–34, 5 vols. See BAUDRY, suppl. aux œuvres: Lyons, 1836. Bossuet says of him, that as he read the later scholastics more than the ancient Fathers, he was not very decided in his views. Having been associated with the French Academy, his name belongs to the history of French literature. His numerous, often somewhat far-fetched comparisons, indicate a predominant Spanish taste. His masterpieces: traité de l'amour de Dieu, and Philothea, are still worth reading.

¹ Upon F.'s life see MALAN, hist. de S. Fr. d'Assis: Par., 1841 (German, Munich, 1842). Upon the hist. of the order: LUCAS WADDING, Annales minorum s. trium ordinum a s. Fr. institut. (ed. 2, T. I.—XVII). For a hist. of the order until the commencement of the 18th cent., see Vol. VII. of HELYOT: Paris, 1714–19, VIII., 4to.—Concerning Franc. poets: A. F. OZANAM, les Poètes francisc. en Italie au treizième siècle: Paris, 1852, 8vo. (German, by JULIUS: Münster, 1853).

REUCHLIN.*

Francis Xavier, a most remarkable man in the history of Missions. He possessed rare qualities of mind and heart, was full of energy and zeal, and yet humble and meek; severe towards himself, forbearing towards others. He was fired with self-sacrificing zeal for the glory of Christ and the salvation of men, especially of heathen. He is not inappropriately called the Apostle of India — having resumed the (traditional) labors of the Apostle Thomas there. — He was born April 7, 1506, at the castle Xavier, near Pamplona, Spain, of a wealthy old noble family, and early displayed unusual talents. He studied at St. Barbara's College, Paris, obtained the degree of M. A., and lectured upon Philosophy. Literary distinction was the aim of his ambition. Ignatius Loyola was then studying theology in Paris, and Xavier became his roommate. At first X. ridiculed Loyola's fanaticism, but he was soon subdued by L.'s kindness and piety. At one time he inclined to Protestantism, and attended Prot. meetings; but L.'s warnings prevailed. He became daily more attached to L., shared his fastings, and at length concluded to study theology. There were six young men of talent and pious zeal, whom L. induced to take a religious pledge in Montmartre; of these Xavier was the chief. Upon the host they vowed perpetual chastity and voluntary poverty. After completing their studies they would go to Jerusalem and devote themselves to the service of Christians or the conversion of the Saracens. Should they be hindered in this they would unconditionally and without pay go whithersoever the Pope might direct. They designed setting sail from Venice, but as Venice was then at war with the Porte, they delayed, meanwhile serving in hospitals. X. had that of the Incurables assigned to him, where he spent the day in the humblest services, and the night in prayer. He paid special attention to persons with contagious or offensive diseases, in spite of the disgust at first excited. In 1537 he took priest's orders, lived in a wretched hut near Padua, preached repentance, and got his daily bread from door to door. After the Jesuit order was fully constituted, the ambassador of the King of Portugal asked for six Jesuits for the E. India mission. X. was chosen as one. John III. would gladly have retained him, but he was determined to bear the gospel to the heathen. The Pope appointed him apostolic Nuntius for India, with extensive powers. In 1541 he, with two other Jesuits, set sail. On the way he labored with the sailors. At Goa he found but feeble remains of Christianity; the heathen in a miserable condition; the Portuguese intent only on getting rich. To correct the low state of Christian morals, he instructed the children, and revived the seminary there. He attended the sick, visited prisoners, and early every morning he might be seen going around the streets ringing a bell to gather children and servants to the place of instruction. The power of his meekness and love seemed irresistible. A great revival followed his labors, and the vilest persons were reclaimed. He heard that the Paravas, on the coast of Coromandel, were in want of religious teachers, and immediately went thither with three assistants, and in answer to a prayer the entire tribe embraced Christianity and were baptized. Orlandini reports that in answer to his prayers the sick were healed, evil spirits cast out, and even two dead persons restored to life. He is said to have twice exercised the gift of tongues; to have smitten robbers with terror; and to have stayed a plague. At one time Malacca was beset by foes on sea and land, and the people were greatly alarmed. He ascended the pulpit, prayed and exhorted to trust in God: suddenly he paused, and after a few moments said the enemy had been routed; in a day or two the news of their defeat reached the place. He established, or restored, Christianity in many places. Jews, heathen, Mohammedans were converted, although the Brahmins and Bonzes violently opposed him. In Travankor he is said to have baptized 10,000 in one month, and whole villages in a day. Of course these conversions were too rapid to endure. He exerted greater influence by his ascetic life, and his kindness, than by wonders, although the truth of many of these seems well attested. He had a small catechism translated into the native language, from which he taught. He also urged the people to commit to memory the creed, the Lord's prayer, the ten commandments, the Ave Maria, and other prayers. In every place he appointed the fittest converts teachers. His plan was to establish a network of missions over the whole country, though he erred in thinking the Inquisition a necessary help. From 1547 he directed his eye to Japan, which the Portuguese had just discovered. In 1549 he went thither, learned the language, and preached. He baptized over 100 Japanese, and did some wonders there. But the Bonzes excited the hostility of the people and Emperor against Christianity, and its promulgation was forbidden on pain of death. Next he turned towards China. Although foreigners were threatened with perpetual imprisonment if taken on Chinese territory, and although many hindrances were put in his way, he determined to go there. He was willing to be imprisoned, for the sake of access to other prisoners. But when he reached the island Santhian, he was overtaken by death, Dec. 2, 1552. He died exclaiming: In te Domine speravi, non confundar in æternum. In 1662 Greg. XV. canonized him. By a breve of Benedict XIV., he was pronounced the patron of India. His statue, near Cape Comorin, is visited by heathen from far and near.—(See Hist. Soc. Jesu pars prima s. Ignatius auctore N. Orlandini: Antw., 1620. His biogr. by P. Bouhours, 1621, 4to. A critical biogr. of X. is still needed. Comp. Schröckh, chr. K.-gesch. seit d. Reform., III., Th. 528, 653, &c. Gieselr, Lehrb. d. K.-gesch. Ersch u. Gruber, Encycl.).

FRONMÜLLER.*

Francke, Aug. Hermann, was born in the city of Lübeck, March 23, 1663. His parents were highly respectable, and spent the utmost care upon his intellectual and religious training. His youngest sister, during her short life, exerted especially a salutary influence over him. In 1666 the family moved to Gotha, where F. passed through the gymnasium. In 1679 he visited the University of Erfurt, where he applied himself diligently to the Hebrew. Six months after he visited the University of Kiel, where he became an inmate of the family of Kortholt, whose lectures, conversation, and friendship were powerful agents in forming his mind. Having heard of his teachers that the Hebrew and Greek languages were the "two eyes in studying theology," he now applied himself to enlarge his knowledge of the former; in the latter he was already well versed. To gain his end he visited Hamburg, and enjoyed for two months the instructions of the celebrated Hebrew scholar, Esra Edzardi, who advised him to read, in course, the original Old Testament. In compliance with this advice, F. read the entire Hebrew Bible seven times in one year. He was encouraged in this not only by his respect for the Word of God, which, in its deeper meaning, was as yet little known to him; but also by a happy talent for acquiring languages. The French and English he had already acquired. It seems as if the Christian spirit, tired of the fetters of doctrinal scholasticism, had driven him instinctively to the study of the S. Scriptures. An engagement as companion and teacher of Hebrew to a young theologian, who was studying at Leipsic, enabled him, in 1684, to visit the latter University. This gave him an excellent opportunity of enlarging his theological and humanistic acquirements. Here he learned the Italian and Rabbinical languages, in 1685 became A. M., and founded, in connection with Paul Anton, the Collegium philobiblicum, which afterwards became very flourishing under his guidance, but also stirred up much hostility against him. During this his first sojourn at Leipsic, he gave offence only by a translation of two works of Molinos. Although we implicitly believe the translator, when he tells us that he does not assent to every opinion of Molinos; yet it cannot be denied that F. might have furnished the German reader with more wholesome nourishment. But he did not see the ultimate tendency of the works: he wished merely to lead the mind away from scholastic subtleties to an inward Christianity. — At this time his maternal uncle, Gloxin, minister at Lübeck, gave to him a second time the Shabelian family stipend, on condition that he should visit Lüneburg, in order to be instructed by the pious and learned superintendent, C. H. Sandhagen, in scriptural interpretation, especially of the prophets, and in the harmony of the gospels. This furnished the decisive factor in F.'s religious development. His youth had never been frivolous, but had been spent in diligent study: nevertheless he accuses himself that his theology was merely of the head, and not of the heart: that he studied the Scriptures to become learned, not to apply it to his heart and life: and that he had not considered it wrong by means of knowledge to attain to honors, wealth, and ease. With this state he became wholly dissatisfied, and there arose in him a longing for true godliness, and for an entire surrender to the cause of God. But he was to be brought to a deeper knowledge of sin and grace, of his sinful self and the Saviour, and to a living faith. This happened at Lüneburg. When on one occasion he had to preach on John 20:31, he saw that this faith was yet wanting to him. He tells us: "My entire life passed before me; I could enumerate every single sin; but soon the chief fountain came to view, viz: unbelief, or misbelief, with which I had so long deceived myself." He sank into a deep distress. He found how hard it was to have no God, to whom the heart might turn; to bewail his sins, and yet not to know why; nor who it was, that pressed out such tears, and whether there really was a God, whom he had offended. In this condition he knelt and prayed for deliverance from it, if there really was a God and Saviour. The Lord heard him suddenly. "Every doubt had vanished; I was assured in my heart of the grace of God in Christ; and I could now call Him, not only God, but also Father. All sadness and distress of the heart was removed; a flood of joy poured upon me, that from a full heart I praised and magnified God, who had granted me such abundant grace. In deep distress and doubt I bowed the knee; with inexpressible joy and assurance I arose again." A few days after he preached on John 20:31. "From that time," he tells us, "I became earnest in religion; and it also became easy for me to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts. From that time also I began to suffer more for the sake of the good." He had experienced, what is wanting in so many theologians and clergymen of his age. Hence his incessant efforts to impart his discovered treasure to others.—F. made known his new faith in his "auf Veranlassung christlicher Freunde aufrichtig und einfältig entworfenen Bekenntnisse seines inneren Wandels vor Gott" (in F.'s öffentl. Zeugn. v. d. Dienste Gottes, p. 13). A mind most deeply imbued with Christ is manifested in it; nor does it discover, even to the most rigid scrutiny any trace of heterodoxy. It could be easily foreseen, however, that the new spirit would burst many of the old and now effete forms.—F. left Lüneburg in the spring of 1688, and went to Hamburg, where he remained to Christmas of the same year. Here he became intimate with the lic. Nick. Lange, afterwards superintendent of Brandenburg. In conversations with the latter concerning prevalent errors in the education of children, the idea of establishing in Hamburg a private school for children suggested itself to him. He tells us that in this way he not only acquired patience and forbearance in the treatment of religious errors, but also learned how corrupt was the existing school-system, and how defective the training of children; and at this time already he entertained a strong desire to contribute something towards a reformation in the education and training of the young. He often said that his experience at Hamburg was the foundation of all that God had accomplished through him afterwards. The results of this experience he summed up in his "Von Erziehung der Kinder zur Gottseligk. u. christl. Klugheit."—His uncle permitted him to use his Shabellian stipend in visiting any university which he might prefer. He went to Leipsic, not without an anticipation of various struggles, but also fortified by a confident faith to meet them. He first visited Dresden, in order to derive strength and counsel from Spener. The latter approved of his design of giving practical exegetical lectures. On his return to Leipsic in the spring of 1689, F. lectured on several epistles of Paul, and this in the German. His room was soon too small for the crowd of hearers: Dr. Olearius, rector of the University, granted him the use of one of the academical halls, but even this became too small. Being charged during the summer vacation with the so-called lectiones cereales, he explained to nearly 300 hearers the 2d Ep. to Timothy. The collegia philobiblica were also still continued, and F. at the same time caused the more advanced students to deliver in his presence homilies on passages of Scripture. These exercises had a very happy effect on the students, who were led by them to the sadly neglected Scriptures, and thus also to Christianity. A new spirit, one of patience, self-examination, of active faith, seemed to animate the scholastic youth. At this time arose the name of Pietist. Other foreseen annoyances did not fail to arise: the new teacher was envied his brilliant success; the pedantic objection was urged, that the use of the German was intolerable; it was a fault that he made the way of salvation no easy thing; to many he seemed pretentious, as wishing to know more about this way than old doctors; he was already charged with deviating from true doctrine, and decried as the head of the new sect of Pietists, and as a hypocrite. Thus it happened that in 1690 the theological faculty prohibited his theological lectures; in the same year he left Leipsic, and in the year after, Schade and Anton, his colleagues in the collegia philobiblica, followed his example. After a short usefulness at Lübeck, he was appointed in June, 1690, to the diaconate in the Augustine church at Erfurt. Here, also, in union with Breithaupt (see Art.), he labored with much success. It appeared here, that the preaching of the pure gospel, however pungent, was most attractive. His sermons were listened to by persons from all the country around; even by Rom. Catholics some of whom came over to the Protestant Church. F. sought to increase the usefulness of his sermons by repeating them at home, and by spreading the N. Testament, and other good books. But here also, as was foreseen, trials were not wanting; some of them were prepared for him by his colleagues; others, by the fanatical Catholics, whom the government of electoral Mayence, to the jurisdiction of which Erfurt belonged, stirred up against the bold and powerful preacher of the gospel. After he had been vainly accused of scattering heretical books, an Electoral rescript ordered that he should be removed from the city as an originator of a new sect. F. complained of this order to the Council; but he was commanded to leave the city within two days. Having employed these days in comforting the members of his church, he left Erfurt in Sept., 1691,¹ and went to Gotha. Here he received a letter from Berlin, inviting him over into the Electorate of Brandenburg. Dec. 22, 1691, he was appointed Professor of the Greek and Oriental languages in the new University of Halle, to which the pastorate of the church of St. George at Glaucha, a suburb of Halle, was added.—He arrived at Halle Jan. 7, 1692, entered upon his pastorate in February, and commenced his lectures at Easter. For the latter he received no salary, since the pastorate had been given him for this purpose. He was now at the place, which, to the day of his death, was to be the sphere of his ever increasing labors.—In mentioning the name of A. H. Francke, the Orphan Asylum at Halle, and other institutions connected with it, are always suggested to the mind; these, however, form only a part of F.'s labors; his labors as pastor and teacher of theology are the true key to his other labors.—As pastor, he came into a long neglected congregation. His predecessor had been deposed for adultery; religion was at a low ebb, and luxurious vices stalked alongside of the bitterest poverty. The clergy were such as we generally find them at the origin of Pietism. They held stiffly to the pure doctrine and to the old routine of a comfortable pastorate. His field not only demanded great labor and patience, but he had also to expect that his colleagues would act towards him as they had done at other places. He first secured a position for himself by his sermons, which, as in Erfurt, made a deep impression, and attracted crowds from the entire city; for, although they were not marked by elegant rhetoric, gorgeous imagery and piquant anecdote, they nevertheless conveyed such a warm faith, simplicity, and love, connected with a bold condemnation of prevailing vices, that they could not otherwise than awaken and nourish Christian life. The citizens of Halle gladly turned from the dry, abstruse disquisitions of a dead orthodoxy, which were generally heard in the churches, in order to be once more edified by truly apostolical sermons. Francke's sermons, compared with those of our own age, are often very lengthy; but this was no objection then, and was, besides, more than atoned for by their rich matter. But F. trained his congregations in other ways also. Social meetings, held at first daily in his own house, and afterwards, in order to prevent evil reports, in the church, became to many a source of awakening and edification. For the neglected youth he instituted public catechizations, which were numerous attended by adults also. To his pastoral labors he devoted himself with untiring zeal, gaining the hearts by his mild and affectionate manner, and thus also securing a hearing for his admonitions. As confessor also he exerted a salutary influence by scrupulously attending to the wants of every individual. A rule of his own, that application to attend the Lord's Supper should be made in person at his house, assisted materially in this; for he improved the opportunity to examine their spiritual condition and to impart wholesome admonition. In order to engage with more freedom in this work, he declined the customary confessional fee. Besides this, he tried to increase his usefulness by various literary labors treating of different points of practical religion, such as the reading of the Scriptures, the true knowledge of Christ, prayer, also on dancing. That F., like Spener, combatted the errors connected with the pietistic movement, is well known. Thus he admonished separatists, who were fond of denouncing the established Church as Babel, that Babel was in their own hearts, so long as they uncharitably judged others. His knowledge of Christianity was also too deep to let him mistake an outward for a true renunciation of the world. — With his pastoral labors, those as academical teacher stand in close connection; this, in fact, is a peculiarity of the latter. We are thus led to the founding of the University of Halle. This University was from its beginning a nursery of the new spirit introduced by Spener and his friends, and S. had a decided influence on the appointment of its first theological teachers. A new institution could accommodate itself to the new spirit more readily than one that was hampered by ancient forms. But to form a just estimate of the labors of F. and his colleagues, it would be very improper to judge them by the standard of the later excrescences of the University. Francke is unjustly made a kind of forerunner of vulgar rationalism. Pietism, so far from being a bridge to modern neology, rather prevented its earlier appearance. Like the Reformation of the 16th cent., it possessed the great merit of bringing back an apostatizing age to the foundation of salvation, and of preventing the spread of indifferentism. It gave to the 18th cent. in Germany its religious impulse and character, which German rationalism in its utmost aberrations could never wholly ignore, and by which it was distinguished from the contemporary French philosophy. All human labor is modified by time and place both in its results and its essential qualities. In the German Lutheran Church orthodoxy had taken the place of the Scriptures, and scholastic forms that of a living, active faith.

¹ At Erfurt he yet wrote his "Abgenöthigte Fürstellung der ungegründeten und unerweislichen Beschuldigungen und Unwahrheiten, welche in dem jüngst in Leipsig publicirten Pfingstprogramm von Carpsov enthalten sind."

Pietism saw the deepest want of the age when it reversed the order. In this, of course, it manifested a certain onesidedness; but this was necessary and fully justified. — Francke was not a theological teacher; but how intimately he connected his professorship with theology, appears from his Easter programme of 1692, in which he commends the study of the Hebrew and Greek, the languages of the S. Scriptures. He held this office to 1699; in 1698 he became Professor of Theology, and continued such until his death. From 1716–17 he was prorector. His colleagues were Bayer (for a short time only) Anton, Breithaupt; after 1709, J. H. Michaelis and Joach. Lange; and, after 1716, Herrenschmid, who all labored in his own spirit. The theological faculty seemed thus peculiarly fitted to spread Spener's principles. F. began his theological labors in 1698 with an introduction to the O. T., and afterwards he extended these lectures to the N. T. Hermeneutics also seemed to him of great importance; he regarded it a chief requisite of the theological teacher to be a good interpreter of the S. Scriptures. Up to 1726 he lectured repeatedly on hermeneutics, and in 1712 he published his prælectiones hermeneuticæ. His rules he applied moreover in his expositions of portions or entire books of the Scriptures, especially of the Psalms and the Gospel of St. John. His maxim was: theologus nascitur in scripturis, and he lamented the fact that during his studies he had heard scarcely any exegetical lectures. Thus also in his Methodus studii theologici, he strongly commended the study of the originals of the Scriptures, and even of the Chaldaic. He desired that the Hebrew text should be as familiar to the theologian as the German. To this end the Collegium orientale, founded by him, rendered essential service. That his exegesis was sound, appears from the fact that he insisted strenuously upon the investigation of the literal sense. Nor, as appears from the above Methodus, did he suffer the other theological branches to be neglected. He did not even wish the so-called polemical theology to be set aside, but only that it should be properly regulated; since an intimate acquaintance with heresies helped to purify and protect piety: "that many, from ignorance of Ch. History, expressed opinions, which are untenable." Meth. st. th. c. III., § 31. He remarks, ibid., § 28, that in dogmatics two extremes must be avoided; we must assign to the study of it neither too much nor too little importance. As regards the first, he assails the reigning scholasticism, as calculated to lead some into skepticism; as regards the second, he rejects, with Spener, an error of pietism, which pretended that the study of the Scriptures made the study of doctrinal works unnecessary. Besides the courses of study already mentioned, he gave to his students careful instructions in everything needed for the discharge of their future duties; such as in catechetics, homiletics, pastoral theology, and even in casuistry. His lectiones paræneticæ were especially useful and instructive. These took place on Thursday, from 10–11, during which hour, by special arrangement of the faculty, no other lectures were given, so that every theol. student might be able to attend. They were intended to enforce upon the students all that belonged to an earnest religion, and to a proper discharge of official duties. He confined himself to no particular theme. In these lectures he also gave hints to his students as regards the proper arrangement of their studies. At first he gave special parænetic lectures on the Methodus studii theologici, which afterwards appeared under the same title; and gathered at the same time the materials for his idea studiosi theologiae (publ. 1712). After 1720 he gave special lectiones methodologicas, which had no connection with the parænetic lectures. These latter suggested also the Monita pastoralia theologica. From what has been said it is evident that F.'s theological strength is not to be sought in the field of strict science; his works also show this. The religious moral interest was so prominent with him, that he defined theology to be uberior christianismi cultura. He taught in connection with this, that Christ was the special aim of theological studies. In his Method. st. th. c. II., § 3, he expresses some beautiful sentiments on this point. Indeed such principles furnish a fruitful germ for a prosperous development of theological science. In his theological labors F. manifests an organizing talent similar to that which gave rise to the Orphan Asylum. — But if F.'s labors were crowned with important results, opposition also was not wanting. The clergy of Halle, even before F.'s arrival, had in their sermons made violent attacks on the Pietists, and drawn upon themselves thus a sharp reprimand from the government. The spirit of F.'s labors, the applause awarded to him, his influence among the citizens, the small numbers attending at the other churches compared with the crowds attending his, all this brought the ill-feeling against him to an outburst. Some excesses of his adherents, also, gave to his enemies welcome occasion for an attack upon him. See, it was said, what his doctrines lead to. The vilest reports were spread concerning his meetings for social prayer. Matters came to such a pass, that in Nov., 1692, the Elector appointed a special commission to settle the odious quarrel. The articles of agreement, which were far more favorable to F. than to the city clergy, were read on the last Sunday in Advent in all the churches within and without the city, and thus the peace restored until 1698. In this year F. gave new offence by a sermon on False Prophets. Although he avoided all personalities, it was nevertheless evident to his hearers that he referred to abuses near at home. The clergy of Halle applied the sermon to themselves, and again from their pulpits fulminated against the Pietists, and even brought complaints against F. before the Consistorium. The latter called upon F. to answer, and to state his objections to the clergy. F. answered that it was not his fault if some of the clergy felt aggrieved by his sermon; at the same time he gave a manly statement of things which he censured in his colleagues, and complained especially that they had warned the people not to attend his church, since this was the road to hell. The clergy defended themselves, and accused F., with Breithaupt and Anton, of various errors. A second commission effected a compromise between the parties, which again was more favorable to F. and his colleagues than to the clergy. After this F.'s influence extended more and more. In 1715 he became pastor of St. Ulrich's, and thus member of the ministerium. At his death only two of his former opponents were still living, one of whom, J. G. Francke, but no relative, called him in a funeral discourse a theologian of the highest merit in the Luth. Church. He had various opponents abroad also, who attacked especially his labors as theological teacher. — F. suffered also violent attacks as founder of the Orphan Asylum and the other institutions connected with it; for they were, indeed, the most faithful expression of his spirit, and contributed most largely in establishing and extending his influence; but to these attacks, also, we owe an extended account, by F.'s own pen, of the origin and progress of this grand creation of the newly awakened Christian spirit. — Being pained to see the coarse habits and ignorance of many members of his church, he took occasion at the stated distribution of alms to instruct the poor in the concerns of the soul. From 1594 he had them all to come to his house, questioned the young from the catechism whilst the old listened, then addressed to them an exhortation and closed with prayer, after which he distributed the alms and announced that he would continue thus every week. The great ignorance which he thus discovered, led to another step. He sought to bring a number of children to school by presenting the school-fees to the parents; but the latter, though they punctually came for the money, did not send their children. Meantime, in order to relieve the distress of the poor, he had also commenced to send around a savings box for the charitable gifts of pious Christians; but afterwards he put up such a box at the door of the parsonage, and inscribed upon it 1 John 3 : 17, and 2 Cor. 9 : 7. One day, about Easter of 1695, he found that a charitable hand had deposited 7 florins. It was by a pious widow of high connections named Knorr. He at once determined to begin with it a charity school. On the same day yet he purchased books for two thalers, and engaged a poor student to give instructions two hours daily, paying him two groshen a week for his services. This is the beginning of Francke's institutions, which, by the blessing of God, have benefitted so many thousands both for time and eternity. The school was opened in an antechamber of F.'s study. But his first experience was discouraging; for of 27 children which had received books, only four returned; the others sold their books and staid away. New books were purchased, which were always left in the school. To encourage the children, a small alms was distributed to them weekly. After the 7 florins were spent, new contributions flowed in. It was soon known with what care the children of the poor were taught, and a number of citizens offered to pay a weekly fee, if their children also were admitted. The number of scholars increased so much, that a second and third room had soon to be rented. The paying were now separated from the charity scholars, and separate instructions given to each. But as F. always found that home example destroyed the impressions made at the school, he resolved to take a few children under his constant care. An unexpected legacy enabled him to support an orphan from the yearly interest. Looking around for such a subject, four were named to him, and he determined to receive them all (Nov. 5, 1695). On the 16th of Nov. they numbered already nine. The supervisor of them was G. H. Neubauer, a pious student, who ever after was F.'s zealous and disinterested assistant. During the next year a house adjoining the parsonage was purchased; and the year following a second one. The number of orphans soon rose to 150, for whom free boarding was provided. From these the teachers for the charity school were now divided into males and females, the number of classes increased, and a class for the elements of the higher studies added to the school for paying scholars. At the same time a school was established for the sons of the nobility.—As there was not sufficient room for all demands, F. resolved to build an Orphan Asylum, the corner-stone of which was laid July 24, 1698. To this, kings, princes, and menials contributed their portion. It was completed in 1701, and occupied by the orphans. New additions were made to it from year to year, as circumstances demanded. In 1698 the number of orphans was 100, and at F.'s death 134. The pupils in the different schools numbered in 1698, 500; in 1709, 1100; in 1714, 1775; and at F.'s death, 2207.—In all these labors F. was energetically supported by a number of excellent men. This was natural; for an activity like that of F. creates its own agents and instruments. We mention Elers, founder of the book establishment of the Asylum (see his life by Dr. Knapp, in his Leben from. Männer des 18. Jahrh.; Hal., 1829); Chr. Fr. Richter, author of well-known hymns, and physician to the Asylum, † 1711; and Herrenschmid, after 1715 his colleague in the theol. faculty, and after 1716 subdirector of Asylum; † 1723.—Notwithstanding the faithful assistance of these men, F.'s immense labors soon injured his health. To restore this, he made various journeys through Germany as far as into Holland. These journeys helped to create supporters for his undertakings, to remove prejudices, and to convert enemies into friends. In 1726 he felt his strength diminishing. May 15th he gave his last parænetic lecture. May 24th he spent for the last time with several friends in the garden of the Asylum, when he offered a fervent thanksgiving for the merciful providences of God. He died June 8, 1727. He left a daughter and a son. Rich materials for F.'s biography may be found in the collected Epicedien: Halle, 1727, fol.—Francke's Stiftung., eine Zeitschr.; herausg. von Schulze, Knapp u. Niemeyer. On F. as academic teacher, see especially in the latter, Vol. 2, p. 221, an essay by Schulze. Also, Guericke, A. H. Francke, eine Denkschr. zur Säc.-Feier seines Todes: Halle, 1827. A. H. Francke, od. Macht u. Segen des Gebetes u. Gottvertr., by Rosalie Koch; Breslau, 1854; a book for the people. HERZOG. — Reinecke.

Frank, Sebastian, born about 1500 at Donauwörth, was one of those fanatical sectaries of the age of the Reformation, who have furnished modern Don Quixottes of the spirit, and Romanists a welcome opportunity for traducing the Reformation, and for opposing the positive philosophy and faith of the Evangelical Church. His first appearance was at Nuremberg, where, in 1528, he translated and prefaced a work of Althamer, Luth. preacher at N., entitled "Diallage od. Vereinig. d. streit. Sprüche i. d. Schrift." He also published a work against drunkenness, in which already the germs of pantheism and false subjectivism become apparent. His views found no favor with Luther and the Nurembergers, and F. therefore sought a field more congenial to his taste in S. W. Germany, to which the contagion of the Anabaptist disturbances of North Germany had spread. He went to Strassburg, where he published his "Chronika, etc., von Anbeg. bis, 1531." His lively, attractive, and popular style shows him to have been one of the best German prose writers of his age. But his history, though it evidences immense reading, shows little tact and judgment. Melancthon called him an "indocta conditor historiae." Whatever his defects, his is still the merit of having written the first universal history in German.—The work gave him no abiding place at Strassburg. Bucer seems to have opposed him. We find him next at Esslingen on the Neckar, where he gained a living as soap-boiler. In 1533 he moved to Geislingen, in the territory of Ulm, which latter city, in 1534, offered him gratuitously the rights of citizenship. He now lived by his pen. But his liberal-minded patrons in Ulm sustained him with difficulty against Melancthon, Bucer, Frecht von Ulm, and the landgrave of Hessen. When, therefore, in 1535 his "Paradoxa" appeared, the storm burst over him. His citizenship was taken from him, and he was warned to leave the city; but being well represented in the council, he was suffered to remain until 1538. Meantime Schwenkfeld had also created disturbances, and F. did not avoid all contact with him. On the 3d of July, 1539, he was forced to leave the city, and henceforth led a vagrant life until he died in 1545, at Basel. His doctrines were condemned at the convention of Smalcald in 1540. Luther, also, denounced him in the strongest terms.—(See ERBEK, Gesch. der prot. Sekt. im Zeitalt. der Ref.—SCHENKEL, das Wes. des Protestantismus. WALD, de vita Franci: Erl., 1793.—CH. K. AM ENDE, Nachlese zu F.'s Leb. u. Schriften: Nurnberg, 1796). H. MERZ. — Reinecke.

Frankenberg, John Henry, Count of, Archb. of Mechlin, and primate of Belgium, played an important part as chief defender of the Catholic Church in B., against the reforms of Joseph II. He was born Sept. 18, 1720, at Grossglogau, in Silesia, and showed in his earliest youth such a strong inclination to the clerical office, that he was sent by his parents, who were zealous Catholics, to the Jesuit College of his native city, and afterwards, also under Jesuit supervision, to the University of Breslau. In his 19th year already he received the four lower orders, and a leanery at the Cathedral. Without, however, entering upon his office, he went to Rome, and continued for five years longer his theological studies in the German Hungarian College. A discussion on canonical law, which he held shortly before he left the College, so much delighted Pope Benedict XIV., that the latter embraced him and remarked: "In this youth the Church will receive a great man." Having returned to Germany, he was appointed coadjutor by the Archb. of Görz; and ten years later, in 1759, Archb. of Mecheln, and member of the Belgic Council of State, by Maria Theresa. In this position he had an extensive influence, preached frequently on festive occasions, endeavored to reform his clergy, and by his charities gained the affections of the poor. On account of his influence and his labors for the Church, Pius VI. created him (June 1, 1778), cardinal. The Emperor Joseph himself placed the cardinal's hat upon his head. Several years later, however, we find him leading a violent opposition to the ecclesiastical reforms of the Emperor. For when the latter, in order to elevate the standing as regards learning of the Belgic clergy, endeavored in 1786 to abolish the Episcopal seminaries, in which alone the clergy were educated, and to substitute a general seminary located at Louvain, and under the direction of the government; F. was the first to remonstrate earnestly to the Emperor, claiming theological instruction as belonging to the Church and the bishops. In spite of this remonstrance, the seminary at Louvain was established, with an affiliated one at Luxemburg; and an order, moreover, issued that only such as had studied five years at this seminary could obtain the higher orders. The Episcopal seminaries were also abolished. F. once more remonstrated, showing that the bishops had good reasons to suspect the general seminary, since in the edict by which it was established, expressions such as "rational theology," "pure and rational worship," created a strong suspicion that by means of it certain principles (Jansenism) were to be introduced. The seminary was nevertheless established, and the bishops had to send in their pupils; the latter, however, had been well filled with prejudices against the new school and its teachers. The government had very unwisely appointed as teachers not only Jansenists, but also fanatical illuminati and rationalists, who rudely assailed whatever their pupils had been taught previously, and derided their zeal in observing the ceremonies of their religion. The dissatisfaction of the pupils, inflamed already in advance, broke out in open resistance; the military was sent out against the young theological rebels, a part of them imprisoned, others dispersed, and thus, after a few months, the seminary, which had opened with 300 pupils, was dissolved. The cardinal, suspected of being the instigator of these troubles, was summoned to Vienna, where he was kept prisoner for some time; but, as the troubles in Belgium were constantly increasing, was sent home again, and welcomed on his return with universal joy. Repeated efforts to restore the seminary at Louvain were unsuccessful; for F. continued his remonstrances and restored his own Episcopal seminary. When by a decree of Jan. 21, 1788, he was forbidden under a penalty of 1000 thalers to have theology taught in his seminary, and a penalty of 50 thalers imposed upon any professor violating the decree, F. declared it illegal, and refused obedience for himself and others. Hence on Aug. 1, imperial commissaries, accompanied by a considerable body of soldiers, were sent to the different Episcopal seminaries in order forcibly to conduct the pupils to Louvain. At Mechlin and Antwerp this occasioned bloody scenes. Cardinal F. was ordered to proceed to Louvain in order to examine the doctrines taught there, and to state his objections. After various delays and evasions, he gave, June 26, 1789, an extended report on the instructions given in the seminary, the opinions of its teachers, and the text-books; all which he pronounced unorthodox and Jansenistic. His chief objection however, was, that the seminary was a violation of the rights of the Church. This report was at once scattered in numerous copies in all the Belgic dialects, and employed as a means of agitation. Being accused by the imperial minister of its publication, F. protested his innocence, asserting at the same time his right to publish his judgment in a matter of such importance to the entire Belgic Church. In the meantime the troubles increased, but, in consequence of the French revolution, assumed a more political character until it came to an insurrection of the whole nation. F., regarded by the Austrian party as the instigator of it all, and repeatedly threatened with imprisonment, retreated to a place of safety. The Emperor in the meantime died: Belgium became a victim of the French revolution, which proceeded against the church in a still more radical way. Here also F. resisted boldly, and was therefore condemned by the National Convention, Oct. 10, 1797, to deportation. He died at Breda, Holland, June 11, 1804. See AUG. THEINER, der Card. J. H. von Frankenberg u. s. Kampf für d. Freiheit der Kirche, etc.: Freib. im Breisg. 1850. A partisan work, though reliable as to facts.

KLÜPFEL.—Reinecke.

Frankfort-on-the-Main, Reformation and Ev. Church of. Among the cities which felt the salutary and quickening spirit which arose at Wittenberg. F. must also be mentioned. Many distinguished men, such as Conr. Hensel, Pastor at St. Bartholomews; John ab Indagine, the learned dean of St. Leonards, who thought that he had read the approaching revolution in the stars; and Th. Murner, a Franciscan of original mind, had prepared the way. Among the old families of the city there was a lively taste for science and literature. The excellent Philip v. Fürstenberg spoke and wrote both Latin and Greek, and stood in correspondence with the best minds of his age. The immortal Amandus v. Holzhausen rivalled him in his labors for the common weal and in his love for studies. These men, with others of a like mind, resolved no longer to send their children to the Catholic school; and by the advice of Erasmus, they called, in 1521, the ardent young humanist, Wm. Nesen, from Louvain to F., as a teacher for their sons. He was an admirer of Luther and Melancthon. From his school the gymnasium subsequently arose. When in April of the same year Luther, on his journey to and from Worms, remained twice over night in F., he was joyfully welcomed by these men. They were also the chief agents in F. for the reformation of the Church. On Invocavit Sunday, in 1522, Amandus opened the Church of the monastery of St. Catherine, of which he was the pastor, to the first Ev. preacher, Hartm. Ibach. The elector of Mayence, to whose diocese F. belonged, at the instigation of P. Meyer, the city pastor, made indeed the most strenuous efforts to check the innovations; but since on the other side the neighboring nobility, with Hartmuth v. Kronberg at their head, arose menacingly, and Ulrich v. Hutten also joined in the opposition. Ibach continued to preach for some time longer, until he thought it more safe to retire from the city. A second Ev. preacher, Dietr. Sartorius, whom Amandus appointed for the same church, could maintain himself only for a short time; in return for which the enraged burghers in 1524 expelled the hated Meyer, who had by his intrigues, even more than by his violent sermons, excited their ill-will.

The year 1525 with its storms did not leave F. unscathed. On the 2d. day of Easter, the guilds, instigated by foreigners, assembled in the church-yard of St. Peters. All the authority of the esteemed Amandus was required to lead the raging flood into a regular channel. Of the articles which, at his advice, were handed in to the magistracy, several demanded the abolition of ecclesiastical abuses. During these disturbances, preachers from abroad also made their appearance in the city; two of whom, Dionysius Melander, a former Dominican from Ulm, and J. B. Algesheimer, formerly priest at Mayence, were detained by the council in order to satisfy the congregation, and they at once made themselves masters of the parish Church, which had been vacant since the departure of Meyer. They were, indeed, men of bold daring, regardless alike of existing circumstances and future consequences; but they were just the men needed in those times to clear the ground upon which more sober minds could afterwards build. How cautiously the council steered between the demands of the parties, appears from the fact that in 1526 it called, on the recommendation of Card. Campegius, Dr. Fred. Nausea to the place of the expelled Meyer; but the preachers had so successfully wrought upon the guilds, and Dr. N., by insisting upon the expulsion of his opponents, had prepared for himself such an unenviable position, that at his first appearance in the Church, a fearful clamor of the assembled multitude prevented his being heard. He quitted the pulpit and the city. Whilst the council from motives of policy refused a closer union with the Elector of Saxony and the Landgr. of Hessen, the aversion to the old Church was constantly increasing. In 1527 the procession of Corpus Christi was interrupted by an unseemly farce; the fraternities dissolved, and the nuns returned to the world. In 1529 the bare-foot friars surrendered their monastery to the council; their guardian, P. Chomberg, became a preacher, and in the monastery church the Lord's Supper was for the first time dispensed under both kinds. In the following year the council appointed a fourth preacher, M. Limperger. In the other monasteries an inventory was taken of all articles of value, and these carefully locked up. All benevolent foundations in the hands of the clergy were abolished, and united in a common fund. The parish Church was still divided between Catholics and Protestants; violent animosities necessarily followed, and became ever more threatening. The preachers were often so lengthy, that the mass had to be omitted. At the beginning of 1533, Dion. Melander buried from the pulpit the anathema against the pope and the entire clergy; the effect was electrical; the rabble burst madly into the church, and destroyed its altar and images. The council was now placed in a critical position. The collegiate churches of St. Bartholomew, of Our Lady, and St. Leonhard, had brought suit against it before the imperial chamber for a violation of their franchises, and a mandate had already threatened the ban of the empire; Mayence and Aschaffenburg had cut off their supplies of wood and provisions: whilst from the other side the impetuous preachers, at that time the most potent men in the city, were urging that the congregation should accomplish by force what the council was neglecting. When the council represented the threatening danger to the guilds, and received from them the bold answer: that, whatever might happen, they would cleave to the council and the gospel, the city fathers thought that they could no longer observe moderation. April 23, 1533, the col. churches were commanded to discontinue the Catholic worship; the Catholic citizens were even forbidden to attend the mass in the neighboring villages; and a Catholic who had taken his child to another town for baptism, was fined 100 florins. The preachers now constructed a complete order of worship, on the basis of which the young Ev. Church consolidated its religious life, and increased so surprisingly, that in a short time only a small fraction of the citizens continued faithful to the old Church. But since the negotiations with Mayence, and the elector Palatine, who had been appointed mediator by King Ferdinand, had accomplished nothing; and since the request of the city to be received as a member of the Smalcald league was still ungranted; the Council found itself forced to compromise with the clergy, and in Nov. 1535 to reinstate the Catholic worship; although in the parish Church the preachers still maintained themselves alongside of the priests. Melander, the most impetuous of the preachers, was fortunately no longer in the city; he had left on account of difference with his colleagues. On Feb. 2, 1536, the city was received into the Smalcald league; in April the confederates held a convention in Frankfort, which was attended also by Melancthon and Bucer, through whose efforts was effected the compact between the theologians of Saxony and of Upper Germany, which afterwards was called the Wittenberg Concord.—In polemical works against the Reformed, it has often been asserted that the Evangelical Church of Frankfort was from the beginning of a clearly Luth. type; original sources how, however, that the prevailing tendency was to the Swiss type. Luther, as is well known, in 1533 sent an energetic warning to the Council against the concealed Zwinglianiam of their our preachers. The latter in their answer deny the odious charge; but proceed to a statement of their views on the Lord's Supper, which, in form and matter, differs in nothing from that of the cities of U. Germany. Confession, also, is a mere personal want; absolution is a mere announcement of grace, without sacramental character; to announce it is a right of every believer (See STEITZ, die Priv. Beichte u. Priv.-Absol. in ler Luth. K.: Frankf. 1854, pp. 160-63). For this reason, too, it was, that in 1536 the Frankf. preacher, J. B. Algesheimer, proceeded with the deputies of the suspected cities of Upper Germany to Wittenberg to subscribe the Concord. The form of worship introduced at first into the churches of F., shows the same inclination to the views of the Reformed. For whilst the Saxon Church regarded the celebration of the Lord's Supper as the culmination of every principal Lord's day service, and gave to the Roman mass only a purer and more scriptural form; the services in F. were held in that simpler form which agreed so well with the puritan sense of the Reformed Church, and the celebration of the Lord's Supper was restricted to every third Sunday. But a Luth. tendency gradually found entrance into the ministerium. In 1536, P. Geltner, a disciple of Luther, was called to F.; and in the name of this city subscribed, in 1537, the Articles of Smalcald. Notwithstanding this, a violent controversy arose a few years after between his party, and Ambach, Lulius and Ligarius, who were of Reformed tendencies, concerning a catechism by Ambach, in which sufficient prominence had not been given to the Luth. doctrines. In order to calm the minds heated with doctrinal zeal, the council again invited Bucer to Frankfort, who succeeded, Dec. 9, 1542, in restoring peace by the so-called Frankf. Concord. Geltner's equivocal character did not suffer him to gain in F. any decided advantages for Lutheranism; the victory of which is due to H. Beyer, a man of uncommon force and energy, who about this time commenced his labors in the imperial city. Born in 1516 at F., he had spent 12 years at Wittenberg, and adopted entire Luther's thoughts and language. Called in 1545 by the Council to the ministry, he not only preached decidedly in the mind of his great teacher; but also determined to assimilate the form of worship of the Church of F. to that of Saxony. The Interim diverted him from this plan forever. — After the unfortunate issue of the war in Upper Germany, the disheartened Council, in spite of the opposition of the preachers and the guilds, opened Dec. 29, 1546, the gates of the city to the imperial troops, renounced the league, and bought with heavy sacrifices the Emperor's forgiveness. When the latter published, May 15, 1548, the Interim at Augsburg, the deputy of F. ventured a hint about conscience, but was intimidated by the threats of the imperial vice-chancellor. At F. they could venture to enforce the new law only gradually. When, on July 5th, a committee of the Council warned the preachers to be silent in their sermons with regard to the Interim, and not to attack papal doctrines and ceremonies, they answered that their office required them to be watchful shepherds of their flocks. By the Church constitution of 1533, all festivals except Sunday and one day of Christmas had been abolished; in consequence of the acceptance of the Interim, the Council ordered, Aug. 10, 1548, the preachers to announce on the following Sunday the restoration of the festivals ordered by it, and the prohibition of meat on fast-days. Ambach, Lulius and Beyer, positively refused to do so, and only Geltner yielded. The Council, on Feb. 25, 1549, once more besought the clergy to comply with the Interim; at least so far as to use the surplice, and to place lighted candles upon the communion table; but the result was the same. Beyer at the same time consulted Melancthon, Aepinus, Pistorius, Brenz, and other theologians; and wrote out in full his own reasons, why he declined every equivocal compromise between considerations of prudence and the positive demands of conscience. One concession, however, the preachers could not escape; they announced the festivals, but "without prayers." The most painful sacrifice which they had to make, was the parish church of St. Bartholomew, which they vacated, Oct. 4, 1549, to the Catholics.

During the siege of F., in 1552, by Maurice of Saxony, and Albert of Brandenburg, the citizens had to serve in its defence, stand guard, etc.; hence the churches were unvisited, and the week-day festivals again went into disuse. Nor did the preachers, after the siege had been raised, resume the load imposed upon them; and on second Christmas the churches were consequently closed. Although the Interim had been set aside by the compact of Passau, the Council nevertheless from unknown motives ordered, Jan. 5, 1553, the restoration of the festivals commanded by it. The preachers, who saw in this an effort to foist in again the entire Interim, refused in language which exceeded all that their excited anger had ever dictated. The Council was silent, until on Saturday before Easter the senior Mayor, through the sexton, commanded the preachers that they should observe Easter Monday as a festival. Geltner alone complied. Beyer on Easter Sunday admonished his congregation that if on the following day the church-bells should be rung, they should remain at home. For this he was promptly dismissed from his office, but restored again through the solicitation of his colleagues. In the main points the preachers remained victors; only as late as 1576 the Council after repeated efforts succeeded in enlarging the original simple cycle of festivals by the festival of the Circumcision of Christ and the Ascension.—Through Beyer's labors and force of character, Lutheranism had found entrance among the congregation and the preachers; of the latter only Lulius and Ambach yet represented the views of Upper Germany; they, however, on account of their great age and lengthy sermons had been dismissed from their pulpits. At this time, 1552, the fanatical Westphal renewed the sacramental controversy; in F. also the unhappy quarrel flamed up and aided rigid Lutheranism to a decided victory.

In 1553 the persecutions of Mary of England compelled the Netherland refugees to seek securer homes in other countries. The sacramental controversies had just inflamed the minds, and since the strangers held the Calvinist doctrine, they were refused a home nearly everywhere on the continent. A part of them at last found a home in East Friesland; others in the imperial cities of Wesel and Strasburg, and in Geneva. In 1554 Valerandus Polanus, a Reformed preacher, arrived in F. also. He was born in Ryssal, Flanders, and had in a work of his own defended Calvin's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. In 1547 he had gone with his countrymen to England as superintendent of the exile congregation Glassenbury. After the accession of Mary he proceeded to Frankfort. He at once called upon several preachers, especially Beyer, but avoided all discussion concerning the Lord's Supper, and also concealed his design of forming a congregation. March 15, he sent a petition to the Council, requesting that he and others might be received into the city, and that a church might be granted them; since, though one in faith with the citizens, they yet had a different language. Both requests were granted. Many other exiles followed them; they established a presbytery and a French school, and on Sunday, April 21, they opened divine service in the French language. On May 5th the two preachers, Beyer and Ritter, discovered that on the next day the Lord's Supper was to be celebrated; and this with rites so different from their own, that they were confirmed in their suspicions of Calvinism. On their information this celebration was forbidden by the authorities, and the preachers warned their congregations against errors. But when, soon after, the communion was observed, and this with glasses and the breaking of bread, and the faces of the pictures in the church of the exiles were covered with paper, the former ill-will broke out in open hatred. On June 27, a party of English Protestants, with their preacher, Wm. Whittingham, arrived at F., and obtained the use of the same church as the other exiles. In June, 1555, a party of Flemish Protestants followed, who had called John de Lasky and P. Dnthen as their preachers; these also established their worship in the Dutch language in the same church. In the English congregation John Knox labored from Nov., 1554, until March, 1555. At his arrival the congregation was divided into two parties; the one insisting upon the use of the Angl. ritual, the other upon the introduction of the Genevan liturgy. Under the supervision of Knox the Angl. liturgy was revised, and several rites were excluded as savoring of Popery and superstition. Peace had scarcely been restored, when several other Anglicans, Dr. Cox, teacher of Edward VI., among them, arrived at F. and sought by forcible means to restore the discarded ceremonies. Notwithstanding Knox's admirable moderation towards them, the Cox faction endeavored to secure his suspension. Failing in this, they denounced Knox, on account of an expression used in his last work with regard to the contemplated marriage of Mary with Philip of Spain, for violating the majesty of the Emperor, his son, and the

Queen. The Council fearing that the denouncers would apply to the Imperial chamber, requested Knox to leave the city; which he did March 26, 1555. — If the protection awarded to the exiles by several respectable patricians displeased the preachers, they were still more displeased when the Anglicans in the Fall of the same year, on account of great inconveniences arising from the common use of one church by three congregations, applied for the common use of the Luth. Church of St. Catharine; in which request they were also energetically supported by their patrons. On complaint (Sept. 5) of the preachers, the latter were charged by the Council to report on the deviations of the exiles from the Augsb. Confession; and now commenced that series of controversial tracts, which continued nearly two centuries, and forms a dark shadow in the Ch. History of F. — In this deluge of controversial tracts we mention as most important only the Purgatio of de Lasky, in which he admirably portrays Calvin's doctrine on the Lord's Supper, and defends it with the altered Augsb. Confession. In the same year, 1556, in which, in his own name and that of his colleagues, he sent this work to the Council, he returned to his own country. Calvin being at F. at the same time, hoped in vain to change the preachers to more moderation; they refused every personal meeting. Melanchthon's efforts to the same purpose had no better effects. But the exiles were still more injured in the Council by their own quarrels; nor were fanatics wanting among them who expressed Anabaptist views. After long and fruitless negotiations the Council at last resolved, April 22, 1561, that the foreign preachers should abstain entirely from preaching, until they had united in their views with the native preachers. All remonstrances were unable to alter this decree. In the following year, therefore, a large number of the exiles emigrated to the Palatinate, where they enjoyed the free exercise of their religion. The Anglicans had before already returned to England, Elizabeth having now ascended the throne. — The remainder of the Walloons, the germ of the modern Fr. Ref. congregation, continued their worship for a time longer in a private house; that of the Flemings, the founders of the Germ. Ref. congregation, in a barn. In 1594 Dr. F. Gomarus, who from 1588 had been minister among the Flemings, was expelled the city on pretence that contrary to a decree of Council he had married a foreign wife, and his congregation was forbidden to appoint a successor. Aug. 11, 1596, the Walloons had to discontinue their private assemblies. In consequence of this 200 families removed to Hanau, where they opened divine services in French and Dutch. The remnant at F. assembled for worship in the neighboring Bockenheim and Offenbach. During the thirty years war the Walloon congregation came near to entire dissolution. In 1633 the Flemings restored their worship at Bockenheim, but used the Germ. language. The Walloons also built, in 1638, a church for themselves in the same place. The oppression endured by the Reformed F., necessarily awakened a fraternal feeling among them. When the revocation of the edict of Nantes and the persecution of the Waldenses n Piedmont occasioned a large emigration, large companies of the exiles arrived at F., in the vicinity of which many of them settled and established French congregations.—The history of the Luth. congregation presents little that is interesting. Its domestic peace was temporarily disturbed by several adherents of M. Flacius Illyricus, who, in 1575, died at F. in exile. Petreus, rect. of the gymnasium, who had married the widow and adopted the principles of this restless man, was driven, in 1681, from his office and from the city. The disaster at Antwerp, Nov. 5, 1576, by the Spaniards, brought a new accession to the congregation. These numerous exiles were welcomed the more heartily to F., as they adhered to the unaltered Augsb. Confession. Among them was the preacher, C. Reinus, from Sevilla in Spain. They connected themselves with the Luth. congregation, which allowed them, up to 1788, to hold divine services in French in the Weissfrauen church. For the purpose of taking care of the poor they have, however, an independent organization with deacons and elders.—An excellent arrangement of the Luth. Church at F. was the Seniory. The senior clergyman was the chairman of the Luth. ministerium and provost of the rural clergy; he was director of the Theological Seminary, superintended the studies of the students, conducted the examinations, and ordained and inducted into office. He was, in short, to give unity to the labors of the ministerial office. He was called from abroad, and through his position and character exercised generally an important influence. Among the 12 seniors, who were invested with this office from March 25, 1618, to Nov. 1822, the most celebrated was Dr. Phil. Jac. Spener, from 1666 to 1686 (see Art. Spener). After him Dr. J. P. Fresenius, the well-known author of numerous works, and opponent of the Reformed and Moravians, deserves to be mentioned. He was senior from 1748–1761 (see concerning him, Lappenberg, Reliq. l. Fräul. v. Klettenberg: Hamb., 1849). With the last senior, Dr. W. F. Hufnagel, who was called to F. in 1791, rationalism entered the ministerium, which held on to Lutheranism in the way of a petrified orthodoxy; and, being represented with spirit, learning, taste, and social act by so gifted a mind, spread rapidly among the higher and middle classes of society. After his death the seniory remained vacant. Nor were the evils which thence arose to the congregation removed by the appointment of the oldest pastor as vice-senior.—After all the efforts of the two Ref. congregations at F. to obtain the free exercise of their religion, as also in the interposition of prominent sovereigns, such as Frederick the Great, had been useless, this opposition was at last softened by the milder spirit of the age which, in the latter half of the last century, not only melted away denominational differences, but also weakened all denominational consciousness. On Nov. 15, 1787, a decree of the Council allowed the two Ref. congregations to build houses of worship, but their preachers were still forbidden to administer baptism and marriage. On Oct. 10, 1806, all concessions were placed upon an equal footing.—These rights were again ratified to the Reformed

